chief among the tame and useful animals; the lion among the wild ones; the eagle among birds; and man, the head of all (the original headship of man over the animal kingdom, about to be restored in Jesus Christ, Psalm 8. 4-8, is also implied in this combination). They are, throughout Scripture, represented as distinct from God; they could not be likenesses of Him which He forbade in any shape. (3.) They are introduced in the third or gospel dispensation (Revelation 4. 6), as living creatures (not so well translated "beasts" in English Version), not angels, but beings closely connected with the redeemed Church. So also in Ezekiel 1. and 10. Thus, throughout the three dispensations, they seem to be symbols of those who in every age should officially study and proclaim the manifold wisdom of God. thou alone—lit., "Thou art He who alone art God of all the kingdoms;" whereas Sennacherib had classed Jehovah with the heathen gods, he asserts the nothingness of the latter and the sole lordship of the former. 17. ear . . . eyes—singular, plural. When we wish to hear a thing we lend one ear; when we wish to see a thing we open both eyes. 18. have laid waste—conceding the truth of the Assyrian's allegation (ch. 36. 18-20), but adding the reason, "For they were no gods." 19. cast . . . gods into . . . fire—The policy of the Assyrians in order to alienate the conquered peoples from their own countries was, both to deport them elsewhere, and to destroy the tutelary idols of their nation, the strongest tie which bound them to their native land. The Roman policy was just the reverse. 20. The strongest argument to plead before God in prayer, the honour of God (Exodus 32. 12-14; Psalm 83. 18; Daniel 9. 18, 19). 21. Whereas thou hast prayed to me—i. e., hast not relied on thy own strength, but on me (cf. 2 Kings 19. 20). "That which thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib, &c., I have heard" (Psalm 65. 2). 22. Transition to poetry; in parallelism. virgin . . . daughter—honourable terms. "Virgin" implies that the city is, as yet, inviolate. "Daughter" is an abstract collective feminine personification of the population, the child of the place denoted (Note, ch. 23. 10; 1. 8). Zion and her inhabitants. shaken . . . head—in scorn (Psalm 22. 7; 109. 25; Matthew 27. 39). With us to shake the head is a sign of denial or displeasure; but gestures have different meanings in different countries (ch. 58. 9; Ezekiel 25. 6; Zephaniah 2. 15). 23. Whom—Not an idol. 24. said—virtually. Hast thou within thyself? height—imagery from the Assyrian felling of trees in Lebanon (ch. 14. 8; 33. 9); fig. for, "I have carried my victorious army through the regions most difficult of access, to the most remote lands." sides—rather, recesses. [G. V. SMITH.] fir trees—not cypresses, as some translate; pine foliage and cedars are still found on the north-west side of Lebanon. [STANLEY.] height of . . . border—In 2 Kings 19. 23, "the lodgings of his borders." Perhaps on the ascent to the top there was a place of repose or caravansery, which bounded the usual attempts of persons to ascend. [BARNES.] Here, simply, "its extreme height." forest of . . . Carmel—rather, "Its thickest forest." Carmel expresses thick luxuriance (Note, ch. 10. 18; 29. 17). 25. digged, and drunk water—In 2 Kings 19. 24, it is "strange waters." I have marched into foreign lands where I had to dig wells for the supply of my armies; even the natural destitution of water there did not impede my march. rivers of . . . besieged places—rather, "the streams (artificial canals from the Nile) of Egypt." "With the sole of my foot," expresses that as soon as his vast armies marched into a region, the streams were drunk up by them; or rather, that the rivers proved no obstruction to the onward march of his armies. So ch. 19. 4-6, referring to Egypt, "the river—brooks of defence—shall be dried up." HORSLEY translates the Hebrew for "besieged places," rocks. 26. Reply of God to Sennacherib. long ago—join, rather, with "I have done it." Thou dost boast that it is all by thy counsel and might; but it is I who, long ago, have ordered it so (ch. 22. 11); thou wert but the instrument in my hands (ch. 10. 5, 15). This was the reason why "the inhabitants were of small power before thee" (v. 27), viz., that I ordered it so; yet thou art in my hands, and I know thy ways (v. 28), and I will check thee (v. 29). Connect also, "I from ancient times have arranged ('formed') it." However, English Version is supported by ch. 33. 13; 45. 6, 21; 48. 5. 27. Therefore—Not because of thy power, but because I made them unable to withstand thee. grass—which easily withers (ch. 40. 6; Psalm 37. 2). on . . . house-tops—which having little earth to nourish it fades soonest (Psalm 129. 6-8). corn blasted before it be grown up—SMITH translates, "The corn-field (frail and tender), before the corn is grown." 28. abode—rather, sitting down (Psalm 139. 2). The expressions here describe a man's whole course of life (Deuteronomy 6. 7; 28. 6; 1 Kings 3. 7; Psalm 121. 8). There is also a special reference to Sennacherib's first being at home, then going forth against Judah and Egypt, and raging against Jehovah (v. 4). 29. tumult—insolence. hook in . . . nose—like a wild beast led by a ring through the nose, he shall be forced back to his own country (cf. Job 41. 1, 2; Ezekiel 19. 4; 29. 4; 33. 4). In a bas-relief of Khorsabad, captives are led before the king by a cord attached to a hook, or ring, passing through the under lip or the upper lip, and nose. 30. Addressed to Hezekiah. sign—a token which, when fulfilled, would assure him of the truth of the whole prophecy as to the enemy's overthrow. The two years, in which they were sustained by the spontaneous growth of the earth, were the two in which Judah had been already ravaged by Sennacherib (ch. 32. 10). Thus translate, "Ye did eat (the first year) such as growth of itself, and in the second year that, &c., but in this third year sow ye," &c., for in this year the land shall be delivered from the foe. The fact that Sennacherib moved away his camp immediately after shows that the first two years refer to the past, not to the future. [ROSENEMULLER.] Others, referring the first two years to the future, get over the difficulty of Sennacherib's speedy departure, by supposing that year to have been the sabbatical year, and the second year the jubilee; no indication of this appears in the context. 31. remnant—Judah remained after the ten tribes were carried away; also those of Judah who should survive Sennacherib's invasion are meant. 33. with shields—He did come near it, but was not allowed to conduct a proper siege. bank—a mound to defend the assailants in attacking the walls. 34. (See v. 29, 37; ch. 29. 5-8.) 35. I will defend—Notwithstanding Hezekiah's measures of defence (2 Chronicles 32. 3-5), Jehovah was its true defender. mine own sake—since Jehovah's name was blasphemed by Sennacherib (v. 23). David's sake—on account of His promise to David (Psalm 132. 17, 18), and to Messiah the heir of David's throne (ch. 9. 7; 11. 1). 36. Some attribute the destruction to the agency of the plague (Note ch. 33. 24), which may have caused Hezekiah's sickness, narrated immediately after; but ch. 33. 1, 4, proves that the Jews spoiled the corpses, which they would not have dared to do, had there been on them infection of a plague. The secondary agency seems, from ch. 29. 6; 30. 30, to have been a storm of hail, thunder, and lightning (cf. Exodus 9. 22-25). The simoon belongs rather to Africa and Arabia, than Palestine, and ordinarily could not produce such a destructive effect. Some few of the army, as 2 Chronicles 32. 21 seems to imply, survived and accompanied Sennacherib home. HERODOTUS (2. 141) gives an account confirming Scripture in so far as the sudden discomfiture of the Assyrian army is concerned. The Egyptian priests told him that Sennacherib was forced to retreat from Pelusium owing to a multitude of field-mice, sent by one of their gods, having gnawed the Assyrians' bow-strings and shield-straps. Cf. the language (v. 33), "He shall not shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields," which the Egyptians corrupted into their version of the story. Sennacherib was at the time with a part of his army, not at Jerusalem, but on the Egyptian frontier, south-west of Palestine. The sudden destruction of the host near Jerusalem, a considerable part of his whole army, as well as the advance of the Ethiopian Tirhakah, induced him to retreat, which the Egyptians accounted for in a way honouring to their own gods. The mouse was the Egyptian emblem of destruction. The Greek Apollo was called Sminthian, from a Cretan word for a mouse; as a tutelary god of agriculture, he was represented with one foot upon a mouse, since field-mice hurt corn. The Assyrian inscriptions, of course, suppress their own defeat, but nowhere boast of having taken Jerusalem; and the only reason to be given for Sennacherib not having, amidst his many subsequent expeditions recorded in the monuments, returned to Judah, is the terrible calamity he had sustained there, which convinced him that Hezekiah was under the Divine protection. RAWLINSON says, In Sennacherib's account of his wars with Hezekiah, inscribed with cuneiform characters in the hall of the palace of Koyunjik, built by him (140 feet long by 120 broad), wherein even the Jewish physiognomy of the captives is portrayed, there occurs a remarkable passage; after his mentioning his taking two hundred thousand captive Jews, he adds, "Then I prayed unto God;" the only instance of an inscription wherein the name of God occurs without a heathen adjunct. The 46th Psalm probably commemorates Judah's deliverance. It occurred in one "night," according to 2 Kings 19. 35, with which Isalah's words, "when they arose early in the morning," &c., are in undesigned coincidence. they . . . they—the Jews . . . the Assyrians. 37. dwelt in Nineveh—about twenty years after his disaster, according to the Inscriptions. The word, "dwelt," is consistent with any indefinite length of time. Nineveh, so called from Ninus, i. e., Nimrod, its founder; his name means exceedingly impious rebel; he subverted the existing patriarchal order of society, by setting up a system of chieftainship, founded on conquest; the hunting field was his training school for war; he was of the race of Ham, and transgressed the limits marked by God (Genesis 10. 8-11, 25), encroaching on Shem's portion; he abandoned Babel for a time, after the miraculous confusion of tongues, and went and founded Nineveh; he was, after death, worshipped as Orion the constellation (Note, Job 9. 9; 33. 31). 38. Nisroch—Nisr, in Semitic, means eagle; the termination och, means great. The eagle-headed human figure in Assyrian sculptures is no doubt Nisroch, the same as Asshur, the chief Assyrian god; the corresponding goddess was Ashera, or Astarte; this means a "grove," or sacred tree, often found as the symbol of the heavenly hosts (Saba) in the sculptures, as Asshur the Eponymus hero of Assyria (Genesis 10. 11) answered to the sun or Baal, Belus, the title of office, Lord. This explains "image of the grove" (2 Kings 21. 7). The eagle was worshipped by the ancient Persians and Arabs. Esar-haddon—In Ezra 4. 2 he is mentioned as having brought colonists into Samaria. He is also thought to have been the king who carried Manasseh captive to Babylon (2 Chronicles 33. 11). He built the palace on the mound Nebbi-yunus, and that called the south-west palace of Nimroud. The latter was destroyed by fire, but his name and wars are recorded on the great bulls taken from the building. He obtained his building materials from the north-west palaces of the ancient dynasty, ending in Pul.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 1-22. HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS; PERHAPS CONNECTED WITH THE PLAGUE OR BLAST WHEREBY THE ASSYRIAN ARMY HAD BEEN DESTROYED. 1. Set . . . house in order—Make arrangement as to the succession to the throne; for he had then no son; and as to thy other concerns, thou shalt die—speaking according to the ordinary course of the disease. His being spared fifteen years was not a change in God's mind, but an illustration of God's dealings being unchangeably regulated by the state of man in relation to Him. 2. The couches in the East run along the walls of houses. He turned away from the spectators to hide his emotion and collect his thoughts for prayer. 3. He mentions his past religious consistency not as a boast, or a ground for justification, but according to the Old Testament dispensation, wherein temporal rewards (as long life, &c., Exodus 20. 12) followed legal obedience, he makes his religious conduct a plea for asking the prolongation of his life. walked—life is a journey; the pious "walk with God" (Genesis 5. 24; 1 Kings 9. 4). perfect—sincere; not absolutely perfect, but aiming towards it (Matthew 5. 43); single-minded in walking as in the presence of God (Genesis 17. 1). The letter of the Old Testament legal righteousness was, however, a standard very much below the spirit of the law as unfolded by Christ (Matthew 5. 20-48; 2 Corinthians 3. 6, 14, 17). wept sore—JOSEPHUS says, the reason why he wept so sorely, was that being childless, he was leaving the kingdom without a successor. How often our wishes, when gratified, prove curses! Hezekiah lived to have a son; that son was the idolater Manasseh, the chief cause of God's wrath against Judah, and of the overthrow of the kingdom (2 Kings 23. 26, 27). 4. In 2 Kings 20. 4, the quickness of God's answer to the prayer is marked, "afore Isalah had gone out into the middle court, the word of the Lord came to him:" i. e., before he had left Hezekiah, or at least when he had just left him, and Hezekiah was in the act of praying after having heard God's message by Isalah (cf. ch. 65. 24; Psalm 32. 5; Daniel 9. 21). 5. God of David thy father—God remembers the covenant with the father to the children (Exodus 20. 5; Psalm 89. 23, 29). tears—(Psalm 56. 8.) days . . . years—man's years, however many, are but as so many days (Genesis 5. 27). 6. In 2 Kings 20. 8, after this verse comes the statement which is put at the end, in order not to interrupt God's message (v. 21, 22) by Isalah (v. 5-8). will deliver—the city was already delivered, but here assurance is given, that Hezekiah shall have no more to fear from the Assyrians. 7. sign—a token that God would fulfil His promise, that Hezekiah should "go up into the house of the Lord the third day" (2 Kings 20. 5, 8); the words in italics are not in Isalah. 8. bring again—cause to return (Joshua 10. 12-14). In 2 Kings 20. 9, 11, the choice is stated to have been given to Hezekiah, whether the shadow should go forward, or go back, ten degrees. Hezekiah replied, "It is a light thing (a less decisive miracle) for the shadow to go down (its usual direction) ten degrees: nay, but let it return backward ten degrees;" so Isalah cried to Jehovah that it should be so, and it was so (cf. Joshua 10. 12, 14). sun-dial of Ahaz—HERODOTUS (2. 109) states that the sun-dial, and the division of the day into twelve hours, were invented by the Babylonians; from them Ahaz borrowed the invention. He was one, from his connection with Tiglath-pileser, likely to have done so (2 Kings 16. 7, 10). "Shadow of the degrees" means the shadow made on the degrees. JOSEPHUS thinks these degrees were steps ascending to the palace of Ahaz; the time of day was indicated by the number of steps reached by the shadow. But probably a sun-dial, strictly so called, is meant; it was of such a size, and so placed, that Hezekiah, when convalescent, could witness the miracle from his chamber. Cf. v. 21, 22 with 2 Kings 20. 9, where translate, shall this shadow go forward, &c.; the dial was no doubt in sight, probably "in the middle court" (2 Kings 20. 4), the point where Isalah turned back to announce God's gracious answers to Hezekiah. Hence this particular sign was given. The retrogression of the shadow may have been effected by refraction; a cloud denser than the air interposing between the gnomon and dial would cause the phenomenon, which does not take from the miracle, for God gave him the choice whether the shadow should go forward or back, and regulated the time and place. BOSANQUET makes the 14th year of Hezekiah to be 689 B. C., the known year of a solar eclipse, to which he ascribes the recession of the shadow. At all events, there is no need for supposing any revolution of the relative positions of the sun and earth, but merely an effect produced on the shadow (2 Kings 20. 9-11); that effect was only local, and designed for the satisfaction of Hezekiah, for the Babylonian astronomers and king "sent to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Chronicles 32. 31), implying that it had not extended to their country. No mention of any instrument for marking time occurs before this dial of Ahaz, 700 B. C. The first mention of the "hour" is made by Daniel at Babylon (Daniel 3. 6). 9-20. The prayer and thanksgiving song of Hezekiah is only given here, not in the parallel passages of 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles; v. 9 is the heading or inscription. 10. cutting off—ROSENMULLER translates, "the meridian;" when the sun stands in the zenith: so "the perfect day" (Proverbs 4. 18). Rather, "in the tranquillity of my days," i. e., that period of life

when I might now look forward to a tranquil reign. [MAURER.] The Hebrew is so translated (ch. 62, 6, 7). go—rather, “go into,” as in ch. 46, 2. [MAURER.] residue of my years—those which I had calculated on. God sends sickness to teach man not to calculate on the morrow, but to live more wholly to God, as if each day were the last. 11. Lord . . . Lord—The repetition, as in v. 19, expresses the excited feeling of the king's mind. To see the Lord (“Jehovah”) is fig. for, to enjoy His good gifts. So, in a similar connection (Psalm 27, 13), “I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living” (Psalm 34, 12); “What man is he that desireth life that he may see good?” world—rather, translate, “among the inhabitants of the land of stillness,” i. e., Hades [MAURER], in parallel antithesis to “the land of the living” in the first clause. The Hebrew comes from a root, to rest or cease (Job 14, 6). 12. age—rather, as the parallel “shepherd's tent” requires habitation, so the Arabie. [GESENIUS.] departed—is broken up, or shifted, as a tent to a different locality. The same image occurs (2 Corinthians 5, 1; 2 Peter 1, 12, 13). He plainly expects to exist, and not cease to be in another state; as the shepherd still lives, after he has struck his tent and removed elsewhere. I have cut off—He attributes to himself that which is God's will with respect to him; because he declares that will. So Jeremiah is said to “root out” kingdoms, because he declares God's purpose of doing so (Jeremiah 1, 10). The weaver cuts off his web from the loom when completed. Job 7, 6 has a like image. The Greeks represented the Fates as spinning and cutting off the threads of each man's life. he—God. with pining sickness—rather, from the thrum, or thread, which tied the loom to the weaver's beam. from day . . . to night—i. e., in the space of a single day between morning and night (Job 4, 20). 13. I reckoned . . . that—rather, I composed (my mind, during the night, expecting relief in the “morning,” so Job 7, 4); for (that is not, as in the English Version, to be supplied) as a lion He was breaking all my bones. [VTRRINGA.] (Job 10, 16; Lamentations 3, 10, 11.) The Hebrew, in Psalm 131, 2, is rendered I quieted. Or else, “I made myself like a lion (viz., in roaring, through pain), He was so breaking my bones!” Poets often compare great groaning to a lion's roaring, so, next verse, he compares his groans to the sounds of other animals (Psalm 22, 1). [MAURER.] 14. Rather, “Like a swallow, or a crane” (from a root, to disturb the water, a bird frequenting the water) [MAURER], (Jeremiah 8, 7). chatter—twitter: broken sounds expressive of pain. dove—called by the Arabs the daughter of mourning, from its plaintive note (ch. 59, 11). looking upward—to God for relief. undertake for—lit., be surety for me; assure me that I shall be restored (Psalm 119, 122). 15–20. The second part of the song passes from prayer to thanksgiving at the prayer being heard. What shall I say—The language of one at a loss for words to express his sense of the unexpected deliverance. both spoken . . . and . . . done it—(Numbers 23, 19.) Both promised and performed (1 Thessalonians 5, 24; Hebrews 10, 23). himself—no one else could have done it (Psalm 93, 1). go softly . . . in the bitterness—rather, “on account of the bitterness;” I will behave myself humbly in remembrance of my past sorrow and sickness from which I have been delivered by God's mercy (see 1 Kings 21, 27, 29). In Psalm 42, 4, the same Hebrew verb expresses the slow and solemn gait of one going up to the house of God; it is found nowhere else; hence ROSENMULLER explains it, “I will reverently attend the sacred festivals in the temple:” but this ellipsis would be harsh; rather metaphorically the word is transferred to a calm, solemn, and submissive walk of life. 16. by these—viz., by God's benefits, which are implied in the context (v. 15, “He hath Himself done it” “unto me”). All “men live by these” benefits (Psalm 104, 27–30), “and in all these is the life of my spirit,” i. e., I also live by them (Deuteronomy 8, 3). and (wilt) make me to live—The Hebrew is imperative, “make me to live.” In this view he adds a prayer to the confident hope founded on his compara- tive convalescence, which he expressed, “Thou wilt recover me.” [MAURER.] 17. for peace—instead of the prosperity which I had previously. great bitterness—lit., bitterness to me, bitterness; expressing intense emotion. in love—lit., attachment, such as joins one to another tenderly; “Thou hast been lovingly attached to me from the pit;” a pregnant phrase for, Thy love has gone down to the pit, and drawn me out from it. The “pit” is here simply death, in Hezekiah's sense; realized in its fulness only in reference to the soul's redemption from hell by Jesus Christ (ch. 61, 1), who went down to the pit for that purpose Himself (Psalm 88, 4–6; Zechariah 9, 11, 12; Hebrews 13, 20). “Sin” and sickness are connected (Psalm 103, 3; cf. ch. 53, 4, with Matthew 8, 17; 9, 5, 6), especially under the Old Testament dispensation of temporal sanctions; but even now, sickness, though not invariably arising from sin in individuals, is connected with it in the general moral view. cast . . . behind back—consigned my sins to oblivion. The same phrase occurs (1 Kings 14, 9; Nehemiah 9, 26; Psalm 50, 17). Contrast Psalm 90, 8, “Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.” 18. death—i. e., the dead; Hades and its inhabitants (Job 28, 22; see note, v. 11). Plainly Hezekiah believed in a world of disembodied spirits; his language does not imply what skepticism has drawn from it, but simply that he regarded the disembodied state as one incapable of declaring the praises of God before men, for it is, as regards this world, an unseen land of stillness; “the living” alone can praise God on earth, in reference to which only he is speaking; ch. 57, 1, 2 shows that at this time the true view of the blessedness of the righteous dead was held, though not with the full clearness of the gospel, which “has brought life and immortality to light” (2 Timothy 1, 10). hope for thy truth—(Psalm 104, 27.) Their probation is at an end. They can no longer exercise faith and hope in regard to thy faithfulness to thy promises, which are limited to the present state. For “hope” ceases (even in the case of the godly) when sight begins (Romans 8, 24, 25); the ungodly have “no hope” (1 Thessalonians 4, 13). Hope in God's truth is one of the grounds of praise to God (Psalm 71, 14; 119, 49). Others translate, “cannot celebrate.” 9. living . . . living—emphatic repetition, as in v. 11, 17; his heart is so full of the main object of his prayer, that for want of adequate words he repeats the same word. father to the children—one generation of the living to another. He probably, also, hints at his own desire to live until he should have a child, the successor to his throne, to whom he might make known and so perpetuate the memory of God's truth. truth—faithfulness to His promises; especially in Hezekiah's case, His promise of hearing prayer. 20. was ready—not in the Hebrew; “Jehovah was for my salvation,” i. e., saved me (cf. ch. 12, 2). we—I and my people. in the house of the Lord—This song was designed, as many of the other Psalms, as a form to be used in public worship at stated times, perhaps on every anniversary of his recovery; hence “all the days of our life.” lump of figs—a round cake of figs pressed into a mass (1 Samuel 25, 18). God works by means; the meanest of which He can make effectual. boil—inflamed ulcer, produced by the plague. 22. house of the Lord—Hence he makes the praises to be sung there prominent in his song (v. 20; Psalm 116, 12–14, 17–19).

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Ver. 1–8. HEZEKIAH'S ERROR IN THE DISPLAY OF HIS RICHES TO THE BABYLONIAN AMBASSADOR. 1. Merodach-baladan—For 150 years before the overthrow of Nineveh by Cyaxares the Mede, a succession of rulers, mostly viceroys of Assyria, ruled Babylon, from the time of Nabonassar, 747 B. C. That date is called “the Era of Nabonassar.” Pul or Phallukha was then expelled, and a new dynasty set up at Nineveh, under Tiglath-pileser. Semiramis Pul's wife, then retired to Babylon, with Nabonassar, her son, whose advent to the throne of Babylon, after the overthrow of the old line at Nineveh, marked a new era. Sometimes the viceroys of Babylon made themselves, for a time, independent of Assyria; thus Merodach-baladan at this time did so, encouraged by the Assyrian disaster in the Jewish campaign; he had done so before, and was defeated in the first year of Sennacherib's reign, as is recorded in cuneiform characters in that monarch's palace of Koyunjik. Nabopolassar was the first who established, permanently, his independence; his son, Nebuchadnezzar, raised Babylon to the position which Nineveh once occupied; but from the want of stone near the Lower Euphrates, the buildings of Babylon, formed of sun-dried brick, have not stood the wear of ages as Nineveh has. Merodach was an idol, the same as the god of war and planet Mars (Jeremiah 50. 2). Often kings took their names from their gods, as if peculiarly under their tutelage. So Belshazzar from Bel. Baladan means Bel is his lord. The chronicle of Eusebius contains a fragment of Berosus, stating that Acesis, an Assyrian viceroy, usurped the supreme command at Babylon. Merodach-(or Berodach)baladan murdered him and succeeded to the throne. Sennacherib conquered Merodach-baladan and left Esar-haddon, his son, as governor of Babylon. Merodach-baladan would naturally court the alliance of Hezekiah, who, like himself, had thrown off the yoke of the Assyrian king, and who would be equally glad of the Babylonian alliance against Assyria; hence arose the excessive attention which he paid to the usurper. sick—An additional reason is given (2 Chronicles 32. 31). "The princes of Babylon sent to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land," viz., the recession of the shadow on Ahaz's sun-dial; to the Chaldean astronomers, such a fact would be especially interesting, the dial having been invented at Babylon. 2. glad—It was not the mere act, but the spirit of it, which provoked God (2 Chronicles 32. 25), "Hezekiah rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him, for his heart was lifted up;" also cf. v. 31. God "tries" His people at different times by different ways, bringing out "all that is in their heart," to show them its varied corruptions. Cf. David in a similar case (1 Chronicles 21. 1-8). precious things—rather, "the house of his (aromatic) spices;" from a Hebrew root, to break to pieces, as is done to aromatics. silver . . . gold—partly got from the Assyrian camp (ch. 33. 4); partly from presents (2 Chronicles 32. 23, 27-29). precious ointment—used for anointing kings and priests. armour—or else vessels in general; the parallel passage (2 Chronicles 32. 27), "treasuries . . . for shields," favours English Version. His arsenal. 3. What . . . whence—implying that any proposition coming from the idolatrous enemies of God, with whom Israel was forbidden to form alliance, should have been received with any thing but gladness. Reliance on Babylon, rather than on God, was a similar sin to the previous reliance on Egypt (ch. 30. and 31). far country—implying that he had done nothing more than was proper in showing attention to strangers "from a far country." 4. All—a frank confession of his whole fault; the king submits his conduct to the scrutiny of a subject, because that subject was accredited by God. Contrast Asa (2 Chronicles 16. 7-10). 5. Lord of hosts—who has all thy goods at His disposal. 6. days come—120 years afterwards. This is the first intimation that the Jews would be carried to Babylon—the first designation of their place of punishment. The general prophecy of Moses (Leviticus 26. 33; Deuteronomy 28. 64); the more particular one of Ahijah in Jeroboam's time (1 Kings 14. 15), "beyond the river;" and of Amos 5. 27, "captivity beyond Damascus;" are now concentrated in this specific one as to "Babylon" (Micah 4. 10). It was an exact retribution in kind, that as Babylon had been the instrument of Hezekiah and Judah's sin, so also it should be the instrument of their punishment. 7. sons . . . from thee—the sons which Hezekiah (as Josephus tells us) wished to have (note, ch. 28. 3, on "wept sore") will be among the foremost in suffering. enuuchs—fulfilled (Daniel 1. 2, 3, 7). 8. peace . . . in my days—the punishment was not, as in David's case (2 Samuel 24. 13-15), sent in his time. True repentance acquiesces in all God's ways, and finds cause of thanksgiving in any mitigation.

CHAPTER XL.

Ver. 1-31. SECOND PART OF THE PROPHECIES OF ISAIAH. The former were local and temporary in their reference. These belong to the distant future, and are world-wide in their interest; the deliverance from Babylon under Cyrus, which he here foretells by prophetic suggestion, carries him on to the greater deliverance under Messiah, the Saviour of Jews and Gentiles in the present eclectic Church, and the restorer of Israel and Head of the world-wide kingdom, literal and spiritual, ultimately. As Assyria was the hostile world-power in the former part, which refers to Isaiah's own time, so Babylon is so in the latter part, which refers to a period long subsequent. The connecting link, however, is furnished (ch. 39. 6) at the close of the former part. The latter part was written in the old age of Isaiah, as appears from the greater mellowness of style and tone which pervades it; it is less fiery and more tender and gentle than the former part. 1. Comfort ye—twice repeated to give double assurance. Having announced the coming captivity of the Jews in Babylon, God now desires His servants, the prophets (ch. 52. 7), to comfort them; the scene is laid in Babylon; the time, near the close of the captivity; the ground of comfort is the speedy ending of the captivity, the Lord Himself being their leader. my people . . . your God—relatives (Jeremiah 31. 33; Hosea 1. 9, 10). It is God's covenant relation with His people, and His "word" of promise (v. 8) to their forefathers, which is the ground of His interposition in their behalf, after having for a time chastised them (ch. 54. 8). 2. comfortably—lit., to the heart; not merely to the intellect. Jerusalem—though then in ruins, regarded by God as about to be rebuilt; her people are chiefly meant, but the city is personified. cry—publicly and emphatically as a herald cries aloud (v. 3). warfare—the appointed time of her misery (Job 7. 1, Margin; 14. 14; Daniel 10. 1). The ulterior and Messianic reference probably is the definite time of the legal economy of burdensome rites is at an end (Galatians 4. 3, 4). pardoned—The Hebrew expresses, that her iniquity is so expiated that God now delights in restoring her. double for all her sins—This can only, in a very restricted sense, hold good of Judah's restoration after the first captivity. For how can it be said her "warfare was accomplished," when as yet the galling yoke of Antiochus and also of Rome was before them? The "double for her sins" must refer to the twofold captivity, the Assyrian and the Roman; at the coming close of this latter dispersion, and then only, can her "iniquity" be said to be "pardoned," or fully expiated. [HOUBIGANT.] It does not mean double as much as she deserved, but ample punishment in her twofold captivity. Messiah is the antitypical Israel (cf. Matthew 2. 15, with Hosea 11. 1). He indeed has "received" of sufferings amply more than enough to expiate "for our sins" (Romans 5. 15, 17). Otherwise (cry unto her), "that she shall receive (blessings) of the Lord's hand double to the punishment of all her sins" (so "sin" is used, Zechariah 14. 19, Margin). [LOWTH.] English Version is simpler. 3. crieth in the wilderness—So the LXX, and Matthew 3. 3 connect the words. The Hebrew accents, however, connect them thus: "In the wilderness prepare ye," &c., and the parallelism also requires this, "Prepare ye in the wilderness," answering to "make straight in the desert." Matthew was entitled, as under inspiration, to vary the connection, so as to bring out another sense, included in the Holy Spirit's intention; in Matthew 3. 1, "John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness," answers thus to "The voice of one crying in the wilderness." MAUREN takes the participle as put for the finite verb (so in v. 6), "A voice crieth." The clause, "In the wilderness," alludes to Israel's passage through it from Egypt to Canaan (Psalm 68. 7), Jehovah being their leader; so it shall be at the coming restoration of Israel, of which the restoration from Babylon was but a type (not the full realization; for their way from it was not through the "wilderness"). Where John preached (viz., in the wilderness; the type of this earth, a moral wilderness), there were the hearers who are ordered to prepare the way of the Lord, and there was to be the coming of the Lord. [BENGE.] John, though he was immediately followed by the suffering Messiah, is rather the herald of the coming reigning Messiah, as Malachi 4. 5, 6 ("before the great and dreadful day of the Lord"), proves. Matthew 17. 11 (cf. Acts 3. 21) implies that John is not exclusively meant; and that though in one sense Elias has come, in another he is yet to come. John was the fig. Elias, coming "in the spirit and power of Elias" (Luke 1. 17); John 1. 21, where John the Baptist denies that he was the actual Elias, accords with this view. Malachi 4. 5, 6 cannot have received its exhaustive fulfilment in John; the Jews always understood it of the literal Elijah. As there is another consummating advent of Messiah Himself, so perhaps there is to be of his forerunner Elias, who also was present at the transfiguration. the Lord—Hebrew, Jehovah; as this is applied to Jesus, He must be Jehovah (Matthew 3. 3). 4. Eastern monarchs send heralds before them in a journey to clear away obstacles, make causeways over valleys, and level hills. So John's duty was to bring back the people to obedience to the law, and to remove all self-confidence, pride in national privileges, hypocrisy, and irreligion, so that they should be ready for His coming (Malachi 4. 6; Luke 1. 17). crooked—declivities. 5. see It—The LXX. for "it," have "the salvation of God." So Luke 3. 6 (cf. Luke 2. 30, i. e., Messiah); but the Evangelist probably took these words from ch. 52. 10. for—Rather, "All flesh shall see that the mouth of Jehovah hath spoken it." [BENGE.] 6. The voice—The same Divine herald as in v. 3. he—one of those ministers or prophets (Note, v. 1) whose duty it was, by direction of "the voice," to comfort the Lord's afflicted people with the promises of brighter days." All flesh is grass—The connection is, "All human things, however goodly, are transitory: God's promises alone are steadfast" (v. 8, 15, 17, 23, 24); this contrast was already suggested in v. 5, "All flesh . . . the mouth of the Lord." 1 Peter 1. 24, 25 applies this passage distinctly to the gospel word of Messiah (cf. John 12. 24; James 1. 10). 7. Spirit of the Lord—Rather, wind of Jehovah (Psalm 103. 16). The withering east wind of those countries sent by Jehovah (Jonah 4. 8), the people—Rather, this people [LOWTH], which may refer to the Babylonians [ROSENMULLER]; but better, mankind in general, as in ch. 42. 5; so v. 6, "all flesh;" this whole race, i. e., man. 8. Rather, "Oh thou that bringest good things to Zion; thou that bringest good tidings to Jerusalem." Thou is thus the collective personification of the messengers who announce God's gracious purpose to Zion (Note, v. 1); ch. 52. 7 confirms this. [VULGATE and GESSENIUS.] If English Version be retained, the sense will be, the glad message was first to be proclaimed to Jerusalem, and then from it as the centre to all "Judea, Samaria, and the uttermost parts of the earth" (Luke 24. 47, 49; Acts 1. 8). [VITRINGA and HENGSTENBERG.] mountain—It was customary for those who were about to promulge any great thing, to ascend a hill from which they could be seen and heard by all (Judges 9. 7; Matthew 5. 1). be not afraid—to announce to the exiles their coming return home is attended with danger in the midst of the Babylonians. The gospel minister must "open his mouth boldly" (Proverbs 29. 25; Ephesians 6. 19). Behold—especially at His second coming (Zechariah 12. 10; 14. 5). 10. with strong hand—rather, as a strong one. [MAURER.] Or, against the strong one, viz., Satan (Matthew 12. 29; Revelation 20. 2, 3, 10). [VITRINGA.] arm—power (Psalm 89. 13; 98. 1). for him—i. e., He needs not to seek help for Himself from any external source, but by His own inherent power He gains rule for Himself (so v. 14). work—rather, recompense which he gives for work (ch. 62. 11; Revelation 22. 12). 11. feed—including all a shepherd's care—lead (Ezekiel 34. 23; Psalm 23. 1; Hebrews 13. 20; 1 Peter 2. 25). carry—applicable to Messiah's restoration of Israel, as sheep scattered in all lands, and unable to move of themselves to their own land (Psalm 80. 1; Jeremiah 23. 3). As Israel was "carried from the womb" (i. e., in its earliest days) (ch. 63. 9, 11, 12; Psalm 77. 20), so it shall be in "old age" (its latter days) (ch. 46. 3, 4). gently lead—as a thoughtful shepherd does the ewes "giving suck" (Margin) (Genesis 33. 13, 14). 12. Lest the Jews should suppose that He who was just before described as a "shepherd" is a mere man, He is now described as God. Who—Who else but God could do so? Therefore, though the redemption and restoration of His people, foretold here, was a work beyond man's power, they should not doubt its fulfilment, since all things are possible to Him who can accurately regulate the proportion of the waters as if He had measured them with His hand (cf. v. 15). But MAURER translates, "Who can measure," &c., i. e., How immeasurable are the works of God? The former is a better explanation (Job 23. 25; Proverbs 30. 4). span—the space from the end of the thumb to the end of the middle finger extended; God measures the vast heavens as one would measure a small object with his span. dust of the earth—all the earth is to Him but as a few grains of dust contained in a small measure (lit., the third part of a larger measure). hills in a balance—adjusted in their right proportions and places, as exactly as if He had weighed them out. 13. Quoted in Romans 11. 34; 1 Corinthians 2. 16. The Hebrew here for "directed" is the same as in v. 12 for "meted out;" thus the sense is, "Jehovah measures out heaven with His span;" but who can measure Him? i. e., Who can search out His Spirit (mind) wherewith He searches out and accurately adjusts all things? MAURER rightly takes the Hebrew in the same sense as in v. 12 (so Proverbs 16. 2; 21. 2), "weigh," "ponder." "Direct," as in English Version, answers, however, better to "taught" in the parallel clause. 14. path of judgment—his wisdom, whereby He so beautifully adjusts the places and proportions of all created things. 15. of—rather (hanging) from a bucket. [MAURER.] he taketh up . . . as a very little thing—rather, "are as a mere grain of dust which is taken up," viz., by the wind; lit., one taketh up, impersonally (Exodus 16. 14). [MAURER.] isles—rather, lands in general, answering to "the nations" in the parallel clause; perhaps lands, like Mesopotamia, enclosed by rivers [JEROME] (so ch. 42. 15). However, English Version, "isles" answers well to "mountains" (v. 12), both alike being lifted up by the power of God; in fact "isles" are mountains upheaved from the bed of the sea by volcanic agency; only that he seems here to have passed from unintelligent creatures (v. 12) to intelligent, as nations and lands, i. e., their inhabitants. 16. All Lebanon's forests would not supply fuel enough to burn sacrifices worthy of the glory of God (ch. 66. 1; 1 Kings 8. 27; Psalm 50. 8-13). beasts—which abounded in Lebanon. 17. (Psalm 62. 9; Daniel 4. 35). less than nothing—MAURER translates, as in ch. 41. 24, of nothing (partitively); or expressive of the nature of a thing, a mere nothing. vainly—emptiness. 18. Which of the heathen idols, then, is to be compared to this Almighty God? This passage, if not written, as BARNES thinks, so late as the idolatrous times of Manasseh, has at least a prospective warning reference to them and subsequent reigns; the result of the chastisement of Jewish idolatry in the Babylonish captivity was that thenceforth after the restoration the Jews never fell into it. Perhaps these prophecies here may have tended to that result (see 2 Kings 23. 26, 27). 19. graven—rather, an image in general; for it is incongruous to say meteth (i. e., casts out of metal) a graven image (i. e., one of carved wood); so Jeremiah 10. 14, "molten image." spreadeth it over—(Note, ch. 30. 22.) chains—an ornament lavishly worn by rich Orientals (ch. 3. 18, 19), and so transferred to their idols. Egyptian relics show that idols were suspended in houses by chains. 20. impoverished—lit.*, sunk in circumstances. no oblation—He who cannot afford to overlay his idol with gold and silver (v. 19). tree . . . not rot—the cedar, cypress, oak, or ash (ch. 44. 14). graven—of wood; not a molten one of metal. 41. be moved—that shall be durable. 21. ye—who worship idols. The question emphatically implies, they had known. from the beginning—(Ch. 41. 4, 26; 48. 16.) God is the beginning (Revelation 1. 8). The tradition handed down from the very first, of the creation of all things by God at the beginning, ought to convince you of His omnipotence and of the folly of idolatry. 22. It is he—rather, connected with last verse, Have ye not known?—have ye not understood Him that sitteth? &c. (v. 26). [MAURER.] circle—

applicable to the globular form of the earth, above which, and the vault of sky around it, He sits. For "upon" translate "above." as grasshoppers—or locusts in His sight (Numbers 13. 33), as He looks down from on high (Psalm 33, 13, 14; 113, 4-6). curtain—referring to the awning which the Orientals draw over the open court in the centre of their houses as a shelter in rain or hot weather. 23. (Psalm 107. 4; Daniel 2. 21.) judges—i. e., rulers; for these exercised judicial authority (Psalm 2. 10). The Hebrew, shophete, answers to the Carthaginian chief magistrates, suffetes. 24. they—the "princes and judges" (v. 23) who oppose God's purposes and God's people. Often compared to tall trees (Psalm 37. 35; Daniel 4. 10). not . . . sown—the seed, i. e., race, shall become extinct (Nahum 1. 14). stock—not even shall any shoots spring up from the stump when the tree has been cut down: no descendants whatever (Job 14. 7; Note, ch. 11. 1). and . . . also—so LXX. But MAUREN translates, "They are hardly (lit., not yet, as in 2 Kings 20. 4) planted, &c., when He (God) blows upon them." blow—the image is from the hot east wind (simoon) that "withers" vegetation. whirlwind . . . stubble—(Psalm 83, 13), where, "like a wheel," refers to the rotatory action of the whirlwind on the stubble. 25. (Cf. v. 18.) 26. bringeth out . . . host—image from a general reviewing his army: He is Lord of Sabaoth, the heavenly hosts (Job 38. 32). callest . . . by name—numerous as the stars are. God knows each in all its distinguishing characteristics—a sense which "name" often bears in Scripture; so in Genesis 2. 19, 20, Adam, as God's vicegerent, called the beasts by name, i. e., characterized them by their several qualities, which, indeed, He has imparted. by the greatness . . . faith—rather, "by reason of abundance of (their inner essential) force and firmness of strength, not one of them is driven astray," referring to the sufficiency of the physical forces with which He has endowed the heavenly bodies, to prevent all disorder in their motions. [HORSLEY.] In English Version the sense is, "He has endowed them with their peculiar attributes ('names') by the greatness of His might," and the power of His strength (the better rendering, instead of, "for that He is strong"). 27. Since these things are so, thou hast no reason to think that thine interest ("way," i. e., condition, Psalm 37. 5; Jeremiah 12. 1) are disregarded by God. judgment is passed over from—rather, My cause is neglected by my God; He passes by my case in my bondage and distress without noticing it. my God—who especially might be expected to care for me. 28. known—by thine own observation and reading of Scripture. heard—from tradition of the fathers. everlasting, &c.—These attributes of Jehovah ought to inspire His afflicted people with confidence. no searching of his understanding—therefore thy cause cannot, as thou sayest, escape His notice; though much in His ways is unsearchable, He cannot err, (Job 11. 7-9). He is never "faint" or "weary" with having the countless wants of His people ever before Him to attend to. 29. Not only does He "not faint" (v. 23), but He gives power to them who do faint. no might . . . increaseth strength—a seeming paradox. They "have no might" in themselves; but in Him they have strength, and He "increases" that strength (2 Corinthians 12. 9). 30. young men—lit., those selected; men picked out on account of their youthful vigour for an enterprise. 31. mount up—(2 Samuel 1. 23.) Rather, "They shall put forth fresh feathers as eagles" are said to renovate themselves; the parallel clause, "renew their strength," confirms this. The eagle was thought to moult and renew his feathers, and with them his strength, in old age (so LXX., Vulgate, Psalm 103. 5). However, English Version is favoured by the descending climax, mount up—run—walk, in every attitude the praying, waiting child of God is "strong in the Lord" (Psalm 84. 7; Micah 4. 5; Hebrews 12. 1).

CHAPTER XLI.

Ver. 1-29. ADDITIONAL REASONS WHY THE JEWS SHOULD PLACE CONFIDENCE IN GOD'S PROMISES OF DELIVERING THEM; HE WILL RAISE UP A PRINCE AS THEIR DELIVERER, WHEREAS THE IDOLS COULD NOT DELIVER THE HEATHEN

NATIONS FROM THAT PRINCE. 1. (Zechariah 2. 13.) God is about to argue the case, therefore let the nations listen in reverential silence. Cf. Genesis 23. 16, 17, as to the spirit in which we ought to behave before God. before me—rather (turning), towards me. [MAUREN.] islands—including all regions beyond sea (Jeremiah 25, 22), maritime regions, not merely isles in the strict sense. renew . . . strength—let them gather their strength for the argument; let them adduce their strongest arguments (cf. ch. 1. 18; Job 9. 32). "Judgment" means here, to decide the point at issue between us. 2. Who—else but God? The fact that God "raiseth up" Cyrus, and qualifies him for becoming the conqueror of the nations and deliverer of God's people, is a strong argument why they should trust in Him. The future is here prophetically represented as present or past. the righteous man—Cyrus; as ch. 44. 28; 45. 1-4, 13; 46. 11, "from the East," prove. Called "righteous," not so much on account of his own equity (HERODOTUS, 3. 89), as because he fulfilled God's righteous will in restoring the Jews from their unjust captivity. Raised him up in righteousness. The LXX. take the Hebrew as a noun, righteousness. MAUREN translates, "Who raised up him whom salvation (national and temporal, the gift of God's 'righteousness' to the good, ch. 32. 17; cf. ch. 45. 8; 51. 5) meets at his foot" (i. e., wherever he goes). Cyrus is said to come from the East, because Persia is east of Babylon; but in v. 25, from the north, in reference to Media. At the same time the full sense of righteousness, or righteous, and of the whole passage, is realized only in Messiah, Cyrus' antitype (Cyrus knew not God, ch. 45. 4). He goes forth as the Universal Conqueror of the "nations," in righteousness making war (Psalm 2. 8, 9; Revelation 19. 11-15; 6. 2; 2. 26, 27). "The idols He shall utterly abolish" (cf. v. 7. 23, with ch. 2. 18). Righteousness was always raised up from the East. Paradise was east of Eden. The cherubim were at the east of the garden. Abraham was called from the East. Judea, the birth-place of Messiah, was in the East. called . . . to . . . foot—called him to attend His (God's) steps, i. e., follow His guidance. In Ezra 1, 2, Cyrus acknowledges Jehovah as the Giver of his victories. He subdued the nations from the Euxine to the Red Sea, and even Egypt (says XENOPHON). dust—(Cf. 17. 13; 29. 5; Psalm 18. 42.) Persia, Cyrus' country, was famed for the use of the "bow" (ch. 22. 6). "Before him" means "gave them into his power" (Joshua 10. 12). MAUREN translates, "Gave his (the enemy's) sword to be dust, and his (the enemy's) bow to be as stubble" (Job 41. 26, 29). 3. Cyrus had not visited the regions of the Euphrates and westward, until he visited them for conquest. So the gospel conquests penetrated regions where the name of God was unknown before. 4. Who—else but God? calling . . . generations from . . . beginning—The origin and position of all nations are from God (Deuteronomy 32. 8; Acts 17. 26); what is true of Cyrus and his conquests is true of all the movements of history from the first; all are from God. with the last—i. e., the last (ch. 41. 6; 48. 12). 5. feared—that they would be subdued. drew near and came—together, for mutual defence. 6. Be of good courage—Be not alarmed because of Cyrus, but make new images to secure the favour of the gods against him. 7. One workman encourages the other to be quick in finishing the idol, so as to avert the impending danger. nails—to keep it steady in its place. Wisdom 13, 15, 16, gives a similar picture of the folly of idolatry. 8. Contrast between the idolatrous nations whom God will destroy by Cyrus; and Israel whom God will deliver by the same man for their forefathers' sake. servant—so termed as being chosen by God to worship Him themselves, and to lead other peoples to do the same (ch. 45. 4). Jacob . . . chosen—(Psalm 135. 4.) my friend—lit., loving me. 9. Abraham, the father of the Jews, taken from the remote Ur of the Chaldees. Others take it of Israel, called out of Egypt (Deuteronomy 4. 37; Hosea 11. 1). from the chief men—lit., the elbows; so the joints; hence the root which joins the tree to the earth; fig., those of ancient and noble stock. But the parallel clause ("ends of the earth") favours GESSENIUS, who translates, "the extremities of the earth;" so JEROME. 10. be not dismayed—lit., anxiously

to look at one another in dismay. right hand of my righteousness—i. e., my right hand prepared in accordance with my righteousness (faithfulness to my promises) to uphold thee. 11. ashamed—put to the shame of defeat (cf. ch. 64. 17; Romans 9. 33). 12. seek . . . and . . . not find—said of one so utterly put out of the way that not a trace of him can be found (Psalm 37. 36). thing of naught—shall utterly perish. 13. (Deuteronomy 33. 28, 29.) 14. worm—in a state of contempt and affliction, whom all loathe and tread on, the very expression which Messiah, on the cross, applies to Himself (Psalm 22. 6), so completely are the Lord and His people identified and assimilated. "God's people are as 'worms' in humble thoughts of themselves, and in their enemies' haughty thoughts of them; worms, but not vipers, or of the serpent's seed." [HENRY.] men—the parallelism requires the word "men" here to have associated with it the idea of fewness or feebleness. LOWTH translates, "Ye mortals of Israel." The LXX., "Altogether diminutive." MAURER supports English Version, which the Hebrew text best accords with. the Lord—in general. and thy Redeemer—in particular; a still stronger reason why He should "help" them. 15. God will make Israel to destroy their enemies as the Eastern corn-drag (ch. 28. 27, 28) bruises out the grain with its teeth, and gives the chaff to the winds to scatter. teeth—serrated, so as to cut up the straw for fodder, and separate the grain from the chaff. mountains . . . hills—kingdoms more or less powerful that were hostile to Israel (ch. 2. 14). 16. fan—winnowed (cf. Matthew 3. 12.) whirlwind . . . scatter them—(Job 27. 21; 30. 22.) 17. poor and needy—primarily, the exiles in Babylon. water—fig., refreshment, prosperity after their affliction. The language is so constructed as only very partially to apply to the local and temporary event of the restoration from Babylon; but fully to be realized in the waters of life and of the Spirit, under the gospel (ch. 30. 25; 44. 3; John 7. 37-39; 4. 14). God wrought no miracles that we read of, in any wilderness, during the return from Babylon. faileth—rather, is rigid or parched. [HORSLEY.] 18. Alluding to the waters with which Israel was miraculously supplied in the desert after having come out of Egypt. high places—bare of trees, barren, and unwatered (Jeremiah 4. 11; 14. 6). High places . . . valleys spiritually expressed that in all circumstances, whether elevated or depressed, God's people will have refreshment for their souls, however little to be expected it might seem. 19. (Ch. 32. 15; 55. 13.) shittah—rather, the acacia, or Egyptian thorn, from which the gum Arabic is obtained. [LOWTH.] oil tree—the olive. fir tree—rather, the cypress: grateful by its shade. pine—GESENIUS translates, "the holm." box tree—not the shrub used for bordering flower-beds, but [GESENIUS] a kind of cedar, remarkable for the smallness of its cones, and the upward direction of its branches. 20. consider—lit., lay it (to heart); turn (their attention) to it. "They" refers to all lands (v. 1; Psalm 64. 9; 40. 3). The effect on the Gentiles of God's open interposition hereafter in behalf of Israel shall be, they shall seek Israel's God (ch. 2. 3; Zechariah 8. 21-23). 21. A new challenge to the idolaters (see v. 1, 7) to say, can their idols predict future events as Jehovah can (v. 22-25, &c.)? your strong reasons—the reasons for idol-worship which you think especially strong. 22. what shall happen—"Let them bring near and declare future contingencies." [HORSLEY.] former things . . . the latter end of them—show what former predictions the idols have given, that we may compare the event ("latter end") with them; or give new prophecies ("declare things to come") (ch. 42. 9). [MAURER.] BARNES explains it more reconditely, "Let them foretell the entire series of events, showing, in their order, the things which shall first occur, as well as those which shall finally happen;" the false prophets tried to predict isolated events, having no mutual dependency; not a long series of events mutually and orderly connected, and stretching far into futurity. They did not even try to do this. None but God can do it (ch. 46. 10; 44. 7, 8). "Or . . . things to come" will, in this view, mean, Let them, if they cannot predict the series, even predict plainly any detached events.

23. do good . . . evil—give any proof at all of your power, either to reward your friends or punish your enemies (Psalm 115. 2-8). that we may be dismayed, and behold it together—MAURER translates, "That we (Jehovah and the idols) may look one another in the face (i. e., encounter one another; 2 Kings 14. 8, 11), and see" our respective powers by a trial. HORSLEY translates, "Then the moment we behold, we shall be dismayed." We thus, and in English Version, refers to Jehovah and His worshippers. 24. of nothing—(Note ch. 40. 17.) The Hebrew text is here corrupt; so English Version treats it. abomination—abstract for concrete; not merely abominable, but the essence of whatever is so (Deuteronomy 18. 12). chooseth you—as an object of worship. 25. raised up—in purpose: not fulfilled till 150 years afterwards. north—In v. 2, "from the East;" both are true: see the note there. call . . . my name—acknowledge me as God, and attribute His success to me; this he did in the proclamation (Ezra 1. 2). This does not necessarily imply that Cyrus renounced idolatry, but hearing of Isaiah's prophecy given 150 years before, so fully realized in his own acts, he recognized God as the true God, but retained his idol (so Naaman, 2 Kings 5; cf. 2 Kings 17. 33, 41; Daniel 3. 28; 4. 1-3, 34-37). princes—the Babylonian satraps or governors of provinces. mortar—mirre: He shall tread them under foot as dirt (ch. 10. 6). 26. Who—of the idolatrous soothsayers? When this prophecy shall be fulfilled, all shall see that God foretold as to Cyrus, which none of the soothsayers have. before time—before the event occurred. He is righteous—rather, It is true; it was a true prophecy, as the event shows. "He is righteous," in English Version, must be interpreted, The fulfilment of the idol's words proves that he is faithful. showeth, &c.—rather, "there was none (of the soothsayers) that showed . . . declared—no one has heard your words" foretelling the event. 27. Rather, "first will give to Zion and to Jerusalem the messenger of good tidings, Behold, behold them!" The clause "Behold . . . them" (the wished-for event is now present) is inserted in the middle of the sentence as a detached exclamation, by an elegant transposition, the language being framed abruptly, as one would speak in putting vividly as it were, before the eyes of others, some joyous event which he had just learned [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU] (cf. ch. 40. 9). None of the idols had foretold these events. Jehovah was the "first" to do so (see v. 4). 28. no counsellor—no one of the idolatrous soothsayers who could advertise (Numbers 24. 14) those who consulted them what would take place. Cf. "counsel of His messenger" (ch. 44. 26). when I asked—i. e., challenged them, in this chapter. 29. confusion—emptiness. [BARNES.]

CHAPTER XLII.

Ver. 1-25. MESSIAH THE ANTOTYPE OF CYRUS.—God's description of His character (v. 1-4). God addresses Him directly (v. 5-7). Address to the people to attend to the subject (v. 8, 9). Call to all, and especially the exile Jews to rejoice in the coming deliverance (v. 10-25). 1. my servant—The law of prophetic suggestion leads Isaiah from Cyrus to the far greater Deliverer, behind whom the former is lost sight of. The express quotation in Matthew 12. 18-20, and the description can apply to Messiah alone (Psalm 40. 6; with which cf. Exodus 21. 6; John 6. 38; Philippians 2. 7). Israel, also, in its highest ideal, is called the "servant" of God (ch. 49. 3). But this ideal is realized only in the antitypical Israel, its representative-man and Head, Messiah (cf. Matthew 2. 15, with Hosea 11. 1). "Servant" was the position assumed by the Son of God throughout His humiliation. elect—chosen by God before the foundation of the world for an atonement (1 Peter 1. 20; Revelation 13. 8). Redemption was no afterthought to remedy an unforeseen evil (Romans 16. 25, 26; Ephesians 3. 9, 11; 2 Timothy 1. 9, 10; Titus 1. 2, 3). In Matthew 12. 18 it is rendered "my beloved;" the only beloved Son, beloved in a sense distinct from all others. Election and the love of God are inseparably joined. my soul—a human phrase applied to God, because of the intended union of humanity with the Divinity: I myself. delighteth—is well pleased with, and accepts, as a propitiation. God could have "delighted" in no created being as a mediator (cf. v. 21; ch. 63. 5; Matthew 3. 17). Spirit upon him—(Ch. 11. 2; 61. 1; Luke 4. 18; John 3. 34.) judgment—the gospel dispensation, founded on justice, the canon of the Divine rule and principle of judgment called "the law" (ch. 2. 3; cf. v. 3; 51. 4; 49. 6). The gospel has a discriminating judicial effect: saving to penitents; condemnatory to Satan, the enemy (John 12. 31; 16. 11), and the wilfully impenitent (John 9. 39); Matthew 12. 18 has, "He shall show," for "He shall bring forth," or "cause to go forth." Christ both produced and announced His "judgment." The Hebrew dwells most on His producing it; Matthew on His announcement of it: the two are joined in Him. 2. Matthew marks the kind of "cry" as that of altercation by quoting it, "He shall not strive" (ch. 53. 7). street—LXX. translate, "outside." An image from an altercation in a house, loud enough to be heard in the street outside: appropriate of Him who "withdrew himself" from the public fame created by His miracles to privacy (Matthew 12. 15; v. 34, there, shows another and sterner aspect of His character, which is also implied in the term "judgment"). 3. bruised—"It pleased the Lord to bruise Him" (ch. 53. 5, 10; Genesis 3. 15); so He can feel for the bruised. As v. 2 described His unturbulent spirit towards His violent enemies (Matthew 12. 14-16), and His utter freedom from love of notoriety, so v. 3, His tenderness in cherishing the first spark of grace in the penitent (ch. 40. 11). reed—fragile: easily "shaken with the wind" (Matthew 11. 7). Those who are at best feeble, and who besides are oppressed by calamity or by the sense of sin. break—entirely crush or condemn. Cf. "bind up the broken-hearted" (ch. 50. 4; 61. 1; Matthew 11. 28). flax—put for the lamp-wick, formed of flax. The believer is the lamp (so the Greek, Matthew 5. 15; John 5. 35): his conscience enlightened by the Holy Ghost is the wick. "Smoking" means dimly burning, smouldering, the flame not quite extinct. This expresses the positive side of the penitent's religion; as "bruised reed," the negative. Broken-hearted in himself, but not without some spark of flame: lit., from above. Christ will supply such a one with grace as with oil. Also, the light of nature smouldering in the Gentiles amidst the hurtful fumes of error. He not only did not quench, but cleared away the mists and superadded the light of revelation. See JEROME ad Alg. Qu. 2. truth—Matthew 12. 20 quotes it, "send forth judgment unto victory." Matthew, under the Spirit, gives the virtual sense, but varies the word, in order to bring out a fresh aspect of the same thing. Truth has in itself the elements of victory over all opposing forces. Truth is the victory of Him who is "the truth" (John 14. 6). The gospel judicial sifting ("judgment") of believers and unbelievers, begun already in part (John 3. 18, 19; 9. 39), will be consummated victoriously in truth only at His second coming; v. 13, 14, here, and Matthew 12. 32, 36, 41, 42, show that there is reference to the judicial aspect of the gospel, especially finally: besides the mild triumph of Jesus coming in mercy to the penitent now (v. 2), there shall be finally the judgment on His enemies, when the "truth" shall be perfectly developed. Cf. ch. 61. 1-3, where the two comings are similarly joined (Psalm 2. 4-6, 8; Revelation 15. 2, 4; 19. 11-16). On "judgment," see Note, v. 1. 4. fall—faint; man in religion may become as the almost expiring flax-wick (v. 3), but not so He in His purposes of grace. discouraged—lit., broken, i. e., checked in zeal by discouragements (cf. ch. 49. 4, 5). ROSENMULLER not so well translates, "He shall not be too slow on the one hand, nor run too hastily on the other." Judgment—His true religion, the canon of His judgments and righteous reign. isles . . . wait, &c.—The distant lands beyond sea shall put their trust in His gospel way of salvation. Matthew 12. 21 virtually gives the sense, with the inspired addition of another aspect of the same thing, "In his name shall the Gentiles trust" (as "wait for" here means, ch. 30. 18). "His law" is not something distinct from Himself, but is indeed Himself, the manifestation of God's character ("name") in Christ, who is the embodiment of the law (ch. 42. 21; Jeremiah 23. 6; Romans 10. 4). "Isles" here, and v. 12, may refer to the fact, that the populations of which the Church was primarily formed were Gentiles of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. 5. Previously God had spoken of Messiah; now (v. 5-7) He speaks to Him. To show to all that He is able to sustain the Messiah in His appointed work, and that all might accept Messiah as commissioned by such a mighty God, He commences by announcing Himself as the Almighty Creator and Preserver of all things. spread . . . earth—(Psalm 136. 6.) 6. in righteousness—rather, "for a righteous purpose." [LOWTH.] (See v. 21.) God "set forth" His Son "to be a propitiation (so as) to declare His (God's) righteousness, that God might be just, and (yet) the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus" (Romans 3. 25, 26; cf. Note, ch. 41. 2; 45. 13; 50. 8, 9). hold . . . hand—cf. as to Israel, the type of Messiah, Hosea 11. 3. covenant—the medium of the covenant, originally made between God and Abraham (ch. 49. 8). "The mediator of a better covenant" (Hebrews 8. 6) than the law (see ch. 49. 8; Jeremiah 31. 33; 50. 5). So the abstract "peace," for peace-maker (Micah 5. 5; Ephesians 2. 14). the people—Israel; as ch. 49. 8, compared with v. 6, proves (Luke 2. 32). 7. blind—spiritually (v. 18, 19; ch. 35. 5; John 9. 39). prison—(Ch. 61. 1, 2.) darkness—opposed to "light" (v. 6; Ephesians 5. 8; 1 Peter 2. 9). 8. God turns from addressing Messiah to the people. Lord—JEHOVAH: God's distinguishing and incommunicable name, indicating essential being and immutable faithfulness (cf. Exodus 6. 3; Psalm 83. 18; 96. 5; Hosea 12. 5). my—that is due to me, and to me alone. 9. former things—former predictions of God, which were now fulfilled, are here adduced in proof that they ought to trust in Him alone as God, viz., the predictions as to Israel's restoration from Babylon. new—viz., predictions as to Messiah, who is to bring all nations to the worship of Jehovah (v. 1, 4, 6). spring forth—the same image from plants just beginning to germinate occurs, ch. 43. 19; 58. 8. Before there is the slightest indication to enable a sagacious observer to infer the coming event, God foretells it. 10. new song—such as has never before been sung, called for by a new manifestation of God's grace, to express which no hymn for former mercies would be appropriate. The new song shall be sung when the Lord shall reign in Jerusalem, and all "nations shall flow unto it" (ch. 2. 2; 26. 1; Revelation 5. 9; 14. 3). ye that go down to the sea—whose conversion will be the means of diffusing the gospel to distant lands. all . . . therein—all the living creatures that fill the sea (Psalm 96. 11). [MAURER.] Or, all sailors and voyagers. [GENESIUS.] But these were already mentioned in the previous clause: there he called on all who go upon the sea; in this clause all animals in the sea; so in v. 11, he calls on the inanimate wilderness to lift up its voice. External nature shall be so renovated as to be in unison with the moral renovation. 11. cities—in a region not wholly waste, but mainly so, with an oasis here and there, Kedar—in Arabia Deserta (ch. 21. 16; Genesis 25. 13). The Kedarens led a nomadic, wandering life. So Kedar is here put in general for that class of men. rock—Sela, i. e. Petra, the metropolis of Idumea and the Nabathean Ishmaelites. Or it may refer in general to those in Arabia Petraea, who had their dwellings cut out of the rock. the mountains—viz., of Paran, south of Sinai, in Arabia Petraea. [VITRINGA.] 12. glory . . . islands—(Ch. 24. 15.) 13-16. Jehovah will no longer restrain his wrath: He will go forth as a mighty warrior (Exodus 15. 3) to destroy His people's and His enemies, and to deliver Israel (cf. Psalm 45. 3). stir up jealousy—rouse His indignation. roar—image from the battle-cry of a warrior. 14. long time—viz., during the desolation of Israel (ch. 32. 14). holden my peace—(Cf. Psalm 50. 21; Habakkuk 1. 2.) cry like a woman, &c.—Like a woman in parturition, who, after having restrained her breathing for a time, at last, overcome with labour-pain, lets out her voice with a panting sigh; so Jehovah will give full vent to His long pent-up wrath. Translate, instead of "destroy . . . devour;" I will at once breathe hard and pant, viz., giving loose to my wrath. 15. I will destroy all my foes. mountains—in Palestine usually planted with vines and olives in terraces, up to their tops. islands—rather, dry lands. God will destroy His foes, the heathen, and their idols, and "dry up" the fountains of their oracles, their doctrines and institutions, the symbol of which is water, and their schools which promoted idolatry. [VITRINGA.] 16. blind—God's people, Israel, in captivity, needing a guide. In the ulterior sense the New Testament Church, which was about to be led and enlightened by the Son of God as its leader and shepherd in the wilderness of the Roman empire, until it should reach a city of habitation. "A way . . . they knew not," refers to the various means employed by Providence for the establishment of the Church in the world, such as would never have occurred to the mind of mere man. "Blind," they are called, as not having heretofore seen God's ways in ordering His Church. "Make darkness light," &c., implies that the glorious issue would only be known by the event itself. [VITRINGA.] The same holds good of the individual believer (ch. 30. 21; Psalm 107. 7; cf. Hosea 2. 6, 14; Ephesians 5. 8; Hebrews 13. 5). 17. turned back . . . ashamed—disappointed in their trust; the same phrase occurs, Psalm 35. 4. 18. deaf—viz., to the voice of God. blind—to your duty and interest; wilfully so (v. 20). In this they differ from "the blind" (v. 16). The Jews are referred to. He had said, God would destroy the heathen idolatry; here he remembers that even Israel, his "servant" (v. 19), from whom better things might have been expected, is tainted with this sin. 19. my servant—viz., Israel. Who of the heathen is so blind? Considering Israel's high privileges, the heathen's blindness was as nothing compared with that of Israelite idolaters. my messenger . . . sent—Israel was designed by God to be the herald of His truth to other nations. perfect—furnished with institutions, civil and religious, suited to their perfect well-being. Cf. the title, "Jeshurun," the perfect one, applied to Israel (cf. ch. 44. 2), as the type of Messiah. [VITRINGA.] Or translate, the friend of God, which Israel was by virtue of descent from Abraham, who was so called (ch. 41. 8). [GESENIUS.] The language, "my servant" (cf. v. 1), "messenger" (Malachi 3. 1), "perfect" (Romans 10. 4; Hebrews 2. 10; 1 Peter 2. 22), can, in the full antitypical sense, only apply to Christ. So v. 21 plainly refers to Him. "Blind" and "deaf" in His case refer to His endurance of suffering and reproach, as though He neither said nor heard (Psalm 38. 13, 14). Thus there is a transition by contrast from the moral blindness of Israel (v. 18) to the patient blindness and deafness of Messiah. [HORSLEY.] 20. observest—thou dost not keep them. The "many things" are the many proofs which all along from the first God had given Israel of His goodness and His power (Deuteronomy 4. 32-38; 29. 2-4; Psalm 78. 105). he—transition from the second to the third person. "Opening . . . ears," i. e., though he (Israel) hath his ears open (Note, ch. 6. 10). This language, too (Note, v. 19), applies to Messiah as Jehovah's servant (ch. 50. 5; Psalm 40. 6). 21. his righteousness—not His people's, but His own; v. 24 shows that they had no righteousness (ch. 45. 24; 50. 16). God is well pleased with His Son ("in whom my soul delighteth," v. 1), "who fulfils all righteousness" (Matthew 3. 15) for them, and with them for His sake (cf. v. 6; Psalm 71. 16, 19; Matthew 5. 17; Romans 10. 3, 4; Philippians 3. 9). Perhaps in God's "righteousness" here is included His faithfulness to His promises given to Israel's forefathers [ROSENMULLER]; because of this He is well pleased with Israel, even though displeased with their sin, which He here reproves; but that promise could only be based on the righteousness of Messiah, the promised seed, which is God's righteousness. 22. holes—caught by their foes in the caverns where they had sought refuge. [BARNES.] Or bound in subterranean dungeons, [MAURER.] prison houses—either literal prisons, or their own houses, whence they dare not go forth for fear of the enemy. The connection is, Notwithstanding God's favour to His people for His righteousness' sake (v. 21), they have fallen into misery (the Babylonish and Romish captivities, and their present dispersion), owing to their disregard of the Divine law: spiritual imprisonment is included (v. 7). none saith, Restore—There is no deliverer (ch. 63. 5). 23. A call that they should be warned by the past judgments of God to obey Him for the time to come.

24. Who—Their calamity was not the work of chance, but God's immediate act for their sins. Jacob . . . Israel . . . we—change from the third to the first person; Isaiah first speaking to them as a prophet, distinct from them; then identifying himself with them, and acknowledging His share in the nation's sins (cf. Joshua 5. 1). 25. him—Israel (v. 24). strength of battle—violence of war. it—the battle or war (cf. ch. 10. 16). knew not—knew not the lesson of repentance which the judgment was intended to teach (ch. 5. 13; 9. 13; Jeremiah 5. 3).

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ver. 1-28. A SUCCESSION OF ARGUMENTS WHEREIN ISRAEL MAY BE ASSURED THAT, NOTWITHSTANDING THEIR PERVERSITY TOWARDS GOD (ch. 42. 25), HE WILL DELIVER AND RESTORE THEM. 1. But now—Notwithstanding God's past just judgments for Israel's sins. created—not only in the general sense, but specially created as a peculiar people unto Himself (v. 7, 15, 21; ch. 44. 2, 21, 24). So believers, "created in Christ Jesus" (Ephesians 2. 10), "a peculiar people" (1 Peter 2. 9). redeemed—a second argument why they should trust Him besides creation. The Hebrew means ransom by a price paid in lieu of the captives (cf. v. 3). Babylon was to be the ransom in this case, i. e., was to be destroyed, in order that they might be delivered; so Christ became a curse, doomed to death, that we might be redeemed. called . . . by name—not merely "called" in general, as in ch. 42. 6; 48. 12; 51. 2, but designated as His own peculiar people (cf. ch. 45. 3, 4; Exodus 32. 1; 33. 12; John 10. 3). 2. rivers . . . not overflow thee—so in passing Jordan, though at its "overflow," when its "swellings" were especially dangerous (Joshua 3. 15; Jeremiah 12. 5). waters . . . fire—a proverbial phrase for the extremest perils (Psalm 63. 12; also Psalm 138. 7). Lit. fulfilled at the Red Sea (Exodus 14.), and in the case of the three youths cast into the fiery furnace for conscience' sake (Daniel 3. 25, 27). 3. Egypt for thy ransom—either Egypt or Israel must perish; God chose that Egypt, though so much more mighty, should be destroyed, in order that His people might be delivered; thus Egypt stood, instead of Israel, as a kind of "ransom." The Hebrew, kopher, means properly that with which anything is overlaid, as the pith with which the ark was overlaid; hence that which covers over sins, an atonement. Nebuchadnezzar had subdued Egypt, Ethiopia (Hebrew, Cush), and Saba (descended from Cush, Genesis 10. 7, probably Meroe of Ethiopia, a great island formed by the Astaboras and the Nile, conquered by Cambyses, successor of Cyrus). Cyrus received these from God with the rest of the Babylonian dominions, in consideration of his being about to deliver Israel. However, the reference may be to the three years' war in which Sargon overcame these countries, and so had his attention diverted from Israel (see Notes, ch. 20). [VITRINGA.] But the reference is probably more general, viz., to all the instances in which Jehovah sacrificed mighty heathen nations, when the safety of Israel required it. 4. Since—All along from the beginning; for there was never a time when Israel was not Jehovah's people. The apodosis should be at, "I will give." "Since ever thou wast precious in my sight, honourable, and that I loved thee, I will give," &c. [MAURER.] GESENIUS, as English Version, takes Since to mean, Inasmuch as. If the apodosis be as in English Version, "Since thou wast precious" will refer to the time when God called His people out of Egypt, manifesting then first the love which He had from everlasting towards them (Jeremiah 31. 3; Hosea 11. 1); "honourable" and "loved," refer to outward marks of honour and love from God. men . . . people—other nations for thee (so v. 3). thy life—thy person. 5. (Deuteronomy 30. 3.) seed—descendants scattered in all lands. VITRINGA understands it of the spiritual "seed" of the Church produced by mystical regeneration: for the expression is, "bring," not "bring back." This sense is perhaps included, but not to the exclusion of the literal Israel's restoration (Jeremiah 30. 10, 11; Amos 9. 9; Zechariah 2. 6-13). 6. Give up—viz., my people. sons . . . daughters—the feminine joined to the

masculine expresses the complete totality of anything (Zechariah 9. 17). 7. called by my name—belong to Israel, whose people, as sons of God, bear the name of their Father (ch. 44. 5; 48. 1). for my glory—(v. 21; ch. 29. 23.) 8. Solemn challenge given by God to the nations to argue with Him the question of His superiority to their idols, and His power to deliver Israel (ch. 41. 1). blind people—the Gentiles, who also, like Israel (ch. 42. 19), are blind (spiritually), though having eyes, i. e., natural faculties, whereby they might know God (Romans 1. 20, 21). [LOWTH.] Or else, the Jews. [VITRINGA.] 9. who . . . can declare this—who among the idolatrous soothsayers hath predicted this, i. e., as to Cyrus being the Deliverer of Israel? former—predictions, as in ch. 42. 9. [MAURER.] Or, things that shall first come to pass (Note, ch. 41. 21, 22). [BARNES.] let them bring forth their witnesses—as I do mine (v. 10). justified—declared veracious in their pretended prophecies. or—rather, and: let men hear their prediction and say, from the event, It is verified (Note, ch. 41. 26). 10. Ye—The Jews, to whom I have given predictions, verified by the event; and in delivering whom I have so often manifested my power (see v. 3, 4; ch. 44. 8). and my servant—i. e., the whole Jewish people (ch. 41. 8). believe—trust in. formed—before I existed none of the false gods were formed. “Formed” applies to the idols, not to God. Revelation 1. 11 uses the same language to prove the Godhead of Jesus, as Isaiah here to prove the Godhead of Jehovah. 11. Lord—Jehovah. saviour—temporarily, from Babylon: eternally, from sin and hell (Hosea 13. 4; Acts 4. 12). The same titles as are applied to God are applied to Jesus. 12. declared—predicted the future (ch. 41. 22, 23). saved—the nation, in past times of danger. showed—viz., that I was God. when . . . no strange god, &c.—to whom the predictions uttered by me could be assigned. “Strange” means foreign, introduced from abroad. 13. before—lit., from the time of the first existence of day. let—Old English for hinder (ch. 14. 27). Rather, transtate, “undo it.” [HORSLEY.] 14. sent—viz., the Medes and Persians (ch. 10. 5, 6; 13. 3). brought down—made to go down to the sea (ch. 42. 10), in order to escape the impending destruction of Babylon. nobles—rather, fugitives: viz., the foreigners who sojourned in populous Babylon (ch. 13. 14), distinct from the Chaldeans. [MAURER.] whose cry is in the ships—exulting in their ships with the joyous sailors—cry, boastingly; their joy heretofore in their ships contrasts sadly with their present panic in fleeing to them (ch. 22. 2; Zephaniah 2. 15). Babylon was on the Euphrates, which was joined to the Tigris by a canal, and flowed into the Persian Gulf. Thus it was famed for ships and commerce, until the Persian monarchs, to prevent revolt or invasion, obstructed navigation by dams across the Tigris and Euphrates. 15. creator of Israel—(v. 1.) your—proved to be specially yours by delivering you. 16, 17. Allusion to the deliverance of Israel, and overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea, the standing illustration of God's unchanging character towards His people (Exodus 14). the power—the might of the enemies' host, every mighty warrior. they shall lie down together—as Pharaoh's army sank “together” in a watery grave. 18. So wonderful shall be God's future interpositions in your behalf, that all past ones shall be forgotten in comparison. Plainly the future restoration of Israel is the event ultimately meant. Thus the “former things” are such events as the destruction of Sennacherib and the return from Babylon. “Things of old” are events still more ancient, the deliverance from Egypt and at the Red Sea, and entry into Canaan. [VITRINGA.] 19. new—unprecedented in its wonderful character (ch. 42. 9). spring forth—as a germinating herb; a beautiful image of the silent but certain gradual growth of events in God's providence (Mark 4. 26-28). way in . . . wilderness—just as Israel in the wilderness, between the Red Sea and Canaan, was guided, and supplied with water by Jehovah; but the “new” deliverance shall be attended with manifestations of God's power and love, eclipsing the old (cf. ch. 41. 17-19). “I will open a way, not merely in the Red Sea, but in the wilderness of the whole world; and not merely one river shall gush out of the rock, but many, which shall refresh, not the bodies as formerly, but the souls of the thirsty, so that the prophecy shall be fulfilled: “With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.” [JEROME.] “A way” often stands for the true religion (Acts 9. 2; 18. 26). “Rivers” express the influences of the Holy Spirit (John 7. 37-39). Israel's literal restoration hereafter is included, as appears by comparing ch. 11. 15, 16. 20. beast—image of idolaters, defiled with blood and pollutions, dwelling like dragons, &c., in the wastes of Gentile ignorance: even they shall be converted. Or else, lit., such copious floods of water shall be given by God in the desert, that the very beasts shall (in poetic language) praise the Lord (Psalm 148. 10). [JEROME.] dragons—serpents: or else jackals (Note, ch. 13. 22). owls—rather, ostriches. 21. This people—viz., the same as “my people, my chosen” (see v. 1, 7; Psalm 102. 18). my praise—on account of the many and great benefits conferred on them, especially their restoration. 22. But—Israel, however, is not to think that these Divine favours are due to their own pety towards God. So the believer (Titus 3. 5), but—rather, for. weary of me—(Amos 8. 5, 6; Malachi 1. 13), though “I have not wearied thee” (v. 23), yet “thou hast been weary of me.” 23. small cattle—rather, the lamb or kid, required by the law to be daily offered to God (Exodus 29. 38; Numbers 28. 3). sacrifices—offered any way; whereas the Hebrew for holocaust, or “burnt offering,” denotes that which ascends as an offering consumed by fire. I have not caused thee to serve—i. e., to render the service of a slave (Matthew 11. 30; Romans 8. 15; 1 John 4. 18; 5. 3). offering—bloodless (Leviticus 2. 1, 2). wearied—antithetical to v. 22, “Thou hast been weary of me.” Though God in the law required such offerings, yet not so as to “weary” the worshipper, or to exact them in cases where, as in the Babylonish captivity, they were physically unable to render them; God did not require them, save in subordination to the higher moral duties (Psalm 50. 8-14; 51. 16, 17; Micah 6. 3, 6-8). 24. bought—for “sweet cane” (aromatic calamus) was not indigenous to Palestine, but had to be bought from foreign countries (Jeremiah 6. 20). It was used among the Hebrews to make the sacred ointment (Exodus 30. 23). It is often offered as a mark of hospitality. filled—satiated (Jeremiah 31. 14). God deigns to use human language to adapt Himself to human modes of thought. made me to serve—though “I have not caused thee to serve” (v. 23). Our sin made the Son of God to become “a servant.” He served to save us from servile bondage (Philippians 2. 7; Hebrews 2. 14, 15). wearied me—Though I have “not wearied thee” (v. 23; see ch. 1. 14). 25. (Ch. 44. 22.) I, even I—The God against whom your sin is committed, and who alone can and will pardon. for mine own sake—(Ch. 48. 9, 11.) How abominable a thing sin is, since it is against such a God of grace! “Blotted out” is an image from an account-book, in which, when a debt is paid, the charge is cancelled or blotted out. not remember . . . sins—(Jeremiah 31. 34.) When God forgives He forgets, i. e., treats the sinner as if He had forgotten his sins. 26. Put me in remembrance—Remind me of every plea which thou hast to urge before me in thy defence. Image from a trial (ch. 1. 18; 41. 1). Our strongest plea is to remind God of His own promises. So Jacob did at Mahanaim and Peniel (Genesis 32. 9, 12). God, then, instead of “pleading against us with His great power,” “will put His strength” in us (Job 23. 6); we thus become “the Lord's remembrancers” (ch. 62. 6, Margin). “Declare God's righteousness” vindicated in Jesus Christ “that thou mayest be justified” (Romans 3. 26; cf. ch. 20., and Psalm 143. 2). 27. first father—collectively for “most ancient ancestors,” as the parallelism (“teachers”) proves. [MAURER.] Or, thy chief religious ministers or priests. [GESENIUS.] Adam, the common father of all nations, can hardly be meant here, as it would have been irrelevant to mention his sin in an address to the Jews specially. Abraham is equally out of place here, as he is everywhere cited as an example of faithfulness, not of sin. However, taking the passage in its ultimate application to the Church at large, Adam may be meant. teachers—lit., interpreters between God and man, the priests (Job 33. 23; Malachi 2. 7). 28. pro-

aned the princes—(Psalm 89, 39; Lamentations 2, 2, 6, 7.) I have esteemed, or treated, them as persons not sacred. I have left them to suffer the same treatment as the common people, stripped of their holy office and in captivity. princes of the sanctuary—"governors of" it (1 Chronicles 24, 5); directing its holy services; priests. curse—Hebrew, Cherim, a solemn anathema, or excommunication. reproaches—(Psalm 123, 3, 4.)

CHAPTER XLIV.

Ver. 1-23. CONTINUATION OF THE PREVIOUS CHAPTER (v. 1-5). 1. Yet—Though thou hast sinned, yet hear God's gracious promise as to thy deliverance. chosen—(Ch. 41, 8.) 2. (Ch. 43, 1, 7.) formed . . . from . . . womb—(So v. 24; ch. 49, 1, 5.) The sense is similar to that in ch. 1, 2, "I have nourished and brought up children." Jesurun—A diminutive term of endearment applied to Israel. The full title of affection was Israëlin; contracted it became Jeshurun, with an allusion to the Hebrew root, jashar, "upright," "perfect" (see Note on "He that is perfect," ch. 42, 19) [GESENIUS] (Deuteronomy 32, 15). 3. (Ch. 41, 18.) him . . . thirst—rather, the land (ch. 35, 6, 7), fig. for man thirsting after righteousness (Matthew 5, 6). floods—the abundant influences of the Holy Spirit, stronger than "water." spirit—including all spiritual and temporal gifts, as the parallel, "blessing," proves (ch. 11, 2; 32, 15). seed—(Ch. 59, 21.) 4. they—thy "seed" and "offspring" (v. 3). as among—needlessly inserted in English Version. Rather, "Thy seed shall spring up as willows among the grass beside canals of water." [HORSLEY.] Or, "They shall spring up among the grass (i. e., luxuriantly; for what grows in the midst of grass grows luxuriantly) as willows by the water-courses," which makes the parallel clauses better balanced. [MAURER.] 5. The third clause answers in parallelism to the first, the fourth to the second. I am the Lord's—(Jeremiah 50, 5; 1 Corinthians 6, 19, 20; 2 Corinthians 8, 5). call himself by the name of Jacob—The Gentiles (as the result of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Israel, the Lord's "seed," first) shall join themselves to the children of Jacob, in order to worship their God (cf. ch. 43, 7; Psalm 49, 11). Or, calls, i. e., invokes and celebrates the name of Jacob, attaches himself to his nation and religion [MAURER] (Psalm 24, 6). subscribe . . . hand unto . . . Lord—in solemn and public covenant, pledging himself to God's service (cf. Nehemiah 9, 38), before "witnesses" (Hebrews 12, 1), after the manner of a civil contract (Jeremiah 32, 10, 12, 44). So the Christian in the sacraments. [BARNES.] Lit., "shall fill his hand with letters (Exodus 32, 15; Ezekiel 2, 10) in honour of Jehovah;" or "shall write upon his hand, I am Jehovah's" (cf. ch. 49, 16; Revelation 13, 16); alluding to the puncture with ink on the hand, whereby a soldier marked himself as bound to his commander; and whereby the Christians used to mark themselves with the name of Christ. [LOWTH.] The former view is simpler. surname himself . . . Israel—MAURER and GESENIUS interpret this as the Hebrew sanctions, answering to their rendering of the parallel second clause, "calls blandly (speaks in honourable terms of) the name of Israel." Retaining English Version, we must, from the Hebrew understand it thus, "Surname himself by the honourable name of Israel." (ch. 45, 4). 6. Here follows an argument for Jehovah, as the only God, and against the idols, as vanity (see Notes ch. 41, 4; 43, 1, 10-12). 7. Who but God can predict future events and declare also the order and time of each (Note ch. 41, 22, 23; 45, 21)? call—openly proclaim (ch. 40, 6) things to come. [MAURER.] Or, call forth the event; command that it happen (ch. 46, 11; 48, 15). [BARNES.] set . . . in order—There is no chance or confusion; all events occur in the order best fitted to subserve God's plans. for me—It is FOR GOD that all things exist and take place (Revelation 4, 11). But MAURER translates, "Let him set it forth (Job 37, 19) to me," since . . . ancient people—I have given the Jews predictions of the future ever since I appointed them as my people in ancient times; therefore they were qualified to be His witnesses (v. 8). As to their being God's "ancient (everlasting) people," see Deuteronomy 32, 7-9; Jeremiah

31, 3; the type of the redeemed Church (Ephesians 1, 4). 9. be afraid—lit., be astounded, or distracted with fear. from that time—viz., from the time that "I appointed the ancient people" (v. 7). From the time of Abraham's call, his family were the depositories of the predictions of the Redeemer, whereas the promise of Cyrus was not heard of till Isaiah's time; therefore, the event to the prediction and accomplishment of which God appeals in proof of His sole Godhead, is the redemption of man by a descendant of Abraham, in whose person "the ancient people" was first formally "appointed." The deliverance of the Jews, by Cyrus, is mentioned afterwards only as an earnest of that greater mercy. [HORSLEY.] no God—Hebrew, tsur, "rock" (Deuteronomy 32, 4), i. e., a stronghold to take refuge in, and a solid foundation to build on. 9. (Ch. 40, 18, 20; 41, 29.) delectable things—the idols in which they take such pride and delight. not profit—(Habakkuk 2, 18.) they are their own witnesses—contrasted with, "Ye are my witnesses" (v. 8). "They," i. e., both the makers and the idols, are witnesses against themselves, for the idols palpably see and know nothing (Psalm 115, 4-8). that they may be ashamed—The consequence deducible from the whole previous argument, not merely from the words immediately preceding, as in ch. 28, 13; 36, 12. I say all this to show that they are doomed to perish with shame, which is their only fitting end. 10. Who?—Sarcastic question: "How debased the man must be who forms a god!" It is a contradiction in terms. A made god, worshipped by its maker (1 Corinthians 8, 4) 11. his fellows—The associates of him who makes an idol; or of the idol (see Deuteronomy 7, 26; Psalm 115, 8; Hosea 4, 17). they are of men—they are mortal men themselves; what better, then, can the idol be than its maker? gathered together . . . stand up—as in a court of justice, to try the issue between God and them (Note, ch. 41, 1, 2). yet—wrongly inserted in English Version. The issue of the trial shall be, "they shall fear," &c. 12. tongs—rather, "prepareth (to be supplied) an axe," viz., with which to cut down the tree designed as the material of the idol. The "smith" (Hebrew, workman in iron) here answers to the "carpenter" (Hebrew, workman in wood). "He worketh it (the axe, not the idol, which was wood, not metal) in the coals," &c. The axe was wrought, not cast. The smith makes the axe for the carpenter. hungry . . . drinketh no water—so eager is he to expedite his work while the iron is hot. If the god were worth any thing, it would not let him grow "faint" with hunger and thirst. WILLIAMS, the missionary, states, that the South Sea Islanders when they make an idol abstain from food and drink. 13. After the smith's work in preparing the instruments comes the carpenter's work in forming the idol. rule—rather, line. [BARNES.] with a line—rather, a pencil. [HORSLEY.] Lit., red ochre, which he uses to mark on the wood the outline of the figure. [LOWTH.] Or best, the stylus or graver, with which the incision of the outline is made. [GESENIUS.] planes—rather, chisels or carving tools, for a plane would not answer for carving. compass—from a Hebrew root, to make a circle; by its symmetry of form is secured. according to . . . beauty of a man—irony. The highest idea the heathen could form of a god was one of a form like their own. Jerome says, "The more handsome the statue the more august the god was thought." The incarnation of the Son of God condescends to this anthropomorphic feeling so natural to man, but in such a way as to raise man's thoughts up to the infinite God who "is a spirit." that it may remain in . . . house—the only thing it was good for; it could not hear nor save (cf. Wisdom 13, 15). 14. Description of the material out of which the idol is formed. cypress—rather, from Hebrew root, to be hard, "the holm-oak," an evergreen abundant in Palestine. [GESENIUS.] strengtheneth—lit., "and he getteth strength to himself in the trees of the forest," i. e., he layeth in a great store of timber. [LOWTH.] Or, "chooseth," as "maiest strong for thyself," i. e., hast chosen (Psalm 80, 15, 17). [GESENIUS.] But English Version gives a good sense; "strengtheneth," i. e., rears to maturity; a meaning suitable also to the context of Psalm 80, 15, 17, where Israel is compared to a vine planted by Jehovah. [MAURER.] rain . . . nourisheth it—Though the man planted the tree, yet he could not make it grow. In preparing to make an idol, he has to depend on the true God for rain from heaven (Jeremiah 14. 22). 15. The same tree that furnishes the material for the god is in part used as fuel for a fire to cook his meals with and warm himself! thereto—rather, "he falleth down before them," i. e., such images. [MAURER.] 16. part . . . part—not distinct parts, but the same part of the wood (cf. v. 17). eateth—i. e., cooks so as to eat (v. 19). I have seen—I feel its power. 18. he—God hath given them over to judicial blindness; not His direct physical, but His providential agency in administering His moral government, is meant (cf. ch. 6. 9, 10). "Shut," lit., daubed, plastered up; it is an Eastern custom in some cases to seal up the eyes of offenders. 19. considereth—lit., layeth it to heart (ch. 42. 25; Jeremiah 12. 11). abomination—the scriptural term for an idol, not merely abominable, but the essence of what is so, in the eyes of a jealous God (1 Kings 11. 5, 7). 20. feedeth on ashes—fig., for the idolater delights in what is vain (Proverbs 15. 14; Hosea 12. 1). "Feedeth on wind." There is an allusion, perhaps, also, to the god being made of a tree, the half of which was reduced to ashes by fire (v. 15, 16, 17); the idol, it is implied, was no better, and could, and ought, to have been reduced to ashes like the other half. deceived heart—the heart and will first go astray, then the intellect and life (Romans 1. 28; Ephesians 4. 18). He in . . . right hand—is not my handiwork (the idol) a self-deceit? 21. Remember—"Be not like the idolaters who consider not in their heart" (v. 19). these—things just said as to the folly of idol-worship. my servant—not like the idolaters, slaves to the stock of a tree (v. 19). See v. 1, 2. thou . . . not . . . forgotten of me—Therefore thou oughtest to "remember" me. 22. blotted out—the debt of thy sin from the account-book in which it was entered (Exodus 32. 32, 33; Revelation 20. 12). as a thick cloud—scattered away by the wind (Psalm 103. 12). as a cloud—a descending gradation. Not only the "thick cloud" of the heavier "transgressions," but the "cloud" ("vapour" [LOWTH]), not so dense, but covering the sky as a mist) of the countless "sins." These latter, though not thought much of by man, need, as much as the former, to be cleared away by the Sun of righteousness, else they will be a mist separating us from heaven (Psalm 19. 12, 13; 1 John 1. 7-9). return . . . for—The antecedent redemption is the ground of, and motive to, repentance. We do not repent in order that He may redeem us, but because He hath redeemed us (Zechariah 12. 10; Luke 24. 47; Acts 3. 18, 19). He who believes in his being forgiven cannot but love (Luke 7. 43, 47). 23. Call to inanimate nature to praise God; for it also shall share in the coming deliverance from "the bondage of corruption" (Romans 8. 20, 21). done it—effected redemption for both the literal and spiritual Israel. lower parts, &c.—antithetical to "heavens;" "mountains," "forest," and "tree," are the intermediate objects in a descending gradation (see Psalm 96. 11, 12). 24-28. Confirmation of His promises to the Church and Israel, by various instances of His omnipotence; among these the restoration of the Jews by Cyrus. alone—lit., Who was with me? viz., when I did it; answering to "by myself," in the parallel clause (cf. similar phrases, Hosea 8. 4; John 5. 30). [MAURER.] 25. tokens—prognostics; the pretended miracles which they gave as proofs of their supernatural powers. liars—(Jeremiah 50. 36). Conjurors; or, astrologers; men leading a retired contemplative life, in order to study divination by the signs of the stars. [VITRINGA.] backward—with shame at their predictions not being verified. "To turn away the face" is to frustrate defeat (ch. 36. 9; 1 Kings 2. 15). The "wise men" are the diviners who, when Babylon was attacked by Cyrus, predicted his overthrow. 26. servant—in a collective sense, for the prophets in general, who foretold the return from Babylon; answering to "His messengers" (plural, in the parallel clause). [MAURER.] Antotypically, and ultimately, Messiah, who is the consummating embodiment of all the prophets and messengers of God (Malachi 3. 1; Matthew 21. 34, 36, 37; John 10. 30); hence the singular, "His servant," counsel—predictions; prophets' counsels concern the future (cf. "counselor," ch. 41. 28). Jerusalem—regarded prophetically, as lying in ruins. 27. Referring to the Euphrates, which was turned into a different channel, close to Babylon, by Cyrus, who thereby took the city. "The deep" is applied to Euphrates as "sea" (Jeremiah 51. 32, 36). "Rivers" refers to the artificial canals from the Euphrates made to irrigate the country; when it was turned off into a different bed, viz., a lake, forty miles square, which was originally formed to receive the superfluous water in an inundation, the canals became dry. 28. my shepherd—type of Messiah (ch. 40. 11; Psalm 23. 1; 77. 20; Ezekiel 34. 23). all my pleasure—so Messiah (ch. 42. 1; 53. 10). This is the first time Cyrus is named expressly; and that, 150 years before the time when in 550 B. C. he began his reign. The name comes from the Persian Khorschid, "the sun;" kings often taking their names from the gods; the sun was worshipped as a god in Persia, saying—rather, "and that saith;" construed with God, not with Cyrus. God's word is instantaneously efficient in accomplishing his will. to . . . to—or, "of Jerusalem . . . of the temple," as previously, the same Hebrew word is translated, "of Cyrus." [BARNES.] English Version is more graphic. Cyrus, according to JOSEPHUS, heard of this prophecy of Isaiah delivered so long before; hence he was induced to do that which was so contrary to Oriental policy, to aid in restoring the captive Jews and rebuilding their temple and city.

TOWERS OF JUDEA: PART OF THE WALLS OF HEBRON.

CHAPTER XLV.

Ver. 1-25. THE SUBJECT OF THE DELIVERANCE BY CYRUS IS FOLLOWED UP (v. 1-7). These seven verses should have been appended to last chapter, and the new chapter should begin with v. 8, "Drop down," &c. [HORSLEY.] Reference to the deliverance by Messiah often breaks out from amidst the local and temporary details of the deliverance from Babylon, as the great ultimate end of the prophecy. 1. his anointed—Cyrus is so called as being set apart as king, by God's providence, to fulfil His special purpose. Though kings were not anointed in Persia, the expression is applied to him in reference to the Jewish custom of setting apart kings to the regal office by anointing. right hand . . . holden—image from sustaining a feeble person by holding his right hand (ch. 42. 6). subdue nations—viz., the Cilicians, Syrians, Babylonians, Lydians, Bactrians, &c.; his empire extended from Egypt and the Mediterranean to the Indian Ocean, and from Ethiopia to the Euxine Sea. loose . . . loins—i. e., the girdle off the loins; and so enfeeble them. The loose outer robe of the Orientals, when girt fast round the loins, was the emblem of strength and preparedness for action; ungirt, was indicative of feebleness (Job 38. 3; 12. 21); "weakeneth the strength of the mighty" (Margin), "looseth the girdle of the strong." The joints of Belshazzar's loins, we read in Daniel 5. 6, were loosed during the siege by Cyrus, at the sight of the mysteries handwriting on the palace walls. His being taken by surprise, unaccoutred, is here foretold. to open . . . gates—In the revelry in Babylon on the night of its capture, the inner gates, leading from the streets to the river, were left open, for there were walls along each side of the Euphrates with gates, which, had they been kept shut, would have hemmed the invading hosts in the bed of the river, where the Babylonians could have easily destroyed them. Also, the gates of the palace were left open, so that there was access to every part of the city; and such was its extent, that they who lived in the extremities were taken prisoners before the alarm reached the centre of the palace. [HERODOTUS, 1. sec. 191]. 2. crooked . . . straight—(ch. 40. 4), rather, "maketh mountains plain" [LOWTH], i. e., clear out of thy way all opposing persons and things. THE KERRI reads as in v. 13, "make straight" (Margin). gates of brass—(Psalm 107. 16.) HERODOTUS, 1. sec. 179, says, Babylon had 100 massive gates, twenty-five on each of the four sides of the city, all, as well as their posts, of brass. bars of iron—with which the gates were fastened. 3. treasures of darkness—i. e., hidden in subterranean places; a common Oriental practice. Sorcerers pretended to be able to show where such treasures were to be found; in opposition to their pretensions, God says, He will really give hidden treasures to Cyrus (Jeremiah 50. 37; 51. 13). PLINY, H. N., 33, 3, says that Cyrus obtained from the conquest of Asia 34,000 pounds weight of gold, besides golden vases, and 500,000 talents of silver, and the goblet of Semiramis, weighing fifteen talents, that thou mayest know—viz., not merely that He was "the God of Israel," but that He was Jehovah, the true God. Ezra 1, 2 shows that the correspondence of the event with the prediction had the desired effect on Cyrus. which call . . . thy name—so long before designate thee by name (ch. 43. 1). 4. (Note, ch. 41. 8; 43. 14.) surnamed—i. e., designated to carry out my design of restoring Judah (see Note, ch. 44. 5; 44. 28; 45. 1). MAURER here, as in ch. 44. 5, translates, "I have addressed thee by an honourable name." hast not known me—previous to my calling thee to this office; after God's call, Cyrus did know Him in some degree (Ezra 1. 1-3). 5. (Ch. 42. 8; 43. 3, 11; 44. 8; 46. 9.) girded thee—whereas "I will loose (the girdle off) the loins of kings" (v. 1), strengthening thee, but enfeebling them before thee, though . . . not known me—(v. 4.) God knows His elect before they are made to know Him (Galatians 4. 9; John 15. 16). 6. From the rising to the setting of the sun, i. e., from east to west, the whole habitable world. It is not said, "from north to south," for that would not imply the habitable world, as, "from east to west" does (Ezra 1. 1, &c.). The conquest of Jerusalem, by Babylon, the capital of the world, and the overthrow of Babylon and restoration of the Jews, by Cyrus, who expressly acknowledged himself to be but the instrument in God's hands, were admirably suited to secure, throughout the world, the acknowledgment of Jehovah as the only true God. 7. form . . . create—Yatzar, to give "form" to previously-existing matter. Bara, to "create" from nothing the chaotic dark material. light . . . darkness—lit. (Genesis 1. 1-3), emblematical also, prosperity to Cyrus, calamity to Babylon and the nations to be vanquished. [GROTIUS.] Isaiah refers also to the Oriental belief in two coexistent, eternal principles, ever struggling with each other, light or good, and darkness or evil, Oromasden and Ahrimanen. God, here, in opposition, asserts His sovereignty over both. [VITRINGA.] create evil—not moral evil (James 1. 13), but in contrast to "peace" in the parallel clause, war, disaster (cf. Psalms 65. 7; Amos 3. 6). 8. Drop—viz., the fertilizing rain (Psalms 65. 12). skies—clouds. Lower than the "heavens." righteousness—i. e., the dew of the Holy Spirit, whereby "righteousness" shall "spring up." (See latter end of the verse.) earth—fig. for the hearts of men on it, opened for receiving the truth by the Holy Ghost (Acts 16. 14). them—the earth and the heavens. HORSLEY prefers with Queen Elizabeth's Bible, "Let the earth open, and let salvation and justice grow forth; let it bring them forth together; I the Lord have created him" (v. 13). MAURER translates, "Let all kinds of salvation (prosperity) be fruitful" (Psalms 72. 3, 6, 7). The revival of religion after the return from Babylon suggests to the prophet the diffusion of Messiah's gospel, especially in days still future; hence the elevation of the language to a pitch above what is applicable to the state of religion after the return. 9. Anticipating the objections which the Jews might raise as to why God permitted their captivity, and when He did restore them, why He did so by a foreign prince, Cyrus, not a Jew (ch. 40. 27, &c.), but mainly and ultimately, the objections about to be raised by the Jews against God's sovereign act in adopting the whole Gentile world as His spiritual Israel (v. 8, referring to this catholic diffusion of the gospel), as if it were an infringement of their nation's privileges; so Paul expressly quotes it, Romans 9, 4-8, 11-21. Let . . . strive—Not in the Hebrew; rather, in opposition with "him," "A potsherd among the potsherds of the earth!" A creature fragile and worthless as the fragment of an earthen vessel, amongst others equally so, and yet presuming to strive with his Maker! English Version implies, it is appropriate for man to strive with man, in opposition to 2 Timothy 2. 24. [GENESIUS.] thy . . . he—shall thy work say of thee, He, &c. ? 10. If it be wrong for a child, born in less favourable circumstances, to upbraid his parents with having given him birth, a fortiori, it is, to upbraid God for His dealings with us. Rather translate, "a father . . . a woman." The Jews considered themselves exclusively God's children, and were angry that God should adopt the Gentiles besides. Woe to him who says to one already a father, Why dost thou beget other children? [HORSLEY.] 11. Ask . . . command—Instead of striving with me in regard to my purposes, your wisdom is in prayer to ask, and even command me, in so far as it is for my glory, and for your real good (Mark 11. 24; John 16. 23, 13, latter part of the verse; 1 John 3. 22). sons—(Ch. 54. 13; Galatians 3. 26.) work of my hand—spiritually (Ephesians 2. 10); also literal Israel (ch. 60. 21). MAURER translates, instead of "command," Leave it to me, in my dealings concerning my sons and concerning the work of my hands, to do what I will with my own. LOWTH reads it interrogatively, Do ye presume to question me and dictate to me (see v. 9, 10)? The same sense is given, if the words be taken in irony. But English Version is best. 12. The same argument for prayer, drawn from God's omnipotence and consequent power, to grant any request, occurs (ch. 40. 26-31). 1, even my hands—So Hebrew (Psalms 41. 2), "Thou . . . thy hand" (both nominatives, in opposition). 13. him—Cyrus, type of Messiah, who redeems the captives of Satan "without money and without price" (ch. 55. 1), "freely" (gratuitously) (ch. 52. 3; 61. 1; Zechariah 9. 11; Romans 3. 24). 14. in righteousness—to fulfil my righteous purpose (Note, ch. 41. 2; 42. 6; Jeremiah 23. 6). 14. The language but cursorily alludes to Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba, being given to Cyrus as a ransom in lieu of Israel whom he restored (ch. 43. 3), but mainly and fully describes the gathering in of the Gentiles to Israel (Acts 2. 10, 11; 8. 27-38), especially at Israel's future restoration (ch. 2. 2; 14. 1, 2; 19. 18-22; 60. 3-14; 49. 23; Psalms 68. 31; 72. 10, 11). labour—wealth acquired by labour (Jeremiah 8. 24). Sabeans . . . of stature—the men of Meroe, in Upper Egypt. HERODOTUS (3. 30) calls the Ethiopians "the tallest of men" (Note, ch. 18. 2; 1 Chronicles 11. 23). thee—Jerusalem ("my city," v. 13). in chains—(Psalms 149. 8.) "The saints shall judge the world" (1 Corinthians 6. 2) and "rule the nations with a rod of iron" (Zechariah 4. 12-19; Revelation 2. 26, 27). The "chains," in the case of the obedient, shall be the easy yoke of Messiah; as "the sword of the Spirit" also is saving to the believer, condemnatory to the unbeliever (John 12. 48; Hebrews 4. 12; Revelation 19. 15). God is in thee—(Jeremiah 3. 19.) 15. God that hidest thyself—*HORSLEY, after JEROME, explains this as the confession of Egypt, &c., that God is concealed in human form in the person of Jesus. Rather, connected with v. 9, 10, the prophet, contemplating the wonderful issue of the seemingly dark counsels of God, implies a censure on those who presume to question God's dealings (ch. 55. 8, 9; Deuteronomy 29. 29). Faith still discerns, even under the veil, the covenant-keeping God of Israel the Saviour (ch. 8. 17). 16. ashamed—disappointed in their expectation of help from their idols (Note, ch. 42. 17; Psalms 97. 7). 17. in the Lord—(v. 24, 25), contrasted with the idols which cannot give even temporary help (v. 16); in Jehovah there is everlasting salvation (ch. 26. 4). not . . . ashamed—opposed to the doom of the idolaters, who, in the hour of need, shall be "ashamed" (Note, v. 16). 18. (Note, v. 12.) not in vain [but] to be inhabited—Therefore, Judah, lying waste during the Babylonish captivity, shall be peopled again by the exiles. The Jews, from this passage, infer that, after the resurrection, the earth shall be inhabited, for there can be no reason why the earth should then exist in vain any more than now (2 Peter 3. 13). 19. not . . . secret—not like the heathen oracles, which gave their responses from dark caverns, with studied obscurity (ch. 48. 16). Christ plainly quotes these words, thereby identifying Himself with Jehovah (John 18. 20). I said not . . . Seek . . . in vain—When I commanded you to seek me (Jehovah did so, v. 11, "Ask me," &c.), it was not in order that ye might be sent empty away (Deuteronomy 32. 47). Especially in Israel's time of trial, God's interposition, in behalf of Zion hereafter, is expressly stated as about to be the answer to prayer (ch. 62. 6, 7-10; Psalms 102, 13-17, 19-21). So in the case of all believers, the spiritual Israel. righteousness—what is veracious; not in the equivocal terms of heathen responses, fitly symbolized by the “dark places” from which they were uttered. right—true (Note, ch. 41, 26). 20. escaped of the nations—those of the nations who shall have escaped the slaughter inflicted by Cyrus. Now, at last, ye shall see the folly of “praying to a god that cannot save” (v. 16). Ultimately, those that shall be “left of all the nations which shall come against Jerusalem” are meant (Zechariah 14, 16). They shall then all be converted to the Lord (ch. 66, 23, 24; Jeremiah 3, 17; Zechariah 8, 20-23). 21. Challenge the worshippers of idols (ch. 41, 1). take counsel together—as to the best arguments wherewith to defend the cause of idolatry. who . . . from that time—(Ch. 41, 22, 23; Note, ch. 44, 8.) Which of the idols has done what God hath, viz., foretold, primarily as to Cyrus; ultimately as to the final restoration of Israel hereafter? The idolatry of Israel before Cyrus' time will have its counterpart in the Antichrist and the apostasy, which shall precede Christ's manifestation. just . . . and . . . Saviour—righteous in keeping His promises, and therefore a Saviour to His people. Not only is it not inconsistent with, but it is the result of, His righteousness, or justice, that He should save His redeemed (ch. 42, 6, 21; Psalm 85, 10, 11; Romans 3, 26). 22. Look . . . and be ye saved—The second imperative expresses the result which will follow obedience to the first (Genesis 42, 18); ye shall be saved (John 3, 14, 15). Numbers 21, 9: “If a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass he lived.” What so simple as a look? Not do something, but look to the Saviour (Acts 16, 30, 31). Believers look by faith, the eye of the soul. The look is that of one turning (see Margin) to God, as at once “Just and the Saviour” (v. 21), i. e., the look of conversion (Psalm 22, 27). 23. sworn by myself—equivalent to, “As I live,” as Romans 14, 11 quotes it. So Numbers 14, 21. God could swear by no greater, therefore swears by Himself (Hebrews 6, 13, 16). word . . . in righteousness—rather, “the truth (Note, v. 19) is gone forth from my mouth, the word (of promise), and it shall not return (i. e., which shall not be revoked).” [LOWTH.] But the accents favour English Version. tongue . . . swear—viz., an oath of allegiance to God as their true King (Note, ch. 19, 18; 65, 16). Yet to be fulfilled (Zechariah 14, 9). 24. Rather, “Only in Jehovah shall men say of me (this clause is parenthetical), is there righteousness” (which includes salvation, v. 21, “a just God and a Saviour,” ch. 46, 13), &c. [MAURER.] strength—viz., to save. shall men come—Those who have set themselves up against God shall come to Him in penitence for the past (ch. 19, 22). ashamed—(v. 16; ch. 54, 17, 41, 11). 25. all . . . Israel—the spiritual Israel (Romans 2, 29) and the literal Israel, i. e., the final remnant which shall all be saved (v. 17; Romans 11, 26). justified—treated as if they were just, through Christ's righteousness and death (Jeremiah 23, 5). glory—lit., sing in His praise (Jeremiah 9, 21; 1 Corinthians 1, 31).

CHAPTER XLVI.

Ver. 1-13. BABYLON'S IDOLS COULD NOT SAVE THEMSELVES, MUCH LESS HER. BUT GOD CAN AND WILL SAVE ISRAEL: CYRUS IS HIS INSTRUMENT. 1. Bel—The same as the Phœnician Baal, i. e., lord, the chief god of Babylon; to it was dedicated the celebrated tower of Babylon, in the centre of one of the two parts into which the city was divided, the palace being in the centre of the other. Identical with the sun, worshipped on turrets, housetops, and other high places, so as to be nearer the heavenly hosts (Saba) (Jeremiah 19, 13; 32, 29; Zephaniah 1, 5). GESSENIUS identifies Bel with the planet Jupiter, which, with the planet Venus (under the name Astarte or Astaroth), was worshipped in the East as the god of fortune, the most propitious star to be born under (Note, ch. 65, 11). According to the Apocryphal book, Bel and the Dragon, Bel was cast down by Cyrus. boweth . . . stoopeth—falleth prostrate (ch. 10, 4; 1 Samuel 5, 3, 4; Psalm 20, 8). Nebo—The planet Mercury or Hermes, in astrology. The scribe of heaven, answering to the Egyp-

tan Anubis. The extensive worship of it is shown by the many proper names compounded of it: Neb-ûchadnezzar, Neb-uzaradan, Nab-onassar, &c. were upon—i. e., were a burden (supplied from the following clause) upon. It was customary to transport the gods of the vanquished to the land of the conquerors, who thought thereby the more effectually to keep down the subject people (1 Samuel 5, 1, &c.; Jeremiah 48, 7; 49, 3; Daniel 11, 8). carriages—in the Old English sense of the things carried, the images borne by you: the lading (Acts 21, 15), “carriages,” not the vehicles, but the baggage. Or, the images which used to be carried by you formerly in your solemn processions. [MAURER.] were heavy laden—rather, are put as a load on the beasts of burden. [MAURER.] HORSLEY translates, “They who should have been your carriers (as Jehovah is to His people, v. 3, 4) are become burdens” (see Note, v. 4). 2. deliver—from the enemies' hands. burden—their images laid on the beasts (v. 1). themselves—the gods, here also distinguished from their images. 3. in contrast to what precedes: Babylon's idols, so far from bearing its people safely, are themselves borne off, a burden to the laden beast; but Jehovah bears His people in safety even from the womb to old age (ch. 63, 9; Deuteronomy 32, 11; Psalm 71, 6, 18). God compares Himself to a nurse, tenderly carrying a child; contrast Moses' language (Numbers 11, 12). 4. old age—As your—you—you, are not in the Hebrew, the sentiment is more general than English Version, though of course it includes the Jews from the infancy to the more advanced age of their history (ch. 47, 6). I am he—i. e., the same (Psalm 102, 27; John 8, 24; Hebrews 13, 8). I will bear . . . carry—Not only do I not need to be borne and carried myself, as the idols (v. 1). 5. (Ch. 40, 18, 25). 6. (Ch. 40, 19, 20; 41, 7.) They lavish gold out of their purses, and spare no expense for their idol. Their profuseness shames the niggardliness of professors who worship God with what cost them nothing. Sin is always a costly service. 7. cry . . . can . . . not . . . save—(Ch. 45, 20, with which contrast v. 19). 8. show yourselves men—renounce the childishness of idolatry as shown in what precedes (2 Corinthians 14, 20; 16, 13; Ephesians 4, 14). In order to be manly we must be godly: for man was made “in the image of God,” and only rises to his true dignity when joined to God; virtue is derived from the Latin vir, “a man.” bring . . . to mind—rather, lay it to heart. transgressors—addressed to the idolaters among the Jews. 9. former—viz., proofs of the sole Godship of Jehovah, from predictions fulfilled, and interpositions of God in behalf of Israel (ch. 45, 5). 10. (Ch. 45, 21; 41, 22, 23; 44, 26.) yet—not in the Hebrew. Translate, “What had not been done.” [HORSLEY.] do all my pleasure—(Ch. 53, 10; Romans 9, 19). 11. ravenous bird—Cyrus so called on account of the rapidity of his marches from the distant regions of Persia to pounce on his prey (see Notes, ch. 41, 2, 25; Jeremiah 49, 22; Ezekiel 17, 3). The standard of Cyrus, too, was a golden eagle on a spear (see the heathen historian, XENOPHON, 7., who almost the same word is used, actos, as here, ayit). executeth my counsel—(Ch. 44, 28; 45, 13). Babylon represents, mystically, the apostate faction: the destruction of its idols symbolizes the future general extirpation of all idolatry and unbelief. purposed . . . also do it—(Ch. 43, 13). 12. stout-hearted—stubborn in resisting God (Psalm 76, 5; Acts 7, 51). far from righteousness—(Ch. 59, 9; Habakkuk 2, 4). 13. near—antithetical to “far” (v. 12; ch. 51, 5; 56, 1; 61, 10, 11; Romans, 10, 6-8). righteousness—answering to “salvation” in the parallel clause; therefore it means here, my righteous deliverance; righteous, because proving the truth of God's promises, and so contrived as to not compromise, but vindicate, His righteousness (ch. 42, 21; Romans 3, 26). Zion . . . my glory—rather, “I will give salvation in Zion; to Israel (I will give) my glory.” [HORSLEY, with QUEEN ELIZABETH'S BIBLE.] (Ch. 63, 11; Psalm 14, 7; Luke 2, 32.)

CHAPTER XLVII.

Ver. 1-15. THE DESTRUCTION OF BABYLON IS REPRESENTED UNDER THE IMAGE OF A ROYAL VIRGIN BROUGHT DOWN IN A MOMENT FROM HER MAGNIFICENT THRONE TO

THE EXTREME OF DEGRADATION. 1. in the dust—(Note, ch. 3, 26; Job 2, 13; Lamentations 2, 10). virgin—i. e., heretofore unconquered. [HERODOTUS, I. 191.] daughter of Babylon—Babylon and its inhabitants (Notes, ch. 1, 8; 37, 22). no throne—The seat of empire was transferred to Shushan. Alexander intended to have made Babylon his seat of empire, but Providence defeated his design. He soon died; and Seleucia, being built near, robbed it of its inhabitants, and even of its name, which was applied to Seleucia. delicate—alluding to the effeminate debauchery and prostitution of all classes at banquets and religious rites. [CURTIUS, 5, 1; HERODOTUS, I. 199; BARUCH, 6, 43.] 2. millstones—like the querns or hand-mills, found in this country, before the invention of water-mills and wind-mills: a convex stone, made by the hand to turn in a concave stone, fitted to receive it, the eorn being ground between them: the office of a female slave in the East; most degrading (Job 31, 10; Matthew 24, 41). uncover thy locks—rather, “take off thy veil” [HORSLEY]; perhaps the removal of the plaited hair worn round the women’s temples is included; it, too, is a covering (1 Corinthians 11, 15); to remove it and the veil is the badge of the lowest female degradation; in the East the head is the seat of female modesty; the face of a woman is seldom, the whole head never almost, seen bare (Note, ch. 22, 8). make bare the leg—rather, “lift up (lit., uncover); as in lifting up the train the leg is uncovered) thy flowing train.” In Mesopotamia, women of low rank, as occasion requires, wade across the rivers with stript legs, or else entirely put off their garments and swim across. “Exchange thy rich, loose, queenly robe, for the most abject condition, that of one going to and fro through rivers as a slave, to draw water,” &c. uncover . . . thigh—gather up the robe, so as to wade across. 3. not meet . . . as a man—rather, “I will not meet a man,” i. e., suffer man to intercede with me—give man an audience. [HORSLEY.] Or, “I will not make peace with any man,” before all are destroyed. Lit., strike a league with; a phrase arising from the custom of striking hands together in making a compact [MAURER] (Note, Proverbs 17, 18; 22, 26; 11, 15, Margin). Or else from striking the victims sacrificed in making treaties. 4. As for—rather supply, “Thus saith our Redeemer.” [MAURER.] LOWRIE supposes this verse to be the exclamation of a chorus breaking in with praises, “Our Redeemer! Jehovah of hosts,” &c. (Jeremiah 50, 34). 5. Sit—The posture of mourning (Ezra 9, 4; Job 2, 13; Lamentations 2, 10). darkness—mourning and misery (Lamentations 3, 2; Micah 7, 8). lady of kingdoms—mistress of the world (ch. 13, 19). 6. reason for God’s vengeance on Babylon: in executing God’s will against His people, she had done so with wanton cruelty (ch. 10, 5, &c.; Jeremiah 50, 17; 51, 33; Zechariah 1, 15). polluted my inheritance—(Ch. 43, 28.) the ancient—even old age was disregarded by the Chaldeans, who treated all alike with cruelty (Lamentations 4, 16; 5, 12). [ROSENMULLER.] Or, “the ancient” means Israel, worn out with calamities in the latter period of its history (ch. 46, 4), as its earlier stage of history is called its “youth” (ch. 54, 6; Ezekiel 16, 60). 7. so that—through thy vain expectation of being a queen for ever, thou didst advance to such a pitch of insolence as not to believe “these things” (viz., as to thy overthrow, v. 1-5) possible. end of it—viz., of thy insolence, implied in her words, “I shall be a lady for ever.” 8. given to pleasures—(Note, v. 1.) In no city were there so many incentives to licentiousness. I am . . . none . . . beside me—(v. 10.) Language of arrogance in man’s mouth; fitting for God alone (ch. 45, 6). See ch. 5, 8, latter part. widow . . . loss of children—A state, represented as a female, when it has fallen is called a widow, because its king is no more; and childless, because it has no inhabitants, they having been carried off as captives (ch. 23, 4; 54, 1, 4, 5; Revelation 18, 7, 8). 9. In a moment—it should not decay slowly, but be suddenly and unexpectedly destroyed; in a single night it was taken by Cyrus. The prophecy was again literally fulfilled when Babylon revolted against Darius; and, in order to hold out to the last, each man chose one woman of his family, and strangled the rest, to save provisions. Darius impaled 3000 of the revolters. in . . . perfection—i. e.,

“in full measure.” for . . . for—rather, “notwithstanding the . . . notwithstanding;” “in spite of.” [LOWTH.] So “for” (Numbers 14, 11). Babylon was famous for “expiations or sacrifices, and other incantations, whereby they tried to avert evil and obtain good.” [DIODORUS SICULUS.] 10. wickedness—as in ch. 13, 11, the cruelty with which Babylon treated its subject states. none seeth me—(Psalm 10, 11; 94, 7.) “There is none to exact punishment from me.” Sinners are not safe, though seeming secret. thy wisdom—astrological and political (ch. 19, 11, &c., as to Egypt). perverted—turns thee aside from the right and safe path. 11. from whence it riseth—Hebrew, the dawn thereof, i. e., its first rising. Evil shall come on thee without the least previous intimation. [ROSENMULLER.] But dawn is not applied to “evil,” but to prosperity shining out after misery (ch. 21, 12). Translate, “Thou shalt not see any dawn” (of alleviation). [MAURER.] put . . . off rather, as Margin, “remove by expiation;” it shall be never ending. not know—unawares: which thou dost not apprehend. Proving the fallacy of thy divinations and astrology (Job 9, 5; Psalm 35, 8). 12. Stand—forth: a scornful challenge to Babylon’s magicians to show whether they can defend their city. laboured—The devil’s servlee is a laborious yet fruitless one (ch. 55, 2). 13. wearied—(Cf. 57, 10; Ezekiel 24, 12.) astrologers—lit., those who form combinations of the heavens; who watch conjunctions and oppositions of the stars. “Casters of the configurations of the sky.” [HORSLEY.] GESENIUS explains it: the dividers of the heavens. In casting a nativity they observed four signs:—the horoscope, or sign which arose at the time one was born; the mid-heaven; the sign opposite the horoscope towards the west; and the hypogee. monthly prognosticators—Those who at each new moon profess to tell thereby what is about to happen. Join, not as English Version, “save . . . from those things,” &c.; but, “They that at new moons make known from (by means of) them the things that shall come upon thee,” [MAURER.] 14. (Ch. 29, 6; 30, 30.) not . . . a coal—Like stubble, they shall burn to a dead ash, without leaving a live coal or cinder (cf. ch. 30, 14), so utterly shall they be destroyed. 15. Thus, &c.—Such shall be the fate of those astrologers who cost thee such an amount of trouble and money. thy merchants from thy youth—i. e., with whom thou hast trafficked from thy earliest history, the foreigners sojourning in Babylon for the sake of commerce (ch. 13, 14; Jeremiah 51, 6, 9; Nahum 3, 16, 17). [BARNES.] Rather, the astrologers, with whom Babylon had so many dealings (v. 12-14). [HORSLEY.] to his quarter—lit., straight before him (Ezekiel 1, 9, 12). The foreigners, whether soothsayers or merchants, shall flee home out of Babylon (Jeremiah 50, 16).

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Ver. 1-22. THE THINGS THAT BEFALL BABYLON JEHOVAH PREDICTED LONG BEFORE, LEST ISRAEL SHOULD ATTRIBUTE THEM, IN ITS “OBSTINATE” PERVERSITY, TO STRANGE GODS (v. 1-5). 1. the waters of Judah—spring from the fountain of Judah (Numbers 24, 7; Deuteronomy 33, 28; Psalm 68, 26, Margin). Judah has the “fountain” attributed to it, because it survived the ten tribes, and from it Messiah was to spring. swear by . . . Lord—(Ch. 19, 18; 45, 23; 65, 16.) mention—in prayers and praises. not in truth—(Jeremiah 5, 2; John 4, 24.) 2. For—Ye deserve these reproofs; for ye call yourselves citizens of “the holy city” (ch. 52, 1), but not in truth (v. 1); Nehemiah 11, 1; Daniel 9, 24); so the inscription on their coins of the time of the Maccabees. “Jerusalem the Holy.” 3. former—things which have happened in time past to Israel (ch. 42, 9; 44, 7, 8; 45, 21; 46, 10). suddenly—they came to pass so unexpectedly, that the prophecy could not have resulted from mere human sagacity. 4. obstinate—Hebrew, hard (Deuteronomy 9, 27; Ezekiel 3, 7, Margin). iron sinew—inflexible (Acts 7, 51). brow brass—shameless as a harlot (see Jeremiah 6, 28; 3, 3; Ezekiel 3, 7, Margin). 5. (See Notes, v. 1, 3.) 6. Thou, &c.—So “ye are my witnesses” (ch. 43, 10). Thou canst testify the prediction was uttered long before the fulfilment: “see all

this," viz., that the event answers to the prophecy. declare—make the fact known as a proof that Jehovah alone is God (ch. 44, 8). new things—viz., the deliverance from Babylon by Cyrus, new in contradistinction from former predictions that had been fulfilled (ch. 42, 9; 43, 19). Antotypically, the prophecy has in view the "new things" of the gospel treasury (Song of Solomon 7, 13; Matthew 13, 52; 2 Corinthians 5, 17; Revelation 21, 5). From this point forward, the prophecies as to Messiah's first and second advents, and the restoration of Israel, have a new circumstantial distinctness, such as did not characterize the previous ones, even of Isaiah. Babylon, in this view, answers to the mystical Babylon of Revelation. hidden—which could not have been guessed by political sagacity (Daniel 2, 22, 29; 1 Corinthians 2, 9, 10). 7. Not like natural results from existing causes, the events when they took place were like acts of creative power, such as had never before been "from the beginning," even before the day when—rather [MAURER], "And before the day (of their occurrence) thou hast not heard of them," i. e., by any human acuteness; they are only heard of by the present inspired announcement. 8. hearest not—repeated, as also "knewest not," from last verse. from that time that—omit that: "From the first thine ear did not open itself," viz., to obey them. [ROSENMULLER.] "To open the ear" denotes obedient attention (ch. 50, 5). Or, "was not opened" to receive them, i. e., they were not declared by me to thee previously, since, if thou hadst been informed of them, such is thy perversity, thou couldst not have been kept in check. [MAURER.] In the former view, the sense of the words following is, "For I knew that, if I had not foretold the destruction of Babylon so plainly, that there could be no perverting of it, thou wouldst have perversely ascribed it to idols, or something else than to me" (v. 5). Thus they would have relapsed into idolatry, to cure them of which the Babylonian captivity was sent: so they had done (Exodus 32, 4). After the return, and ever since, they have utterly forsaken idols. wast called—as thine appropriate appellation (ch. 9, 6). from the womb—from the beginning of Israel's national existence (ch. 44, 2). 9. refrain—lit., muzzle; His wrath, after the return, was to be restrained a while, and then, because of their sins, let loose again (Psalm 78, 38). for thee—i. e., mine anger towards thee. 10. (Note, ch. 1, 25.) with silver—rather, "for silver." I sought by affliction to purify thee, but thou wast not as silver obtained by melting, but as dross. [GESENIUS.] Thy repentance is not complete: thou art not yet as refined silver. ROSENMULLER explains, not as silver, not with the intense heat needed to melt silver (it being harder to melt than gold), i. e., not with the most extreme severity. The former view is better (ch. 1, 25; 42, 25; Ezekiel 22, 18-20, 22). chosen—or else [LOWTH], tried . . . proved; according to GESENIUS, lit., to rub with the touchstone, or to cut in pieces so as to examine (Zechariah 13, 9; Malachi 3, 3; 1 Peter 1, 7). 11. how should my name—MAURER, instead of "my name" from v. 9, supplies "my glory" from the next clause; and translates, "How (shamefully) my glory has been profaned!" In English Version the sense is, "I will refrain (v. 9, i. e., not utterly destroy thee), for why should I permit my name to be polluted, which it would be, if the Lord utterly destroyed His elect people" (Ezekiel 20, 9)? not give glory unto another—if God forsook His people for ever, the heathen would attribute their triumph over Israel to their idols; so God's glory would be given to another. 12-15. The Almighty who has founded heaven and earth, can, and will, restore His people. the first . . . last—(Ch. 41, 4; 44, 6). 13. spanned—measured out (ch. 40, 12). when I call . . . stand up together—(Ch. 40, 26; Jeremiah 33, 25.) But it is not their creation so much which is meant, as that, like ministers of God, the heavens and the earth are prepared at His command to execute His decrees (Psalm 119, 91). [ROSENMULLER.] 14. among them—among the gods and astrologers of the Chaldees (ch. 41, 22; 43, 9; 44, 7). Lord . . . loved him; he will, &c.—i. e., "He whom the Lord hath loved will do," &c. [LOWTH]; viz., Cyrus (ch. 44, 28; 45, 1, 13; 46, 11). However, Jehovah's language of love is too strong to apply to Cyrus, except as

type of Messiah, to whom alone it fully applies (Revelation 5, 2-5). his pleasure—not Cyrus' own, but Jehovah's. 15. brought—led him on his way. he—change from the first to the third person. [BARNES.] Jehovah shall make his (Cyrus') way prosperous. 16. not . . . in secret—(Ch. 45, 19.) Jehovah foretold Cyrus' advent, not with the studied ambiguity of heathen oracles, but plainly. from the time, &c.—from the moment that the purpose began to be accomplished in the raising up of Cyrus I was present. sent me—The prophet here speaks, claiming attention to his announcement as to Cyrus, on the ground of his mission from God and His Spirit. But he speaks not in his own person so much as in that of Messiah, to whom alone in the fullest sense the words apply (ch. 61, 1; John 10, 36). Plainly, ch. 40, 1, which is the continuation of ch. 48, from v. 16, where the change of speaker from God (v. 1, 12-15) begins, is the language of Messiah. Luke 4, 1, 14, 18, shows that the Spirit combined with the Father in sending the Son: therefore "His Spirit" is nominative to "sent," not accusative, following it. 17. teacheth . . . to profit—by affliction, such as the Babylonish captivity, and the present long-continued dispersion of Israel (Hebrews 12, 10). 18. peace—(Psalm 119, 165.) Cf. the desire expressed by the same Messiah (Matthew 23, 37; Luke 19, 42). river—(Ch. 33, 21; 41, 18), a river flowing from God's throne is the symbol of free, abundant, and ever-flowing blessings from Him (Ezekiel 47, 1; Zechariah 14, 8; Revelation 22, 1). righteousness—religious prosperity, the parent of "peace" or national prosperity; therefore "peace" corresponds to "righteousness" in the parallelism (ch. 32, 17). 19. sand—retaining the metaphor of "the sea" (v. 18). like the gravel thereof—rather, as the Hebrew, "like that (the offspring) of its (the sea's) bowels;" referring to the countless living creatures, fishes, &c., of the sea, rather than the gravel. [MAURER.] JEROME, CHALDEE, and SYRIAC support English Version. his name . . . cut off—transition from the second person, "thy," to the third, "his." Israel's name was cut off as a nation during the Babylonish captivity; also it is so now, to which the prophecy especially looks (Romans 11, 20). 20. Go . . . forth . . . end of the earth—Primarily, a prophecy of their joyful deliverance from Babylon, and a direction that they should leave it when God opened the way. But the publication of it "to the ends of the earth" shows it has a more world-wide scope antotypically; Revelation 18, 4 shows that the mystical Babylon is ultimately meant. redeemed . . . Jacob—(Ch. 43, 1; 44, 22, 23.) 21. Ezra, in describing the return, makes no mention of God cleaving the rock for them in the desert. [KIMCHI.] The circumstances, therefore, of the deliverance from Egypt (Exodus 17, 6; Numbers 20, 11; Psalm 78, 15; 105, 41) and of that from Babylon, are blended together; the language, whilst more immediately referring to the latter deliverance, yet, as being blended with circumstances of the former not strictly applicable to the latter, cannot wholly refer to either, but to the mystic deliverance of man under Messiah, and literally to the final restoration of Israel. 22. Repeated (ch. 57, 21). All the blessings just mentioned (v. 21) belong only to the godly, not to the wicked. Israel shall first cast away its wicked unbelief before it shall inherit national prosperity (Zechariah 12, 10-14; 13, 1, 9; 14, 3, 14, 20, 21). The sentiment holds good also as to all wicked men (Job 15, 20-25, 31-34).

CHAPTER XLIX.

Ver. 1-26. SIMILAR TO CHAPTER 42, 1-7 (v. 1-9). Messiah, as the ideal Israel (v. 3), states the object of His mission, His want of success for a time, yet His certainty of ultimate success. 1. O isles—Messiah is here regarded as having been rejected by the Jews (v. 4, 5), and as now turning to the Gentiles, to whom the Father hath given Him "for a light and salvation." "Isles" mean all regions beyond sea. from the womb—(Ch. 44, 2; Luke 1, 31; John 10, 36.) from . . . bowels . . . mention of my name—His name "Jesus" (i. e., God-Saviour) was designated by God before His birth (Matthew 1, 21). 2. my mouth . . . sword—(Ch. 11, 4; Revelation 19, 15.) The double office of the Word of God, saving and damnatory, is implied (ch. 50. 4; John 12. 48; Hebrews 4. 12). shaft—(Psalm 45. 5.) "Polished," i. e., free from all rust, implies His unsullied purity. in . . . quiver . . . hid me—Like a sword in its scabbard, or a shaft in the quiver, Messiah, before his appearing, was hid with God, ready to be drawn forth at the moment God saw fit [HENGSTENBERG]; also, always protected by God, as the arrow by the quiver (ch. 51. 16). 3. Israel—applied to Messiah, according to the true import of the name, the Prince who had power with God in wrestling in behalf of man, and who prevails (Genesis 32. 28; Hosea 12. 3, 4). He is also the ideal Israel, the representative-man of the nation (cf. Matthew 2. 15 with Hosca 11. 1). in whom . . . glorified—(John 14. 13; 17. 1-5). 4. I—Messiah. in vain—comparatively in the case of the greater number of His own countrymen. "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not" (ch. 53. 1-3; Luke 19. 14; John 1. 11; 7. 5). Only 120 disciples met after His personal ministry was ended (Acts 1. 15). yet . . . my judgment . . . with the Lord—ultimately, God will do justice to my cause, and reward [Margin for work, cf. ch. 40. 10; 62. 11] my labours and sufferings. He was never "discouraged" (ch. 42. 4; 50. 7, 10). He calmly, in spite of seeming ill-success for the time, left the result with God, confident of final triumph (ch. 53. 10-12; 1 Peter 2. 23). So the ministers of Christ (1 Corinthians 4. 1-5; 1 Peter 4. 19). 5. The reason why He was confident that His work would be accepted and rewarded, viz., because He is "glorious in the eyes of Jehovah," &c. to bring Jacob again to him—(Matthew 15. 24; Acts 3. 26.) Though Israel be not gathered—metaphor from a scattered flock which the shepherd gathers together again. Or a hen and her chickens (Matthew 23. 37). Instead of the text "not," the Keri has the similar Hebrew word, "to Him," which the parallelism favours: "And that Israel may be gathered to Him," yet—rather, parenthetically, "For I am glorious, &c., and my God is my strength." Then (v. 6) resuming the words from the beginning of v. 5, "He saith" (I repeat), &c. HORSLEY explains, "Notwithstanding the Incredulity of the Jews, Messiah shall be glorified in the conversion of the Gentiles," reading as English Version; but if the Keri be read, "Israel shall at one time or other be gathered, notwithstanding their incredulity during Messiah's sojourn on earth." 6. It is a light thing—"It is too little that thou shouldst," &c. [HENGSTENBERG] i. e., it is not enough honour to thee to raise up Jacob and Israel, but I design for thee more, viz., that thou shouldst be the means of enlightening the Gentiles (ch. 42. 6, 7; 60. 3). the preserved—viz., those remaining after the judgments of God on the nation—the elect remnant of Israel reserved for mercy. LOWTH, with a slight but needless change of the Hebrew, translates for "tribes" and "preserved," the scions—the branches. 7. whom man despiseth—Hebrew, the despised of soul, i. e., by every soul, by all men (ch. 52. 14, 15; 53. 3; 50. 6-9; Psalm 22. 6). LOWTH translates, "whose person is despised." abhorreth—lit., who is an abomination to the nation (Luke 23. 18-23). The Jews contemptuously call Him always Tolvi, "the crucified." I prefer, on account of Go!, the Hebrew term for nation being usually applied to the Gentiles, and that for people to the Jews (Hosea 1. 9; so the Greek terms respectively also Laos and Ethne, Romans 9. 25), to take "nation" here collectively for the Gentile world, which also spurned him (Psalm 2. 1-3; Acts 4. 25-27). servant of rulers—(Matthew 17. 27.) He who would not exert His power against the rulers (Matthew 26. 52, 53). shall see—viz., the fulfilment of God's promises (v. 3, 6), when He shall be a light to the Gentiles. arise—to reverence thee (Psalm 72. 10, 11; Philippians 2. 10). princes also—rather, for the parallelism, supply the ellipsis, thus, "Princes shall see and shall worship." faithful—viz., to His promises. choose thee—as God's elect (ch. 42. 1). 8. Messiah is represented as having asked for the grace of God in behalf of sinners; this verse contains God the Father's favourable answer. an acceptable time—"In a time of grace." [HENGSTENBERG.] A limited time (ch. 61. 2; 2 Corinthians 6. 2). The time judged by God to be the best fitted for effecting the purposes of His grace by Messiah. heard thee—(Psalm 2. 8; Hebrews 5. 7.) day of

salvation—when "the fulness of time" (Galatians 4. 4) shall have come. The day of salvation is "to-day" (Hebrews 4. 7). helped—given thee the help needed to enable thee, as man, to accomplish man's salvation. preserve—from the assaults and efforts of Satan, to divert thee from thy voluntary death to save man. covenant of the people—(Note, ch. 42. 6.) "The people," in the singular, is always applied exclusively to Israel. establish the earth—rather, "to restore the land," viz., Canaan to Israel. Spiritually, the restoration of the Church (the spiritual Israel) to the heavenly land forfeited by man's sin is also included. cause to inherit . . . desolate heritages—image from the desolate state of Judea during the Babylonish captivity. Spiritually, the Gentile world, a moral waste, shall become a garden of the Lord. Lit., Judea lying desolate for ages shall be possessed again by Israel (cf. ch. 61. 7, "in their land"). Jesus, the antitype of, and bearing the same name as Joshua (Hebrews 4. 8), shall, like him, divide the land among its true heirs (ch. 54. 3; 61. 4). 9. (Ch. 42. 7; Zechariah 9. 12.) prisoners—the Jews bound in legal bondage. them . . . in darkness—the Gentiles having no light as to the one true God. [VITRINGA.] Show yourselves—not only see but be seen (Matthew 5. 16; Mark 5. 19). Come forth from the darkness of your prison into the light of the Sun of righteousness. in the places, &c.—In a desert there are no "ways," nor "high places," with "pastures;" thus the sense is: "They shall have their pastures, not in deserts, but in cultivated and inhabited places. Laying aside the figure, the churches of Christ at the first shall be gathered, not in obscure and unknown regions, but in the most populous parts of the Roman empire, Antioch, Alexandria, Rome, &c. [VITRINGA.] Another sense probably is the right one. Israel, on its way back to the Holy Land, shall not have to turn aside to devious paths in search of necessaries, but shall find them in all places wherever their route lies; so ROSENMULLER. God will supply them as if He should make the grass grow in the trodden ways and on the barren high places. 10. Messiah will abundantly satisfy all the wants, both of literal Israel on their way to Palestine, and of the spiritual on their way to heaven, as their Shepherd (ch. 65. 13; Matthew 5. 6), also in heaven (Revelation 7. 16, 17). 11. my—all things are God's. mountains a way—I will remove all obstructions out of the way (ch. 40. 4). exalted—i. e., cast up (ch. 57. 14; 62. 10); for instance, over valleys. VITRINGA explains "mountains" as great kingdoms, Egypt, Syria, &c., subjected to Rome, to facilitate the spreading of the gospel; "highways," the Christian doctrine wherein those who join the Church walk, and which, at the time of Constantine, was to be raised into prominence before all, and publicly protected (ch. 55. 8, 9). 12. Sinim—The Arabians and other Asiatics called China Sin, or Tchin; the Chinese had no special name for themselves, but either adopted that of the reigning dynasty or some high-sounding titles. This view of "Sinim" suits the context which requires a people to be meant "from far," and distinct from those "from the north and from the west." [GESENIUS.] 13. So Revelation 12. 12. God will have mercy on the afflicted, because of His compassion; on His afflicted, because of His covenant. 14. Zion—The literal Israel's complaint, as if God had forsaken her in the Babylonian captivity; also in their dispersion previous to their future restoration; thereby God's mercy shall be called forth (ch. 63. 15-19; Psalm 77. 9, 10; 102. 17). 15. (Ch. 44. 21; Psalm 103. 13; Matthew 7. 11.) 16. Alluding to the Jews' custom (perhaps drawn from Exodus 13. 9) of puncturing on their hands a representation of their city and temple, in token of zeal for them [LOWTH] (Song of Solomon 8. 6). 17. thy children—Israel (v. 20, 21; ch. 43. 6). JEROME reads, for "Thy children," "Thy builders;" they that destroyed thee shall hasten to build thee. haste—to rebuild thy desolate capital. shall go forth—Thy destroyers shall leave Judea to Israel in undisturbed possession. 18. As Zion is often compared to a bride (ch. 54. 5), so the accession of converts is like bridal ornaments ("jewels," ch. 62. 3; Malachi 3. 17). Her literal children are, however, more immediately meant, as the context refers to their restoration; and only secondarily to her spiritual children by conversion to Christ. Israel shall be the means of the final complete conversion of the nations (Micah 5. 7; Romans 11. 12, 15), as a bride—viz., binds on her ornaments. 19. land of thy destruction—thy land once the scene of destruction, too narrow—(Ch. 54. 1, 2; Zechariah 10. 10.) 20. children . . . after . . . other—rather, the children of thy widowhood, i. e., the children of whom thou hast been bereft during their dispersion in other lands (Note, ch. 47. 8). [MAURER.] again—rather, yet, give place—rather, stand close to me, viz., in order that we may be the more able to dwell in the narrow place. [HORSLEY.] Cf. as to Israel's spiritual children, and the extension of the gospel sphere, Romans 15. 19, 24; 2 Corinthians 10. 14-16. But v. 22 (cf. ch. 66. 20) shows that her literal children are primarily meant. GESENIUS translates, "Make room." 21. Who? &c.—Zion's joyful wonder at the unexpected restoration of the ten tribes. Secondly, the accession of spiritual Israelites to the mother-Church of Jerusalem from the Gentiles is meant. This created surprise at first (Acts 10. 45; 14. 27; 15. 3, 4). lost . . . am desolate, a captive, and removing to and fro—rather, "bereaved of . . . have been barren, an exile and outcast." [HORSLEY.] She had been "put away" by Jehovah, her husband (ch. 50. 1); hence her wonder at the children begotten to her. 22. lift . . . hand—i. e., beckon to (Note, ch. 13. 2). standard—(Ch. 11. 12.) bring . . . sons in . . . arms—The Gentiles shall aid in restoring Israel to its own land (ch. 60. 4; 66. 20). Children able to support themselves are carried on the shoulders in the East; but infants, in the arms, or astride on one haunch (ch. 60. 12). "Thy sons" must be distinct from "the Gentiles," who carry them; and therefore cannot primarily refer to converts among the Gentiles. 23. Hek . . . dust—i. e., kiss thy feet in token of humble submission. for they . . . not . . . ashamed . . . wait for me—The restoration of Israel shall be in answer to their prayerful waiting on the Lord (ch. 30. 18, 19; Psalm 102. 16, 17; Zechariah 12. 10; 14. 3). 24. the prey—Israel, long a prey to mighty Gentile nations, whose oppression of her shall reach its highest point under Antichrist (Daniel 11. 36, 37, 41, 45). lawful captive—the Jews justly consigned for their sins (ch. 50. 1) as captives to the foe. Secondly, Satan and Death are "the mighty" conquerors of man, upon whom his sin gives them their "lawful" claim. Christ answers that claim for the sinners, and so the captive is set free (Job 19. 25; 14. 14; Matthew 12. 29; Hosea 6. 2, where v. 4 shows the primary reference is to Israel's restoration, to which the resurrection corresponds; Isaiah 26. 19; Ephesians 4. 8; Hebrews 2. 14, 15). Others not so well translate, "the captives taken from among the just Israelites." 25. (Ch. 53. 12; Psalm 68. 18; Colossians 2. 15.) contend with him, &c.—(Ch. 54. 17.) 26. feed . . . own flesh—A phrase for internal strifes (ch. 9. 20). own blood—A just retribution for their having shed the blood of God's servants (Revelation 16. 6). sweet wine—i. e., mist, or new wine, the pure juice which flows from the heap of grapes before they are pressed; the ancients could preserve it for a long time, so as to retain its flavour. It was so mild that it required a large quantity to intoxicate; thus the idea here is that very much blood would be shed (Revelation 14. 10, 20). all flesh shall, &c.—the effect on the world of God's judgments (ch. 66. 15, 16, 18, 19; Revelation 15. 3, 4).

CHAPTER L.

Ver. 1-11. THE JUDGMENTS ON ISRAEL WERE PROVOKED BY THEIR CRIMES, YET THEY ARE NOT FINALLY CAST OFF BY GOD. 1. Where . . . mother's divorcement—Zion is "the mother;" the Jews are the children; and God the Husband and Father (ch. 54. 5; 62. 5; Jeremiah 3. 14). GESENIUS thinks, God means by the question to deny that He had given "a bill of divorcement" to her, as was often done on slight pretexts by a husband (Deuteronomy 24. 1), or that He had "sold" His and her "children," as a poor parent sometimes did (Exodus 21. 7; 2 Kings 4. 1; Nehemiah 5. 5) under pressure of his "creditors;" that it was they who sold themselves through their own sins. MAURER explains, "Show the bill of your mother's divorce-

ment, whom, &c.; produce the creditors to whom ye have been sold; so it will be seen that it was not from any caprice of mine, but through your own fault, your mother has been put away, and you sold" (ch. 52. 3). HORSLEY best explains (as the antithesis between "I" and "yourselves" shows, though LOWTH translates, "Ye are sold") I have never given your mother a regular bill of divorcement, I have merely "put her away" for a time, and can, therefore, by right as her husband still take her back on her submission; I have not made you, the children, over to any "creditor" to satisfy a debt; I therefore still have the right of a father over you, and can take you back on repentance, though as rebellious children you have sold yourselves to sin and its penalty (1 Kings 21. 25). bill . . . whom—rather, "the bill with which I have put her away." [MAURER.] 2. I—Messiah. no man—willing to believe in and obey me (ch. 52. 1, 3). The same Divine Person had "come" by His prophets in the Old Testament (appealing to them, but in vain, Jeremiah 7. 25, 26), who was about to come under the New Testament. hand shortened—the Oriental emblem of weakness, as the long stretched-out hand is of power (ch. 59. 1). Notwithstanding your sins, I can still "redeem" you from your bondage and dispersion. dry up . . . sea—(Exodus 14. 21.) The second exodus shall exceed, whilst it resembles in wonders, the first (ch. 11. 11, 15; 51. 15). make . . . rivers . . . wilderness—turn the prosperity of Israel's foes into adversity. fish stinketh—the very judgment inflicted on their Egyptian enemies at the first exodus (Exodus 7. 18, 21). 3. heavens . . . blackness—another of the judgments on Egypt to be repeated hereafter on the last enemy of God's people (Exodus 10. 21). sackcloth—(Revelation 6. 12.) 4. Messiah, as "the servant of Jehovah" (ch. 42. 1), declares that the office has been assigned to Him of encouraging the "weary" exiles of Israel by "words in season" suited to their case; and that, whatever suffering it is to cost Himself, He does not shrink from it (v. 5, 6), for that He knows His cause will triumph at last (v. 7, 8). learned—not in mere human learning, but in divinely-taught modes of instruction and eloquence (ch. 49. 2; Exodus 4. 11; Matthew 7. 28, 29; 13. 54) speak a word in season—(Proverbs 15. 23; 25. 11.) Lit., "to succour by words," viz., in their season of need, the "weary" dispersed ones of Israel (Deuteronomy 28. 65-67). Also, the spiritual "weary" (ch. 42. 3; Matthew 11. 28). wakeneth [me] morning, &c.—Cf. "daily rising up early" (Jeremiah 7. 25; Mark 1. 35). The image is drawn from a master wakening his pupils early for instruction. wakeneth . . . ear—prepares me for receiving His Divine instructions. as the learned—as one taught by Him. He "learned obedience," experimentally, "by the things which He suffered;" thus gaining that practical learning which adapted Him for "speaking a word in season" to suffering men (Hebrews 5. 8). 5. opened . . . ear—(see Note, ch. 42. 20; 48. 8); i. e., hath made me obediently attentive (but MAURER, "hath informed me of my duty"), as a servant to his master (cf. Psalm 40. 6-8, with Philipians 2. 7; ch. 42. 1; 49. 3, 6; 52. 13; 53. 11; Matthew 20. 28; Luke 22. 27). not rebellious—but, on the contrary, most willing to do the Father's will in proclaiming and procuring salvation for man, at the cost of His own sufferings (Hebrews 10. 5-10). 6. smiters—with scourges and with the open hand (ch. 52. 14; Mark 14. 65). Lit., fulfilled (Matthew 27. 26; 26. 67; Luke 18. 33). To "pluck the hair" is the highest insult that can be offered an Oriental (2 Samuel 10. 4; Lamentations 3. 30). "I gave" implies the voluntary nature of His sufferings; His example corresponds to His precept (Matthew 5. 39). spitting—to spit in another's presence is an insult in the East, much more on one; most of all in the face (Job 30. 10; Matthew 27. 30; Luke 18. 32). 7. Sample of His not being "discouraged" (ch. 42. 4; 49. 5). set . . . face like . . . flint—set myself resolutely, not to be daunted from my work of love by shame or suffering (Ezekiel 3. 8, 9). 8. (Ch. 49. 4.) The believer, by virtue of his oneness with Christ, uses the same language (Psalm 138. 8; Romans 8. 32-34). But "justify" in His case, is God's judicial acceptance and vindication of Him on the ground of His own righteousness (Luke 23. 44-47; Romans 1. 4; 1 Timothy 3. 16, with which cf. 1 Peter 3. 18), in their case, on the ground of His righteousness and meritorious death imputed to them (Romans 5. 19). stand together—in judgment, to try the issue. adversary—lit., master of my cause, i. e., who has real ground of accusation against me, so that he can demand judgment to be given in his favour (cf. Zechariah 3. 1, &c.; Revelation 12. 10). 9. (Cf. ch. 52. 13, Margin; ch. 53. 10; Psalm 118. 6; Jeremiah 23. 5.) as a garment—(Ch. 51. 6, 8; Psalm 102. 23.) A leading constituent of wealth in the East is change of raiment, which is always liable to the inroads of the moth; hence the frequency of the image in Scripture. 10. Messiah exhorts the godly after His example (ch. 49. 4, 5; 42. 4) when in circumstances of trial ("darkness," ch. 47. 5), to trust in the arm of Jehovah alone. Who is there—i. e., Whosoever (Judges 7. 3). obeyeth . . . servant—viz., Messiah. The godly "honour the Son, even as they honour the Father" (John 5. 23). darkness—(Micah 7. 8, 9.) God never had a son who was not sometimes in the dark. For even Christ, His only Son, cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" light—rather, splendour; bright sunshine; for the servant of God is never wholly without "light." [VITRINGA.] A godly man's way may be dark, but his end shall be peace and light. A wicked man's way may be bright, but his end shall be utter darkness (Psalm 112. 4; 97. 11; 37. 21). let him trust, &c.—as Messiah did (v. 8, 9). 11. In contrast to the godly (v. 10), the wicked, in times of darkness, instead of trusting in God, trust in themselves (kindle a light for themselves to walk by) (Ecclesiastes 11. 9). The image is continued from v. 10, "darkness;" human devices for salvation (ch. 19. 21; 16. 9, 25) are like the spark that goes out in an instant in darkness (cf. Job 18. 6; 21. 17, with Psalm 18. 28). sparks—not a steady light, but blazing sparks extinguished in a moment. walk—not a command, but implying that as surely as they would do so, they should lie down in sorrow (Jeremiah 3. 25). In exact proportion to mystic Babylon's previous "glorifying" of herself shall be her sorrow (Matthew 23. 30; 8. 12; Revelation 18. 7).

CHAPTER LI.

Ver. 1-23. ENCOURAGEMENT TO THE FAITHFUL REMNANT OF ISRAEL TO TRUST IN GOD FOR DELIVERANCE, BOTH FROM THEIR LONG BABYLONIAN EXILE, AND FROM THEIR PRESENT DISPERSION. 1. me—the God of your fathers. ye . . . follow after righteousness—the godly portion of the nation; v. 7 shows this (Proverbs 15. 9; 1 Timothy 6. 11). "Ye follow righteousness," seek it therefore from me, who "bring it near," and that a righteousness "not about to be abolished" (v. 6, 7); look to Abraham, your father (v. 2), as a sample of how righteousness before me is to be obtained; I, the same God who blessed him, will bless you at last (v. 3); therefore trust in me, and fear not man's opposition (v. 7, 8, 12, 13). The mistake of the Jews, heretofore, has been, not in that they "followed after righteousness," but in that they followed it "by the works of the law," instead of "by faith," as Abraham (Romans 9. 31, 32; 10. 3, 4; 4. 2-5). hole of . . . pit—The idea is not, as it is often quoted, the inculcation of humility, by reminding men of the fallen state from which they have been taken, but that as Abraham, the quarry, as it were (cf. ch. 48. 1), whence their nation was hewn, had been called out of a strange land to the inheritance of Canaan, and blessed by God, the same God is able to deliver and restore them also (cf. Matthew 3. 9). 2. alone—translate, "I called him when he was but one" (Ezekiel 33. 24). The argument is, the same God who had so blessed "one" individual, as to become a mighty nation (Genesis 12. 1; 22. 7), can also increase and bless the small remnant of Israel, both that left in the Babylonian captivity, and that left in the present and latter days (Zechariah 14. 2); "the residue" (ch. 13. 8, 9). 3. For—See for the argument, last note. the garden of the Lord—restoration of the primeval paradise (Genesis 2. 8; Ezekiel 28. 13; Revelation 2. 7). melody—Hebrew, psalm. God's praises shall again be heard. 4. my people—the Jews. This reading is better than that of GENEVIUS: "O peoples . . . nations," viz., the Gentiles. The Jews are called on to hear and rejoice in the extension of the true religion to the nations; for, at the first preaching of the gospel, as in the final age to come, it was from Jerusalem that the gospel law was, and is, to go forth (ch. 2. 3). law . . . judgment—the gospel dispensation and institutions (ch. 42. 1, "judgment"). make . . . to rest—establish firmly; found. light, &c.—(Ch. 42. 6.) 5. righteousness . . . near—i. e., faithful fulfilment of the promised deliverance, answering to "salvation" in the parallel clause (ch. 46. 13; 56. 1; Romans 10. 8, 9). Ye follow after "righteousness;" seek it, therefore, from me, and you will not have far to go for it (v. 1). arms—put for Himself; I by my might. judge—(Ch. 2. 3, 4; Psalm 93. 9.) isles, &c.—(Ch. 60. 9.) arm—(Romans 1. 16), "the power of God unto (the Gentiles as well as the Jews) salvation." 6. (Ch. 40. 6, 8; Psalm 102. 26; Hebrews 1. 11, 12.) vanish away—lit., shall be torn asunder, as a garment [MAURER]; which accords with the context. in like manner—But GENEVIUS, "Like a gnat;" like the smallest and vilest insect. JEROME translates, as English Version, and infers that "in like manner" as man, the heavens (i. e., the sky) and earth are not to be annihilated, but changed for the better (ch. 65. 17). righteousness—my faithfully-fulfilled promise (note, v. 5). 7. know righteousness—(Note, v. 1.) 8. (Note, ch. 50. 9; Job 4. 18-20.) Not that the moth eats men up, but that they shall be destroyed by as insignificant instrumentality as the moth that eats a garment. 9. Impassioned prayer of the exiled Jews. ancient days—(Psalm 44. 1) Rahab—poetical name for Egypt (note, ch. 30. 7). dragon—Hebrew, tannin. The crocodile, an emblem of Egypt, as represented on coins struck after the conquest of Egypt by Augustus; or rather here, its king, Pharaoh (note, ch. 27. 1; Psalm 74. 13, 14; Ezekiel 32. 2, Margin; 29. 3). 10. it—the arm. Art not thou the same Almighty power that, &c.? dried the sea—the Red Sea (ch. 43. 16; Exodus 14. 21). 11. (Ch. 35. 10.) therefore—assurance of faith; or else the answer of Jehovah corresponding to their prayer. As surely as God redeemed Israel out of Egypt, He shall redeem them from Babylon, both the literal in the age following, and mystical in the last ages (Revelation 18. 20, 21). There shall be a second exodus (ch. 11. 11-16; 27. 12, 13). singing—image from the custom of singing on a journey when a caravan is passing along the extended plains in the East. everlasting joy—(Jude 24.) sorrow . . . flee away—(Revelation 21. 4.) 12. comforteth—(v. 3; ch. 40. 1.) thou—Zion, son of man—frail and dying as his parent Adam. be made as grass—wither as grass (ch. 40. 6, 7). 13. (Ch. 40. 12, 26, 28), the same argument of comfort drawn from the omnipotence of the Creator. as if . . . ready, &c.—lit., "when he directs," viz., his arrow, to destroy (Psalm 21. 12; 7. 13; 11. 2). [MAURER.] 14. captive exile—lit., one bowed down as a captive (ch. 10. 4). [MAURER.] The scene is primarily Babylon, and the time near the close of the captivity. Secondly, and antipically, the mystical Babylon, the last enemy of Israel and the Church, in which they have long suffered, but from which they are to be gloriously delivered. pit—such as were many of the ancient dungeons (cf. Jeremiah 38. 6, 11, 13; Genesis 37. 20). nor . . . bread . . . fail—(Ch. 33. 16; Jeremiah 37. 21.) 15. divided . . . sea—The Red Sea. The same Hebrew word as "make to rest" (v. 4). Rather, "that terrify the sea," i. e., restrain it by my rebuke, "when its waves roar." [GENEVIUS.] The Hebrew favours MAURER, "that terrify the sea so that the waves roar." The sense favours GENEVIUS (Jeremiah 5. 22; 31. 35), or English Version (v. 9, 10), which favours the special reference to the exodus from Egypt). 16. Addressed to Israel, embodied in "the servant of Jehovah" (ch. 42. 1), Messiah, its ideal and representative Head, through whom the elect remnant is to be restored. put my words in thy mouth—true of Israel, the depository of true religion, but fully realized only in Israel's Head and antitype, Messiah (ch. 49. 2; 50. 4, 5; 59. 21; Deuteronomy 18. 18; John 3. 34). covered . . . in . . . shadow of . . . hand—protected thee (note, ch. 49. 2). plant—rather, "fix" as a tabernacle; so it ought to be rendered (Daniel 11. 45). The "new creation," now going on in the spiritual world by the gospel (Ephesians 2. 10), and hereafter to be extended to the visible world, is meant (ch. 65. 17; 66. 22; cf. ch. 13. 13; 2 Peter 3. 10-13). Zion—Its restoration is a leading part in the new creation to come (ch. 65, 17-19). 17. (Ch. 52, 1.) drunk—Jehovah's wrath is compared to an intoxicating draught; because it confounds the sufferer under it, and makes him fall (Job 21, 20; Psalm 60, 3; 75, 8; Jeremiah 25, 15, 16; 49, 12; Zechariah 12, 2; Revelation 14, 10); ("poured out without mixture;" rather, the pure wine-juice mixed with intoxicating drugs). of trembling—which produced trembling or intoxication. wrung . . . out—drained the last drop out; the dregs were the sediments from various substances, as honey, dates, and drugs, put into the wine to increase the strength and sweetness. 18. Following up the image in v. 17, intoxicated and confused by the cup of God's anger, she has none to guide her in her helpless state; she has not yet awakened out of the sleep caused by that draught. This cannot apply to the Babylonian captivity; for in it they had Ezekiel and Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, as "guides," and soon awoke out of that sleep; but it applies to the Jews now, and will be still more applicable in their coming oppression by Antichrist. 19. two—classes of evils, for he enumerates four, viz., desolation and destruction to the land and state; famine and the sword to the people. who shall be sorry for thee—so as to give thee effectual relief: as the parallel clause, "By whom shall I comfort thee?" shows (Lamentations 2, 11-13). 20. head of all . . . streets—(Lamentations 2, 19; 4, 1.) wild bull—rather, the oryx [JEROME], or a gazelle [GESENIUS], or wild goat [BOCHART]; commonly in the East taken in a net, of a wide sweep, whereinto the beasts were hunted together. The streets of cities in the East often have gates, which are closed at night; a person wishing to escape would be stopped by them and caught, as a wild animal in a net. 21. drunken . . . not with wine—(Ch. 29, 9; cf. v. 17, 20, here; Lamentations 3, 15.) 22. pleadeth . . . cause—(Psalm 35, 1; Jeremiah 50, 34; Micah 7, 9.) no more drink it—(Ch. 51, 7-9.) This cannot apply to Israel after the return from Babylon, but only to them after their final restoration. 23. (Ch. 49, 26; Jeremiah 25, 15-29; Zechariah 12, 2.) Bow down that . . . go over—Conquerors often literally trod on the necks of conquered kings, as Sapor of Persia did to the Roman emperor Valerian (Joshua 10, 24; Psalm 18, 40; 66, 11, 12).

CHAPTER LII.

Ver. 1-15. VERSES 1-13 CONNECTED WITH CHAP. 51. Zion long in bondage (ch. 51, 17-20) is called to put on beautiful garments appropriate to its future prosperity. 1. strength—as thy adornment; answering to "beautiful garments" in the parallel clause. Arouse thyself from dejection and assume confidence. the holy city—(Nehemiah 11, 1; Revelation 21, 2.) no more . . . unclean—(Ch. 35, 8; 60, 21; Joel 3, 17; Revelation 21, 27.) A prophecy never yet fulfilled. uncircumcised—spiritually (Ezekiel 44, 9; Acts 7, 51). 2. from the dust—the seat of mourners (Job 2, 12, 13). arise, and sit—viz., in a more dignified place; on a divan or a throne [LOWTH], after having shaken off the dust gathered up by the flowing dress when seated on the ground; or simply, "Arise, and sit erect." [MAURER.] bands of . . . necks—the yoke of thy captivity. 3. As you became your foes' servants, without their paying any price for you (Jeremiah 15, 13), so they shall release you without demanding any price or reward (ch. 45, 13), (where Cyrus is represented as doing so: a type of their final restoration gratuitously in like manner). So the spiritual Israel, "sold under sin," gratuitously (Romans 7, 14), shall be redeemed also gratuitously (ch. 55, 1). 4. My people—Jacob and his sons. went down—Judea was an elevated country compared with Egypt. sojourn—They went there to stay only till the famine in Canaan should have ceased. Assyrian—Sennacherib. Remember how I delivered you from Egypt and the Assyrian; what, then, is to prevent me from delivering you out of Babylon (and the mystical Babylon and the Antichrist in the last days)? without cause—answering to "for naught" in v. 5; it was an act of gratuitous oppression in the present case, as in that case. 5. what have I here—i. e., what am I called on to do. The fact "that my people is taken away (into captivity; ch. 49, 24, 25) for naught" (by gratuitous oppression, v. 4; also v. 3, where see note) demands my interposition. they that rule—or tyrannize, viz., Babylon, literal and mystical. make . . . to howl—or, raise a cry of exultation over them. [MAURER.] blasphemed—viz., in Babylon: God's reason for delivering his people, not their goodness, but for the sake of His holy name (Ezekiel 20, 9, 14). 6. shall know in that day—when Christ shall reveal Himself to Israel sensibly; the only means whereby their obstinate unbelief shall be overcome (Psalm 102, 16; Zechariah 12, 10; 14, 5). 7. beautiful . . . feet—i. e., The advent of such a herald seen on the distant "mountains" (Notes, ch. 40, 9; 41, 27; 25, 6, 7; Song of Solomon 2, 17) running in haste with the long-expected good tidings, is most grateful to the desolated city (Nahum 1, 15). good tidings—only partially applying to the return from Babylon. Fully, and antitypically, the gospel (Luke 2, 10, 11), "beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke 24, 47), "the city of the great King" (Matthew 5, 35), where Messiah shall, at the final restoration of Israel, "reign" as peculiarly Zion's God ("Thy God reigneth;" cf. Psalm 2, 6). 8. watchmen—set on towers separated by intervals to give the earliest notice of the approach of any messenger with tidings (cf. ch. 21, 6-8). The Hebrew is more forcible than English Version, "The voice of thy watchmen" (exclamatory as in Song of Solomon 2, 8)! "They lift up their voice! together they sing." eye to eye—i. e., close at hand, and so clearly [GESENIUS]; Numbers 14, 14, "face to face;" Numbers 12, 8, "mouth to mouth." Cf. 1 Corinthians 13, 12; Revelation 22, 4, of which Simeon's sight of the Saviour was a prefiguration (Luke 2, 30). The watchmen, spiritually, are ministers and others who pray for the peace of Jerusalem (ch. 62, 6, 7). bring again—i. e., restore. Or else, "return to." [MAURER.] 9. (Ch. 14, 7, 8; 42, 11.) redeemed—spiritually and nationally (ch. 48, 20). 10. made bare . . . arm—metaphor from warriors who bare their arm for battle (Ezekiel 4, 7). all . . . earth . . . see . . . salvation of . . . God—The deliverance wrought by God for Israel will cause all nations to acknowledge the Lord (ch. 66, 18-20). The partial fulfilment (Luke 3, 6) is a forerunner of the future complete fulfilment. 11. (Ch. 48, 20; Zechariah 2, 6, 7.) Long residence in Babylon made many loath to leave it: so as to mystical Babylon (Revelation 18, 4). ye . . . that bear . . . vessels of the Lord—the priests and Levites, whose office it was to bear the vessels of the temple (Jeremiah 27, 18). Nebuchadnezzar had carried them to Babylon (2 Chronicles 36, 18). Cyrus restored them (Ezra 1, 7-11). be . . . clean—by separating yourselves wholly from Babylonian idolaters, mystical and literal. 12. not . . . with haste—as when ye left Egypt (Exodus 12, 33, 39; Deuteronomy 16, 3; cf. Note, ch. 23, 16). Ye shall have time to cleanse yourselves and make deliberate preparation for departure. Lord—Jehovah, as your Leader in front (ch. 40, 3; Exodus 23, 20; Micah 2, 13). rereward—lit., gather up, i. e., to bring up the rear of your host. The transition is frequent from the glory of Messiah in His advent to reign, to His humiliation in His advent to suffer. Indeed, so are both advents accounted one, that He is not said, in His second coming, to be about to return, but to come. 13. Here ch. 53, ought to begin, and ch. 52, end with v. 12. This section, from here to end of ch. 53., settles the controversy with the Jews, if Messiah be the person meant; and with infidels, if written by Isaiah, or at any time before Christ. The correspondence with the life and death of Jesus Christ is so minute, that it could not have resulted from conjecture or accident. An impostor could not have shaped the course of events so as to have made his character and life appear to be a fulfilment of it. The writing is, moreover, declaredly prophetic. The quotations of it in the New Testament show (1.) that it was, before the time of Jesus, a recognized part of the Old Testament; (2.) that it refers to Messiah (Matthew 8, 17; Mark 15, 28; Luke 22, 37; John 12, 38; Acts 8, 23-35; Romans 10, 16; 1 Peter 2, 21-25). The indirect allusions to it still more clearly prove the Messianic interpretation; so universal was that interpretation, that it is simply referred to in connection with the atoning virtue of His death, without being formally quoted (Mark 9, 12; Romans 4, 25; 1 Corinthians 15. 3; 2 Corinthians 5. 21; 1 Peter 1. 19; 2. 21-25; 1 John 3. 5). The genuineness of the passage is certain; for the Jews would not have forged it, since it is opposed to their notion of Messiah, as a triumphant temporal prince. The Christians could not have forged it; for the Jews, the enemies of Christianity, are "our librarians." [PALEY.] The Jews try to evade its force by the figment of two Messiahs, one a suffering Messiah (Ben Joseph), the other a triumphant Messiah (Ben David). HILLEL maintained that Messiah has already come in the person of Itezekiah. BUXTORF states, that many of the modern Rabbins believe that He has been come a good while, but will not manifest Himself because of the sins of the Jews. But the ancient Jews, as the Chaldee paraphrast Jonathan, refer it to Messiah; so the Medrasch Tauchuma (a commentary on the Pentateuch); also Rabbi Moses Haddarschan (see HENGSTENBERG, Christol). Some explain it of the Jewish people, either in the Babylonish exile, or in their present sufferings and dispersion. Others, the pious portion of the nation taken collectively, whose sufferings made a vicarious satisfaction for the ungodly. Others, Isaiah, or Jeremiah [GESENIUS], the prophets collectively. But an individual is plainly described; he suffers voluntarily, innocently, patiently, and as the efficient cause of the righteousness of His people, which holds good of none other but Messiah (ch. 53. 4-6, 9, 11; contrast Jeremiah 20. 7; 15. 10-21; Psalm 137. 8, 9); ch. 53. 9, can hold good of none other. The objection that the sufferings (ch. 53. 1-10) referred to are represented as past, the glorification alone as future (ch. 52. 13-15; 53. 11, 12) arises from not seeing that the prophet takes his stand in the midst of the scenes which he describes as future. The greater nearness of the first advent, and the interval between it and the second, are implied by the use of the past tense as to the first, the future as to the second. Behold—Awakening attention to the striking picture of Messiah that follows (cf. John 19. 5, 14), my servant—Messiah (ch. 42. 1). deal prudently—rather, prosper [GESENIUS] as the parallel clause favours (ch. 53. 10). Or, uniting both meanings, shall reign well. [HENGSTENBERG.] This verse sets forth in the beginning the ultimate issue of His sufferings, the description of which follows: the conclusion (ch. 53. 12) corresponds; the section (ch. 52. 13; 53. 12) begins as it ends with His final glory. extolled—elevated (Mark 16. 19; Ephesians 1. 20-22; 1 Peter 3. 22). 14, 15. Summary of Messiah's history, which is set forth more in detail in ch. 53. "Just as many were astonished (accompanied with aversion, Jeremiah 18. 16; 19. 8, &c.; his visage, &c.; so shall He sprinkle," &c. Israel in this answers to its antitype Messiah, now "an astonishment and by-word" (Deuteronomy 28. 37), hereafter about to be a blessing and means of salvation to many nations (ch. 2. 2, 3; Micah 5. 7). thee; his—such changes of persons are common in Hebrew poetry. marred—Hebrew, disfigurement; abstract for concrete; not only disfigured, but disfigurement itself. more than any man—CASTELLO translates, "so that it was no longer that of a man" (cf. Psalm 22. 6). The more perfect we may suppose the "body prepared" (Hebrew 10. 5) for Him by God, the sadder by contrast was the "marring" of His visage and form. 15. sprinkle many—GESENIUS, for the antithesis to "be astonished," translates, "shall cause . . . to exult." But the word universally in the Old Testament means either to sprinkle with blood, as the high priest makes an expiation (Leviticus 4. 6; 16. 18, 19); or with water, to purify (Ezekiel 36. 25; cf. as to the Spirit, Acts 2. 33), both appropriate to Messiah (John 13. 8; Hebrews 9. 13, 14; 10. 22; 12. 24; 1 Peter 1. 2). The antithesis is sufficient without any forced rendering. Many were astonished; so many (not merely men, but) nations shall be sprinkled. They were amazed at such an abject person claiming to be Messiah; yet it is He who shall justify and purify. Men were dumb with the amazement of scorn at one marred more than the lowest of men, yet the highest: even kings (ch. 49. 7, 23) shall be dumb with awe and veneration ("shut . . . mouths;" Job 29. 9, 10; Micah 7. 16). that . . . not . . . told them—The reason why kings shall so venerate them; the wonders of redemption, which had not been before told them, shall then be announced to them, wonders such as they had never heard or seen paralleled (ch. 55. 1; Romans 15. 21; 16. 25, 26).

CHAPTER LIII.

Ver. 1-12. MAN'S UNBELIEF: MESSIAH'S VICARIOUS SUFFERINGS, AND FINAL TRIUMPH FOR MAN. The speaker, according to HORSLEY, personates the repenting Jews in the latter ages of the world coming over to the faith of the Redeemer; the whole is their penitent confession. This view suits the context (ch. 52. 7-9), which is not to be fully realized until Israel is restored. However, primarily, it is the abrupt exclamation of the prophet: "Who hath believed our report," that of Isaiah and the other prophets, as to Messiah? The infidel's objection from the unbelief of the Jews is anticipated and hereby answered; that unbelief and the cause of it (Messiah's humiliation, whereas they looked for One coming to reign) were foreseen and foretold. 1. report—lit., the thing heard: referring to which sense Paul saith, "So, then, faith cometh by hearing" (Romans 10. 16, 17). arm—power (ch. 40. 10); exercised in miracles and in saving men (Romans 1. 16; 1 Corinthians 1. 18). The prophet, as if present during Messiah's ministry on earth, is deeply moved to see how few believed on Him (ch. 49. 4; Mark 6. 6; 9. 19; Acts 1. 15). Two reasons are given why all ought to have believed. (1.) The "report" of the "ancient prophets." (2.) "The arm of Jehovah" exhibited in Messiah whilst on earth. In HORSLEY'S view, this will be the penitent confession of the Jews, "How few of our nation, in Messiah's days, believed in Him!" 2. tender plant—Messiah grew silently and insensibly, as a sucker from an ancient stock, seemingly dead (viz., the house of David, then in a decayed state) (Note, ch. 11. 1). shall grow . . . hath—rather, grew up . . . had, before him—before Jehovah. Though unknown to the world (John 1. 11), Messiah was observed by God, who ordered the most minute circumstances attending His growth. root—i. e., sprout from a root. form—beautiful form: sorrow had marred His once beautiful form, and when we shall see—rather, joined with the previous words, "Nor comeliness (attractiveness) that we should look (with delight) on Him." there is—rather, was. The studied reticence of the New Testament as to His form, stature, colour, &c., was designed to prevent our dwelling on the bodily, rather than on His moral beauty, holiness, love, &c.; also a providential protest against the making and veneration of images of Him. The letter of P. LENTULUS to the emperor Tiberius, describing His person, is spurious; so also the story of His sending His portrait to Abgar, king of Edessa; and the alleged impression of His countenance on the handkerchief of Veronica. The former part of this verse refers to His birth and childhood; the latter to His first public appearance. [VTRINGA.] 3. rejected—"forsaken of men." [GESENIUS.] "Most abject of men." Lit., "He who ceases from men," i. e., is no longer regarded as a man. [HENGSTENBERG.] (Note, ch. 52. 14; 49. 7.) man of sorrows—i. e., whose distinguishing characteristic was sorrows, acquainted with—familiar by constant contact with. grief—lit., disease; fig. for all kinds of calamity (Jeremiah 6. 14); leprosy especially represented this, being a direct judgment from God. It is remarkable Jesus is not mentioned as having ever suffered under sickness, and we hid . . . faces—Rather, as one who causes men to hide their faces from Him (in aversion). [MAURER.] Or, "He was as a hiding of the face before it," i. e., as a thing before which a man covers his face in disgust. [HENGSTENBERG.] Or, "as one before whom is the covering of the face;" before whom one covers the face in disgust. [GESENIUS.] we—the prophet identifying himself with the Jews. See HORSLEY'S view (Note, v. 1). esteemed . . . not—negative contempt; the previous words express positive. 4. Surely . . . our griefs—lit., "But yet He hath taken (or borne) our sicknesses," i. e., they who despised Him because of His human infirmities ought rather to have esteemed Him on account of them; for thereby "Himself took our infirmities" (bodily diseases). So Matthew 8. 17 quotes it. In the Hebrew for

"borne," or took, there is probably the double notion, He took on Himself vicariously (so v. 5, 6, 8, 12), and so He took away; His perfect humanity whereby He was bodily afflicted for us, and in all our afflictions (ch. 63. 9; Hebrews 4. 15), was the ground on which He cured the sick; so that St. Matthew's quotation is not a mere accommodation. See Note 42 of Archbishop MAGEE, Atonement. The Hebrew there may mean to overwhelm with darkness; Messiah's time of darkness was temporary (Matthew 27. 45), answering to the bruising of His heel; Satan's is to be eternal, answering to the bruising of his head (cf. ch. 50. 10). carried . . . sorrows—The notion of substitution strictly. "Carried," viz., as a burden. "Sorrows," i. e., pains of the mind; as "griefs" refer to pains of the body (Psalm 32. 10; 33. 17). Matthew 8. 17 might seem to oppose this: "And bare our sicknesses." But he uses "sicknesses" fig. for sins, the cause of them. Christ took on Himself all man's infirmities," so as to remove them: the bodily by direct miracle, grounded on His participation in human infirmities; those of the soul by His vicarious suffering, which did away with the source of both. Sin and sickness are ethically connected as cause and effect (ch. 33. 24; Psalm 103. 3; Matthew 9. 2; John 5. 14; James 5. 15). we did esteem him stricken—judicially [LOWTH], viz., for His sins; whereas it was for ours. "We thought Him to be a leper" [JEROME, VULGATE], leprosy being the direct Divine judgment for guilt (Leviticus 13.; Numbers 12. 10, 15; 2 Chronicles 26. 18-21). smitten—by Divine judgments. afflicted—for His sins; this was the point in which they so erred (Luke 23. 34; Acts 3. 17; 1 Corinthians 2. 8.) He was, it is true, "afflicted," but not for His sins. 5. wounded—a bodily wound; not mere mental sorrow; lit., pierced; minutely appropriate to Messiah, whose hands, feet, and side were pierced (Psalm 22. 16). Margin, wrongly, from a Hebrew root, translates, "tormented." for . . . for—(Romans 4. 25; 2 Corinthians 5. 21; Hebrews 9. 28; 1 Peter 2. 24; 3. 18)—the cause for which He suffered not His own, but our sins. bruised—crushing inward and outward suffering (Note, v. 10). chastisement—lit., the correction inflicted by a parent on children for their good (Hebrews 12. 5-8, 10, 11). Not punishment strictly; for this can have place only where there is guilt, which He had not; but He took on Himself the chastisement whereby the peace (reconciliation with our Father; Romans 5. 1; Ephesians 2. 14, 15, 17) of the children of God was to be effected (Hebrews 2. 14). upon him—as a burden; parallel to "hath borne" and "carried." stripes—minutely prophetic of His being scourged (Matthew 27. 26; 1 Peter 2. 24). healed—spiritually (Psalm 41. 4; Jeremiah 8. 22). 6. Penitent confession of believers and of Israel in the last days (Zechariah 12. 10). sheep . . . astray—(Psalm 119. 176; 1 Peter 2. 25.) The antithesis is, "In ourselves we were scattered; in Christ we are collected together; by nature we wander, driven headlong to destruction; in Christ we find the way to the gate of life." [CALVIN.] True, also, literally of Israel before its coming restoration (Ezekiel 34. 5, 6; Zechariah 10. 2, 6; cf. with Ezekiel 34. 23, 24; Jeremiah 23. 4, 5; also Matthew 9. 36). laid—"hath made to light on Him." [LOWTH.] Rather, "hath made to rush upon Him." [MAURER.] the iniquity—i. e., its penalty; or rather, as in 2 Corinthians 5. 21; He was not merely a sin offering (which would destroy the antithesis to "righteousness"), but "sin for us;" sin itself vicariously; the representative of the aggregate sin of all mankind; not sins in the plural, for the "sin" of the world is one (Romans 5. 16, 17); thus we are made not merely righteous, but righteousness, even "the righteousness of God." The Innocent was punished as if guilty, that the guilty might be rewarded as if innocent. This verse could be said of no mere martyr. 7. oppressed—LOWTH translates, "It was exacted, and He was made answerable." The verb means, to have payment of a debt sternly exacted (Deuteronomy 15. 2, 3), and so to be oppressed in general; the exaction of the full penalty for our sins in His sufferings is probably alluded to. and . . . afflicted—or, and yet He suffered, or bore himself patiently and, &c. [HENGSTENBERG and MAURER.] LOWTH's translation, "He was made answerable," is hardly admitted by the

Hebrew. opened not . . . mouth—Jeremiah 11. 19, and David in Psalm 33. 13, 14; 39. 9, prefiguring Messiah (Matthew 26. 63; 27. 12, 14; 1 Peter 2. 23). 8. Rather, "He was taken away (i. e., cut off) by oppression and by a judicial sentence;" a hendiad for, "by an oppressive judicial sentence." [LOWTH and HENGSTENBERG.] GESENIUS not so well, "He was delivered from oppression and punishment" only by death. English Version also translates, "from . . . from," not "by . . . by." But "prison" is not true of Jesus, who was not incarcerated; restraint and bonds (John 18. 24) more accord with the Hebrew. Acts 8. 33; translate as LXX.: "In His humiliation His judgment (legal trial) was taken away;" the virtual sense of the Hebrew as rendered by LOWTH, and sanctioned by the inspired writer of Acts; He was treated as one so mean that a fair trial was denied Him (Matthew 26. 59; Mark 14. 55-59). HORSLEY translates, "After condemnation and judgment He was accepted," who . . . declare . . . generation—who can set forth (the wickedness of) His generation? i. e., of His contemporaries [ALFORD on Acts 8. 33], which suits best the parallelism, "the wickedness of His generation" corresponding to "oppressive judgment." But LUTHER, "His length of life," i. e., there shall be no end of His future days (v. 10; Romans 6. 9). CALVIN includes the day of His Church, which is inseparable from Himself. HENGSTENBERG, "His posterity." He, indeed, shall be cut off, but His race shall be so numerous that none can fully declare it. CHRYSOSTOM, &c., "His eternal sonship and miraculous incarnation." cut off—implying a violent death (Daniel 9. 26). my people—Isaiah, including himself among them by the word "my." [HENGSTENBERG.] Rather, JEROVAH speaks in the person of His prophet, "my people," by the election of grace (Hebrews 2. 13). was he stricken—Hebrew, "the stroke (was laid) upon Him." GESENIUS says, that the Hebrew means them; the collective body, whether of the prophets or people, to which the Jews refer the whole prophecy. But JEROME, the SYRIAC and ETHIOPIAC versions translate it Him; so it is singular in some passages: Psalm 11. 7, His; Job 27. 23, Him; Isaiah 44. 15, thereto. The LXX. the Hebrew, lamo, "upon Him," read the similar words, lamuth, "unto death," which would at once set aside the Jewish interpretation, "upon them." ORIGEN, who laboriously compared the Hebrew with the LXX., so read it, and urged it against the Jews of his day, who would have denied it to be the true reading if the word had not then really so stood in the Hebrew text. [LOWTH.] If his sole authority be thought insufficient, perhaps lamo may imply that Messiah was the representative of the collective body of all men; hence the equivocal plural-singular form. 9. Rather, "His grave was appointed," or "they appointed Him His grave" [HENGSTENBERG]; i. e., they intended (by crucifying Him with two thieves, Matthew 27. 33) that He should have His grave "with the wicked" (Cf. John 19. 31), the denial of honourable burial being accounted a great ignominy (Note, ch. 14. 19; Jeremiah 26. 23). and with . . . rich—rather, "but He was with a rich man," &c. GESENIUS, for the parallelism to "the wicked," translates "ungodly" (the effect of riches being to make one ungodly); but the Hebrew everywhere means rich, never by itself ungodly; the parallelism, too, is one of contrast, viz., between their design and the fact, as it was ordered by God (Matthew 27. 57; Mark 15. 43-46; John 19. 39, 40); two rich men honoured Him at His death, Joseph of Arimathea, and Nicodemus. in his death—Hebrew, deaths. LOWTH translates, "His tomb;" bamoth, from a different root, meaning high places, and so mounds for sepulture (Ezekiel 43. 7). But all the versions oppose this, and the Hebrew hardly admits it. Rather translate, "after His death" [HENGSTENBERG]; as we say, "at His death." The plural, deaths, intensifies the force; as Adam by sin "dying died" (Genesis 2. 17, Margin); i. e., incurred death, physical and spiritual. So Messiah, His substitute, endured death in both senses; spiritual, during His temporary abandonment by the Father; physical, when He gave up the ghost. because—rather, as the sense demands (so in Job 16. 17), "although He had done no," &c. [HENGSTENBERG], (1 Peter 2. 20-22; 1 John

3, 5). violence—i. e., wrong. 10. Transition from His humiliation to His exaltation, pleased the Lord—the secret of His sufferings. They were voluntarily borne by Messiah, in order that thereby He might “do Jehovah’s will” (John 6. 38; Hebrews 10. 7, 9), as to man’s redemption; so at the end of the verse, “the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand.” bruise—(see v. 5); Genesis 3. 15, was hereby fulfilled, though the Hebrew word for “bruise,” there, is not the one used here. The word “Himself,” in Matthew, implies a personal bearing on Himself of our maladies, spiritual and physical, which included as a consequence His ministration to our bodily ailments: these latter are the reverse side of sin; His bearing on Him our spiritual malady involved with it His bearing sympathetically, and healing, the outward; which is its fruits and its type. HENGSTENBERG rightly objects to MAGEE’S translation, “taken away,” instead of “borne,” that the parallelism to “carried” would be destroyed. Besides the Hebrew word elsewhere, when connected with sin, means to bear it and its punishment (Ezekiel 18. 20). Matthew, elsewhere, also sets forth His vicarious atonement (Matthew 20. 28). when thou, &c.—rather, as Margin, “when His soul (i. e., He) shall have made an offering,” &c. In English Version the change of person is harsh: from Jehovah, addressed in the second person (v. 10), to Jehovah speaking in the first person in v. 11. Margin rightly makes the prophet in the name of Jehovah Himself to speak in this verse. offering for sin—(Romans 3. 25; 1 John 2. 2; 4. 10.) his seed—His spiritual posterity shall be numerous (Psalm 22. 30); nay, more, though He must die, He shall see them. A numerous posterity was accounted a high blessing among the Hebrews; still more so, for one to live to see them (Genesis 48. 11; Psalm 128. 6). prolong . . . days—also esteemed a special blessing among the Jews (Psalm 91. 16). Messiah shall, after death, rise again to an endless life (Hosea 6. 2; Romans 6. 9). prosper—(Ch. 52. 13, Margin.) 11. Jehovah is still speaking. see of the travail—He shall see such blessed fruits resulting from His sufferings as amply to repay Him for them (ch. 49. 4, 5; 50. 5, 9). The “satisfaction,” in seeing the full fruit of His travail of soul in the conversion of Israel and the world, is to be realized in the last days (ch. 2. 2-4). his knowledge—rather, the knowledge (experimentally) of Him (John 17. 3; Philippians 3. 10). my . . . servant—Messiah (ch. 42. 1; 52. 13). righteous—the ground on which He justifies others, His own righteousness (1 John 2. 1). justify—treat as if righteous; forensially; on the ground of His meritorious suffering, not their righteousness. bear . . . iniquities—(v. 4, 5), as the sinner’s substitute. 12. divide—as a conqueror dividing the spoil after a victory (Psalm 2. 8; Luke 11. 22). him—for Him. with . . . mighty—HENGSTENBERG translates, “I will give Him the mighty for a portion:” so LXX. But the parallel clause, “with the strong,” favours English Version. His triumphs shall be not merely among the few and weak, but among the many and mighty. spoil . . . strong—(Colossians 2. 15; cf. Proverbs 16. 19.) “With the great; with the mighty,” may mean, as a great and mighty hero. poured out . . . soul—i. e., His life, which was considered as residing in the blood (Leviticus 17. 11; Romans 3. 25). numbered with, &c.—not that He was a transgressor, but was treated as such, when crucified with thieves (Mark 15. 28; Luke 22. 37). made intercession, &c.—This office He began on the cross (Luke 23. 34), and now continues in heaven (ch. 50. 16; Hebrews 9. 24; 1 John 2. 1). Understand because before “He was numbered . . . He bare . . . made intercession.” His meritorious death and intercession are the cause of His ultimate triumph. MAUREL, for the parallelism, translates, “He was put on the same footing with the transgressors.” But English Version agrees better with the Hebrew, and with the sense and fact as to Christ. MAUREL’S translation would make a tautology after “He was numbered with the transgressors;” parallelism does not need so servile a repetition. “He made intercession for,” &c., answers to the parallel, “He was numbered with,” &c., as effect answers to cause, His intercession for sinners being the effect flowing from His having been numbered with them.

CHAPTER LIV.

Ver. 1-17. THE FRUIT OF MESSIAH’S SUFFERINGS, AND OF ISRAEL’S FINAL PENITENCE AT HER PAST UNBELIEF (ch. 53. 6); HER JOYFUL RESTORATION AND ENLARGEMENT BY JEHOVAH, WHOSE WRATH WAS MOMENTARY, BUT HIS KINDNESS EVERLASTING. Israel converted is compared to a wife (v. 5; ch. 62. 5) put away for unfaithfulness, but now forgiven and taken home again. The converted Gentiles are represented as a new progeny of the long-forsaken but now restored wife. The pre-eminence of the Hebrew Church as the mother Church of Christendom is the leading idea; the conversion of the Gentiles is mentioned only as part of her felicity. [HORSLEY.] 1. sing—for joy (Zephaniah 3. 14). barren—the Jewish Church once forsaken by God, and therefore during that time destitute of spiritual children (v. 6). didst not bear—during the Babylonian exile primarily. Secondly, and chiefly, during Israel’s present dispersion. the children—the Gentiles adopted by special grace into the original Church (v. 3; ch. 49. 20, 21). thou . . . married wife—than were her spiritual children, when Israel was still a married wife (under the law, before the Babylonian exile), before God put her away. [MAUREL.] So Paul contrasts the universal Church of the New Testament with the Church of the Old Testament legal dispensation, quoting this very passage (Galatians 4. 27). But the full accomplishment of it is yet future. 2. (Ch. 49. 19, 20; Jeremiah 31. 31-36, 33, 39.) Thy children shall be so many that thy borders must be extended to contain them. curtains—the cloth forming the covering of the tent. spare not—give abundantly the means for the enlargement of the Church (2 Corinthians 9. 5-7). ords . . . stakes—The more the tent is enlarged by lengthening the cords by which the cloth covering is fastened to the ground, the more the stakes supporting the tent need to be strengthened; the Church is not merely to seek new converts, but to strengthen those she has in the faith. The image is appropriate, as the tabernacle was the symbol of the old Israelitish Church (Note, ch. 33. 20). 3. break forth—rather, burst forth with increase; thy offspring shall grow, answering to “thy seed” in the parallel clause. thy seed—Israel and her children, as distinguished from “the Gentiles.” desolate cities—of Israel (ch. 44. 26). 4. (Ch. 41. 10, 14.) shame of youth—Israel’s unfaithfulness as wife of Jehovah, almost from her earliest history. reproach of widowhood—Israel’s punishment in her consequent dismissal from God and barrenness of spiritual children in Babylon and her present dispersion (v. 1; ch. 49. 21; Jeremiah 3. 24, 25; 31. 19; Hosea 2. 2-5). 5. (Ch. 62. 5; Jeremiah 3. 14.) That God was Israel’s “Maker,” both as individuals and as the theocratic kingdom, is the pledge of assurance that He will be her Redeemer (ch. 43. 1-3). Hebrew, “makers . . . husbands:” plural for singular, to denote excellency. of Israel . . . whole earth—Not until He manifests Himself as God of Israel shall He appear God of the whole earth (Psalm 102. 13, 15, 16; Zechariah 14. 5, 9). 6. called—i. e., recalled: the prophetic past for the future. forsaken—that had been forsaken. when thou—or, “when she was rejected:” one who had been a wife of youth (Ezekiel 16. 8, 22, 60; Jeremiah 2. 2) at the time when (thou, or) she was rejected for infidelity. [MAUREL.] “A wife of youth, but afterwards rejected.” [LOWTH.] 7. little moment—as compared with Israel’s coming long prosperity (ch. 26. 20; 60. 10). So the spiritual Israel (Psalm 30. 5; 2 Corinthians 4. 17). gather thee—to myself from thy dispersions. 8. In a little wrath—rather, “In the overflowing of wrath:” as Proverbs 27. 4, Margin. [GENSENIUS.] The wrath, though but “for a moment,” was overflowing whilst it lasted. hid . . . face—(Ch. 8. 17; Psalm 30. 7.) everlasting—in contrast to “for a moment.” 9. I am about to do the same in this instance as in Noah’s flood. As I swore then that it should not return (Genesis 8. 21; 9. 11), and I kept that promise, so I swear now to my people, and will perform my promise, that there shall be no return of the deluge of my wrath upon them. [LOWTH, on insufficient authority, reads (the same will I do now as), “in the days of Noah.”] 10. (Ch. 51. 6; Psalm 89. 33, 34; Romans 11. 29.)

covenant of my peace—(2 Samuel 23. 5.) The covenant whereby I have made thee at peace with me. 11. not comforted—by any one; none gave her help or comfort. lay . . . with fair colours—rather, "lay . . . in cement of vermilion." [LOWTH.] The Hebrew for "fair colours" means stibium, the paint with which Eastern women painted their eyelids and eyelashes (2 Kings 9. 30). The very cement shall be of the most beautiful colour (Revelation 21. 18-21.) 12. widows—rather, battlements; lit., suns; applied to battlements from their radiated appearance. agates—rather, rubies. carbuncles—lit., sparkling gems; the carbuncle when held to the sun becomes like a burning coal. all thy borders—rather, thy whole circuit, consisting of precious stones. The glory of the Church on earth, when the Hebrew Church, according to the original design, shall be the metropolis of Christendom. 13. Quoted by the Saviour (John 6. 45), to prove that in order to come to Him, men must be "drawn" by the Father. So Jeremiah 31. 34; Micah 4. 2; 1 Corinthians 2. 10; Hebrews 8. 10; 10. 16; 1 John 2. 20. great . . . peace—generally (Psalm 119. 165). Specially referring to the peaceful prosperity which shall prevail under Messiah in the latter days (ch. 2. 4; 9. 6). 14. righteousness—the characteristic of the reign of Messiah (ch. 11. 4, 5; Psalm 72. 2, 4; Revelation 19. 11). far from oppression, &c.—far from suffering oppression; "for thou shalt have nothing to fear." 15. gather together, &c.—i. e., If it should happen that enemies "gather together" against thee (Psalm 2. 2), they will not have been sent by me (cf. Hosea 8. 4) as instruments of my wrath (nay, it will be with my disapproval); for "whosoever shall gather together," &c. (Psalm 59. 3). fall for thy sake—rather, "shall come over to thy side." [LOWTH.] Lit., "fall to thee" (Jeremiah 21. 9; 39. 9). To be fully fulfilled to Jerusalem hereafter (Zechariah 14. 16). 16. The workman that forns "weapons against thee" (v. 17) is wholly in my power, therefore thou needest not fear, having me on thy side. for his work—rather, "by his labour." [HORSLEY.] "According to the exigencies of his work." [MAURER.] waster to destroy—(Ch. 10. 5-7; 37. 26, 27; 45. 1-6.) Desolating conquerors who use the "instruments" framed by "the smith." The repetition of the "I" implies, however, something in the latter half of the verse contrasted with the former; understand it, therefore, thus: "I have in my power both him who frames arms and him who destroys them (arms)." [ROSENMULLER.] 17. tongue . . . condemn—image from a court of justice. Those who desire to "condemn" thee thou shalt "condemn" (Exodus 11. 7; Joshua 10. 21; Psalm 64. 8; Romans 8. 1, 33). righteousness . . . of me—(Ch. 45. 24; 46. 13.) Rather (this is) their justification from me. Their enemies would "condemn" them, but I justify and vindicate them, and so they condemn their enemies.

CHAPTER LV.

Ver. 1-13. THE CALL OF THE GENTILE WORLD TO FAITH THE RESULT OF GOD'S GRACE TO THE JEWS FIRST. 1. every one—After the special privileges of Israel (ch. 54.) there follow, as the consequence, the universal invitation to the Gentiles (Luke 24. 47; Romans 11. 12, 15). "Ho" calls the most earnest attention. thirsteth—has a keen sense of need (Matthew 5. 6). waters . . . wine and milk—a gradation. Not merely water, which is needed to maintain life at all, but wine and milk to strengthen, cheer, and nourish; the spiritual blessings of the gospel are meant (ch. 25. 6; Song of Solomon 5. 1; John 7. 37). "Waters," plural, to denote abundance (ch. 43. 20; 44. 3). no money—Yet, in v. 2, it is said, "ye spend money." A seeming paradox. Ye are really spiritual bankrupts: but thinking yourselves to have money, viz., a devotion of your own making, ye lavish it on that "which is not bread," i. e., on idols, whether literal or spiritual. buy . . . without money—another paradox. We are bought, but not with a price paid by ourselves (1 Corinthians 6. 20; 1 Peter 1. 18, 19). In a different sense we are to "buy" salvation, viz., by parting with every thing which comes between us and Christ who has bought it for us and by making it our own (Matthew 13. 44, 46; Luke 12. 33; Revelation 3. 18). 2. not bread—(Habakkuk 2. 13.) "Bread of deceit" (Proverbs 20. 17). Contrast this with the "bread of life" (John 6. 32, 35; also Luke 14. 16-20). satisfieth not—(Ecclesiastes 1. 8; 4. 8.) hearken . . . and eat—When two imperatives are joined, the second expresses the consequence of obeying the command in the first (Genesis 42. 18). By hearkening ye shall eat. So in v. 1, "buy and eat." By buying, and so making it your own, ye shall eat, i. e., experimentally enjoy it (John 6. 53). Cf. the invitation (Proverbs 9. 5, 6; Matthew 22. 4). fatness—(Psalm 36. 8; 63. 5.) 3. me . . . live—by coming to me ye shall live: for "I am the life" (John 14. 6). everlasting covenant—(Jeremiah 32. 40; 2 Samuel 23. 5.) with you . . . David—God's covenant is with the antitypical David, Messiah (Ezekiel 34. 23), and so with us by our identification with Him. sure—answering to "everlasting," irrevocable, unfulfilling, to be relied on (Psalm 89. 2-4, 28, 29, 34-36; Jeremiah 33. 20, 21; 2 Samuel 7. 15, 16; 2 Corinthians 1. 18-20). mercies of David—the mercies of grace (ch. 63. 7; John 1. 16) which I covenanted to give to David, and especially to Messiah, his antitype. Quoted in Acts 13. 34. 4. him—the mystical David (Ezekiel 37. 24, 25; Jeremiah 30. 9; Hosea 3. 5). Given by God (ch. 49. 6). witness—He bore witness even unto death for God, to His law, claims, and plan of redeeming love (John 18. 37; Revelation 1. 5). Revelation is a "testimony;" because it is propounded to be received on the authority of the Giver, and not merely because it can be proved by arguments. commander—"preceptor." [HORSLEY.] "Lawgiver." [BARNES.] to the people—rather, peoples. 5. thou—Jehovah addresses Messiah. call . . . run—God must call, before man can, or will, run (Song of Solomon 1. 4; John 6. 44). Not merely come, but run eagerly. thou knowest not—now as thy people (so in Matthew 7. 23). nation . . . nations—gradation; from Israel, one nation, the gospel spread to many nations, and will do so more fully on Israel's conversion. knew not thee—(Ch. 62. 15; Ephesians 2. 11, 12.) because of . . . thy God . . . glorified thee—(Ch. 60. 5, 9; Zechariah 8. 23); where similar language is directed to Israel, because of the identification of Israel with Messiah, who is the ideal Israel (Matthew 2. 15; cf. with Hosea 11. 1; see Acts 3. 13). 6. The condition and limit in the obtaining of the spiritual benefits (v. 1-3): (1.) Seek the Lord. (2.) Seek Him whilst He is to be found (ch. 65. 1; Psalm 32. 6; Matthew 25. 1-13; John 7. 34; 8. 21; 2 Corinthians 6. 2; Hebrews 2. 3; 3. 13, 15). call—casting yourselves wholly on His mercy (Romans 10. 13). Stronger than "seek;" so "near" is more positive than "while He may be found" (Romans 10. 8, 9). near—propitious (Psalm 34. 18; 145. 18). 7. unrighteous—Hebrew, man of iniquity; true of all men. The "wicked" sins more openly in "his way;" the "unrighteous" refers to the more subtle workings of sin in the "thoughts." All are guilty in the latter respect, though many fancy themselves safe, because not openly "wicked in ways" (Psalm 94. 11). The parallelism is that of gradation. The progress of the penitent is to be from negative reformation, "forsaking his (1.) way," and (2.) a farther step, "his thoughts," to positive repentance, (1.) "returning to the Lord" (the only true repentance, Zechariah 12. 10), and making God his God, along with the other children of God (the crowning-point; appropriation of God to ourselves: "to our God"). "Return" implies that man originally walked with God, but has apostatised. Isalah saith, "our God," the God of the believing Israelites; those redeemed themselves desire others to come to their God (Psalm 34. 8; Revelation 22. 17). abundantly pardon—lit., multiply to pardon, still more than "have mercy;" God's graciousness is felt more and more the longer one knows Him (Psalm 130. 7). 8. For—Referring to v. 7. You need not doubt His willingness "abundantly to pardon" (cf. v. 12); for, though "the wicked" man's "ways," and "the unrighteous man's thoughts," are so aggravated as to seem unpardonable, God's "thoughts" and "ways" in pardoning are not regulated by the proportion of the former, as man's would be towards his fellow-man who offended him; cf. the "for" (Psalm 25. 11; Romans 5. 19). 9. (Psalm 57. 10; 89. 2; 103. 11.) For is repeated from v. 8. But MAURER, after the negation, translates, "but." 10. The hearts of men, once barren of spirituality, shall be made, by the outpouring of the Spirit under Messiah, to bear fruits of righteousness (ch. 5. 6; Deuteronomy 32. 2; 2 Samuel 23. 4; Psalm 72. 6). snow—which covers plants from frost in winter; and, when melted in spring, waters the earth. returneth not—void; as in v. 11; it returns not in the same shape, or without “accomplishing” the desired end. bud—germinate. 11. (Matthew 24. 35.) Rain may to us seem lost when it falls on a desert, but it fulfils some purpose of God. So the gospel word falling on the hard heart; it sometimes works a change at last; and even if not so, it leaves men without excuse. The full accomplishment of this verse, and v. 12, 13, is, however, to be at the Jews’ final restoration and conversion of the world (ch. 11. 9-12; 60. 1-5, 21). 12. go out—from the various countries in which ye (the Jews) are scattered, to your own land (Ezekiel 11. 17). 1ed—by Messiah, your “Leader” (v. 4; ch. 52. 12; Micah 2. 12, 13). mountains . . . trees, &c.—images justly used to express the seeming sympathy of nature with the joy of God’s people. For, when sin is removed, the natural world shall be delivered from “vanity,” and be renewed, so as to be in unison with the regenerated moral world (ch. 44. 23; Psalm 98. 8; Romans 8. 19-22). 13. thorn—emblem of the wicked (2 Samuel 23. 6; Micah 7. 4). fir tree—the godly (ch. 60. 13; Psalm 92. 12). Cf. as to the change wrought, Romans 6. 19. brier—emblem of uncultivation (ch. 5. 6). myrtle—Hebrew, Hedes, from which comes Hedassah, the original name of Esther. Type of the Christian Church; for it is a lowly, though beautiful, fragrant and evergreen shrub (Psalm 92. 13, 14). for a name . . . everlasting sign—a perpetual memorial to the glory of Jehovah (Jeremiah 13. 11; 33. 9).

CHAPTER LVI.

Ver. 1-12. THE PREPARATION NEEDED ON THE PART OF THOSE WHO WISH TO BE ADMITTED TO THE KINGDOM OF GOD. 1. judgment—equity. John the Baptist preached similarly a return to righteousness, as needed to prepare men for Messiah’s first coming (Luke 3. 3, 8-14). So it shall be before the second coming (Malachi 4. 4-6). near to come—Matthew 3. 2; 4. 17, also as to the second coming (ch. 62. 10, 11; Luke 21. 23, 31; Romans 13. 11, 12; Hebrews 10. 25). righteousness—answering to “salvation” in the parallel clause; therefore it means righteousness which bringeth salvation (ch. 46. 13; Romans 3. 25, 26). 2. (Luke 12. 43.) the man—Hebrew, enosh, “a man in humble life,” in contradistinction to Hebrew, ish, “one of high rank.” Even the humblest, as “the stranger” and “the eunuch” (v. 4, 6), are admissible to these privileges. this . . . it—what follows: “keeping the Sabbath,” &c. (ch. 58. 13, 14; Ezekiel 20. 12). A proof that the Sabbath, in the spirit of its obligation, was to be binding under the gospel (ch. 66. 23). That gospel times are referred to is plain, from the blessing not being pronounced on the man who observed the sacrificial ritual of the Jewish law. layeth hold—image from one grasping firmly some precious object which he is afraid of having forcibly snatched from him. The “Sabbath” here includes all the ordinances of Divine worship under the new gospel law. keepeth . . . hand . . . from . . . evil—The observance of the second table of the law; as the “Sabbath” referred to the first table. Together, they form the whole duty of man, the worship of God and a holy life. 3. God welcomes all believers, without distinction of persons, under the new economy (Acts 10. 34, 35). joined . . . to . . . Lord—(Numbers 18. 4, 7). “Proselytes,” separated—Proselytes from the Gentiles were not admitted to the same privileges as native Israelites. This barrier between Jews and Gentiles was to be broken down (Ephesians 2. 14-16). eunuch—(Acts 8. 27, &c.) Eunuchs were chamberlains over harems, or court ministers in general. dry tree—barren (cf. Luke 23. 31); not admissible into the congregation of Israel (Deuteronomy 23. 1-3). Under the gospel the eunuch and stranger should be released from religious and civil disabilities. please me—sacrifice their own pleasure to mine. take hold—so “layeth hold” (note, v. 2). 5. in mine house—the temple, the emblem of the Church (1 Timothy

3. 15). They shall no longer be confined as proselytes were, to the outer court, but shall be admitted “into the holiest” (Hebrews 10. 19, 20). a place—Heb., a hand. than of sons—Though the eunuch is barren of children (v. 3), I will give him a more lasting name than that of being father or sons and daughters (regarded as a high honour among the Hebrews) (John 1. 12; 10. 3; 1 John 3. 1; Revelation 2. 17; 3. 12). 6. join . . . Lord—(Jeremiah 50. 6.) Conditions of admission to the privileges of adoption. 7. Even then—(Ephesians 2. 11-13.) to my holy mountain—Jerusalem, the seat of the Lord’s throne in His coming kingdom (ch. 2. 2; Jeremiah 3. 17). joyful—(Romans 5. 11.) burnt offerings . . . sacrifices—spiritual, of which the literal were types (Romans 12. 1; Hebrews 13. 15; 1 Peter 2. 5). accepted—(Ephesians 1. 6.) altar—(Hebrews 13. 10), spiritually, the cross of Christ, which sanctifies our sacrifices of prayer and praise. house . . . for all people—or rather, peoples. No longer restricted to one favoured people (Malachi 1. 11; John 4. 21, 23; 1 Timothy 2. 8). To be fully realized at the second coming (ch. 2. 2-4). No longer literal, but spiritual sacrifice, viz., “prayer” shall be offered (Psalm 141. 2; 52. 17; Malachi 1. 11; Matthew 21. 13). 8. Jehovah will not only restore the scattered outcasts of Israel (ch. 11. 12; Psalm 147. 2) to their own land, but “will gather others (‘strangers’) to him (Israel), besides those gathered” (Margin, to his gathered, i. e., in addition to the Israelites collected from their dispersion), (John 10. 16; Ephesians 1. 10; 2. 19). 3. beasts—Gentile idolatrous nations hostile to the Jews, summoned by God to chastise them (Jeremiah 12. 7-9; 50. 17; Ezekiel 34. 5); the Chaldeans and subsequently the Romans. The mention of the “outcasts of Israel” (v. 8) brings in view the outcasting, caused by the sins of their rulers (v. 10-12). to devour—viz., Israel. 10. his watchmen—Israel’s spiritual leaders (ch. 62. 16; Ezekiel 3. 17). dumb dogs—image from bad shepherds’ watch-dogs, which fail to give notice, by barking, of the approach of wild beasts. blind—(Matthew 23. 16.) sleeping, lying down—rather, “dreamers, sluggards.” [LOWTH.] Not merely sleeping inactive, but under visionary delusions. loving to slumber—not merely slumbering involuntarily, but loving it. 11. greedily—lit., strong (i. e., insatiable) in appetite (Ezekiel 34. 2, 3; Micah 3. 11). cannot understand—unable to comprehend the wants of the people, spiritually; so v. 10, “cannot bark.” look to . . . own way—i. e., their own selfish interests; not to the spiritual welfare of the people (Jeremiah 6. 13; Ezekiel 22. 27). from his quarter—rather, “from the highest to the lowest.” [LOWTH.] “From his quarter;” i. e., from one end to the other of them, one and all (Genesis 19. 4). 12. fetch wine—language of the national teachers challenging one another to drink. BARNES translates, “I will take another cup” (ch. 5. 11). to-morrow, &c.—Their self-indulgence was habitual and intentional: not merely they drink, but they mean to continue so.

CHAPTER LVII.

Ver. 1-21. THE PEACEFUL DEATH OF THE RIGHTEOUS FEW: THE UNODLINES OF THE MANY: A BELIEVING REMNANT SHALL SURVIVE THE GENERAL JUDGMENTS OF THE NATION, AND BE RESTORED BY HIM WHO CREATES PEACE. In the midst of the excesses of the unfaithful watchmen (ch. 56. 10, 11, 12), most of the few that are godly perish: partly by vexation at the prevailing ungodliness; partly by violent death in persecution: prophetic of the persecuting times of Manasseh, before God’s judgments in causing the captivity in Babylon; and again those in the last age of the Church, before the final judgments on the apostasy (2 Kings 21. 16; Matthew 23. 29-35, 37; Revelation 11. 17). The Hebrew for “perisheth,” and “is taken away,” expresses a violent death (Micah 7. 2). 1. no man layeth it to heart—as a public calamity. merciful men—rather, godly men; the subjects of mercy. none considering—viz., what was the design of Providence in removing the godly. from the evil—Hebrew, from the face of the evil, i. e., both from the moral evil on every side (ch. 56. 10-12), and from the evils about to come in punishment of the national sins, foreign invasions,

&c. (ch. 56. 9; 57. 13). So Abijah's death is represented as a blessing conferred on him by God for his piety (1 Kings 14. 10-13; see also 2 Kings 22. 20). 2. Or, "he entereth into peace;" in contrast to the persecutions which he suffered in this world (Job 3. 13, 17). Margin not so well translates, "he shall go in peace" (Psalm 37. 37; Luke 2. 29). rest—the calm rest of their bodies in their graves (called "beds," 2 Chronicles 16. 14; cf. Isaiah 14. 18; because they "sleep" in them, with the certainty of awakening at the resurrection, 1 Thessalonians 4. 14) is the emblem of the eternal "rest" (Hebrews 4. 9; Revelation 14. 13). each one walking in . . . uprighting—This clause defines the character of those who at death "rest in their beds," viz., all who walk uprightly. 3. But . . . ye—In contrast to "the righteous" and their end, he announces to the unbelieving Jews their doom. sons of the sorceress—i. e., ye that are addicted to sorcery: this was connected with the worship of false gods (2 Kings 21. 6). No insult is greater to an Oriental than any slur cast on his mother (1 Samuel 20. 30; Job 30. 8). seed of the adulterer—spiritual adultery is meant: idolatry and apostasy (Matthew 16. 4). 4. sport yourselves—make a mock (ch. 66. 5). Are ye aware of the glory of Him whom you mock, by mocking His servants ("the righteous" v. 1)? (2 Chronicles 36. 16.) make . . . wide mouth—(Psalm 22. 7, 13; 35. 21; Lamentations 2. 16). children of transgression, &c.—not merely children of transgressors, and a seed of false parents, but of transgression and falsehood itself, utterly unfaithful to God. 5. Enflaming yourselves—Burning with lust towards idols [GESENIUS]; or else (cf. Margin), in the terebinth groves, which the Hebrew and the parallelism favour (Note, ch. 1. 29). [MAURER.] under . . . tree—(2 Kings 17. 10.) The tree, as in the Assyrian sculptures, was probably made an idolatrous symbol of the heavenly hosts. slaying . . . children—as a sacrifice to Molech, &c. (2 Kings 17. 31; 2 Chronicles 28. 3; 33. 6). in . . . valleys—the valley of the son of Hinnom. Fire was put within a hollow brazen statue, and the child was put in his heated arms; kettle drums (Hebrew, toph) were beaten to drown the child's cries; whence the valley was called Tophet (2 Chronicles 33. 6; Jeremiah 7. 3). under . . . cliffs—the gloom of caverns suiting their dark superstitions. 6. The smooth stones, shaped as idols, are the gods chosen by thee as thy portion (Psalm 16. 5). meat offering—not a bloody sacrifice, but one of meal and flour mingled with oil. "Meat" in Old English meant food, not flesh, as it now means (Leviticus 14. 10). Should I receive comfort—rather, "Shall I bear these things with patience?" [HORSLEY.] 7. Upon . . . high mountain . . . bed—image from adultery, open and shameless (Ezekiel 23. 7); the "bed" answers to the idolatrous altar, the scene of their spiritual unfaithfulness to their Divine husband (Ezekiel 16. 16, 25; 23. 41). 8. "Remembrance," i. e., memorials of thy idolatry: the objects which thou holdest in remembrance. They hung up household tutelary gods "behind the doors;" the very place where God has directed them to write His laws "on the posts and gates" (Deuteronomy 6. 9; 11. 20); a curse, too, was pronounced on putting up an image "in a secret place" (Deuteronomy 27. 15). discovered thyself—image from an adulteress. enlarged . . . bed—so as to receive the more paramours. made . . . covenant—with idols: in open violation of thy "covenant" with God (Exodus 19. 5; 23. 32). Or, "hast made assignments with them for thyself." [HORSLEY.] thy bed . . . their bed—The Jews' sin was twofold; they resorted to places of idolatry ("their bed"), and they received idols into the temple of God ("thy bed"). where—rather, ever since that. [HORSLEY.] The Hebrew for where means room (Margin), a place; therefore, translate, "thou hast provided a place for it" (for "their bed"), viz., by admitting idolatrous altars in thy land [BARNES]; or "thou chooseth a (convenient) place for thyself" in their bed [MAURER] (ch. 56. 5). 9. the king—the idol which they came to worship, perfumed with oil, like harlots (Jeremiah 4. 30; Ezekiel 23. 16, 40). So "king" means idol (Amos 5. 26; Zephaniah 1. 5); (malcham meaning "king"). [ROSEN-MULLER.] Rather, the king of Assyria or Egypt, and other foreign princes, on whom Israel relied, instead of on God; the "ointment" will thus refer to the presents

(Hosea 12. 1), and perhaps the compliances with foreigners' idolatries, whereby Israel sought to gain their favour [LOWTH] (ch. 30. 6; Ezekiel 16. 33; 23. 16; Hosea 7. 11). send . . . messengers far off—not merely to neighbouring nations, but to those "far off," in search of new idols, or else alliances, even unto hell—the lowest possible degradation. 10. greatness of . . . way—the length of thy journey in seeking strange gods, or else foreign aid (Jeremiah 2. 23, 24). Notwithstanding thy deriving no good from these long journeys (so, "send . . . far off," v. 9), thou dost not still give up hope (Jeremiah 2. 25; 18. 12). hast found . . . life of . . . hand—for "thou still findest life (i. e., vigour) enough in thy hand" to make new idols [MAURER], or to seek new alliances ("hand" being then taken for strength in general). grieved—rather, "therefore thou art not weak" [MAURER]; inasmuch as having "life in thy hand," thou art still strong in hope. 11. Israel wished not to seem altogether to have denied God. Therefore they "lied" to Him. God asks, Why dost thou do so? "Whom dost thou fear? Certainly not me; for thou hast not remembered me." Translate, "seeing that thou hast not remembered me," laid it to heart—rather, "nor hast me at heart;" hast no regard for me; and that, because I have been long silent and have not punished thee. Lit., "Have I not held my peace, and that for long? and so thou fearest me not" (Psalm 50. 21; Ecclesiastes 8. 11). It would be better openly to renounce God, than to "flatter Him" with lies of false professions (Psalm 78. 36.) [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] However, ch. 51. 12, 13 favours English Version of the whole verse; God's "silent" long-suffering, which was intended to lead them to repentance, caused them "not to fear Him" (Romans 2. 4, 5). 12. declare—I will expose publicly thy (hypocritical) righteousness. I will show openly how vain thy works, in having recourse to idols, or foreign alliances, shall prove (v. 3). 13. When thou criest—In the time of thy trouble. companies—viz., of idols, collected by thee from every quarter, or else, of foreigners, summoned to thy aid. wind . . . carry . . . away—(Job. 21. 18; Matthew 7. 27.) vanity—rather, a breath. [LOWTH.] possess . . . land . . . inherit—i. e., the literal land of Judea and Mount Zion; the believing remnant of Israel shall return and inherit the land. Secondly, the heavenly inheritance, and the spiritual Zion (ch. 49. 8; Psalm 37. 9, 11; 69. 35, 36; Matthew 5. 5; Hebrews 12. 22). "He that putteth his trust in me," of whatever extraction, shall succeed to the spiritual patrimony of the apostate Jew. [HORSLEY.] 14. shall say—The nominative is, "He that trusteth in me" (v. 13). The believing remnant shall have every obstacle to their return cleared out of the way, at the coming restoration of Israel, the antitype to the return from Babylon (ch. 35. 8; 40. 3, 4; 62. 10, 11). Cast . . . up—a high road before the returning Jews. stumbling-block—Jesus had been so to the Jews, but will not be so then any longer (1 Corinthians 1. 23); their prejudices shall then be taken out of the way. 15. The pride and self-righteousness of the Jews were the stumbling-block in the way of their acknowledging Christ. The contrition of Israel in the last days shall be attended with God's interposition in their behalf. So their self-humiliation, in ch. 66. 2, 5, 10, &c., precedes their final prosperity (Zechariah 12. 6, 10-14); there will, probably, be a previous period of unbelief even after their return (Zechariah 12. 8, 9). 16. For—Referring to the promise in v. 14, 15, of restoring Israel when "contrite" (Genesis 6. 3; 8. 21; Psalm 78. 38, 39; 85. 5; 103. 9, 13, 14; Micah 7. 18). God "will not contend for ever" with His people, for their human spirit would thereby be utterly crushed, whereas God's object is to chasten, not to destroy them (Lamentations 3. 33, 34; Micah 7. 8, 9). With the ungodly He is "angry every day" (Psalm 7. 11; Revelation 14. 11). spirit . . . before me—i. e., the human spirit which went forth from me (Numbers 16. 22), answering to "which I have made" in the parallel clause. 17. covetousness—akin to idolatry; and, like it, having drawn off Israel's heart from God (ch. 2. 7; 56. 11; 58. 3; Jeremiah 6. 13; Colossians 3. 5). hid me—(Ch. 8. 17; 45. 15.) went on fraudulently—the result of God's hiding His face [Psalm 81. 12; Romans 1. 24, 26]. 18. Rather, "I have seen his ways (in sin), yet will I heal him," i. e., restore Israel spiritually and temporally (Jeremiah 33. 6; 3. 22; Hosea 14. 4, 5. [HORSLEY.] However, the phrase, "his mourners," favours English Version; "his ways" will thus be his ways of repentance; and God's pardon on "seeking" them answers to the like promise (ch. 61. 2, 3; Jeremiah 31. 18, 20). 19. fruit of . . . lips—i. e., thanksgivings which flow from the lips. I make men to return thanks to me (Hosea 14. 2; Hebrews 13. 15). Peace, peace—"perfect peace" (see Margin, ch. 26. 3; John 14. 27). Primarily, the cessation of the troubles now afflicting the Jews, as formerly, under the Babylonian exile. More generally, the peace which the gospel proclaims both to Israel "that is near," and to the Gentiles who are "far off" (Acts 2. 39; Ephesians 2. 17). 20. when it cannot rest—rather, "for it can have no rest" (Job 15. 20, &c.; Proverbs 4. 16, 17). English Version represents the sea as occasionally agitated; but the Hebrew expresses that it can never be at rest. 21. (Ch. 48. 22; 2 Kings 9. 22.) my God—The prophet, having God as his God, speaks in the person of Israel, prophetically regarded as having now appropriated God and His "peace" (ch. 11. 1-3), warning the impatient that, whilst they continue so, they can have no peace.

CHAPTER LVIII.

Ver. 1-14. REPROOF OF THE JEWS FOR THEIR DEPENDENCE ON MERE OUTWARD FORMS OF WORSHIP. 1. aloud—Hebrew, with the throat, i. e., with full voice, not merely from the lips (1 Samuel 1. 13). Speak loud enough to arrest attention. my people—The Jews in Isaiah's time, and again in the time of our Lord, more zealous for externals than for inward holiness. ROSENMULLER thinks the reference to be to the Jews in the captivity practising their rites to gain God's favour and a release; and that hence, sacrifices are not mentioned, but only fasting and Sabbath observance, which they could keep, though far away from the temple in Jerusalem. The same also applies to their present dispersion, in which they cannot offer sacrifices, but can only show their zeal in fastings, &c. Cf. as to our Lord's time, Matthew 6. 16; 23.; Luke 18. 12. 2. Put the stop at "ways;" and connect "as a nation that," &c., with what follows; "As a nation that did righteousness," thus answers to, "they ask of me just judgments" (i. e., as a matter of justice due to them, salvation to themselves, and destruction to their enemies); and "forsook not the ordinance of their God," answers to "they desire the drawing near of God" (that God would draw near to exercise those "just judgments" in behalf of them, and against their enemies). [MAURER.] So JEROME, "In the confidence, as it were, of a good conscience, they demand a just judgment, in the language of the saints: Judge me, O Lord, for I have walked in mine integrity." So in Malachi 2. 17, they affect to be scandalized at the impunity of the wicked, and impugn God's justice. [HORSLEY.] Thus, "seek me daily, and desire (English Version not so well, 'delight') to know my ways," refers to their requiring to know why God delayed so long in helping them. English Version gives a good, though different sense, viz., dispelling the delusion that God would be satisfied with outward observances, whilst the spirit of the law was violated and the heart unchanged (v. 3-14; Ezekiel 33. 31, 32; cf. John 18. 23), scrupulously side by side with murder. The prophets were the commentators on the law, as their Magna Charta, in its inward spirit and not the mere letter. 3. Wherefore—The words of the Jews: "Why is it that, when we fast, thou dost not notice it" (by delivering us)? They think to lay God under obligation to their fasting (Psalm 73. 13; Malachi 3. 14). afflicted soul—(Leviticus 16. 29.) Behold—God's reply. pleasure—in antithesis to their boast of having "afflicted their soul;" It was only in outward show they really enjoyed themselves. GESENIUS not so well translates, "business." exact . . . labours—rather, "oppressive labours." [MAURER.] HORSLEY, with Vulgate, translates, "Exact the whole upon your debtors;" those who owe you labour (Nehemiah 5. 1-5, 8-10, &c.). 4. ye shall not fast—rather, "ye do not fast at this time, so as to make your voice to be heard on high," i. e., in heaven; your aim in fasting is strife, not to gain the ear of God [MAURER] (1 Kings 21. 9, 12, 13). In English Version the sense is, If you wish acceptance with God, ye must not fast as ye now do, to make your voice heard high in strife. 5. for a man to afflict his soul—The pain felt by abstinence is not the end to be sought, as if it were meritorious; it is of value only so far as it leads us to amend our ways (v. 6, 7). bow . . . head . . . sackcloth—to affect the outward tokens, so as to "appear to men to fast" (Matthew 6. 17, 18; 1 Kings 21. 27; Esther 4. 3). 6. loose . . . bands of wickedness—i. e., to dissolve every tie wherewith one has unjustly bound his fellow-men (Leviticus 25. 49, &c.). Servitude, a fraudulent contract, &c. undo . . . heavy burdens—Hebrew, loose the bands of the yoke. oppressed—lit., the broken. The expression, to let go free, implies that those "broken" with the yoke of slavery are meant (Nehemiah 5. 10-12; Jeremiah 34. 9-11, 14, 16). JEROME interprets it, broken with poverty; bankrupt. 7. deal—distribute (Job 31. 16-21). cast out—rather, reduced. [HORSLEY.] naked . . . cover him—(Matthew 25. 36.) flesh-kindred (Genesis 29. 14). Also brethren in common descent from Adam, and brethren in Christ (James 2. 15). "Hide . . . thyself," means to be strange towards them, and not to relieve them in their poverty (Matthew 15. 5). 8. light—emblem of prosperity (v. 10; Job 11. 17). health—lit., a long bandage, applied by surgeons to heal a wound (cf. ch. 1. 6). Hence restoration from all past calamities. go before thee—Thy conformity to the Divine covenant acts as a leader, conducting thee to peace and prosperity. glory . . . reward—like the pillar of cloud and fire, the symbol of God's "glory," which went behind Israel, separating them from their Egyptian pursuers (ch. 52. 12; Exodus 14. 19, 20). 9. Then . . . call . . . answer—When sin is renounced (ch. 65. 24). When the Lord's call is not hearkened to, He will not hear our "call" (Psalm 66. 18; Proverbs 1. 24, 28; 15. 23; 28. 9). putting forth of finger—the finger of scorn pointed at simple-minded godly men. The middle finger was so used by the Romans. speaking vanity—every injurious speech. [LOWTH.] 10. draw out thy soul—"impair of thine own subsistence," or "sustenance." [HORSLEY.] "Soul" is fig. for "that wherewith thou sustainest thy soul," or "life." light . . . in obscurity—calamities shall be suddenly succeeded by prosperity (Psalm 112. 4). 11. satisfy . . . in drought—(Ch. 41. 17, 18.) Lit., drought, i. e., parched places. [MAURER.] make fat—rather, strengthen. [NOYES.] "Give thee the free use of thy bones" [JEROME], or, of thy strength. [HORSLEY.] watered garden—an Oriental picture of happiness. fail not—Hebrew, "deceive not;" as streams that disappoint the caravan which had expected to find water, as formerly, but find it dried up (Job 6. 15-17). 12. they . . . of thee—thy people, the Israelites. old waste places—the old ruins of Jerusalem (ch. 61. 4; Ezekiel 36. 33-36). foundations of many generations—i. e., the buildings which had lain in ruins, even to their foundations, for many ages; called in the parallel passage (ch. 61. 4), "the former desolations;" and in the preceding clause here, "the old waste places." The literal and spiritual restoration of Israel is meant, which shall produce like blessed results on the Gentile world (Amos 9. 11, 12; Acts 15. 16, 17). be called—appropriately; the name truly designating what thou shalt do. breath—the calamity wherewith God visited Israel for their sin (ch. 30. 26; 1 Chronicles 15. 13). paths to dwell in—not that the paths were to be dwell in, but the paths leading to their dwellings were to be restored; "paths, so as to dwell in the land." [MAURER.] 13. (Ch. 56. 2; Nehemiah 13. 15-22.) The Sabbath, even under the new dispensation, was to be obligatory (ch. 66. 23). foot—the instrument of motion (cf. Proverbs 4. 27); men are not to travel for mere pleasure on the Sabbath (Acts 1. 12). The Jews were forbidden to travel on it farther than the tabernacle or temple. If thou keep thy foot from going on thy own ways and "doing thy pleasure," &c. (Exodus 20. 10, 11). my holy day—God claims it as His day; to take it for our pleasure is to rob Him of His own. This is the very way in which the Sabbath is mostly broken; it is made a day of carnal pleasure instead of spiritual "delight." holy of the Lord—not the predicate, but the subject; "if thou call the holy (day) of Jehovah honourable;" if thou treat it as a day to be honoured. him—or else, it, the Sabbath. not doing . . . own way—answering to, “turn away thy foot from the Sabbath.” nor finding . . . pleasure—answering to, “doing thy pleasure.” “To keep the Sabbath in an idle manner is the sabbath of oxen and asses; to pass it in a jovial manner is the sabbath of the golden calf, when the people sat down to eat and drink, and rose again to play; to keep it in surfelting and wantonness is the sabbath of Satan, the devil’s holiday.” [BISHOP ANDREWES.] nor speaking . . . words—answering to, “call Sabbath a delight . . . honourable.” Man’s “own words” would “call” it a “weariness;” it is the spiritual nature given from above which “calls it a delight” (Amos 8, 5; Malachi 1, 13). 14. delight . . . in . . . Lord—God rewards in kind, as He punishes in kind. As we “delight” in keeping God’s “Sabbath,” so God will give us “delight” in Himself (Genesis 15, 1; Job 22, 21–26; Psalm 37, 4). ride upon . . . high places—I will make thee supreme lord of the land; the phrase is taken from a conqueror riding in his chariot, and occupying the hills and fastnesses of a country [VITRINGA] (Deuteronomy 32, 13; Micah 1, 3; Habakkuk 3, 19). Judea was a land of hills; the idea thus is, “I will restore thee to thine own land.” [CALVIN.] The parallel words, “heritage of Jacob,” confirm this (Genesis 27, 28, 29; 28, 13–15). mouth of . . . Lord . . . spoken it—A formula to assure men of the fulfillment of any solemn promise which God has made (ch. 40, 5).

CHAPTER LIX.

Ver. 1–21. THE PEOPLE’S SIN THE CAUSE OF JUDGMENTS: THEY AT LAST OWN IT THEMSELVES; THE REDEEMER’S FUTURE INTERPOSITION IN THEIR EXTREMITY. The reason why Jehovah does not deliver His people, notwithstanding their religious services (ch. 58, 3), is not want of power on His part, but because of their sins (v. 1–8); v. 9–15 contain their confession; v. 16–21, the consequent promise of the Messiah. 1. hand . . . shortened—(Note, ch. 50, 2.) ear heavy—(Ch. 6, 10.) 2. hid—Hebrew, caused Him to hide (Lamentations 3, 44). 3. (Ch. 1, 15; Romans 3, 13–15.) hands . . . fingers—not merely the “hands” perpetrate deeds of grosser enormity (“blood”), but the “fingers” commit more minute acts of “iniquity.” lips . . . tongue—The lips “speak” openly “lies,” the tongue “mutters” malicious insinuations (“perverseness;” perverse misrepresentations of others) (Jeremiah 6, 28; 9, 4). 4. Rather, “No one calleth an adversary into court with justice,” i. e., None bringeth a just suit: “No one pleadeth with truth,” they trust . . . iniquity—(So Job 15, 35; Psalm 7, 14). 5. cockatrice—Probably the basilisk serpent, cerastes. Instead of crushing evil in the egg, they foster it. spider’s web—This refers not to the spider’s web being made to entrap, but to its thinness, as contrasted with substantial “garments;” as v. 6 shows. Their works are vain and transitory (Job 8, 14; Proverbs 11, 18). eateth . . . their eggs—he who partakes in their plans, or has anything to do with them, finds them pestiferous. that which is crushed—The egg, when it is broken, breaketh out as a viper; their plans, however specious in their undeveloped form like the egg, when developed, are found pernicious. Though the viper is viviparous (from which “vi-per” is derived), yet during gestation, the young are included in eggs, which break at the birth [BOCHART]; however, metaphors often combine things without representing everything to the life. 6. not . . . garments—like the “fig leaves” wherewith Adam and Eve vainly tried to cover their shame, as contrasted with “the coats of skins” which the Lord God made to clothe them with (ch. 64, 6; Romans 13, 14; Galatians 3, 27; Philippians 3, 9). The artificial self-deceiving sophisms of human philosophy (1 Timothy 6, 5; 2 Timothy 2, 16, 23). 7. feet—all their members are active in evil; in v. 3, the “hands, fingers, lips, and tongue,” are specified. run . . . haste—(Romans 3, 15.) Contrast David’s “running and hastling” in the ways of God (Psalm 119, 32, 60). thoughts—not merely their acts, but their whole thoughts. 8. peace—whether in relation to God, to their own conscience, or to their fellow-men (ch. 57, 20, 21). judgment—justice. crooked—the opposite of “straightforward” (Proverbs 2, 15; 23, 18). 9. judgment far—retribution in kind, because they had shown “no judgment in their goings” (v. 8). “The vindication of our just rights by God is withheld by Him from us.” us—In v. 8 and previous verses, it was “they,” the third person; here, “us . . . we,” the first person. The nation here speaks: God thus making them out of their own mouth condemn themselves; just as He by his prophet had condemned them before. Isalah includes himself with his people, and speaks in their name. justice—God’s justice bringing salvation (ch. 46, 13). light—the dawn of returning prosperity. obscurity—adversity (Jeremiah 8, 15). 10. grope—fulfilling Moses’ threat (Deuteronomy 28, 29). stumble at noon . . . as . . . night—There is no relaxation of our evils; at the time when we might look for the noon of relief, there is still the night of our calamity. in desolate places—rather, to suit the parallel words “at noonday,” in fertile (lit., fat; Genesis 27, 28) fields [GESENIUS] (where all is promising) we are like the dead (who have no hope left them); or, where others are prosperous, we wander about as dead men. True of all unbelievers (ch. 26, 10; Luke 15, 17). 11. roar—moan plaintively, like a hungry bear which growls for food. doves—(Ch. 38, 14; Ezekiel 7, 16.) salvation—retribution in kind: because not salvation, but “destruction” was “in their paths” (v. 7). 12. (Daniel 9, 5, &c.) thee . . . us—antithesis. with us—i. e., we are conscious of them (Margin, Job 12, 3; 15, 9). know—acknowledge they are our iniquities. 13. The particulars of the sins generally confessed in the preceding verse (ch. 48, 8; Jeremiah 2, 19, 20). The act, the word, and the thought of apostasy, are all here marked; transgression and departing, &c.; lying (cf. v. 4), and speaking, &c.; conceiving and uttering from the heart. 14. Justice and righteousness are put away from our legal courts. in the street—in the forum, the place of judicature, usually at the gate of the city (Zechariah 8, 16). cannot enter—is shut out from the forum, or courts of justice. 15. faith—is not to be found, he that departeth . . . prey—He that will not fall in with the prevailing iniquity exposes himself as a prey to the wicked (Psalm 10, 8, 9). Lord saw it—The iniquity of Israel, so desperate as to require nothing short of Jehovah’s interposition to mend it, typifies the same necessity for a Divine Mediator existing in the deep corruption of man; Israel, the model nation, was chosen to illustrate this awful fact. 16. no man—viz., to atone by his righteousness for the unrighteousness of the people. “Man” is emphatic, as in 1 Kings 2, 2; no representative man able to retrieve the cause of fallen men (ch. 41, 28; 63, 5, 6; Jeremiah 5, 1; Ezekiel 22, 30). no intercessor—no one to interpose, “to help . . . uphold” (ch. 63, 5). his arm—(Ch. 40, 10; 51, 5.) Not man’s arm, but His alone (Psalm 98, 1; 41, 3). his righteousness—the “arm” of Messiah. He won the victory for us, not by mere might as God, but by His invincible righteousness, as man having “the Spirit without measure” (ch. 11, 5; 42, 6, 21; 51, 8; 58, 11; 1 John 2, 1). 17. Messiah is represented as a warrior armed at all points, going forth to vindicate His people. Owing to the unity of Christ and His people, their armour is like His, except that they have no “garments of vengeance” (which is God’s prerogative, Romans 12, 19), or “cloak of zeal” (in the sense of judicial fury punishing the wicked; this zeal belongs properly to God, 2 Kings 10, 16; Romans 10, 2; Philippians 3, 6; “zeal,” in the sense of anxiety for the Lord’s honour, they have, Numbers 25, 11, 13; Psalm 69, 9; 2 Corinthians 7, 11; 9, 2); and for “salvation,” which is of God alone (Psalm 3, 8), they have as their helmet “the hope of salvation” (1 Thessalonians 5, 8). The “helmet of salvation” is attributed to them (Ephesians 6, 14, 17) in a secondary sense, viz., derived from Him, and as yet only in hope, not fruition (Romans 8, 24). The second coming here, as often, is included in this representation of Messiah. His “zeal” (John 2, 15–17) at His first coming was but a type of His zeal and vengeance against the foes of God at His second coming (2 Thessalonians 1, 8–10; Revelation 19, 11–21). 18. deeds—Hebrew, “recompenses;” according as their deeds demand. [MAURER.] This verse predicts the judgments at the Lord’s second coming, which shall precede the final redemption of His people (ch. 66. 13, 15, 16). Islands—(Note, ch. 41. 1.) Distant countries. 19. (Ch. 45. 6; Malachi 1. 11.) The result of God's judgments (ch. 26. 9; 66. 18-20). like a flood—(Jeremiah 46. 7, 8; Revelation 12. 15). lift up a standard—rather, from a different Hebrew root, shall put him to flight, drive him away. [MAURER.] LOWTH, giving a different sense to the Hebrew for "enemy" from that in v. 18, and a forced meaning to the Hebrew for "Spirit of the Lord," translates, "When He shall come as a river straitened in its course, which a mighty wind drives along." 20. to Zion—Romans 11. 26 quotes it, "out of Zion." Thus St. Paul, by inspiration, supplements the sense from Psalm 14. 7: He was, and is come to Zion, first with redemption, being sprung as man out of Zion. LXX. translate, "for the sake of Zion." Paul applies this verse to the coming restoration of Israel spiritually. them that turn from—(Romans 11. 26). "shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob;" so LXX., Paul herein gives the full sense under inspiration. They turn from transgression, because He first turns them from it, and it from them (Psalm 130. 4; Lamentations 5. 21). 21. covenant with them . . . thee—The covenant is with Christ, and with them only as united to Him (Hebrews 2. 13). Jehovah addresses Messiah the representative and ideal Israel. The literal and spiritual Israel are His seed, to whom the promise is to be fulfilled (Psalm 22. 30). Spirit . . . not depart . . . for ever—(Jeremiah 31. 31-37; Matthew 23. 20).

CHAPTER LX.

Ver. 1-22. ISRAEL'S GLORY AFTER HER AFFLICTION. An ode of congratulation to Zion on her restoration at the Lord's second advent to her true position as the mother Church from which the gospel is to be diffused to the whole Gentile world; the first promulgation of the gospel among the Gentiles, beginning at Jerusalem, is an earnest of this. The language is too glorious to apply to any thing that as yet has happened. 1. Arise—from the dust in which thou hast been sitting as a mourning female captive (ch. 3. 26; 52. 1, 2). shine—impart to others the spiritual light now given thee (v. 3). Margin and GESENIUS translate, "Be enlightened;" be resplendent with posterity; imperative for the future indicative, "Thou shalt be enlightened" (ch. 58. 8, 10; Ephesians 5. 8, 14). glory of the Lord—not merely the Shechinah, or cloud of glory, such as rested above the ark in the old dispensation, but the glory of the Lord in person (Jeremiah 3. 16, 17). is risen—as the sun (Malachi 4. 2; Luke 1. 78, Margin). 2. darkness . . . earth—the rest of the earth; in contrast with "light . . . upon thee" (v. 1). The earth will be afterwards enlightened through Israel (ch. 9. 2). be seen—conspicuously; so the Hebrew. 3. (Ch. 2. 3; 11. 10; 43. 6; 49. 22; 66. 12.) kings—(Ch. 49. 7, 23; 52. 15.) thy rising—rather, thy sun-rising, i. e., to the brightness that riseth upon thee. 4. Lift up . . . eyes—Jerusalem is addressed as a female with eyes cast down from grief. all they . . . they—The Gentile peoples come together to bring back the dispersed Hebrews, restore their city, and worship Jehovah with offerings. nursed at thy side—rather carried, &c. It is the custom in the East to carry the children astride on the hip, with the arms around the body (ch. 66. 12.) 5. see—(v. 4), viz., the bringing back of thy sons. flow together—rather, "overflow with joy" [LOWTH]; or, from a different Hebrew root, "be bright with joy" (GESENIUS) (Job 3. 4). fear—rather, beat with the agitation of solemn joy at the marvellous sight [HORSLEY] (Jeremiah 33. 9.) be enlarged—swell with delight. Grief, on the contrary, contracts the heart. abundance of . . . sea—the wealth of the lands beyond the sea, as in Solomon's time, the type of the coming reign of the Prince of peace. converted—rather, be turned, instead of being turned to purposes of sin and idolatry. forces—rather, riches. 6. camels—laden with merchandise; the camel is "the ship of the desert" (cf. ch. 30. 6). cover thee—so many of them shall there be. dromedaries—they have one bunch on the back, whereas the camel has two; distinguished for swiftness (Jeremiah 2. 23). Midian—East of the Elanitic branch of the Red Sea, and stretching northward along Mount Selr. Associated with the Ishmaelites in traffic (Genesis 37. 25, 28). Ephah—part of Midian, east of the Dead Sea. It abounded in camels (Judges 6. 5). Sheba—In Arabia Felix, famed for frankincense and gold (Psalm 72. 15; Jeremiah 6. 20), which they traded in (ch. 45. 14; Job 6. 19; Ezekiel 27. 22). 7. Kedar—(Ch. 21. 16; Song of Solomon 1. 5.) in the south of Arabia Deserta, or north of Arabia Petraea; they traded in flocks (Ezekiel 27. 21). Nebaloth—son of Ishmael, as was Kedar. Father of the Nabatheans in Arabia Petraea. minister—by coming up as an acceptable sacrifice. come up with acceptance—i. e., acceptably. The rams offering themselves voluntarily (Psalm 68. 30; Romans 12. 1; 1 Peter 2. 5), without waiting for any other priest, answer to believers strong in faith and lamb-like meekness; and in the white fleecelike robe of sanctity. [VITRINGA.] house of my glory—the temple (Ezekiel 41.; Haggai 2. 7, 9; Malachi 3. 1). 8. The prophet, seeing in vision new hosts approaching quickly like a cloud of doves, asks who they are. 9. (Note, ch. 42. 4.) Tarshish first—The ships of Tartessus (Note, ch. 2. 16; 23. 1, i. e., vessels that trade to the most distant regions) will be among the foremost to bring back the scattered Israelites (ch. 66. 20). their silver—the nations among whom the Jews have been scattered shall help them with their money in returning (v. 5-7, 11, 16), as was the case at the return from Babylon (Ezra 1. 4; cf. Psalm 68. 30, 31). unto the name . . . to the Holy One—rather, because of the name—because of the Holy One (cf. ch. 55. 5). [LOWTH.] 10. kings . . . minister unto thee—(v. 7 above, note; ch. 49. 23.) in my wrath I smote thee—(Ch. 54. 7, 8; 57. 17.) 11. (Revelation 11. 25.) The gates are ever open to receive new offerings and converts (ch. 26. 2; Acts 14. 27; Revelation 3. 8). In time of peace the gates of a city are open; so, under the Prince of peace, there shall be no need of barring gates against invaders. forces—riches. be brought—as willing captives to the truth; or, if not willingly, be brought by judgments to submit to Israel (v. 12, 14). GESENIUS explains it, "may come escorted by a retinue." 12. For—The reason which will lead Gentile kings and people to submit themselves; fear of the God in Israel (Zechariah 14. 17). 13. glory—i. e., the trees which adorned Lebanon; emblem of men eminent in natural gifts, devoting all that is in them to the God of Israel (Hosea 14. 5, 6). fir . . . pine . . . box—rather, "the cypress . . . ilex . . . cedar." place of my sanctuary—Jerusalem (Jeremiah 3. 17). place of my feet—no longer the ark (Jeremiah 3. 16), "the footstool" of Jehovah (Psalm 99. 5; 132. 7; 1 Chronicles 28. 2); but "the place of His throne, the place of the soles of His feet, where He will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever," in the new temple (Ezekiel 43. 7). 14. The sons—Their fathers who "afflicted" Israel having been cut off by Divine judgments (ch. 14. 1, 2; 49. 23). The Zion of the Holy One—The royal court of the Holy One. MAURER translates, "Zion, the sanctuary (holy place) of Israel" (ch. 57. 15; Psalm 46. 4). 15. forsaken—(Psalm 78. 60, 61.) no man went through thee—Thy land was so desolate that no traveller, or caravan, passed through thee; true only of Israel, not true of the Church (Lamentations 1. 4). excellency—glory, i. e., for ever honoured. 16. suck—Thou shalt draw to thyself and enjoy all that is valuable of the possessions of the Gentiles, &c. (ch. 49. 23; 61. 6; 66. 11, 12). know—by the favours bestowed on thee, and through thee on the Gentiles. 17. Poetically, with figurative allusion to the furniture of the temple; all things in that happy age to come shall be changed for the better. extractors—viz., of tribute. righteousness—all rulers in restored Jerusalem shall not only be peaceable and righteous, but shall be, as it were, "peace" and "righteousness" itself in their administration. 18. (Ch. 2. 4.) Not only shall thy walls keep thee safe from foes, but "Salvation" shall serve as thy walls, converting thy foes into friends, and so ensuring thee perfect safety (ch. 26. 1, 2). gates—once the scene of "destruction" when victorious foes burst through them (Nehemiah 1. 3); henceforth to be not only the scene of praises, but "Praise" itself; the "gates," as the place of public concourse, were the scene of thanksgivings (2 Chronicles 31. 2; Psalm 9. 11; 24. 7; 100. 4). "Judah," the favoured tribe, means protes. 19

The sun and moon, the brightest objects by day and night, shall be eclipsed by the surpassing glory of God manifesting Himself to thee (ch. 30, 26; Zechariah 2, 5; Revelation 21, 23; 22, 5). 20. There shall be no national and spiritual obscuration again as formerly (Joel 2, 10; Amos 8, 9). mourning . . . ended—(Ch. 25, 8; Revelation 21, 4). 21. all righteous—(Ch. 4, 3; 52, 1; Revelation 21, 27.) inherit . . . land—(Ch. 49, 8; 54, 3; 65, 9; Psalm 37, 11, 22; Matthew 5, 5.) branch of my planting—(Ch. 61, 3; Psalm 92, 13; Matthew 15, 13.) work of my hands—the converted Israelites (ch. 29, 23; 45, 11). that I may be glorified—the final end of all God's gracious dealings (ch. 49, 3; 61, 3). 22. little one—even one, and that the smallest in number and rank, shall be multiplied a thousandfold in both respects (Micah 5, 2; Matthew 13, 31, 32). his time—not our time; we might wish to hasten it, but it will come in the due time, as in the case of Jesus' first coming (Galatians 4, 4); so in that of the restoration of Israel and the conversion of the world (ch. 66, 8; Habakkuk 2, 3; Acts 1, 7; Hebrews 10, 37).

CHAPTER LXI.

Ver. 1-11. MESSIAH'S OFFICES: RESTORATION OF ISRAEL. Messiah announces His twofold commission to bring gospel-mercy at His first coming, and judgments on unbelievers and comfort to Zion at His second coming (v. 1-9); the language can be applied to Isaiah, comforting by his prophecies the exiles in Babylon, only in a subordinate sense. 1. is upon me; because . . . hath anointed me—quoted by Jesus as His credentials in preaching (Luke 4, 18-21). The Spirit is upon me in preaching, because Jehovah hath anointed me from the womb (Luke 1, 35), and at baptism, with the Spirit "without measure," and permanently "abiding" on me (ch. 11, 2; John 1, 32; 3, 34; Psalm 45, 7; with which cf. 1 Kings 1, 39, 40; 19, 16; Exodus 29, 7). "Anointed" as Messiah, Prophet, Priest, and King. good tidings—as the word gospel means. the meek—rather, "the poor," as Luke 4, 18 hath it, i. e., those afflicted with calamity, poor in circumstances and in spirit (Matthew 11, 5). proclaim liberty—(John 8, 31-36.) Language drawn from the deliverance of the Babylonian captives, to describe the deliverance from sin and death (Hebrews 2, 15); also from the "liberty proclaimed" to all bond-servants on the year of jubilee (v. 2; Leviticus 25, 10; Jeremiah 34, 8, 9). opening of the prison—The Hebrew rather is, "the most complete opening," viz., of the eyes to them that are bound, i. e., deliverance from prison, for captives are as it were blind in the darkness of prison (ch. 14, 17; 35, 5; 42, 7). [EWARD.] So Luke 4, 18 and LXX. interpret it. Luke 4, 18, under inspiration, adds to this, for the fuller explanation of the single clause in the Hebrew, "to set at liberty them that are bruised;" thus expressing the double "opening" implied, viz., that of the eyes (John 9, 39), and that of the prison (Romans 6, 18; 7, 24, 25; Hebrews 2, 15). His miracles were acted parables. 2. acceptable year—the year of jubilee on which "liberty was proclaimed to the captives" (v. 1; 2 Corinthians 6, 2). day of vengeance—The "acceptable time of grace" is a "year;" the time of "vengeance" but "a day" (so ch. 34, 8; 63, 4; Malachi 4, 1). Jesus (Luke 4, 20, 21) "closed the book" before this clause; for the Interval from His first to His second coming is "the acceptable year;" "the day of vengeance" will not be till He comes again (2 Thessalonians 1, 7-9). our God—The saints call Him "our God;" for He cometh to "avenge" them (Revelation 6, 10; 19, 2). all that mourn—the "all" seems to include the spiritual Israelite mourners, as well as the literal, who are in v. 3 called "them that mourn in Zion," and to whom ch. 57, 18 refers. 3. To appoint . . . to give—The double verb, with the one and the same accusative, imparts glowing vehemence to the style. beauty for ashes—There is a play on the sound and meaning of the Hebrew words, peer, epher, Et., "ornamental head-dress" or tiara (Ezekiel 24, 17), worn in times of joy, instead of a head-dress of "ashes," cast on the head in mourning (2 Samuel 13, 19). oil of joy—perfumed ointment was poured on the guests at joyous feasts (Psalm 23, 5; 45, 7, 8; Amos 6, 6). On occasions of grief it was used also (2 Samuel 14, 2). garment of praise—

bright-coloured garments, indicative of thankfulness, instead of those that indicate despondency, as sackcloth (John 16, 20). trees of righteousness—Hebrew, terebinth trees; symbolical of men strong in righteousness, instead of being, as heretofore, bowed down as a reed with sin and calamity (ch. 1, 29, 30; 42, 3; 1 Kings 14, 15; Psalm 1, 3; 92, 12-14; Jeremiah 17, 8). planting of . . . Lord—(Note, ch. 60, 21.) that he might be glorified—(John 15, 8.) 4. old wastes—Jerusalem and the cities of Judah which long lay in ruins (Note, ch. 58, 12). 5. stand—shall wait on you as servants (ch. 14, 1, 2; 60, 10). 6. But ye—as contrasted with the "strangers." Ye shall have no need to attend to your flocks and lands: strangers will do that for you; your exclusive business will be the service of Jehovah as His "priests" (Exodus 19, 6, which remains yet to be realized; cf. as to the spiritual Israel, ch. 66, 21; 1 Peter 2, 5, 9; Revelation 1, 6; 5, 10). ministers—(Ezekiel 44, 11.) eat . . . riches of . . . Gentiles—(Ch. 69, 5-11.) in their glory . . . boast yourselves—rather, "in their splendour ye shall be substituted in their stead;" tit., ye shall substitute yourselves. [MAURER.] 7. double—Instead of your past share, ye shall have not merely as much, but "double" as much reward (ch. 40, 2; Zechariah 9, 12; cf. the third clause in this verse). confusion—rather, humiliation, or contumely. rejoice—They shall celebrate with jubilation the portion. [MAURER.] Transition from the second to the third person. in their land—marking the reference to literal Israel, not to the Church at large. everlasting joy—(Ch. 35, 10.) 8. judgment—justice, which requires that I should restore my people, and give them double in compensation for their sufferings. robbery for burnt offering—rather, from a different Hebrew root, the spoil of INIQUITY. [HORSLEY.] So in Job 5, 6. Having, as I do, the rapine, combined with iniquity, perpetrated on my people by their enemies, I will vindicate Israel. direct . . . work in truth—rather, "I will give them the reward of their work" (cf. Margin, ch. 49, 10; 49, 4; 62, 11) in faithfulness. 9. known—honourably; shall be illustrious (Psalm 67, 2). people—rather, peoples. seed . . . blessed—(Ch. 65, 23.) 10. Zion (v. 3) gives thanks for God's returning favour (cf. Luke 1, 46, 47; Habakkuk 3, 18). salvation . . . righteousness—Inseparably connected together. The "robe" is a loose mantle thrown over the other parts of the dress (Psalm 132, 9, 16; 149, 4; Revelation 21, 2; 19, 8). decketh himself with ornaments—rather "maketh himself a priestly head-dress;" i. e., a magnificent head-dress, such as was worn by the high priest, viz., a mitre and a plate, or crown of gold worn in front of it. [AQUILA, &c.] Appropriate to the "kingdom of priests," dedicated to the offering of spiritual sacrifices to God continually (Exodus 19, 6; Revelation 5, 10; 20, 6). jewels—rather, ornaments in general. [BARNES.] 11. (Ch. 45, 8; 55, 10, 11; Psalm 72, 3; 85, 11.) bud—the tender shoots. praise—(Ch. 60, 18; 62, 7.)

CHAPTER LXII.

Ver. 1-12. INTERCESSORY PRAYERS FOR ZION'S RESTORATION, ACCOMPANYING GOD'S PROMISES OF IT, AS THE APPOINTED MEANS OF ACCOMPLISHING IT. 1. I—the prophet, as representative of all the praying people of God who love and intercede for Zion (cf. v. 6, 7; Psalm 102, 13-17), or else Messiah (cf. v. 6). So Messiah is represented as unfainting in His efforts for His people (ch. 42, 4; 50, 7). righteousness thereof—not its own inherently, but imputed to it, for its restoration to God's favour; hence "salvation" answers to it in the parallelism. "Judah" is to be "saved" through "the Lord our (Judah's and the Church's) righteousness" (Jeremiah 23, 6). as brightness—properly the bright shining of the rising sun (ch. 60, 19, 4; 5; 2 Samuel 23, 4; Proverbs 4, 18). lamp—blazing torch. 2. (Ch. 11, 10; 42, 1-6; 49, 7, 22, 23; 60, 3, 5, 10). new name—expression of thy new and improved condition (v. 4), the more valuable and lasting as being conferred by Jehovah himself (v. 12; ch. 65, 15; Revelation 2, 17; 3, 12). 3. (Zechariah 9, 16). in . . . hand of . . . Lord—As a crown is worn on the head, not "in the hand," hand must here be figurative for "under the Lord's protection" (cf. Deuteronomy 33, 3). "All His saints are in thy hand." His people are in His hand at the same time that they are "a crown of glory" to Him (Revelation 6. 2; 19. 12); reciprocally, He is "a crown of glory and a diadem of beauty" to them (ch. 28. 5; cf. Malachi 3. 17). 4. be termed—be "forsaken," so as that that term could be applicable to thee. Hephzi-bah—(2 Kings 21. 1), the name of Hezekiah's wife, a type of Jerusalem, as Hezekiah was of Messiah (ch. 32. 1): "my delight is in her." Beulah—"Thou art married." See the same contrast of Zion's past and future state under the same figure (ch. 54. 4-6; Revelation 21. 2, 4). land . . . married—to Jehovah as its Lord and Husband: implying not only ownership, but protection on the part of the Owner. [HORSLEY.] 5. thy sons—Rather, changing the points, which are of no authority in Hebrew, "thy builder" or "restorer," i. e., God; for in the parallel clause, and in v. 4, God is implied as being "married" to her; whereas her "sons" could hardly be said to marry their mother; and in ch. 49. 18, they are said to be her bridal ornaments, not her husband. The plural form, builders, is used of God in reverence as "husbands" (note, ch. 54. 5). over the bride—in the possession of the bride (ch. 65. 19; Jeremiah 32. 11; Zephaniah 3. 17). 6. I—Isaiah speaking in the person of the Messiah. watchman upon . . . walls—image from the watches set upon a city's wall to look out for the approach of a messenger with good tidings (ch. 52. 7, 8); the good tidings of the return of the Jewish exiles from Babylon, prefiguring the return from the present dispersion (cf. ch. 21. 6-11; 56. 10; Ezekiel 3. 17; 33. 7). The watches in the East are announced by a loud cry to mark the vigilance of the watchmen. ye that . . . mention . . . Lord—Hebrew, ye that are the Lord's remembrancers; God's servants who by their prayers "put God in remembrance" of His promises (ch. 43. 26); we are required to remind God, as if God could, which He cannot, forget His promises (Psalm 119. 49; Jeremiah 14. 21). 7. no rest—Hebrew, "silence;" keep not silence yourselves, nor let Him rest in silence. Cf. as to Messiah himself, "I will not hold . . . peace . . . not rest" (v. 1); Messiah's watchmen (v. 6, 7) imitate Him (v. 1) in intercessory "prayer without ceasing" for Jerusalem (Psalm 122. 6; 51. 18); also for the spiritual Jerusalem, the Church (Luke 18. 1, 7; Romans 1. 9). a praise—(Note, ch. 61. 11; Zephaniah 3. 20). 8. sworn by . . . right hand—His mighty instrument of accomplishing His will (cf. ch. 45. 24; Hebrews 6. 13). sons of . . . stranger—Foreigners shall no more rob thee of the fruit of thy labours (cf. ch. 65. 21, 22). 9. eat . . . and praise—not consume it on their own lusts, and without thanksgiving. drink it in . . . courts—They who have gathered the vintage shall drink it at the feasts held in the courts surrounding the temple (Deuteronomy 12. 17, 18; 14. 23, &c.). 10. What Isaiah in the person of Messiah had engaged in (v. 1) unrestingly to seek, and what the watchmen were unrestingly to pray for (v. 7), and what Jehovah solemnly promised (v. 8, 9), is now to be fulfilled; the Gentile nations are commanded to "go through the gates" (either of their own cities [ROSENMULLER] or of Jerusalem [MAURER]), in order to remove all obstacles out of "the way of the people" (Israel) (note, 57. 14; 40. 3; 52. 10-12). standard—for the dispersed Jews to rally round, with a view to their return (ch. 49. 22; 11. 12). 11. salvation—embodied in the Saviour (see Zechariah 9. 9). his work—rather, recompense (ch. 40. 10). 12. Sought out—Sought after and highly prized by Jehovah; answering to "not forsaken" in the parallel clause; no longer abandoned, but loved; image from a wife (v. 4; Jeremiah 30. 14).

CHAPTER LXIII.

Ver. 1-19. MESSIAH COMING AS THE AVENGER, IN ANSWER TO HIS PEOPLE'S PRAYERS. Messiah, approaching Jerusalem after having avenged His people on His and their enemies, is represented under imagery taken from the destruction of "Edom," the type of the last and most bitter foes of God and His people (see ch. 34. 5, &c.). 1. Who—the question of the prophet in prophetic vision. dyed—scarlet with blood (v. 2, 3; Revelation 19. 13). Bozrah—(Note, ch. 34. 6.) travelling—rather, stately; lit., throwing back the head [GESENIUS.] speak in righteous- ness—answer of Messiah. I, who have in faithfulness given a promise of deliverance, am now about to fulfil it. Rather, speak of righteousness (ch. 45. 19; 46. 13); salvation being meant as the result of His "righteousness." [MAURER.] save—the same Messiah that destroys the unbeliever saves the believer. 2. The prophet asks, why His garments are "dyed" and "red?" winefat—rather, the wine-press, wherein the grapes were trodden with the feet; the juice would stain the garment of him who trod them (Revelation 14. 19, 20; 19. 15). The image was appropriate, as the country round Bozrah abounded in grapes. This final blow inflicted by Messiah and His armies (Revelation 19. 13-15) shall decide His claim to the kingdoms usurped by Satan, and by the "beast," to whom Satan delegates his power. It will be a day of judgment to the hostile Gentiles, as His first coming was a day of judgment to the unbelieving Jews. 3. Reply of Messiah. For the image, see Lamentations 1. 15. He "treads the winepress" here not as a sufferer, but as an inflicter of vengeance. will tread . . . shall be . . . will stain—rather preterites, "I trod . . . trampled . . . was sprinkled . . . I stained." blood—lit., spirted juice of the grape, pressed out by treading. [GESENIUS.] 4. is—rather, was. This assigns the reason why He has thus destroyed the foe (Zephaniah 3. 8). my redeemed—my people to be redeemed. day . . . year—here, as in ch. 34. 8; 61. 2, the time of "vengeance" is described as a "day;" that of grace and of "recompense" to the "redeemed," as a "year." 5. The same words as in ch. 59. 16, except that there it is His "righteousness," here it is His "fury," which is said to have upheld Him. 6. Gather, preterites, "I trod down . . . made them drunk." The same image occurs ch. 51. 17, 21-23; Psalm 75. 8; Jeremiah 25. 26, 27. will bring down . . . strength to . . . earth—rather, "spilled their life-blood (the same Hebrew words as in v. 3) on the earth." [LOWTH and LXX.] 7. Israel's penitential confession and prayer for restoration (Psalm 102. 17, 20), extending from this verse to the end of ch. 64. loving-kindnesses . . . praises . . . mercies . . . loving-kindnesses—the plurals, and the repetitions imply that language is inadequate to express the full extent of God's goodness. us—the dispersed Jews at the time just preceding their final restoration. house of Israel—of all ages; God was good not merely to the Jews now dispersed, but to Israel in every age of its history. 8. he—Jehovah "said," i. e., thought, in choosing them as His covenant-people; so "said" (Psalm 95. 10). Not that God was ignorant that the Jews would not keep faith with Him; but God is here said, according to human modes of thought to say within Himself what He might naturally have expected, as the result of His goodness to the Jews; thus the enormity of their unnatural perversity is the more vividly set forth. He—prove false to me (cf. Psalm 44. 17). so—in virtue of His having chosen them, He became their Saviour. So the "therefore" (Jeremiah 31. 33). His eternal choice is the ground of His actually saving men (Ephesians 1. 3, 4). 9. he was afflicted—English Version reads the Hebrew as the Keri (Margin) does, "There was affliction to Him." But the Chetib (text) reads, "There was no affliction" (the change in Hebrew being only of one letter), i. e., "In all their afflictions there was no (utterly overwhelming) affliction" [GESENIUS]; or, for "Hardly had an affliction befallen them, when the angel of His presence saved them" [MAURER]; or, as best suits the parallelism, "In all their straits there was no straitness in His goodness to them" [HOUBIGANT] (Judges 10. 16; Micah 2. 7; 2 Corinthians 6. 12). angel of his presence—lit., of His face, i. e., who stands before Him continually; Messiah (Exodus 14. 19; 23. 20, 21; Proverbs 8. 30), language applicable to no creature (Exodus 32. 34; 33. 2, 14; Numbers 20. 16; Malachi 3. 1). bare them—(Ch. 46. 3, 4; 40. 11; Exodus 19. 4; Deuteronomy 32. 11, 12). 10. vexed—grieved (Psalm 78. 40; 95. 10; Acts 7. 51; Ephesians 4. 30; Hebrews 3. 10, 17). he fought—rather, "He it was that fought," viz., the angel of His presence [HORSLEY] (Lamentations 2. 5). 11 remembered—Notwithstanding their perversity, He forgot not His covenant of old, therefore He did not wholly forsake them (Leviticus 26. 40-42, 44, 45; Psalm 106. 45, 46);

the Jews make this their plea with God, that He should not now forsake them. saying—God is represented, in human language, mentally speaking of Himself and His former acts of love to Israel, as His ground for pitying them notwithstanding their rebellion. sea—Red Sea. shepherd—Moses; or if the Hebrew be read plural, shepherds, Moses, Aaron, and the other leaders (so Psalm 77. 20). put . . . Spirit . . . within him—Hebrew, in the inward parts of him, i. e., Moses; or it refers to the flock, "in the midst of his people" (Numbers 11. 17, 25; Nehemiah 9. 20; Haggai 2. 5). 12. The right hand of Moses was but the instrument; the arm of God was the real mover (Exodus 15. 6; 14. 21). dividing the water—(Nehemiah 9. 11; Psalm 78. 13.) 13. deep—lit., the tossing and roaring sea. wilderness—Rather, the open plain [HORSLEY], wherein there is no obstacle to cause a horse in its course the danger of stumbling. 14. As a beast . . . rest—image from a herd led "down" from the hills to a fertile and well-watered "valley" (Psalm 23. 2); so God's Spirit "caused Israel to rest" in the promised land after their weary wanderings. to make . . . name—(So v. 12; 2 Samuel 7. 23). 15. Here begins a fervent appeal to God to pity Israel now on the ground of His former benefits. habitation of . . . holiness—(Ch. 57. 15; Deuteronomy 26. 15; 2 Chronicles 30. 27; Psalm 33. 14; 80. 14). zeal . . . strength—evinced formerly for thy people. sounding of . . . bowels—thine emotions of compassion (ch. 16. 11; Jeremiah 31. 20; 48. 36; Hosea 11. 8). 16. thou . . . Father—of Israel, by right not merely of creation, but also of electing adoption (ch. 64. 8; Deuteronomy 32. 6; 1 Chronicles 29. 10). though Abraham . . . Israel—It had been the besetting temptation of the Jews to rest on the mere privilege of their descent from faithful Abraham and Jacob (Matthew 3. 9; John 8. 39; 4. 12); now at last they renounce this, to trust in God alone as their Father, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary. Even though Abraham our earthly father, on whom we have prided ourselves, disown us, Thou wilt not (ch. 49. 15; Psalm 27. 10). Isaac is not mentioned, because not all his posterity was admitted to the covenant, whereas all Jacob's was; Abraham is specified, because he was the first father of the Jewish race. everlasting—an argument why He should help them, viz., because of His everlasting immutability. 17. made us to err—i. e., suffer us to err and to be hardened in our heart. They do not mean to deny their own blameworthiness, but confess that through their own fault God gave them over to a reprobate mind (ch. 6. 9, 10; Psalm 119. 10; Romans 1. 28). Return—(Numbers 10. 38; Psalm 90. 13.) 18. people of . . . holiness—Israel dedicated as holy unto God (ch. 62. 12; Deuteronomy 7. 6). possessed—viz., the Holy Land, or thy "sanctuary," taken from the following clause, which is parallel to this (cf. ch. 64. 10, 11; Psalm 74. 6–8). thy—an argument why God should help them; their cause is His cause. 19. thine . . . never—Rather, "We are thine from of old; thou barest not rule over them." [BARNES.] LOWTH translates, "We for long have been as those over whom thou hast not ruled, who are not called by thy name;" "for long" thus stands in contrast to "but a little while" (v. 18). But the analogy of v. 18 makes it likely that the first clause in this verse refers to the Jews, and the second to their foes, as English Version and BARNES translate it. The Jews' foes are aliens who have unjustly intruded into the Lord's heritage.

CHAPTER LXIV.

Ver. 1–12. TRANSITION FROM COMPLAINT TO PRAYER.

1. rend . . . heavens—bursting forth to execute vengeance, suddenly descending on thy people's foe (Psalm 18. 9; 144. 5; Habakkuk 3. 5, 6). flow down—(Judges 5. 5; Micah 1. 4.) 2. Oh that thy wrath would consume thy foes as the fire, &c. Rather, "as the fire burneth the dry brush-wood." [GESENIUS.] 3. When—Supply from v. 2. As when, &c. terrible things—(Psalm 65. 5.) we looked not for—far exceeding the expectation of any of our nation; unparalleled before (Exodus 34. 10; Psalm 68. 8).

camest down—on Mount Sinai. mountains flowed—Repeated from v. 1; they pray God to do the very same things for Israel now as in former ages. GESENIUS, instead of "flowed" here, and "flow" in v. 1, translates from a different Hebrew root, "quake . . . quaked;" but "fire" melts and causes to flow, rather than to quake (v. 2). 4. perceived by the ear—Paul (1 Corinthians 2. 9) has for this, "nor have entered into the heart of man;" the virtual sense, sanctioned by his inspired authority; men might hear with the outward ear, but they could only by the Spirit "perceive" with the "heart" the spiritual significance of God's acts, both those in relation to Israel, primarily referred to here, and those relating to the gospel secondarily, which Paul refers to. O God . . . what he . . . prepared—Rather, "nor hath eye seen a god beside thee who doeth such things," &c. They refer to God's past marvellous acts in behalf of Israel as a plea for His now interposing for His people; but the Spirit, as Paul by inspiration shows, contemplated further God's revelation in the gospel, which abounds in marvellous paradoxes never before heard of by carnal ear, not to be understood but by mere human sagacity, and when foretold by the prophets not fully perceived or credited; and even after the manifestation of Christ not to be understood save through the inward teaching of the Holy Ghost. These are partly past and present, and partly future, therefore Paul substitutes "prepared" for "doeth," though his context shows he includes all three. For "waiteth" he has "love Him;" godly waiting on Him must flow from love, and not mere fear. 5. meetest—i. e., Thou makest peace, or enterest into covenant with him (Note, ch. 47. 3). rejoiceth and worketh—i. e., who with joyful willingness worketh [GESENIUS] (Acts 10. 35; John 7. 17). those—Thou meetest "those," &c., in apposition to "him" who represents a class whose characteristics "those that," &c., more fully describes. remember thee in thy ways—(Ch. 26. 8; sinned—lit., tripped, carrying on the figure in "ways." In those is continuance—a plea to deprecate the continuance of God's wrath; it is not in thy wrath that there is continuance (ch. 54. 7, 8; Psalm 30. 5; 103. 9), but in thy ways ("those"), viz., of covenant-mercy to thy people (Micah 7. 18–20; Malachi 3. 6); on the strength of the everlasting continuance of His covenant they infer by faith, "we shall be saved." God "remembered" for them His covenant (Psalm 106. 45), though they often "remembered not" Him (Psalm 73. 42). CASTELLIO translates, "we have sinned for long in them ('thy ways'), and could we then be saved?" But they hardly would use such a plea when their very object was to be saved. 6. unclean thing—legally unclean, as a leper. True of Israel, everywhere now cut off by unbelief and by God's judgments from the congregation of the saints. righteousness—plural, "uncleanness" extended to every particular act of theirs, even to their prayers and praises. True of the best doings of the unregenerate (Philippians 3. 6–8; Titus 1. 15; Hebrews 11. 6). filthy rags—lit., a menstruous rag (Leviticus 15. 33; 20. 18; Lamentations 1. 17). fade . . . leaf—(Psalm 90. 5, 6.) 7. stirreth—rouseth himself from spiritual drowsiness. take hold—(Ch. 27. 5). 8. Father—(Ch. 63. 16.) clay . . . potter—(Ch. 29. 16; 45. 9.) Unable to mould themselves aright, they beg the sovereign will of God to mould them unto salvation, even as He made them at the first, and is their "Father." 9. (Psalm 74. 1, 2.) we are . . . thy people—(Jeremiah 14. 9, 21.) 10. holy cities—No city but Jerusalem is called "the holy city" (ch. 48. 2; 52. 1); the plural, therefore, refers to the upper and the lower parts of the same city Jerusalem [VITRINGA]; or all Judea was holy to God, so its cities were deemed "holy." [MAURER.] But the parallelism favours VITRINGA. Zion and Jerusalem (the one city) answering to "holy cities." 11. house—the temple. "Beautiful" includes the idea of glorious (Mark 13. 1; Acts 3. 2). burned—(Psalm 74. 7; Lamentations 2. 7; 2 Chronicles 36. 19.) Its destruction under Nebuchadnezzar prefigured that under Titus. pleasant things—Hebrew, objects of desire; our homes, our city, and all its dear associations. 12. for these things—Wilt thou, notwithstanding these calamities of thy people, still refuse thy aid (ch. 42. 14)?

CHAPTER LXV.

Ver. 1-25. GOD'S REPLY IN JUSTIFICATION OF HIS DEALINGS WITH ISRAEL. In ch. 64, 9, their plea was, "we are all thy people." In answer, God declares that others (Gentiles) would be taken into covenant with Him, while His ancient people would be rejected. The Jews were slow to believe this; hence Paul says (Romans 10, 20) that Isaiah was "very bold" in advancing so unpopular a sentiment; he implies what Paul states (Romans 2, 23; 9, 6, 7; 11, 1-31), that "they are not all (in opposition to the Jews' plea, ch. 64, 9) Israel which are of Israel." God's reason for so severely dealing with Israel is not changeableness in Him, but sin in them (v. 2-7). Yet the whole nation shall not be destroyed, but only the wicked; a remnant shall be saved (v. 8-10, 11-16). There shall be, finally, universal blessedness to Israel, such as they had prayed for (v. 17-25). 1. I am sought—Hebrew, "I have granted access unto me to them," &c. (so Ezekiel 14, 3, "Should I be inquired of;" Ephesians 2, 18). found—Romans 10, 20 renders this, "I was made manifest." As an instance of the sentiment in the clause, "I am sought," &c., see John 12, 21; of the sentiment in this clause, Acts 9, 5. Cf. as to the Gentile converts, Ephesians 2, 12, 13. Behold me—(Ch. 45, 22.) nation . . . not called by my name—i. e., the Gentiles. God retorts in their own words (ch. 63, 19), their plea as being exclusively "called by His name" will not avail, for God's gospel invitation is not so exclusive (Romans 9, 25; 1, 16). 2. spread out . . . hands—inviting them earnestly (Proverbs 1, 24). all . . . day—continually, late and early (Jeremiah 7, 13). rebellious people—Israel, whose rebellion was the occasion of God's turning to the Gentiles (Romans 11, 11, 12, 15). way . . . not good—i. e., the very reverse of good, very bad (Ezekiel 36, 31). 3. continually—answering to "all the day" (v. 2). God was continually inviting them, and they continually offending Him (Deuteronomy 32, 21). to my face—They made no attempt to hide their sin (ch. 3, 9). Cf. "before me" (Exodus 20, 3). in gardens—(Note, ch. 1, 29; 66, 17; Leviticus 17, 5.) altars of brick—Hebrew, bricks. God had commanded His altars to be of unhewn stone (Exodus 20, 25). This was in order to separate them, even in external respects, from idolaters; also, as all chiselling was forbidden, they could not inscribe superstitious symbols on them as the heathen did. Bricks were more easily so inscribed than stone; hence their use for the cuneiform inscriptions at Babylon, and also for idolatrous altars. Some, not so well, have supposed that the "bricks" here mean the flat brick-paved roofs of houses on which they sacrificed to the sun, &c. (2 Kings 23, 12; Jeremiah 19, 13). 4. remain among . . . graves—viz., for purposes of necromancy, as if to hold converse with the dead (ch. 8, 19, 20; cf. Mark 5, 3); or, for the sake of purifications, usually performed at night among sepulchres, to appease the manes. [MAURER.] monuments—Hebrew, "pass the night in hidden recesses," either the idol's inmost shrines ("consecrated precincts") [HORSLEY], where they used to sleep, in order to have Divine communications in dreams [JEROME]; or better, on account of the parallel "graves," sepulchral caves. [MAURER.] eat swine's flesh—To eat it at all was contrary to God's law (Leviticus 11, 7), but it much increased their guilt that they ate it in idolatrous sacrifices (cf. ch. 66, 17). VARRO (Re Rust., 2, 4) says, that swine were first used in sacrifices; the Latins sacrificed a pig to Ceres; it was also offered on occasion of treaties and marriages. broth—so called from the "pieces" (Margin) or fragments of bread over which the broth was poured [GESENIUS]; such broth, made of swine's flesh, offered in sacrifice, was thought to be especially acceptable to the idol, and was used in magic rites. Or, "fragments (pieces) of abominable foods," &c. This fourth clause explains more fully the third, as the second does the first. [MAURER.] is in—rather, lit., "is their vessels," i. e., constitute their vessels' contents. The Jews, in our Lord's days, and ever since the return from Babylon, have been free from idolatry; still the imagery from idolatrous abominations, as being the sin most loathsome in God's eyes, and that most prevalent in Isaiah's time, is employed to describe the foul sin of

Israel in all ages, culminating in their killing Messiah, and still rejecting Him. 5. (Matthew 9, 11; Luke 5, 30; 13, 11; Jude 19.) Applicable to the hypocritical self-justifiers of our Lord's time. smoke—alluding to the smoke of their self-righteous sacrifices; the fire of God's wrath was kindled at the sight, and exhibited itself in the smoke that breathed forth from His nostrils; in Hebrew the nose is the seat of anger; and the nostrils distended in wrath, as it were, breathe forth smoke. [ROSENMULLER.] (Psalm 18, 8.) 6. written before me—it is decreed by me, viz., what follows (Job 13, 26) [MAURER]; or, their guilt is recorded before me (cf. Daniel 7, 10; Revelation 20, 12; Malachi 3, 16). into . . . bosom—(Psalm 79, 12; Jeremiah 32, 18; Luke 6, 33.) The Orientals used the loose fold of the garment falling on "the bosom" or lap, as a receptacle for carrying things. The sense thus is, I will repay their sin so abundantly, that the hand will not be able to receive it; it will need the spacious fold on the bosom to contain it. [ROSENMULLER.] Rather it is, "I will repay it to the very person from whom it has emanated." Cf. "God did render the evil of the men of Shechem upon their heads" (Judges 9, 57; Psalm 7, 16). [GESENIUS.] 7. Their sin had been accumulating from age to age, until God at last repaid it in full. mountains—(Ch. 57, 7; Ezekiel 18, 6; 20, 27, 28; Hosea 4, 13. their—"your" had preceded. From speaking to, He speaks of them; this implies growing alienation from them and greater distance. work—the full recompense of their work (so ch. 49, 4). 8. new wine—As if some grapes having good wine-producing juice in them, be found in a cluster which the vine-dresser was about to throw away as bad, and one saith, &c. Blessing—i. e., good wine-producing juice (cf. Judges 9, 13; Joel 2, 14). so—God will spare the godly "remnant," whilst the ungodly mass of the nation shall be destroyed (ch. 1, 9; 6, 13; 10, 21; 11, 11, 12-16). my servants—The godly remnant. But HORSLEY, "for the sake of my servant, Messiah." 9. seed—"the holy seed" (ch. 6, 13), a posterity from Jacob, designed to repossess the Holy Land, forfeited by the sin of the former Jews. my mountains—Jerusalem and the rest of Judea, peculiarly God's (cf. ch. 2, 2; 11, 9; 14, 32). 10. Sharon—(Notes, ch. 33, 9; 35, 2.) Achor—meaning trouble; a valley near Jericho, so called from the trouble caused to Israel by Achan's sin (Joshua 7, 24). "The valley of Achor," proverbial for whatever caused calamity, shall become proverbial for joy and prosperity (Hosea 2, 15). 11. holy mountain—Moriah, on which the temple was, troop—rather Gad, the Babylonian god of fortune, the planet Jupiter, answering to Baal or Bel; the Arabs called it "the Greater Good Fortune;" and the planet Venus answering to Ment, "the Lesser Good Fortune." [GESENIUS, KIMCHI, &c.] Tables were laid out for their idols with all kinds of viands, and a cup containing a mixture of wine and honey, in Egypt especially, on the last day of the year. [JEROME.] drink offering—rather, mixed drink. number—rather, Ment; as goddess of fortune she was thought to number the fates of men. VITRINGA understands Gad to be the sun; Ment the moon, or Ashtaroth or Astarte (1 Kings 11, 33). 12. number—doom you. Alluding to the "number," as Ment (v. 11) means. Retribution in kind, the punishment answering to the sin (cf. 2 Chronicles 36, 14-17). I called, ye . . . not answer—"I called," though "none had called" upon me (ch. 64, 7); yet even then none "answered" (Proverbs 1, 21). Contrast with this God and His people's mutual fellowship in prayer (v. 24). 13. eat—enjoy all blessings from me (Song of Solomon 5, 1). hungry—(Amos 4, 6; 8, 11.) This may refer to the siege of Jerusalem under Titus, when 1,100,000 are said to have perished by famine; thus v. 15 will refer to God's people without distinction of Jew and Gentile receiving "another name," viz., that of Christians. [HOUBIGANT.] A farther fulfilment may still remain, just before the creation of the "new heavens and earth," as the context, v. 17, implies. 14. howl—(Ch. 15, 2; Matthew 8, 12.) 15. curse—The name of "Jew" has been for long a formula of execration (cf. Jeremiah 29, 22); if one wishes to curse another, he can utter nothing worse than this, "God make thee what the Jew is!" Contrast the formula (Genesis 48, 20). [MAURER.] my chosen—The elect Church, gathered from Jews and Gentiles, called by "another name," Christians (Acts 11. 26). However (Note, v. 13), as "my chosen," or "elect," in v. 9, refers to the "seed of Jacob," the believing Jews, hereafter about to possess their land (v. 19, 23), are ultimately meant by "my chosen," as contrasted with the unbelieving Jews ("ye"). These elect Jews shall be called by "another," or a new name, i. e., shall no longer be "forsaken" of God for unbelief, but shall be His "delight" and "married" to Him (ch. 62. 2, 4). these—unbelieving Israel. Isaiah here speaks of God, whereas in the preceding sentences God Himself spake. This change of persons marks without design how completely the prophet realized God with him and in him, so that he passes, without formally announcing it, from God's words to his own, and vice versa, both alike being from God. 16. That he—rather, "He who," &c. blesseth, &c.—(Psalm 72. 17; Jeremiah 4. 2). God of truth—Very God, as opposed to false gods; Hebrew, Amen: the very name of Messiah (2 Corinthians 1. 20; Revelation 3. 14), faithful to His promises (John 1. 17; 6. 32). Real, substantial, spiritual, eternal, as opposed to the shadowy types of the law. swareth, &c.—God alone shall be appealed to as God (ch. 19. 18; Deuteronomy 6. 13; Psalm 63. 11). troubles—i. e., sins, provocations. [LOWTH.] Rather, calamities caused by your sins; so far from these visiting you again, the very remembrance of them is "hid from mine eyes" by the magnitude of the blessings I will confer on you (v. 17, &c.). [MAURER.] 17. As Caleb inherited the same land which his feet trod on (Deuteronomy 1. 36; Joshua 14. 9), so Messiah and His saints shall inherit the renovated earth which once they trod whilst defiled by the enemy (ch. 34. 4; 51. 16; 66. 22; Ezekiel 21. 27; Psalm 2. 8; 87. 11; 2 Peter 3. 13; Hebrews 12. 26-28; Revelation 21. 1). not be remembered—Note on "troubles," v. 16; the words here answer to "the former . . . forgotten," &c. The former sorrows of the earth, under the fall, shall be so far from recurring, that their very remembrance shall be obliterated by the many mercies I will bestow on the new earth (Revelation 21. 4-27). 18. rejoice for ever . . . Jerusalem—(Ch. 51. 11.) "Everlasting joy . . . Zion." Spiritually (1 Thessalonians 5. 16.) 19. (Ch. 62. 5.) weeping . . . no more—(ch. 25. 7, 8; 35. 10; Revelation 7. 17; 21. 4), primarily, foretold of Jerusalem; secondarily, of all the redeemed. 20. The longevity of men in the first age of the world shall be enjoyed again. thence—from that time forward. infant of days—i. e., an infant who shall only complete a few days; short-lived. filled . . . days—none shall die without attaining a full old age. child . . . die . . . hundred years—i. e., "he that dieth an hundred years old shall die a mere child." [LOWTH.] sinner . . . hundred . . . be accursed—"The sinner that dieth at an hundred years shall be deemed accursed," i. e., his death at so early an age, which in those days the hundredth year would be regarded, just as if it were mere childhood, shall be deemed the effect of God's special visitation in wrath. [ROSENMULLER.] This passage proves that the better age to come on earth, though much superior to the present, will not be a perfect state; sin and death shall have place in it (cf. Revelation 20. 7, 8), but much less frequently than now. 21. (Note, ch. 62. 8; Amos 9. 14). 22. They shall not experience the curse pronounced (Leviticus 26. 16; Deuteronomy 28. 39). tree—amongst the most long-lived of objects in nature. They shall live as long as the trees they "plant" (cf. ch. 61. 3, end of verse; Psalm 92. 12). enjoy—Hebrew, consume, wear out: they shall live to enjoy the last of it (ch. 62. 9). 23. bring forth for trouble—lit., for terror, i. e., "They shall not bring forth children for a sudden death" (Leviticus 26. 16; Jeremiah 15. 8). seed . . . blessed—(Ch. 61. 9.) offspring with them—(Hosea 9. 12.) "Their offspring shall be with themselves" [MAURER]; not "brought forth" only to be cut off by "sudden death" (see the parallel clause). 24. Contrast ch. 61. 7, "none . . . calleth," &c.; and Note, v. 12, "I called, ye did not answer." MAURER translates, "They shall hardly (lit., not yet) call, when (lit., and) I will answer; they shall be still speaking, when I will hear" (Psalm 32. 5; Daniel 9. 20, 21). 25. (Notes, ch. 11. 6-9). and dust—rather, "but dust," &c. The curse shall remain on the serpent [HORSLEY], (Genesis 3. 14; Micah 7. 17). To lick the dust is figurative of the utter and perpetual degradation of Satan and his emissaries (ch. 49. 23; Psalm 72. 9). Satan fell self-tempted; therefore no atonement was contrived for him, as there was for man, who fell by his temptation (Jude 6; John 8. 44). From his peculiar connection with the earth and man, it has been conjectured that the exciting cause of his rebellion was, God's declaration that human nature was to be raised into union with the Godhead; this was "the truth" concerning the person of the Son of God which "he abode not in;" it galled his pride that a lower race was to be raised to that which he had aspired to (1 Timothy 3. 6). How exultingly he might say, when man fell through him, "God would raise manhood into union with Himself, I have brought it down below the beasts by sin!" At that very moment and spot he was told, that the seed of the abhorred race, man, should bruiſe his head (1 John 3. 8). He was raised up for this, to show forth God's glory (Exodus 9. 16; Romans 9. 17). In his unfallen state he may have been God's vicegerent over the earth and the animal kingdom before man: this will account for his assuming the form of a serpent (Genesis 3). Man succeeded to that office (Genesis 2. 19, 20), but forfeited it by sin, whence Satan became "prince of this world;" Jesus Christ supplants the usurper, and as "Son of man" regains the lost inheritance (Psalm 8. 4-8). The steps in Satan's overthrow are these: he is cast out, first, from heaven (Revelation 12. 7-9) on earth; next, he is bound a thousand years (Revelation 20. 2, 3); finally, he is cast into the lake of fire for ever (Revelation 20. 10).

CHAPTER LXVI.

Ver. 1-24. THE HUMBLE COMFORTED, THE UNGODLY CONDEMNED, AT THE LORD'S APPEARING: JERUSALEM MADE A JOY ON EARTH. This closing chapter is the summary of Isaiah's prophecies as to the last days, hence the similarity of its sentiments with what went before. 1. heaven . . . throne . . . where is . . . house ye build—The same sentiment is expressed, as a precautionary proviso for the majesty of God in deigning to own any earthly temple as His, as if He could be circumscribed by space (1 Kings 8. 27) in inaugurating the temple of stone; next, as to the temple of the Holy Ghost (Acts 7. 48, 49); lastly here, as to "the tabernacle of God with men" (ch. 2. 2, 3; Ezekiel 43. 4, 7; Revelation 21. 3). where—rather, "what is this house that ye are building, &c.—what place is this for my rest?" [VITRINGA.] 2. have been—viz., made by me. Or, absolutely, were things made; and therefore belong to me, the Creator. [JEROME.] look—have regard. poor—humble (ch. 57. 15). trembleth at . . . word—(2 Kings 22. 11, 19; Ezra 9. 4.) The spiritual temple of the heart, though not superseding the outward place of worship, is God's favourite dwelling (John 14. 23). In the final state in heaven there shall be "no temple," but "the Lord God" Himself (Revelation 21. 22). 3. God loathes even the sacrifices of the wicked (ch. 1. 11; Proverbs 15. 8; 28. 9). is as if—Lowth not so well omits these words: "He that killeth an ox (presently after) murders a man (as in Ezekiel 23. 39). But the omission in the Hebrew of is as if—increases the force of the comparison. Human victims were often offered by the heathen. dog's neck—an abomination according to the Jewish law (Deuteronomy 23. 18); perhaps made so, because dogs were venerated in Egypt. He does not honour this abomination by using the word sacrifice, but uses the degrading term, "cut off a dog's neck" (Exodus 13. 13; 34. 20). Dogs as unclean are associated with swine (Matthew 7. 6; 2 Peter 2. 22). oblation—unbloody: in antithesis to "swine's blood" (ch. 65. 4). burneth—Hebrew, "he who offereth as a memorial oblation" (Leviticus 2. 2). they have chosen—opposed to the two first clauses of v. 4: "as they have chosen their own ways, &c., so I will choose their delusions." 4. delusions—(2 Thessalonians 2. 11), answering to "their own ways" (v. 3; so Proverbs 1. 31). However, the Hebrew means rather vexations, calamities, which also the parallelism to "fears" requires; "choose their calamities" means, choose the calamities which they thought to escape by "their own

ways, their fears—the things they feared, to avert which their idolatrous “abominations” (v. 3) were practised. I called . . . none . . . answer—(Notes, ch. 65. 12, 24; Jeremiah 7. 13.) did . . . chose—not only did the evil deed, but did it deliberately as a matter of choice (Romans 1. 32). “They chose that in which I delighted not;” therefore, “I will choose” that in which they delight not, the “calamities” and “fears” which they were most anxious to avert. before mine eyes—(Note, ch. 65. 3.) 5. tremble at . . . word—the same persons as in v. 2, the believing few among the Jews. cast you out for my name’s sake—communicate, as if too polluted to worship with them (ch. 65. 5). So in Christ’s first sojourn on earth (Matthew 10. 22; John 9. 22, 34; 16. 2; 15. 21). So it shall be again in the last times, when the believing shall be few (Luke 18. 8). Let the Lord be glorified—The mocking challenge of the persecutors, as if their violence towards you was from zeal for God. “Let the Lord show Himself glorious,” viz., by manifesting Himself in your behalf; as the parallelism to, “He shall appear to your joy,” requires (as in ch. 5. 19; cf. ch. 28. 15; 57. 4). So again Christ on the cross (Matthew 27. 42, 43). appear to your joy—giving you “joy” instead of your “rebuke” (ch. 25. 8, 9). 6. God, from Jerusalem and His “temple,” shall take vengeance on the enemy (Ezekiel 43. 1-8; Zechariah 12. 2, 3; 14. 3, 19-21). The abrupt language of this verse marks the suddenness with which God destroys the hostile Gentile host outside: as v. 5 refers to the confounding of the unbelieving Jews. voice of noise—i. e., the Lord’s loud-sounding voice (Psalm 68. 33; 29. 3-9; 1 Thessalonians 4. 16). 7. she—Zion. Before . . . travelled . . . brought forth—The accession of numbers, and of prosperity to her, shall be sudden beyond all expectation and unattended with painful effort (ch. 54. 1, 4, 5). Contrast with this case of the future Jewish Church the travel-pains of the Christian Church in bringing forth “a man-child” (Revelation 12. 2, 5). A man-child’s birth is in the East a matter of special joy, whilst that of a female is not so; therefore, it here means the manly sons of the restored Jewish Church, the singular being used collectively for the plural: or the many sons being regarded as one under Messiah, who shall then be manifested as their one representative Head. 8. earth—rather, to suit the parallelism, “is a country (put for the people in it) brought forth in one day?” [LOWTH.] In English Version it means, The earth brings forth its productions gradually, not in one day (Mark 4. 28). at once—in this case, contrary to the usual growth of the nations by degrees, Israel starts into maturity at once. for—rather, “is a nation born at once, that Zion has, so soon as she travelled, brought forth?” [MAURER.] 9. cause to bring forth, and shut—rather, “Shall I who beget, restrain the birth?” [LOWTH.] (ch. 37. 3; Hosea 13. 13), i. e., Shall I who have begun, not finish my work of restoring Israel? (1 Samuel 3. 12; Romans 1. 1; Philipplians 1. 6). shut—(cf. Revelation 3. 7, 8). 10. love . . . mourn for her—(Psalm 102. 14, 17, 20; 122. 6.) 11. suck—(ch. 60. 5, 16; 61. 6; 49. 23.) abundance—Hebrew, “the ray-like flow of her opulence,” i. e., with the milk spouting out from her full breasts (answering to the parallel, “breast of her consolations”) in ray-like streams. [GESENIUS.] 12. extend—I will turn peace (prosperity) upon her, like a river turned in its course. [GESENIUS.] Or, “I will spread peace over her as an overflowing river” [BARNES.] (ch. 48. 18). flowing stream—as the Nile by its overflow fertilizes the whole of Egypt. borne upon . . . sides—(Note, ch. 60. 4.) her . . . her—If “ye” refers to the Jews, translate, “ye shall be borne upon their sides . . . their knees,” viz., those of the Gentiles, as in ch. 49. 22; and as “suck” (ch. 60. 16) refers to the Jews sucking the Gentile wealth. However, English Version gives a good sense: The Jews, and all who love Jehovah (v. 10), “shall suck, and be borne” by her as a mother. 13. mother—(Ch. 49. 15.) comforteth—(Ch. 40. 1, 2.) 14. bones—which once were “dried up” by the “fire” of God’s wrath (Lamentations 1. 13), shall live again (Proverbs 3. 8; 15. 30; Ezekiel 37. 1, &c.) flourish . . . herb—Romans 11. 15-24.) known toward—manifested in behalf of. 15. (Ch. 9. 5; Psalm 50. 3; Habakkuk 3. 5; 2 Thessalonians 1. 8; 2 Peter 3. 7.) chariots . . . whirlwind—(Jeremiah 4. 13.) render—as the Hebrew elsewhere (Job

9. 13; Psalm 78. 38) means to alloy or stay wrath. MAURER translates it so here: He stays His anger with nothing but fury, &c.; nothing short of pouring out all His fiery fury will satisfy His wrath. fury—“burning heat” [LOWTH], to which the parallel, “flames of fire,” answers. 16. Rather, “With fire will Jehovah judge, and with His sword (He will judge) all flesh.” The parallelism and collocation of the Hebrew words favour this (ch. 65. 12). all flesh—i. e., all who are the objects of His wrath. The godly shall be hidden by the Lord in a place of safety away from the scene of judgment (ch. 23. 20, 21; Psalm 31. 20; 1 Thessalonians 4. 16, 17). 17. In . . . gardens—Hebrew and LXX. rather require, “for (entering into) gardens,” viz., to sacrifice there. [MAURER.] behind one tree—rather, “following; one,” i. e., some idol or other, which, from contempt, he does not name. [MAURER.] VITRINGA, &c., think the Hebrew for “one,” Ahhadi, to be the name of the god; called Adad (meaning One) in Syria (cf. Acts 17. 23). The idol’s power was represented by inclined rays, as of the sun shining on the earth. GESENIUS translates, “following one,” viz., Hierophant (priest), who led the rest in performing the sacred rites. in . . . midst—viz., of the garden (cf. Notes, ch. 65. 3, 4). mouse—legally unclean (Leviticus 11. 29), because it was an idol to the heathen (see Note, ch. 37. 36; 1 Samuel 6. 4). Translate, “the field mouse,” or “dormouse.” [BOCHART.] The Pharisees with their self-righteous purifications, and all mere formalists, are included in the same condemnation, described in language taken from the idolatries prevalent in Isaiah’s times. 18. know—not in the Hebrew. Rather, understand the words by aposiopesis; it is usual in threats to leave the persons threatened to supply the hiatus for their own fears, owing to conscious guilt: “For I . . . their works and thoughts . . .” viz., will punish. [MAURER.] it shall come—the time is come that I will, &c. [MAURER.] gather . . . nations—against Jerusalem: where the ungodly Jews shall perish; and then the Lord at last shall fight for Jerusalem against those nations: and the survivors (v. 19) shall “see God’s glory” (Zechariah 12. 8, 9; 14. 1-3, 9). tongues—which have been many owing to sin, being confounded at Babel, but which shall again be one in Christ (Daniel 7. 14; Zephaniah 3. 9; Revelation 7. 9, 10). 19. sign—a banner on a high place, to indicate the place of meeting for the dispersed Jewish exiles, preparatory to their return to their land (ch. 5. 26; 11. 12; 62. 10). those that escape of them—the Gentile survivors spared by God (Note, v. 13; Zechariah 14. 16). Ch. 2. 2, 3; Micah 5. 7; and Zechariah 14. 16-19, represent it, not that the Jews go as missionaries to the Gentiles, but that the Gentiles come up to Jerusalem to learn the Lord’s ways there. Tarshish—Tartessus in Spain, in the west. Pul—east and north of Africa: probably the same as Phile, an island in the Nile, called by the Egyptians Pilak, i. e., the border country, being between Egypt and Ethiopia. [BOCHART.] Lud—the Libyans of Africa (Genesis 10. 13), Ludim being son of Mizraim (Egypt): an Ethiopian people famous as bowmen (Jeremiah 46. 9): employed as mercenaries by Tyre and Egypt (Ezekiel 27. 10; 30. 5). Tubal—Tibarenians, in Asia Minor, south of the Caucasus, between the Black Sea and Araxes. Or, the Iberians. [JOSEPHUS.] Italy. [JEROME.] Javan—the Greeks; called Ionians, including all the descendants of Javan, both in Greece and in Asia Minor (Genesis 10. 2-4). my glory . . . Gentiles—(Malachi 1. 11.) 20. they—the Gentiles (v. 19). bring . . . your brethren—the Jews, back to the Holy Land (ch. 49. 22). It cannot mean the mere entrance of the Jews into the Christian Church; for such an entrance would be by faith, not upon “horses, litters, and mules.” [HOUBIGANT.] “Offering” is metaphorical, as in Romans 15. 16. horses—not much used by the Jews. The Gentiles are here represented as using their modes of conveyance to “bring” the Jews to Jerusalem. chariots—as these are not found in Oriental caravans, translate, “vehicles,” viz., borne, not drawn on wheels. litters—covered sedans for the rich. upon swift beasts—dromedaries: from Hebrew root, “to dance,” from their bounding motion, often accelerated by music. [BOCHART.] Panniers were thrown across the dromedaries’ back for poorer women. [HOR-

BLEX.] 21. of them—the Gentiles. priests . . . Levites—for spiritual worship; enjoying the direct access to God which was formerly enjoyed by the ministers of the temple alone (1 Peter 2. 9; Revelation 1. 6). 22. (Ch. 65. 17; 2; Peter 3. 13; Revelation 21. 1.) 23. Lit., "As often as the new moon (shall be) in its own new moon," i. e., every month (Zechariah 14. 16). sabbath—which is therefore perpetually obligatory on earth. all flesh—(Psalm 65. 2; 72. 11.) before me—at Jerusalem (Jeremiah 3. 16, 17). 24. go forth, and look—as the Israelites looked at the carcasses of the Egyptians destroyed at the Red Sea (Exodus 14. 30; cf. ch. 26. 14-19; Psalm 58. 10; 49. 14; Malachi 4. 1-3). carcasses, &c.—(v. 16), those slain by the Lord in the last great battle near Jerusalem (Zechariah 12. 2-9; 14. 2-4); type of the final destruction of all sinners. worm . . . not die—(Mark 9. 44, 46, 48.) Image of hell, from bodies left unburied in the valley of Hinnom (whence comes Gehenna, or hell), south of Jerusalem, where a perpetual fire was kept to consume the refuse thrown there (ch. 30. 33). It shall not be inconsistent with true love for the godly to look with satisfaction on God's vengeance on the wicked (Revelation 14. 10).

May God bless this Commentary, and especially its solemn close, to His glory, and to the edification of the writer and the readers of it, for Jesus' sake!

JEREMIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

JEREMIAH, son of Hilkiah, one of the ordinary priests, dwelling in Anathoth of Benjamin (ch. 1. 1), not the Hilkiah the high priest who discovered the book of the law (2 K'ugs 22. 8); had he been the same, the designation would have been "the priest," or "the high priest." Besides his residence at Anathoth shows that he belonged to the line of Abiathar, who was deposed from the high priesthood by Solomon (1 Kings 2. 26-35), after which the office remained in Zadok's line. Mention occurs of Jeremiah in 2 Chronicles 35. 25; 36. 12. 21. In B. C. 629, the thirteenth year of King Josiah, whilst still very young (ch. 1. 5), he received his prophetic call in Anathoth (ch. 1. 2); and along with Hilkiah the high priest, the prophetess Huldah, and the prophet Zephaniah, he helped forward Josiah's reformation of religion (2 Kings 23. 1-25). Among the first charges to him was one that he should go and proclaim God's message in Jerusalem (ch. 2. 2). He also took an official tour to announce to the cities of Judah the contents of the book of the law, found in the temple (ch. 11. 6) five years after his call to prophesy. On his return to Anathoth, his countrymen, offended at his reproofs, conspired against his life. To escape their persecutions (ch. 11. 21), as well as those of his own family (ch. 12. 6), he left Anathoth and resided at Jerusalem. During the eighteen years of his ministry in Josiah's reign he was unmolested; also during the three months of Jehoahaz or Shallum's reign (ch. 22. 10-12). On Jehoiakim's accession it became evident that Josiah's reformation effected nothing more than a forcible repression of idolatry and the establishment of the worship of God outwardly. The priests, prophets, and people then brought Jeremiah before the authorities, urging that he should be put to death for his denunciations of evil against the city (ch. 26. 8-11). The princes, however, especially Ahikam, interposed in his behalf (ch. 26. 16, 24), but he was put under restraint, or at least deemed it prudent not to appear in public. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim (606 B. C.), he was commanded to write the predictions given orally through him, and to read them to the people. Being "shut up," he could not himself go into the house of the Lord (ch. 33. 5); he therefore deputed Baruch, his amanuensis, to read them in public on the fast-day. The princes thereupon advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide themselves from the king's displeasure. Meanwhile they read the roll to the king, who was so enraged that he cut it with a knife and threw it into the fire; at the same time giving orders for the apprehension of the prophet and Baruch. They escaped Jehoiakim's violence, which had already killed the prophet Urijah (ch. 26. 20-23). Baruch rewrote the words, with additional prophecies, on another roll (ch. 36. 27-32). In the three months' reign of Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, he prophesied the carrying away of the king and the queen-mother (ch. 13. 18; 22. 24-30; cf. 2 Kings 24. 12). In this reign he was imprisoned for a short time by Pashur (ch. 20.), the chief governor of the Lord's house; but at Zedekiah's accession he was free (ch. 37. 4), for the king sent to him to "inquire of the Lord" when Nebuchadnezzar came up against Jerusalem (ch. 21. 1-3, &c.; 37. 3). The Chaldeans drew off on hearing of the approach of Pharaoh's army (ch. 37. 5); but Jeremiah warned the king that the Egyptians would forsake him, and the Chaldeans return and burn up the city (ch. 37. 7, 8). The princes, irritated at this, made the departure of Jeremiah from the city during the respite a pretext for imprisoning him, on the allegation of his deserting to the Chaldeans (ch. 38. 1-5). He would have been left to perish in the dungeon of Malchiah, but for the intercession of Ebed-melech, the Ethiopian (ch. 38. 6-13). Zedekiah, though he consulted Jeremiah in secret, yet was induced by his princes to leave Jeremiah in prison (ch. 38. 14-28) until Jerusalem was taken. Nebuchadnezzar directed his captain, Nebuzaradan, to give him his freedom, so that he might either go to Babylon or stay with the remnant of his people as he chose. As a true patriot, notwithstanding the forty and a half years during which his country had repaid his services with neglect and persecution, he stayed with Gedaliah, the ruler appointed by Nebuchadnezzar over Judea (ch. 40. 6). After the murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael, Johanan, the recognized ruler of the people, in fear of the Chaldeans avenging the murder of Gedaliah, fled with the people to Egypt, and forced Jeremiah and Baruch to accompany him, in spite of the prophet's warning that the people should perish if they went to Egypt, but he preserved by remaining in their land (ch. 41., 42., and 43.). At Tahpanhes, a boundary city on the Tanitic or Pelustian branch of the Nile, he prophesied the overthrow of Egypt (ch. 43. 8-13). Tradition says he died in Egypt. According to the Pseudo-Epiphanius, he was stoned at Taphnæ or Tahpanhes. The Jews so venerated him that they believed he would rise from the dead and be the forerunner of Messiah (Matthew 16. 14).

HAVERNICK observes, that the combination of features in Jeremiah's character proves his Divine mission; mild, timid, and susceptible of melancholy, yet intrepid in the discharge of his prophetic functions, not sparing the prince any more than the meanest of his subjects—the Spirit of prophecy controlling his natural temper and qualifying him for his hazardous undertaking, without doing violence to his individuality. Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Daniel, and Ezekiel were his contemporaries. The last forms a good contrast to Jeremiah, the Spirit in his case acting on a temperament as strongly marked by firmness as Jeremiah's was by shrinking and delicate sensitiveness. Ezekiel views the nation's sins as opposed to righteousness—Jeremiah, as productive of misery; the former takes the objective, the latter the subjective, view of the evils of the times. Jeremiah's style corresponds to his character: he is peculiarly marked by pathos, and sympathy with the wretched; his Lamentations illustrate this; the whole series of elegies has but one object—to express sorrow for his fallen country; yet the lights and images in which he presents this are so many, that the reader, so far from feeling it monotonous, is charmed with the variety of the plaintive strains throughout. The language is marked by Arameisms, which probably was the ground of Jerome's charge, that the style is "rustic." LOTH denies the charge, and considers him in portions not inferior to Isaiah. His heaping of phrase on phrase, the repetition of stereotyped forms—and these often three times—are due to his affected feelings and to his desire to intensify the expression of them; he is at times more concise, energetic, and sublime, especially against foreign nations, and in the rhythmical parts.

The principle of the arrangement of his prophecies is hard to ascertain. The order of kings was—Josiah (under whom he prophesied eighteen years), Jehoahaz (three months), Jehoiakim (eleven years), Jeconiah (three months), Zedekiah (eleven years). But his prophecies under Josiah (chs. 1-20.) are immediately followed by a portion under Zedekiah (ch. 21). Again, ch. 24. 8-10, as to Zedekiah, comes in the midst of the section as to Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jeconiah (chs. 22, 23, 25, v. 1, &c.). So chs. 35, 36., as to Jehoiakim, follow chs. 27., 28., 29., 33., 34., as to Zedekiah; and ch. 45., dated the fourth year of Jehoiakim, comes after predictions as to the Jews who fled to Egypt after the overthrow of Jerusalem. EWALD thinks the present arrangement substantially Jeremiah's own; the various portions are prefaced by the same formula, "The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord" (ch. 7. 1; 11. 1; 13. 1; 21. 1; 25. 1; 30. 1; 32. 1; 34. 1, 8; 35. 1; 40. 1; 44. 1; cf. ch. 14. 1; 46. 1; 47. 1; 49. 34). Notes of time mark other divisions more or less historical (ch. 26. 1; 27. 1; 36. 1; 37. 1). Two other portions are distinct of themselves (ch. 29. 1; 45. 1). Ch. 2. has the shorter introduction which marks the beginning of a strophe; ch. 3. seems imperfect, having as the introduction merely "saying" (Hebrew, ch. 3. 1). Thus in the poetical parts, there are twenty-three sections divided into strophes, of from seven to nine verses, marked some way thus, "The Lord said also unto me." They form five books: I. The Introduction, ch. 1. II. Reproofs of the Jews, chs. 2-24., made up of seven sections: (1) ch. 2.; (2) 3.-6.; (3) 7.-10.; (4) 11.-13.; (5) 14.-17.; (6) 17.-19., 20.; (7) 21.-24. III. Review of all nations in two sections: 25. and 26.-49., with a historical appendix of three sections, (1) 26.; (2) 27.; (3) 28., 29. IV. Two sections picturing the hopes of brighter times, (1) 30., 31.; (2) 32., 33.; and an historical appendix in three sections: (1) ch. 34. 1-7; (2) 34. 8-22; (3) 35. V. The conclusion, in two sections: (1) ch. 36. 2; (2) 45. Subsequently, in Egypt, he added ch. 46. 13-26 to the previous prophecy as to Egypt; also the three sections, chs. 37.-39.; 40.-43.; and 44. Ch. 52. was probably (see ch. 51. 64) an appendix from a later hand, taken from 2 Kings 24. 18, &c.; 25. 30. The prophecies against the several foreign nations stand in a different order in the Hebrew from that of LXX.; also the prophecies against them in the Hebrew (chs. 46.-51.) are in the LXX. placed after ch. 25. 14, forming chs. 26.-31.; the remainder of ch. 25. of the Hebrew is ch. 32. of LXX. Some passages in the Hebrew (ch. 27. 19-22; 33. 14-26; 39. 4-14; 43. 45-47) are not found in LXX.; the Greek translators must have had a different recension before them; probably an earlier one. The Hebrew is probably the latest and fullest edition from Jeremiah's own hand. See Note, ch. 25. 13.

The canonicity of his prophecies is established by quotations of them in the New Testament (see Matthew 2. 17; 16. 14; Hebrews 8. 8-12; on Matthew 27. 9, see Introduction to Zechariah); also by the testimony of Ecclesiastics 49. 7, which quotes Jeremiah 1. 10; of Philo, who quotes his word as an "oracle;" and of the list of canonical books in Melito, Origen, Jerome, and the Talmud.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-19. THE GENERAL TITLE OR INTRODUCTION (v. 1-3); probably prefixed by Jeremiah, when he collected his prophecies, and gave them to his countrymen to take with them to Babylon. [MICHAELIS.] 1. Anathoth—a town in Benjamin, twenty stadia, i. e., two or three miles, north of Jerusalem; now Anata (cf. Isaiah 10. 30, and the context, 23-32). One of the four cities allotted to the Kohathites in Benjamin (Joshua 21. 18). Cf. 1 Kings 2. 26, 27; a stigma was cast thenceforth on the whole sacerdotal family resident there; this may be alluded to in the words here, "the priests . . . in Anathoth." God chooses "the weak, base, and despised things" "to confound the mighty." 2, 3. Jehoiakim . . . Josiah . . . Zedekiah—Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin are omitted, for they reigned only three months each. The first and last of the kings under whom each prophet prophesied are often thus specified in the general title. See on these kings, and Jeremiah's life, my Introduction, thirteenth . . . of his reign—(Ch. 25. 3.) fifth month—(2 Kings 25. 8.) 4-10. Jeremiah's call to the prophetic office. unto me—other MSS. read "to him;" but English Version probably represents the true Hebrew text; this inscription was doubtless made by Jeremiah himself. 5. knew—approved of thee as my chosen instrument (Exodus 33. 12, 17; cf. Isaiah 49. 1, 5; Romans 8. 29). sanctified—rather, separated. The primary meaning is, to set apart from a common to a special use; hence arose the secondary sense, to sanctify, ceremonially and morally. It is not here meant that Jehovah cleansed Jeremiah from original sin or regenerated him by his Spirit; but separated him to his peculiar prophetic office, including in its range, not merely the Hebrews, but also the nations hostile to them (ch. 25. 12-33; 27. 46-51). [HENDERSON.] Not the effect, but the predestination in Jehovah's secret counsel, is meant by the sanctification here (cf. Luke 1. 15, 41; Acts 15. 13; Galatians 1. 15; Ephesians 1. 11). 6. From the long duration of his office (v. 2, 3; ch. 40. 1, &c.; 43. 8, &c.), it is supposed that he was at his call under twenty-five years of age. child—the same word is translated, "young man" (2 Samuel 18. 5). The reluctance often shown by inspired ministers of God (Exodus 4. 10; 6. 12, 30; Jonah 1. 3) to accept the call, shows that they did not assume the office under the impulse of self-deceiving fanaticism, as false prophets often did. 7. to all that—to all to whom. [ROSENMULLER.] Rather, "to all against whom;" in a hostile sense (cf. v. 8. 17, 18, 19). [MAURER.] Such was the perversity of the rulers and people of Judea at that time, that whoever would desire to be a faithful prophet needed to arm himself with an intrepid mind; Jeremiah was naturally timid and sensitive, yet the Spirit moulded him to the necessary degree of courage without taking away his peculiar individuality. 8. (Ezekiel 2. 6; 3. 9.) I am with thee—(Exodus 3. 12; Joshua 1. 5.) 9. touched my mouth—a symbolical act in supernatural vision, implying that God would give him utterance, notwithstanding his inability to speak (v. 6). So Isaiah's lips were touched with a living coal (Isaiah 6. 7; cf. Ezekiel 2. 8, 9, 10; Daniel 10. 16). 10. set thee over—lit., appointed thee to the oversight. He was to have his eye upon the nations, and to predict their destruction, or restoration, according as their conduct was bad or good. Prophets are said to do that which they foretell shall be done; for their word is God's word; and His word is His instrument whereby He doeth all things (Genesis 1. 3; Psalm 33. 6, 9). Word and deed are one thing with Him. What His prophet saith is as certain as if it were done. The prophet's own consciousness was absorbed into that of God; so closely united to God did he feel himself, that Jehovah's words and deeds are described as his. In ch.

51. 28, God is said to do what Jeremiah here is represented as doing (cf. ch. 18. 7; 1 Kings 19. 17; Ezekiel 43. 3). root out—(Matthew 15. 13.) pull down—change of metaphor to architecture (2 Corinthians 10. 4). There is a play on the similar sounds, Linthoth, Linthotz, in the Hebrew for "root out . . . pull down." build . . . plant—restore upon their repenting. His predictions were to be chiefly, and in the first instance, denunciatory; therefore the destruction of the nations is put first, and with a greater variety of terms than their restoration. 11. rod—shoot, or branch. almond tree—lit., the wakeful tree, because it awakes from the sleep of winter earlier than the other trees, flowering in January, and bearing fruit in March; symbol of God's early execution of His purpose; v. 12, "hasten my word" (cf. Amos 8. 2). 12. hasten—rather, "I will be wakeful as to my word," &c.; alluding to v. 11, the wakeful tree. [MAUREL.] 13. Another vision, signifying what is the "word" about to be "performed," and by what instrumentality. seething—lit., blown under; so boiling by reason of the flame under it kept brisk by blowing. An Oriental symbol of a raging war. toward—rather, "from the north." Lit., from the face of the region situated towards the north (cf. v. 14, 15). [MAUREL.] The pot in the north rested on one side, its mouth being about to pour forth its contents southwards, viz., on Judea. Babylon, though east of Judea, was regarded by the Hebrews as north, because they appropriated the term "east" to Arabia Deserta, stretching from Palestine to the Euphrates; or rather [BOCHIART], the reference here is, not to the site, but to the route of the Babylonians; not being able to cross the desert, they must enter the Holy Land by the northern frontier, through Riblah in Hamath (ch. 39. 5; 52. 9). 14. break forth—"shall disclose itself." Out of the north—(Ch. 4. 6; 6. 1, 22; 10. 22; 25. 9; Ezekiel 26. 7.) The Chaldeans did not cast off the yoke of Assyria till several years after, under Nabopolassar, B. C. 625; but long previously they had so increased as to threaten Assyria, which was now grown weak, and other neighbouring peoples. 15. families—the tribes or clans composing the various kingdoms of Babylon; the specification of these aggravates the picture of calamity (ch. 25. 9). throne at . . . gates—the usual place of administering justice. The conquering princes will set up their tribunal there (ch. 39. 3, 5; 52. 9). Or the reference is to the military pavilion (ch. 43. 10). [MAUREL.] 16. utter—pronounce. The judicial sentences, pronounced against the Jews by the invading princes, would be virtually the "judgments of God" (Isaiah 10. 5). works—idols. 17. gird . . . Johns—resolutely prepare for thy appointed task. Metaphor from the flowing robes worn in the East, which have to be girt up with a girdle, so as not to incommode one, when undertaking any active work (Job 38. 3; Luke 12. 35; 1 Peter 1. 13). dismayed . . . confound—the same Hebrew word; lit., to break. Be not dismayed at their faces (before them), lest I make thee dismayed before their faces (before them), i. e., "lest I should permit thee to be overcome by them" (cf. ch. 49. 37). 18. defended city, &c.—i. e., I will give thee strength which no power of thine enemies shall overcome (ch. 6. 27; 15. 20; Isaiah 50. 7; 51. 17; Luke 21. 15; Acts 6. 10). walls—plural, to express the abundant strength to be given him. DE ROSSI'S MSS. read singular, wall. people of the land—the general masses, as distinguished from the princes and priests.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-37. EXPOSTULATION WITH THE JEWS, REMINDING THEM OF THEIR FORMER DEVOTEDNESS, AND GOD'S CONSEQUENT FAVOUR, AND A DENUNCIATION OF GOD'S COMING JUDGMENTS FOR THEIR IDOLATRY. Probably in the thirtieth year of the reign of Josiah (ch. 1. 2; cf. ch. 3. 6, "also . . . in . . . days of Josiah"). The warning not to rely as they did on Egypt (v. 18), was in accordance with Josiah's policy, who took part with Assyria and Babylon against Egypt (2 Kings 23. 29). Jeremiah, doubtless, supported the reformation begun by Josiah, in the previous year (the twelfth of his reign), and fully carried out in the eighteenth. 2. cry—proclaim. Jerusalem—The headquarters and centre of their idolatry; therefore addressed first. thee—rather, "I remember in regard to thee" [HENDERSON]; for thee. [MAUREL.] kindness of thy youth—not so much Israel's kindness towards God, as the kindness which Israel experienced from God in their early history (cf. Ezekiel 16. 8, 22, 60; 23. 3, 8, 19; Hosea 2. 15). For Israel from the first showed perversity rather than kindness towards God (cf. Exodus 14. 11, 12; 15. 24; 32. 1-7, &c.). The greater were God's favours to them from the first, the fouler was their ingratitude in forsaking Him (v. 3, 5, &c.). espousals—the intervals between Israel's betrothal to God at the exodus from Egypt, and the formal execution of the marriage contract at Sinai. EWALD takes the "kindness" and "love" to be Israel's towards God at first (Exodus 19. 8; 24. 3; 35. 20-29; 36. 5; Joshua 24. 16, 17). But cf. Deuteronomy 32. 16, 17; and Ezekiel 16. 5, 6, 15, 22 ("days of thy youth") implies that the love here meant was on God's side, not Israel's. thou wentest after me in . . . wilderness—the next act of God's love, His leading them in the desert without needing any strange god, such as they since worshipped, to help Him (Deuteronomy 2. 7; 32. 12). Verse 6 shows it is God's "leading" of them, not their following after God in the wilderness, which is implied. 3. holiness unto the Lord—i. e., was consecrated to the service of Jehovah (Exodus 19. 5, 6). They thus answered to the motto on their high priest's breastplate, "Holiness to the Lord" (Deuteronomy 7. 6; 14. 2, 21). first-fruits of his increase—i. e., of Jehovah's produce: as the first-fruits of the whole produce of the land were devoted to God (Exodus 23. 19; Numbers 18. 12, 13), so Israel was devoted to Him as the first-fruit and representative nation among all nations. So the spiritual Israel (James 1. 18; Revelation 14. 4). devour—carrying on the image of first-fruits which were eaten before the Lord by the priests as the Lord's representatives; all who ate (injured) Jehovah's first-fruits (Israel), contracted guilt: ex. gr., Amalek, the Amorites, &c., extirpated for their guilt towards Israel. shall come—rather, came. 4. Jacob . . . Israel—the whole nation. families—(Note, ch. 1. 15), hear God's word not only collectively, but individually (Zechariah 12. 12-14). 5. iniquity—wrong done to them (Isaiah 5. 4; Micah 6. 3; cf. Deuteronomy 32. 4). walked after vanity—contrasted with "walked after me in the wilderness" (v. 2); then I was their guide in the barren desert; now they take idols as their guides. vanity . . . vain—An idol is not only vain (impotent and empty), but vanity itself. Its worshippers acquire its character, becoming vain as it is (Deuteronomy 7. 26; Psalm 115. 8). A people's character never rises above that of its gods, which are its "better nature" [BACON] (2 Kings 17. 15; Jonah 2. 8). 6. Neither said they, Where, &c.—The very words which God uses (Isaiah 63. 9, 11, 13), when, as it were, reminding Himself of His former acts of love to Israel as a ground for interposing in their behalf again. When they would not say, Where is Jehovah, &c., God Himself at last said it for them (cf. Note, v. 2, above). deserts . . . pits—The desert between Mount Sinai and Palestine abounds in chasms and pits, in which beasts of burden often sink down to the knees. "Shadow of death" refers to the darkness of the caverns amidst the rocky precipices (Deuteronomy 8. 15; 32. 10). 7. plentiful—lit., a land of Carmel, or well-cultivated land: a garden-land, in contrast to the "land of deserts" (v. 6). defiled—by idolatry (Judges 2. 10-17; Psalm 78. 58, 59; 106. 38). you . . . ye—change to the second person from the third, "they" (v. 6), in order to bring home the guilt to the living generation. 8. The three leading classes, whose very office under the theocracy was to lead the people to God, disowned Him in the same language as the nation at large, "Where is the Lord" (see v. 6)? The priests, whose office it was to expound the law (Malachi 2. 6, 7). handle—are occupied with as the subject of their profession. The pastor, civil, not religious; princes (ch. 3. 15), whose duty it was to tend their people; the prophets, who should have reclaimed the people from their apostasy, encouraged them in it by pretended oracles from Baal, the Phœnician false god. by Baal—in his name and by his authority (cf. ch. 11. 21). walked after things . . . not profit—answering to, "walked after vanity," i. e., idols (v. 5; cf. v. 11; Habakkuk 2. 18). 9. yet plead—viz., by inflicting still further judgments on you. children's children—three MSS. and JEROME omit "children's;" they seem to have thought it unsuitable to read "children's children," when "children" had not preceded. But it is designedly so written, to intimate that the final judgment on the nation would be suspended for many generations [HORSLEY] (cf. Ezekiel 20. 35, 36; Micah 6. 2). 10. pass over the isles—rather, "cross over to the isles." Chittim . . . Kedar—i. e., the heathen nations, west and east. Go where you will, you cannot find an instance of any heathen nation forsaking their own for other gods. Israel alone does this. Yet the heathen gods are false gods; whereas Israel, in forsaking me for other gods, forsake their "glory" for unprofitable dols. Chittim—Cyprus, colonized by Phoenicians, who built in it the city of Citium, the modern Chitti. Then the term came to be applied to all maritime coasts of the Mediterranean, especially Greece (Numbers 24. 24; Isaiah 23. 1; Daniel 11. 30). Kedar—descended from Ishmael, the Bedouins and Arabs, east of Palestine. 11. glory—Jehovah, the glory of Israel (Psalm 106. 20; Romans 1. 23). The Shechinah, or cloud resting on the sanctuary, was the symbol of "the glory of the Lord" (1 Kings 8. 11; cf. Romans 9. 4). The golden calf was intended as an image of the true God (cf. Exodus 32. 4, 5), yet it is called an "idol" (Acts 7. 41). It (like Roman Catholic images) was a violation of the second commandment, as the heathen multiplying of gods is a violation of the first. not profit—(v. 8.) 12. Impassioned personification (Isaiah 1. 2). horribly afraid—rather, "be horrified." be . . . very desolate—rather, "be exceedingly aghast" at the monstrous spectacle. Lit., to be dried up, or devastated, places devastated have such an unsightly look. [MAURER.] 13. two evils—not merely one evil, like the idolaters who know no better: besides simple idolatry, my people add the sin of forsaking the true God whom they have known; the heathen, though having the sin of idolatry, are free from the further sin of changing the true God for idols (v. 11). forsaken me—The Hebrew collocation brings out the only Living God into more prominent contrast with idol nonentities. "Me they have forsaken, the Fountain," &c. (ch. 17. 13; Psalm 36. 9; John 4. 14). broken cisterns—tanks for rain water, common in the East, where wells are scarce. The tanks not only cannot give forth an ever-flowing fresh supply as fountains can, but cannot even retain the water poured into them; the stone-work within being broken, the earth drinks up the collected water. So, in general, all earthly, compared with heavenly, means of satisfying man's highest wants (Isaiah 55. 1, 2; cf. Luke 12. 33). 14. Is he a home-born slave—No. "Israel is Jehovah's son, even His first-born" (Exodus 4. 22). Verses 16, 18, and 36, and the absence of any express contrast of the two parts of the nation are against EICHORN'S view, that the prophet proposes to Judah, as yet spared, the case of Israël (the ten tribes) which had been carried away by Assyria as a warning of what they might expect if they should still put their trust in Egypt. "Were Israel's ten tribes of meaner birth than Judah? Certainly not. If, then, the former fell before Assyria, what can Judah hope from Egypt against Assyria?" "Israel" is rather here the whole of the remnant still left in their own land, i. e., Judah. "How comes it to pass that the nation which once was under God's special protection (v. 3) is now left at the mercy of the foe as a worthless slave? The prophet sees this event as if present, though it was still future to Judah (v. 19). 15. lions—The Babylonian princes (ch. 4. 7; cf. Amos 3. 4). The disaster from the Babylonians in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign, and again three years later when, relying on Egypt, he revolted from Nebuchadnezzar, is here referred to (ch. 46. 2; 2 Kings 24. 1, 2). 16. Noph . . . Tahapanes—Memphis, capital of Lower Egypt, on the west bank of the Nile, near the pyramids of Gizeh, opposite the site of modern Cairo. Daphne, on the Tanitic branch of the Nile, near Pelusium, on the frontier of Egypt towards Palestine. Isaiah 30. 4 contracts it, Hanes. These two cities, one the capital, the other that with which the Jews came most in contact, stand for the whole of Egypt. Tahapanes takes its name from a goddess, Tphnet. [CHAMPOLLION.]

Memphis is from Man-nofri, "the abode of good men:" written in Hebrew, "Moph" (Hosea 9. 6), or Noph. The reference is to the coming invasion of Judah by Pharaoh-necho of Egypt, on his return from the Euphrates, when he deposed Jehoahaz, and levied a heavy tribute on the land (2 Kings 23. 33-35). Josiah's death in battle with the same Pharaoh is probably included (2 Kings 23. 29, 30). have broken—rather, shall feed down the crown, &c., i. e., affect with the greatest ignominy, such as boldness was regarded in the East (ch. 48. 37; 2 Kings 2. 23). Instead of "also," translate, "even" the Egyptians, in whom thou dost trust, shall miserably disappoint thy expectation. [MAURER.] Jehoiakim was twice leagued with them (2 Kings 23. 34, 35): when he revolved the crown from them, and when he revolted from Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24. 1, 2, 7). The Chaldeans, having become masters of Asia, threatened Egypt. Judea, situated between the contending powers, was thus exposed to the inroads of the one or other of the hostile armies; and unfortunately, except in Josiah's reign, took side with Egypt, contrary to God's warnings. 17. Lit., "Has not thy forsaking the Lord, &c., procured this (calamity) to thee?" So LXX.: the Masoretic accents make "this" the subject of the verb, leaving the object to be understood. "Has not this procured (it, i. e., the impending calamity) unto thee, that hast forsaken?" &c. (ch. 4. 18). led—(Deuteronomy 32. 10.) the way—the article expresses the right way, the way of the Lord: viz., the moral training which they enjoyed in the Mosaic covenant. 18. now—used in a reasoning sense, not of time. the way of Egypt—What hast thou to do with the way, i. e., with going down to Egypt; or what, &c., with going to Assyria? drink . . . waters—i. e., to seek reinvigorating aid from them; so v. 13 and 36; cf. "waters," meaning numerous forces (Isaiah 8. 7). Sihor—i. e., The black river, in Greek Melas (black), the Nile; so called from the black deposit or soil it leaves after the inundation (Isaiah 23. 3). The LXX. identify it with Gihon, one of the rivers of Paradise. the river—Euphrates, called by pre-eminence, the river; figurative for the Assyrian power. In 625 B. C., the seventeenth year of Josiah, and the fourth of Jeremiah's office, the kingdom of Assyria fell before Babylon, therefore Assyria is here put for Babylon its successor: so in 2 Kings 23. 29; Lamentations 5. 6. There was doubtless a league between Judea and Assyria (i. e., Babylon), which caused Josiah to march against Pharaoh-necho of Egypt, when that king went against Babylon: the evil consequences of this league are foretold in this verse and v. 36. 19. correct . . . reprove—rather, in the severer sense, chastise . . . punish. [MAURER.] backslidings—"apostasies;" phural, to express the number and variety of their defections. The very confederacies they entered into were the occasion of their overthrow (Proverbs 1. 31; Isaiah 3. 9; Hosea 5. 5). know . . . see—imperative for futures: Thou shalt know and see to thy cost. my fear—rather, "the fear of me." 20. I—the Hebrew should be pointed as the second person feminine, a form common in Jeremiah: "Thou hast broken," &c. So LXX., and the sense requires it. thy yoke . . . bands—the yoke and bands which I laid on thee, my laws (ch. 5. 5). transgress—so the Keri and many MSS. read. But LXX. and most authorities read, "I will not serve," i. e., obey. The sense of English Version is, "I broke thy yoke (in Egypt), &c., and (at that time) thou saidst, I will not transgress; whereas thou hast (since then) wandered" (from me) (Exodus 19. 8). hill . . . green tree—the scene of idolatries (Deuteronomy 12. 2; Isaiah 57. 5, 7). wanderest—rather, "thou hast bowed down thyself" (for the act of adultery: figurative of shameful idolatry (Exodus 34. 15, 16; cf. Job 31. 10). 21. The same image as Deuteronomy 32. 32; Psalm 80. 8, 9; Isaiah 5. 1, &c. unto me—with respect to me. 22. nitre—not what is now so called, viz., saltpetre; but the natron of Egypt, a mineral alkali, an incrustation at the bottom of the lakes, after the summer heat has evaporated the water: used for washing (cf. Job 9. 30; Proverbs 25. 20). soap—potash, the carbonate of which is obtained impure from burning different plants, especially the kali of Egypt and Arabia. Mixed with oil it was used for washing. marked—deeply ingrained, indelibly marked the Hebrew, Catham, being equivalent to Cathab. Others translate, "is treasured up," from the Arabic. MAURER, from a Syriac root, is polluted. 23. (Proverbs 30.12.) Baalim—plural, to express manifold excellency; cf. Elohim. see—consider. the valley—viz., of Hinnom, or Tophet: south and east of Jerusalem: rendered infamous by the human sacrifices to Moloch in it (cf. ch. 31, 32; 19. 2, 6, 13, 14; 32. 35; Isaiah 30. 33, Note). thou art—omit. The substantive that follows in this verse (and also that in v. 24) is in apposition with the preceding "thou." dromedary—rather, a young she-camel. travering—lit., enfolding; making its ways complicated by wandering hither and thither, lusting after the male. Cf. as to the Jews' spiritual lust, Hosea 2. 6, 7. 24. (Ch. 14. 6; Job 39. 5). "A wild ass," agreeing with "thou" (v. 23). at her pleasure—rather, "in her ardour," viz., in pursuit of a male, snuffing the wind to ascertain where one is to be found. [MAURER.] occasion—either from a Hebrew root, "to meet"; "her meeting (with the male for sexual intercourse), who can avert it?" Or better from an Arabic root; "her heat (sexual impulse), who can allay it?" [MAURER.] all they—whichever of the males desire her company. [HORSLEY.] will not weary themselves—have no need to weary themselves in searching for her. her month—in the season of the year when her sexual impulse is strongest, she puts herself in the way of the males, so that they have no difficulty in finding her. 25. Withhold, &c.—i. e., Abstain from incontinence; fig. for idolatry. [HOUBIGANT.] unshod, &c.—do not run so violently in pursuing lovers, as to wear out thy shoes: do not "thirst" so incontinently after sexual intercourse. HIRTZIG thinks the reference is to penances performed barefoot to idols, and the thirst occasioned by loud and continued invocations to them. no hope—(Ch. 18. 12; Isaiah 57. 10.) "It is hopeless," i. e., I am desperately resolved to go on in my own course. strangers—i. e., laying aside the metaphor, strange gods (ch. 3. 13; Deuteronomy 32. 16). 26. is ashamed—is put to shame. "Thief" (John 10. 1). Israel—i. e., Judah (v. 28). 27. Thou art my father—(Contrast ch. 3. 4; Isaiah 64. 8.) in . . . trouble they will say—viz., to God (Psalm 78. 34; Isaiah 26. 16). Trouble often brings men to their senses (Luke 15. 16-18). 28. But—God sends them to the gods for whom they forsook Him, to see if they can help them (Deuteronomy 32. 37, 38; Judges 10. 14). according to the number of thy cities—besides national deities, each city had its tutelary god (ch. 11. 13). 29. plead with me—i. e., contend with me for afflicting you (v. 23, 35). 30. (Ch. 5. 3; 6. 29; Isaiah 1. 5; 9. 13.) your children—i. e., your people, you. your . . . sword . . . devoured . . . prophets—(2 Chronicles 36. 16; Nehemiah 9. 26; Matthew 23. 29, 31.) 31. The Hebrew collocation is, O, the generation, ye, i. e., O ye who now live. The generation needed only to be named, to call its degeneracy to view, so palpable was it, wilderness—in which all the necessaries of life are wanting. On the contrary, Jehovah was a never-failing source of supply for all Israel's wants in the wilderness, and afterwards in Canaan. darkness—lit., darkness of Jehovah, the strongest Hebrew term for darkness; the densest darkness; cf. "land of the shadow of death" (v. 6). We are lords—i. e., We are our own masters. We will worship what gods we like (Psalm 12. 4; 82. 6). But it is better to translate from a different Hebrew root; "We ramble at large," without restraint pursuing our idolatrous lusts. 32. Oriental females greatly pride themselves on their ornaments (cf. Isaiah 61. 10). attire—girldes for the breast. forgotten me—(Ch. 12. 25; Hosca 8. 14.) 33. Why trimmest—MAURER translates, "How skilfully thou dost prepare thy way," &c. But see 2 Kings 9. 30. "Trimminst" best suits the image of one decking herself as a harlot, way—course of life, therefore—accordingly. Or else, "nay, thou hast even," &c. also . . . wicked ones—even the wicked harlots, i. e. (laying aside the metaphor) even the Gentiles who are wicked, thou teachest to be still more so. [GROTIUS.] 34. Also—Not only art thou polluted with idolatry, but also with the guilt of shedding innocent blood. [MAURER.] ROSENMIJLLER not so well translates, "even in thy skirts," &c., i. e., there is no part of thee (not even thy skirts) that is not stained with innocent blood (ch.

19. 4; 2 Kings 21. 16; Psalm 106. 38). See as to innocent blood shed, not as here in honour of idols, but of prophets for having reproved them, v. 30; ch. 26. 20-23. souls—i. e., persons. search—I did not need to "search deep" to find proof of thy guilt; for it was "upon all these" thy skirts. Not in deep caverns didst thou perpetrate these atrocities, but openly in the vale of Hinnom and within the precincts of the temple. 35. (Ver. 23, 29.) 36. gaddest—rannest to and fro, now seeking help from Assyria (2 Chronicles 28. 16-21), now from Egypt (ch. 37, 7, 8; Isaiah 30. 3). 37. him—Egypt. hands upon . . . head—expressive of mourning (2 Samuel 13. 19). in them—in those stays in which thou trustest.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-25. GOD'S MERCY NOTWITHSTANDING JUDAH'S VILENESS. Contrary to all precedent in the case of adultery, Jehovah offers a return to Judah, the spiritual adulteress (v. 1-5). A new portion of the book, ending with ch. 6. Judah worse than Israel; yet both shall be restored in the last days (v. 6-25). 1. They say—rather, as Hebrew, "saying," in agreement with "the Lord;" v. 37 of last chapter. [MAURER.] Or, it is equivalent to, "Suppose this case." Some copyist may have omitted "The word of the Lord came to me," saying. shall he return to her—will he take her back? It was unlawful to do so (Deuteronomy 24. 1-4). shall not—should not the land be polluted if this were done? yet return—(v. 22; ch. 4. 1; Zechariah 1. 3; cf. Ezekiel 16. 51, 58, 60.) "Nevertheless," &c. (Isaiah 50. 1, note). 2. high places—the scene of idolatries which were spiritual adulteries. in . . . ways sat for them—watching for lovers like a prostitute (Genesis 38. 14, 21; Proverbs 7. 12; 23. 28; Ezekiel 16. 24, 25), and like an Arab who lies in wait for travellers. The Arabs of the desert, east and south of Palestine, are still notorious as robbers. 3. no latter rain—essential to the crops in Palestine; withheld in judgment (Leviticus 26. 19; cf. Joel 2. 23). whore's forehead—(Ch. 8. 12; Ezekiel 3. 8.) 4. from this time—not referring, as MICHAELIS thinks, to the reformation begun the year before, i. e., the twelfth of Josiah; it means—now at once, now at last. me—contrasted with the "stock" whom they had heretofore called on as "father" (ch. 2. 27; Luke 15. 18). thou art—rather, "thou wast." guide of . . . youth—i. e., husband (ch. 2. 2; Proverbs 2. 17; Hosea 2. 7, 15). Husband and father are the two most endearing of ties. 5. he—"thou," the second person, had preceded. The change to the third person implies a putting away of God to a greater distance from them; instead of repenting and forsaking their idols, they merely deprecate the continuance of their punishment. Verse 12, and Psalm 103. 9, answer their question in the event of their penitence. spoken and—rather (God's reply to them), "Thou hast spoken (thus), and yet (all the while) thou hast done evil," &c. as thou couldst—with all thy might; with incorrigible persistency. [CALVIN.] 6. From here to ch. 6. 30, is a new discourse, delivered in Josiah's reign; it consists of two parts, the former extending to ch. 4. 3, in which he warns Judah from the example of Israel's doom, and yet promises Israel final restoration; the latter a threat of Babylonian invasion; as Nabopolassar founded the Babylonian empire, 625 B. C., the seventeenth of Josiah, this prophecy is perhaps not earlier than that date (ch. 4. 5, &c.; 5. 14, &c.; 6. 1, &c.; 22.); and probably not later than the second thorough reformation in the eighteenth year of the same reign. backsliding—lit., apostasy; not merely apostate, but apostasy itself, the essence of it (v. 14, 22). 7. I said—(2 Kings 17. 13.) sister—(Ezekiel 16. 46; 23. 2, 4.) 8. I saw that, though (whereas) it was for this very reason (namely, because backsliding (apostate) Israel had committed adultery I had put her away (2 Kings 17. 6, 18), and given her a bill of divorce, yet Judah, &c. (Ezekiel 23. 11, &c.) bill of divorce—lit., a "writing of cuttings off." The plural implies the completeness of the severance. The use of this metaphor here, as in the former discourse (v. 1), implies a close connection between the discourses. The epithets are characteristic; Israel "apostate" (as the Hebrew for "backsliding" is better rendered); Judah, not as yet utterly apostate, but treacherous or faithless. also—herself also, like Israel. 9. It—some take this verse of Judah, to whom the end of v. 8 refers. But v. 10 puts Judah in contrast to Israel in this verse. "Yet for all this," referring to the sad example of Israel; if v. 9 referred to Judah, "she" would have been written in v. 10, not "Judah." Translate, "It (the putting away of Israel) had come to pass through . . . whoredom; and (i. e., for) she (Israel) had defiled the land," &c. [MAURER.] English Version, however, may be explained to refer to Israel. lightness—"Infamy." [EWALD.] MAURER not so well takes it from the Hebrew root, "voice," "fame." 10. yet—notwithstanding the lesson given in Israel's case of the fatal results of apostasy. not . . . whole heart—The reformation in the eighteenth year of Josiah was not thorough on the part of the people, for at his death they relapsed into idolatry (2 Chronicles 34. 33; Hosea 7. 14). 11. justified herself—has been made to appear almost just (i. e., comparatively innocent) by the surpassing guilt of Judah, who adds hypocrisy and treachery to her sin; and who had the example of Israel to warn her, but in vain (cf. Ezekiel 16. 51; 23. 11). more than—in comparison with. 12. Go—not actually; but turn and proclaim towards the north (Media and Assyria, where the ten tribes were located by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser, 2 Kings 15. 29; 17. 6; 18. 9, 11). Return . . . backsliding—Hebrew, Shubah, Meshubah, a play on sounds. In order to excite Judah to godly jealousy (Romans 11. 14), Jehovah addresses the exiled ten tribes of Israel with a loving invitation. cause . . . anger to fall—lit., I will not let fall my countenance (cf. Genesis 4. 5, 6; Job 29. 3), i. e., I will not continue to frown on you. keep—anger is to be supplied (Note, v. 5). 13. Only acknowledge—(Deuteronomy 30. 1, 2; Proverbs 28. 13.) scattered thy ways, &c.—(Ch. 2. 25.) Not merely the calves at Bethel, but the idols in every direction, were the objects of their worship (Ezekiel 16. 15, 24, 25). 14. I am married—lit., I am Lord, i. e., husband to you (so ch. 31. 32; cf. Hosea 2. 19, 20; Isaiah 54. 5). GESENIUS, following the LXX. version of ch. 31. 32, and Paul's quotation of it, Hebrews 8. 9, translates, "I have rejected you;" so the corresponding Arabic, and the idea of lordship, may pass into that of looking down upon, and so rejecting. But LXX. in this passage translates, "I will be Lord over you." And the "for" has much more force in English Version than in that of GESENIUS. The Hebrew hardly admits the rendering though. [HENGSTENBERG.] take you one of a city—Though but one or two Israelites were in a (foreign) city, they shall not be forgotten; all shall be restored (Amos 9. 9). So, in the spiritual Israel, God gathers one convert here, another there, into His Church; not the least one is lost (Matthew 18. 14; Romans 11. 5; cf. ch. 24. 40, 41). family—a clan, or tribe. 15. pastors—not religious, but civil rulers, as Zerubbabel, Nehemiah (ch. 23. 4; 2. 8). 16. they shall no more say—The Jews shall no longer glory in the possession of the ark; it shall not be missed, so great shall be the blessings of the new dispensation. The throne of the Lord, present Himself, shall eclipse and put out of mind the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat between the cherubim, God's former throne. The ark, containing the two tables of the law, disappeared at the Babylonian captivity, and was not restored to the second temple, implying that the symbolical "glory" was to be superseded by a "greater glory" (Haggai 2. 9). neither . . . visit it—Rather, "neither shall it be missed" (so in ch. 23. 4). done—Rather, "neither shall it (the ark) be made (i. e., be restored) any more." [MAURER.] 17. Jerusalem—the whole city, not merely the temple. As it has been the centre of the Hebrew theocracy, so it shall be the point of attraction to the whole earth (Isaiah 2. 2-4; Zechariah 2. 10, 11; 14. 16-21). throne of . . . Lord—The Shekinah, the symbol of God's peculiar nearness to Israel (Deuteronomy 4. 7) shall be surpassed by the antitype, God's own throne in Jerusalem (Psalm 2. 6, 8; Ezekiel 34. 23, 24; Zechariah 2. 5). imagination—Rather, as Margin, "the obstinacy" or stubbornness. 18. Judah . . . Israel . . . together—Two distinct apostasies, that of Israel and that of Judah, were foretold (v. 8, 10). The two have never been united since the Babylonian captivity, therefore their joint restoration must be still future (Isaiah 11. 12, 13; Ezekiel 37. 16-22; Hosea 1. 11). north—(V. 12.) land . . . given . . . inheritance—(Amos 9. 15.) 19. The good land covenanted to Abraham is to be restored to his seed. But the question arises, How shall this be done? put . . . among . . . children—the Greek for adoption means, lit., putting among the sons. the children—i. e., my children. "How shall I receive thee back into my family, after thou hast so long forsaken me for idols?" The answer is, they would acknowledge Him as "Father," and no longer turn away from Him. God assumes the language of one wondering how so desperate apostates could be restored to His family and its privileges (cf. Ezekiel 37. 3; CALVIN makes it, How the race of Abraham can be propagated again, being as it were dead); yet as his purpose has decreed it so, He shows how it shall be effected, viz., they shall receive from Him the spirit of adoption to cry, "My Father" (John 1. 12; Galatians 4. 6). The elect are "children" already in God's purpose; this is the ground of the subsequent realization of this relationship (Ephesians 1. 5; Hebrews 2. 13). pleasant land—(Ch. 11. 5; Ezekiel 20. 6; Daniel 11. 16. Margin.) heritage of . . . hosts—a heritage the most goodly of all nations [MAURER]; or a "heritage possessed by powerful hosts" (Deuteronomy 4. 38; Amos 2. 9). The rendering "splendours," instead of "hosts," is opposed by the fact that the Hebrew for "splendour" is not found in the plural. 20. Surely—Rather, But, husband—lit., friend. 21. In harmony with the preceding promises of God, the penitential confessions of Israel are heard. high places—The scene of their idolatries is the scene of their confessions. Cf. v. 23, in which they cast aside their trust in these idolatrous high places. The publicity of their penitence is also implied (cf. ch. 7. 29; 43. 38). 22. Jehovah's renewed invitation (v. 12, 14) and their immediate response. heal—forgive (2 Chronicles 30. 18, 20; Hosea 14. 4). unto thee—Rather, "in obedience to thee;" lit., for thee. [ROSENMULLER.] 23. multitude of mountains—i. e., the multitude of gods worshipped on them (cf. Psalm 121. 1, 2. Margin). 24. shame—i. e., the idols, whose worship only covers us with shame (ch. 11. 13; Hosea 9. 10). So far from bringing us "salvation," they have cost us our cattle and even our children, whom we have sacrificed to them. 25. (Ezra 9. 7.)

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-31. CONTINUATION OF ADDRESS TO THE TEN TRIBES OF ISRAEL (v. 1, 2). THE PROPHET TURNS AGAIN TO JUDAH, TO WHOM HE HAD ORIGINALLY BEEN SENT (v. 3-31). 1. return . . . return—play on words. "If thou wouldst return to thy land (thou must first), return (by conversion and repentance) to me." not remove—no longer be an unsettled wanderer in a strange land. So Cain (Genesis 4. 12, 14). 2. And thou—Rather, "And if" (carried on from v. 1) thou shalt swear, "Jehovah liveth, in truth," &c., i. e., if thou shalt worship Him (for we swear by the God whom we worship; cf. Deuteronomy 6. 13; 10. 20; Isaiah 19. 18; Amos 8. 14) in sincerity, &c. and the nations—Rather, this is apodosis to the "if;" then shall the nations bless themselves in (by) Him" (Isaiah 65. 16). The conversion of the nations will be the consequence of Israel's conversion (Psalm 102. 13, 15; Romans 11. 12, 15). 3. Transition to Judah. Supply mentally. All which (the foregoing declaration as to Israel) applies to Judah, and Jerusalem—i. e., and especially the men of Jerusalem, as being the most prominent in Judea. Break . . . fallow ground—i. e., Repent of your idolatry, and so be prepared to serve the Lord in truth (Hosea 10. 12; Matthew 13. 7). The unhumbed heart is like ground which may be improved, being let out to us for that purpose, but which is as yet fallow, overgrown with weeds, its natural product. 4. Remove your natural corruption of heart (Deuteronomy 10. 16; 30. 6; Romans 2. 29; Colossians 2. 11). 5. cry, gather together—Rather, "cry fully," i. e., loudly. The Jews are warned to take measures against the impending Chaldean invasion (cf. ch. 8. 14). 6. Zion—the standard toward Zion intimated that the people of the surrounding country were to fly to it, as being the strongest of their fortresses. 7. lion—Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans (ch. 2, 15; 5, 6; Daniel 7, 14). his thicket—lair; Babylon. destroyer of the Gentiles—Rather, "the nations" (ch. 25, 9). 8. Nothing is left to the Jews but to bewail their desperate condition. anger . . . not turned back—(Isaiah 9, 12, 17, 21.) 9. heart—the wisdom of the most leading men will be utterly at a loss to devise means of relief. 10. thou hast . . . deceived—God, having even the false prophets in His hands, is here said to do that which for inscrutable purposes He permits them to do (Exodus 9, 12; 2 Thessalonians 2, 11; cf. ch. 8, 15; which passage shows that the dupes of error were self-prepared for it, and that God's predestination did not destroy their moral freedom as voluntary agents). The false prophets foretold "peace," and the Jews believed them; God overruled this to His purposes (ch. 5, 12; 14, 13; Ezekiel 14, 9). soul—Rather, "reacheth to the life." 11. dry wind—the simoom, terrific and destructive, blowing from the southeast across the sandy deserts east of Palestine. Image of the invading Babylonian army (Hosea 13, 15). Babylon in its turn shall be visited by a similar "destroying wind" (ch. 51, 1). of . . . high places—i. e., that sweeps over the high places. daughter—i. e., the children of my people. not to fan—a very different wind from those ordinary winds employed for fanning the grain in the open air. 12. full . . . from those places—Rather, "a wind fuller (i. e., more impetuous) than those winds" (which fan the corn) (v. 11). [ROSENMULLER.] unto me—for me, as my instrument for executing my purpose. sentence—judgments against them (ch. 1, 16). 13. clouds—continuing the metaphor in v. 11, 12. Clouds of sand and dust accompany the simoom, and after rapid gyrations ascend like a pillar. eagles—(Deuteronomy 28, 49; Habakkuk 1, 8) Woe unto us—The people are graphically presented before us, without it being formally so stated, bursting out in these exclamations. 14. Only one means of deliverance is left to the Jews—a thorough repentance. GESENIUS translates, "How long wilt thou harbour vain 'thoughts?' &c. vain thoughts—viz., projects for deliverance, such as enlisting the Egyptians on their side. 15. For . . . from Dan—The connection is: There is danger in delay; for the voice of a messenger announces the approach of the Chaldean enemy from Dan, the northern frontier of Palestine (ch. 3, 16; cf. v. 6; ch. 1, 14). Mount Ephraim—which borders closely on Judah; so that the foe is coming nearer and nearer. Dan and Bethel in Ephraim were the two places where Jeroboam set up the idolatrous calves (1 Kings 12, 29); just retribution. 16. The neighbouring foreign "nations" are summoned to witness Jehovah's judgments on His rebel people (ch. 6, 18, 19). watchers—i. e., besiegers (cf. 2 Samuel 11, 16); "observed" or watched, i. e., besieged, their voice—the war-shout. 17. keepers of a field—metaphor from those who watch a field, to frighten away the wild beasts. 18. (Ch. 2, 17, 19; Psalm 107, 17.) this is thy wickedness—i. e., the fruit of thy wickedness. 19. The prophet suddenly assumes the language of the Jewish state personified, lamenting its affliction (ch. 10, 19, 20; 9, 1, 10; Isaiah 15, 5; cf. Luke 19, 41). at my very heart—Hebrew, at the walls of my heart; the muscles round the heart. There is a climax, the "bowels," the pericardium, the "heart" itself. maketh . . . noise—moaneth. [HENDERSON.] alarm—the battle-shout. 20. Destruction . . . erted—Breach upon breach is announced (Psalm 42, 7; Ezekiel 7, 26). The war "trumpet" . . . the battle-shout . . . the "destructions" . . . the havoc throughout "the whole land" . . . the spoiling of the shepherds' "tents" (ch. 10, 20; or, "tents" means cities, which should be overthrown as easily as tents [CALVIN]), form a gradation. 21. Judah in perplexity asks, How long is this state of things to continue? 22. Jehovah's reply; they cannot be otherwise than miserable, since they persevere in sin. The repetition of clauses gives greater force to the sentiment. wise . . . evil . . . to do good . . . no knowledge—reversing the rule (Romans 16, 19) "wise unto . . . good, simple concerning evil." 23. Graphic picture of the utter desolation about to visit Palestine. "I beheld, and lo!" four times solemnly repeated, heightens the awful effect of the scene (cf. Isaiah 24, 19; 34, 11). without form and void—reduced to the primeval chaos (Genesis 1, 2). 24. mountains—(Isaiah 5, 25.) moved lightly—shook vehemently. 25. no man . . . birds—no vestige of the human, or of the feathered creation, is to be seen (Ezekiel 38, 20; Zephaniah 1, 3). 26. fruitful place—Hebrew, Carmel. a wilderness—Hebrew, "the wilderness," in contrast to "the fruitful place;" the great desert, where Carmel was, there is now the desert of Arabia. [MAURER.] cities—in contrast to the fruitful place or field. 27. Full end—utter destruction: I will leave some hope of restoration (ch. 5, 10, 18; 30, 11; 48, 23; cf. Leviticus 26, 44). 28. For this—On account of the desolations just described (Isaiah 5, 30; Hosea 4, 3). not repent—(Numbers 23, 19.) 29. whole city—Jerusalem; to it the inhabitants of the country had fled for refuge; but when it, too, is likely to fall, they flee out of it to hide in the "thickets." HENDERSON translates, "every city," noise—the mere noise of the hostile horsemen shall put you to flight. 30. when thou art spoiled—rather, "thou, O destroyed one." [MAURER.] restest . . . face with painting—Oriental females paint their eyes with stibium, or antimony, to make them look full and sparkling, the black margin causing the white of the eyes to appear the brighter by contrast (2 Kings 9, 30). He uses the term distendest in derision of their effort to make their eyes look large [MAURER]; or else, restest, i. e., dost lacerate by puncturing the eyelid in order to make the antimony adhere, [ROSENMULLER.] So the Jews use every artifice to secure the aid of Egypt against Babylon. face—rather, thy eyes (Ezekiel 23, 40). 31. anguish—viz., occasioned by the attack of the enemy. daughter of Zion—There is peculiar beauty in suppressing the name of the person in trouble, until that trouble had been fully described. [HENDERSON.] bewalleth herself—rather, "draweth her breath short" [HORSLEY] paneth. spreadeth . . . hands—(Lamentations 1, 17.)

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-31. THE CAUSE OF THE JUDGMENTS TO BE INFLICTED IS THE UNIVERSAL CORRUPTION OF THE PEOPLE. 1. a man—As the pious Josiah, Baruch, and Zephaniah lived in Jerusalem at that time, Jeremiah must here mean the mass of the people, the king, his counsellors, the false prophets, and the priests, as distinguished from the faithful few, whom God had openly separated from the reprobate people; among the latter not even one just person was to be found (Isaiah 9, 16) [CALVIN]; the godly, moreover, were forbidden to intercede for them (ch. 7, 16; cf. Genesis 18, 23, &c.; Psalm 12, 1; Ezekiel 22, 30). see . . . know—look . . . ascertain. judgment—justice, righteousness. pardon it—rather, her, 2. (Titus 1, 16.) swear falsely—not a judicial oath; but their profession of the worship of Jehovah is insincere (v. 7; ch. 4, 2). The reformation under Josiah was merely superficial in the case of the majority. 3. eyes upon the truth—(Deuteronomy 32, 4; 2 Chronicles 16, 9.) "Truth" is in contrast with "swear falsely" (v. 2). The false-professing Jews could expect nothing but judgments from the God of truth. stricken . . . not grieved—(Ch. 2, 30; Isaiah 1, 5; 9, 13.) refused . . . correction—(Ch. 7, 28; Zephaniah 3, 2.) 4. poor—rather, "the poor." He supposes for the moment that this utter depravity is confined to the unconstructed poor, and that he would find a different state of things in the higher ranks; but there he finds unbridled profligacy. 5. they have known—rather, "they must know." The prophet supposes it as probable, considering their position. but these—I found the very reverse to be the case. burst . . . bounds—set God's law at defiance (Psalm 2, 3). 6. lion . . . wolf . . . leopard—the strongest, the most ravenous, and the swiftest, respectively, of beasts; illustrating the formidable character of the Babylonians. of the evenings—others not so well translate, of the deserts. The plural means that it goes forth every evening to seek its prey (Psalm 104, 20; Habakkuk 1, 8; Zephaniah 3, 3). leopard . . . watch . . . cities—(Hosea 13, 7.) It shall lie in wait about their cities. 7. It would not be consistent with God's holiness to let such wickedness

pass unpunished. sworn by—(v. 2; ch. 4. 2); i. e., worshipped. no gods—(Deuteronomy 32. 21.) fed . . . to the full—so the Kerl (Hebrew Margin) reads. God's bountifulness is contrasted with their apostasy (Deuteronomy 32. 15). Prosperity, the gift of God, designed to lead men to Him, often produces the opposite effect. The Hebrew Chetib (text) reads: "I bound them (to me) by oath," viz., in the marriage covenant, sealed at Sinai between God and Israel; in contrast to which stands their "adultery;" the antithesis favours this. adultery . . . harlots' houses—spiritually; idolatry in temples of idols; but literal prostitution is also included, being frequently part of idol-worship: e. g., in the worship of the Babylonian Mylitta. 8. in the morning—(Isaiah 5. 11.) "Rising early in the morning" is a phrase for unceasing eagerness in any pursuit; such was the Jews' avidity after idol-worship. MAURER translates from a different Hebrew root, "continually wander to and fro," inflamed with lust (ch. 2. 23). But English Version is simpler (cf. ch. 13. 27; Ezekiel 22. 11). 9. (Ver. 29; ch. 9. 9; 44. 22.) 10. Abrupt apostrophe to the Babylonians, to take Jerusalem, but not to destroy the nation utterly (Note, ch. 4. 27). battlements—rather, tendrils [MAURER]: the state being compared to a vine (ch. 12. 10), the stem of which was to be spared, while the tendrils (the chief men) were to be removed. 11. (Ch. 3. 20.) 12. belied—denied. It is not he—rather, "(Jehovah) is not HE," i. e., the true and only God (ch. 14. 22; Deuteronomy 32. 39; Isaiah 43. 10, 13). By their idolatry they virtually denied Him. Or, referring to what follows, and to v. 9, "(Jehovah) is not," viz., about to be the punisher of our sins (ch. 14. 13; Isaiah 23. 15). 13. Continuation of the unbelieving language of the Jews. the prophets—who, rophesy punishment coming on us. the word—the Holy Spirit, who speaks through true prophets, is not in them. [MAURER.] Or else, "There is no word (Divine communication) in them" (Hosea 1. 2) [ROSENMULLER]. thus, &c.—their ill-omened prophecies shall fall on themselves. 14. ye . . . thy . . . this people—He turns away from addressing the people to the prophet; implying that He puts them to a distance from Him, and only communicates with them through his prophet (v. 19). fire . . . wood—Thy denunciations of judgments shall be fulfilled, and shall consume them as fire does wood. In ch. 23. 29 it is the penetrating energy of fire which is the point of comparison. 15. (Ch. 1. 15; 6. 22.) Alluding to Deuteronomy 23. 49, &c. Israel—i. e., Judah. mighty—from an Arabic root, enduring. The fourfold repetition of "nation" heightens the force. ancient—The Chaldeans came originally from the Carduchian and Armenian mountains north of Mesopotamia, whence they immigrated into Babylonia; like all mountaineers, they were brave and hardy (Note, Isaiah 23. 13). language . . . knowest not—Isaiah 36. 11 shows that Aramaic was not understood by the multitude, but only by the educated classes. [MAURER.] HENDERSON refers it to the original language of the Babylonians, which, he thinks, they brought with them from their native hills, akin to the Persic, not to the Aramaic, or any other Semitic tongue, the parent of the modern Kurd. 16. open sepulchre—(Cf. Psalm 5. 9.) Their quiver is all-devouring, as the grave opened to receive the dead: as many as are the arrows, so many are the deaths. 17. (Leviticus 26. 16.) 18. (Ver. 10; ch. 4. 27.) Nevertheless—Not even in those days of judgments, God will not utterly exterminate His people. 19. Retribution in kind. As ye have forsaken me (ch. 2. 13), so shall ye be forsaken by me. As ye have served strange (foreign) gods in your land, so shall ye serve strangers (foreigners) in a land not yours. Cf. the similar retribution in Deuteronomy 23. 47, 48. 21. eyes, . . . and ears, and—translate, "and yet" (cf. Deuteronomy 29. 4; Isaiah 6. 9). Having powers of perception, they did not use them: still they were responsible for the exercise of them. 23. sand—though made up of particles easily shifting about, I render it sufficient to curb the violence of the sea. Such is your monstrous perversity, that the raging, senseless sea sooner obeys me, than ye do who profess to be intelligent [CALVIN] (Job 26. 10; 38. 10, 11; Proverbs 8. 29; Revelation 15. 4). 23. (Ch. 6. 23.) 24. rain . . . former . . . latter—the "former" falls from the middle of October to the beginning of December. The "latter," or spring rain in Palestine, falls before harvest in March and April, and is essential for ripening the crops (Deuteronomy 11. 14; Joel 2. 23). weeks of . . . harvest—the seven weeks between passover and pentecost, beginning on the 16th of Nisan (Deuteronomy 16. 9). By God's special providence no rain fell in Palestine during the harvest weeks, so that harvest work went on without interruption (see Genesis 8. 22). 25. National guilt had caused the suspension of these national mercies mentioned in v. 24 (cf. ch. 3. 3). 26. (Proverbs 1. 11, 17, 18; Habakkuk 1. 15.) as he that setteth snares—rather, "as fowlers crouch." [MAURER.] trap—lit., destruction: the instrument of destruction. catch men—not as Peter, to save (Luke 5. 10), but to destroy men. 27. full of deceit—full of treasures got by deceit. rich—(Psalm 73. 12, 18–20.) 28. shine—the effect of fatness on the skin (Deuteronomy 32. 15). They live a life of self-indulgence. overpass . . . the wicked—exceed even the Gentiles in wickedness (ch. 2. 33; Ezekiel 5. 6, 7). judge not . . . fatherless—(Isaiah 1. 23). yet . . . prosper—(Ch. 12. 1.) 29. (Ver. 9; Malachi 3. 5.) 30. (Ch. 23. 14; Hosea 6. 10.) 31. bear rule by their means—lit., according to their hands, i. e., under their guidance (1 Chronicles 25. 3). As a sample of the priests lending themselves to the deceits of the false prophets, to gain influence over the people, see ch. 29. 24–32. love to have it so—(Micah 2. 11.) end thereof—the fatal issue of this sinful course, when Divine judgments shall come.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1–30. ZION'S FOES PREPARE WAR AGAINST HER: HER SINS ARE THE CAUSE. 1. Benjamin—Jerusalem was situated in the tribe of Benjamin, which was here separated from that of Judah by the valley of Hinnom. Though it was inhabited partly by Benjamites, partly by men of Judah, he addresses the former as being his own countrymen. blow . . . trumpet . . . Tekoa—Tikehu, Tekoa form a play on sounds. The birth-place of Amos. Beth-haccerem—meaning in Hebrew, vineyard-house. It and Tekoa were a few miles south of Jerusalem. As the enemy came from the north, the inhabitants of the surrounding country would naturally flee southwards. The fire-signaling on the hills gave warning of danger approaching. 2. likened—rather, "I lay waste." Lit., "O comely and delicate one, I lay waste the daughter of Zion," i. e., thee. So Zechariah 3. 9, "before Joshua," i. e., before thee. [MAURER.] 3. shepherds—hostile leaders with their armies (ch. 1. 15; 4. 17; 49. 20; 50. 45). feed—They shall consume each one all that is near him; lit., "his hand," i. e., the place which he occupies (Numbers 2. 17; Note, Isaiah 56. 5). 4, 5. The invading soldiers encourage one another to the attack on Jerusalem. Prepare—lit., Sanctify war, i. e., Proclaim it formally with solemn rites; the invasion was solemnly ordered by God (cf. Isaiah 13. 3). at noon—the hottest part of the day when attacks were rarely made (ch. 15. 8; 20. 16). Even at this time they wished to attack, such is their eagerness. woe unto us—The words of the invaders, mourning the approach of night which would suspend their hostile operations; still, even in spite of the darkness, at night they renew the attack (v. 5). 6. cast—Hebrew, pour out; referring to the emptying of the baskets of earth to make the mound, formed of "trees" and earth-work, to overtop the city walls. The "trees" were also used to make warlike engines with. this—pointing the invaders to Jerusalem. visited—i. e., punished. wholly oppression—or join "wholly" with "visited," i. e., she is altogether (in her whole extent) to be punished. [MAURER.] 7. fountain—rather, a well dug, from which water springs; distinct from a natural spring or fountain. casteth out—causeth to flow; lit., causeth to dig, the cause being put for the effect (2 Kings 21. 16, 24; Isaiah 57. 20). me—Jehovah. 8. Tender appeal in the midst of threats. depart—Hebrew, "be torn away." Jehovah's affection making Him unwilling to depart; His attachment to Jerusalem was such that an effort was needed to tear himself from it (Ezekiel 23. 13; Hosea 9. 12; 11. 8). 9. The Jews are the grapes, their enemies the unsparring gleaners.

turn back . . . hand—again and again bring freshly-gathered handfuls to the baskets; referring to the reported carrying away of captives to Babylon (ch. 52. 23-30; 2 Kings 24. 14; 25. 11). 10. ear is uncircumcised—closed against the precepts of God by the foreskin of carnality (Leviticus 23. 41; Ezekiel 44. 7; Acts 7. 51). word . . . reproach—(Ch. 20. 8.) 11. fury of . . . Lord—His denunciations communicated to the prophet against Judah. weary with holding in—(Ch. 20. 9.) I will pour—or else imperative: the command of God (see v. 12), "Pour it out." [MAURER.] aged . . . full of days—The former means one becoming old; the latter a decrepit old man [MAURER] (Job 5. 26; Isaiah 65. 20). 12. The very punishments threatened by Moses in the event of disobedience to God (Deuteronomy 28. 30). turned—transferred. 13. (Ch. 8. 10; Isaiah 56. 11; Micah 3. 11.) 14. hurt—the spiritual wound. slightly—as if it were but a slight wound; or, in a slight manner, pronouncing all sound where there is no soundness. saying—viz., the prophets and priests (v. 13). Whereas they ought to warn the people of impending judgments and the need of repentance, they say there is nothing to fear. peace—including soundness. All is sound in the nation's moral state, so all will be peace as to its political state (ch. 4. 10; 8. 11; 14. 13; 23. 17; Ezekiel 13. 5, 10; 22. 28). 15. ROSENMULLER translates, "They ought to have been ashamed, because," &c., "but," &c.; the Hebrew verb often expressing, not the action, but the duty to perform it, Genesis 20. 9; Malachi 2. 7). MAURER translates, "They shall be put to shame, for they commit abomination; nay (the prophet correcting himself), there is no shame in them" (ch. 3. 8; 8. 12; Ezekiel 3. 7; Zephaniah 3. 5). them that fall—they shall fall with the rest of their people who are doomed to fall, i. e., I will now cease from words; I will execute vengeance. [CALVIN.] 16. Image from travellers who have lost their road, stopping and inquiring which is the right way on which they once had been, but from which they have wandered. old paths—Idolatry and apostasy are the modern way; the worship of God the old way. Evil is not coeval with good, but a modern degeneracy from good. The forsaking of God is not, in a true sense, a "way cast up" at all (ch. 18. 15; Psalm 139. 24; Malachi 4. 4). rest—(Isaiah 28. 12; Matthew 11. 29.) 17. watchmen—prophets, whose duty it was to announce impending calamities, so as to lead the people to repentance (Isaiah 21. 11; 58. 1; Ezekiel 3. 17; Habakkuk 2. 1). 18. congregation—parallel to "nations;" it therefore means the gathered peoples who are invited to be witnesses how great is the perversity of the Israelites (v. 16, 17), and that they deserve the severe punishment about to be inflicted on them (v. 19). what is among them—what deeds are committed by the Israelites (v. 16, 17). [MAURER.] Or, "what punishments are about to be inflicted on them." [CALVIN.] 19. (Isaiah 1. 2.) fruit of . . . thoughts—(Proverbs 1. 31.) nor to my law, but rejected it—lit., "and (as to) my law they have rejected it." The same construction occurs, Genesis 22. 24. 20. Lit., "To what purpose is this to me, that incense cometh to me?" incense . . . came—(Isaiah 43. 24; 60. 6.) No external services are accepted by God without obedience of the heart and life (ch. 7. 21; Psalm 50. 7-9; Isaiah 1. 11; Micah 6. 6, &c.). sweet . . . sweet—antithesis. Your sweet cane is not sweet to me. The calamus. 21. stumbling-blocks—instruments of the Jews' ruin (cf. Matthew 21. 44; Isaiah 8. 14; 1 Peter 2. 8). God Himself ("I") lays them before the reprobate (Psalm 69. 22; Romans 1. 23; 11. 9). fathers . . . sons . . . neighbour . . . friend—indiscriminate ruin. 22. north . . . sides of the earth—The ancients were little acquainted with the north; therefore it is called the remotest regions (as the Hebrew for "sides" ought to be translated, see Note, Isaiah 14. 13) of the earth. The Chaldees are meant (ch. 1. 15; 5. 15). It is striking that the very same calamities which the Chaldeans had inflicted on Zion are threatened as the retribution to be dealt in turn to themselves by Jehovah (ch. 50. 41-43). 23. like the sea—(Isaiah 5. 30.) as men for war—not that they were like warriors, for they were warriors; but "arrayed most perfectly as warriors." [MAURER.] 24. fame thereof—the report of them. 25. He addresses "the daughter of

Zion" (v. 23); caution to the citizens of Jerusalem not to expose themselves to the enemy by going outside of the city walls. sword of the enemy—lit., there is a sword to the enemy; the enemy hath a sword. 26. wallow . . . in ashes—(Ch. 25. 34; Micah 1. 10.) As they usually in mourning only "cast ashes on the head," wallowing in them means something more, viz., so entirely to cover one's self with ashes as to be like one who had rolled in them (Ezekiel 27. 30). as for an only son—(Amos 8. 10; Zechariah 12. 10.) lamentation—lit., lamentation expressed by beating the breast. 27. tower . . . fortress—(ch. 1. 18), rather, "an assayer (and) explorer." By a metaphor from metallurgy in v. 27-30, Jehovah, in conclusion, confirms the prophet in his office, and the latter sums up the description of the reprobate people on whom he had to work. The Hebrew for "assayer" (English Version, "tower") is from a root to try metals. "Explorer" (English Version, "fortress") is from an Arabic root, keen-sighted; or a Hebrew root, cutting, i. e., separating the metal from the dross. [EWALD.] GESENIUS translates as English Version, "fortress," which does not accord with the previous "assayer." 28. grievous revolters—lit., contumacious of the contumacious, i. e., most contumacious, the Hebrew mode of expressing a superlative. So "the strong among the mighty," i. e., the strongest (Ezekiel 32. 21). See ch. 5. 23; Hosea 4. 16. walking with slanders—(ch. 9. 4.) "Going about for the purpose of slandering." [MAURER.] brass, &c.—i. e., copper. It and "iron" being the baser and harder metals express the debased and obdurate character of the Jews (Isaiah 48. 4; 60. 17). 29. bellows . . . burned—so intense a heat is made that the very bellows are almost set on fire. ROSENMULLER translates not so well from a Hebrew root, "pant" or "snort," referring to the sound of the bellows blown hard. lead—employed to separate the baser metal from the silver, as quicksilver is now used. In other words, the utmost pains have been used to purify Israel in the furnace of affliction, but in vain (ch. 5. 3; 1 Peter 1. 7). consumed of the fire—In the Chetib or Hebrew text, the "consumed" is supplied out of the previous "burned." Translating as ROSENMULLER, "pant," this will be inadmissible; and the Keri (Hebrew margin) division of the Hebrew words will have to be read, to get "is consumed of the fire." This is an argument for the translation, "are burned." founder—the refiner. wicked . . . not plucked away—answering to the dross which has no good metal to be separated, the mass being all dross. 30. Reprobate—Silver so full of alloy as to be utterly worthless (Isaiah 1. 22). The Jews were fit only for rejection.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-34. CHAPTERS 7-9. DELIVERED IN THE BEGINNING OF JEHOIAKIM'S REIGN, ON THE OCCASION OF SOME PUBLIC FESTIVAL. The prophet stood at the gate of the temple in order that the multitudes from the country might hear him. His life was threatened, it appears from ch. 26. 1-9, for this prophecy, denouncing the fate of Shiloh as about to befall the temple at Jerusalem. The prophecy given in detail here is summarily referred to there. After Josiah's death the nation relapsed into idolatry, through Jehoiakim's bad influence; the worship of Jehovah was, however, combined with it (v. 4, 10). 2. the gate—i. e., the gate of the court of Israel within that of the women. Those whom Jeremiah addresses came through the gate leading into the court of the women, and the gate leading into the outer court, or court of the Gentiles ("these gates"). 3. cause you to dwell—permit you still to dwell (ch. 18. 11; 26. 13). 4. The Jews falsely thought that because their temple had been chosen by Jehovah as His peculiar dwelling, it could never be destroyed. Men think that ceremonial observances will supersede the need of holiness (Isaiah 48. 2; Micah 3. 11). The triple repetition of "the temple of Jehovah" expresses the intense confidence of the Jews (see ch. 22. 29; Isaiah 6. 3). these—the temple buildings which the prophet points to with his finger (v. 2). 5. For—But. [MAURER.] judgment—justice (ch. 22. 3). this place—this city and land (v. 7).

to your hurt—so v. 19; “to the confusion of their own faces” (ch. 13. 10; Proverbs 8. 36). 7. The apodosis to the “if . . . if” (v. 5, 6), to dwell—to continue to dwell. for ever and ever—joined with “to dwell,” not with the words “gave to your fathers” (cf. ch. 3. 18; Deuteronomy 4. 40). 8. that cannot profit—MAURER translates, “so that you profit nothing” (see v. 4; ch. 5. 31.) 9, 10. “Will ye steal, &c., and then come and stand before me?” whom ye know not—Ye have no grounds of “knowing” that they are gods; but I have manifested my Godhead by my law, by benefits conferred, and by miracles. This aggravates their crime. [CALVIN.] (Judges 5. 8.) 10. And come—And yet come (Ezekiel 23. 39). we are delivered—viz., from all impending calamities. In spite of the prophet’s threats, we have nothing to fear; we have offered our sacrifices, and therefore Jehovah will “deliver” us. to do all these abominations—viz., those enumerated (v. 9). These words are not to be connected with “we are delivered,” but thus: “Is it with this design that ye come and stand before me in this house,” in order that having offered your worthless sacrifices ye may be taken into my favour and so do all these abominations (v. 9) with impunity? [MAURER.] 11. den of robbers—Do you regard my temple as being what robbers make their den, viz., an asylum wherein ye may obtain impunity for your abominations (v. 10)? seen it—viz., that ye treat my house as if it were a den of thieves. Jehovah implies more than is expressed, “I have seen and will punish it” (Isaiah 56. 7; Matthew 21. 13). 12. my place . . . in Shiloh—God caused His tabernacle to be set up in Shiloh in Joshua’s days (Joshua 18. 1; Judges 18. 31). In Eli’s time God gave the ark, which had been at Shiloh, into the hands of the Philistines (ch. 28. 6; 1 Samuel 4. 10, 11; Psalm 78. 56-61). Shiloh was situated between Bethel and Shechem in Ephraim. at the first—implying that Shiloh exceeded the Jewish temple in antiquity. But God’s favour is not tied down to localities (Acts 7. 44). my people Israel—Israel was God’s people, yet He spared it not when rebellious: neither will He spare Judah, now that it rebels, though heretofore it has been His people. 13. rising . . . early—implying unwearied earnestness in soliciting them (v. 25; ch. 11. 17; 2 Chronicles 36. 15). 14. I gave—and I therefore can revoke the gift (for it is still mine, Leviticus 25. 23), now that ye fail in the only object for which it was given, the promotion of my glory. Shiloh—as I ceased to dwell there, transferring my temple to Jerusalem; so I will cease to dwell at Jerusalem. 15. your brethren—children of Abraham, as much as you. whole seed of Ephraim—They were superior to you in numbers and power: they were ten tribes: ye but two. “Ephraim,” as the leading tribe, stands for the whole ten tribes (2 Kings 17. 23; Psalm 73. 67, 68). 16. When people are given up to judicial hardness of heart, intercessory prayer for them is unavailing (ch. 11. 14; 14. 11; 15. 1; Exodus 32. 10; 1 John 5. 16). 17. Jehovah leaves it to Jeremiah himself to decide, is there not good reason that prayers should not be heard in behalf of such rebels? 18. children . . . fathers . . . women—not merely isolated individuals practised idolatry: young and old, men and women, and whole families, contributed their joint efforts to promote it. Oh that there were the same zeal for the worship of God as there is for error (ch. 44. 17, 19; 19. 13)! cakes . . . queen of heaven—Cakes were made of honey, fine flour, &c., in a round flat shape to resemble the disc of the moon, to which they were offered. Others read as Margin, “the frame of heaven,” i. e., the planets generally; so LXX. here; but elsewhere LXX. translate, “queen of heaven.” The Phœnicians called the moon Ashoreth or Astarte: the wife of Baal or Moloch, the king of heaven. The male and female pair of deities symbolized the generative powers of nature; hence arose the introduction of prostitution in the worship. The Babylonians worshipped her as Mylitta, i. e., generative. Our Monday, or Moon-day, indicates the former prevalence of moon-worship (Note, Isaiah 65. 11). that they may provoke me—implying design: in worshipping strange gods they seemed as if purposely to provoke Jehovah. 19. Is it me that they provoke to anger? Is it not themselves? &c.

(Deuteronomy 32. 16, 21; Job 35. 6, 8; Proverbs 8. 36). 20. beast . . . trees . . . ground—Why doth God vent His fury on these? On account of man, for whom these were created, that the sad spectacle may strike terror into him (Romans 8. 20-22). 21. Put . . . burnt offerings unto . . . sacrifices . . . eat flesh—Add the former (which the law required to be wholly burnt) to the latter (which were burnt only in part), and “eat flesh,” even of the holocausts or burnt offerings. As far as I am concerned, saith Jehovah, you may do with one and the other alike. I will have neither (Isaiah 1. 11; Hosea 8. 13; Amos 5. 21, 22). 22. Not contradicting the Divine obligation of the legal sacrifices. But, “I did not require sacrifices, unless combined with moral obedience” (Psalm 50. 8; 51. 16, 17). The superior claim of the moral above the positive precepts of the law was marked by the ten commandments having been delivered first, and by the two tables of stone being deposited alone in the ark (Deuteronomy 5. 6). The negative in Hebrew often supplies the want of the comparative: not excluding the thing denied, but only implying the prior claim of the thing set in opposition to it (Hosea 6. 6). “I will have mercy, and not sacrifice (1 Samuel 15. 22). Love to God is the supreme end, external observances only means towards that end. “The mere sacrifice was not so much what I commanded, as the sincere submission to my will which gives to the sacrifice all its virtue.” [MAGEE, Atonement, note 57.] 23. (Exodus 15. 26; 19. 5.) 24. hearkened not—They did not give even a partial hearing to me (Psalm 81. 11, 12). imagination—rather, as Margin, “the stubbornness.” backward, &c.—(Ch. 2. 27; 32. 33; Hosea 4. 16.) 25. rising . . . early—(v. 13.) 26. hardened . . . neck—(Deuteronomy 31. 27; Isaiah 48. 4; Acts 7. 51.) worse than their fathers—(Ch. 16. 12.) In v. 22 He had said, “your fathers,” here He says, “their fathers,” the change to the third person marks growing alienation from them. He no longer addresses themselves, as it would be a waste of words in the case of such hardened rebels. 27. Therefore—rather, “Though thou speak . . . yet they will not hearken” [MAURER] (Ezekiel 2. 7). A trial to the prophet’s faith; though he knew his warnings would be unheeded, still he was to give them in obedience to God. 28. unto them—i. e., in reference to them. a nation—the word usually applied to the Gentile nations is here applied to the Jews, as being cast off and classed by God among the Gentiles. nor receiveth correction—(Ch. 5. 3.) truth . . . perished—(Ch. 9. 3.) 29. Jeremiah addresses Jerusalem under the figure of a woman, who, in grief for her lost children, deprives her head of its chief ornament, and goes up to the hills to weep (Judges 11. 37, 38; Isaiah 15. 2). hair—flowing locks, like those of a Nazarite. high places—the scene of her idolatries is to be the scene of her mourning (ch. 3. 21). generation of his wrath—the generation with which he is wroth. So Isaiah 10. 6; “the people of my wrath.” 30. set their abominations in the house—(Ch. 32. 34; 2 Kings 21. 4, 7; 23. 4; Ezekiel 8. 5-14.) 31. high places of Tophet—the altars [HORSLEY] of Tophet; erected to Moloch, on the heights along the south of the valley facing Zion. burn . . . sons—(Psalm 106. 38.) commanded . . . not—put for, “I forbade expressly” (Deuteronomy 17. 3; 12. 31). See ch. 2. 23; Isaiah 30. 33; Notes. 32. valley of slaughter—so named because of the great slaughter of the Jews about to take place at Jerusalem: a just retribution of their sin in slaying their children to Moloch in Tophet. no place—no room, viz., to bury in, so many shall be those slain by the Chaldeans (ch. 19. 11; Ezekiel 6. 5). 33. fray—severe or frighten (Deuteronomy 28. 26). Typical of the last great battle between the Lord’s host and the apostasy (Revelation 19. 17, 18, 21). 34. Referring to the joyous songs and music with which the bride and bridegroom were escorted in the procession to the home of the latter from that of the former; a custom still prevalent in the East (ch. 16. 9; Isaiah 24. 7, 8; Revelation 18. 23).

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-22. THE JEWS' COMING PUNISHMENT; THEIR UNIVERSAL AND INCURABLE IMPENITENCE. 1. The victo-

rious Babylonians were about to violate the sanctuaries of the dead in search of plunder; for ornaments, treasures, and insignia of royalty were usually buried with kings. Or rather, their purpose was to do the greatest dishonour to the dead (Isaiah 14. 19). 2. spread . . . before the sun, &c.—retribution in kind. The very objects which received their idolatries shall unconcernedly witness their dishonour. loved . . . served . . . after . . . walked . . . sought . . . worshipped—words are accumulated, as if enough could not be said fully to express the mad fervour of their idolatry to the heavenly host (2 Kings 23. 5). nor . . . buried—(Ch. 22. 19.) dung—(Ch. 9. 22; Psalm 83. 10.) 3. The survivors shall be still worse off than the dead (Job 3. 21, 22; Revelation 9. 6). which remain in all the places—"in all places of them that remain, whither I," &c., i. e., in all places whither I have driven them that remain. [MAURER.] 4. "Is it not a natural instinct, that if one falls, he rises again; if one turns away (i. e., wander from the way), he will return to the point from which he wandered? Why then does not Jerusalem do so?" He plays on the double sense of return; literal and metaphorical (ch. 3. 12; 4. 1). 5. slidden . . . backsliding—rather, as the Hebrew is the same as v. 4, to which this verse refers, "turned away with a perpetual turning away." perpetual—in contrast to the "arise" (rise again v. 4). refuse to return—in contrast to, "shall he . . . not return" (v. 4; ch. 5. 3). 6. spake not aright—i. e., not so as penitently to confess that they acted wrong. Cf. what follows. every one . . . his course—The Keri reads course, but the Chetib, courses. "They persevere in the courses whatever they have once entered on." Their wicked ways were diversified. horse rusheth—lit., pours himself forth, as water that has burst its embankment. The mad rapidity of the war-horse is the point of comparison (Job 39. 19-25). 7. The instinct of the migratory birds leads them with un-failing regularity to return every spring from their winter abodes in summer climes (Song of Solomon 2. 12); but God's people will not return to Him even when the winter of His wrath is past, and He invites them back to the spring of his favour. in the heaven—emphatical. The birds whose very element is the air, in which they are never at rest, yet show a steady sagacity, which God's people do not. times—viz., of migrating, and of returning. my people—this honourable title aggravates the unnatural perversity of the Jews towards their God. know not, &c.—(Ch. 5. 4, 5; Isaiah 1. 3.) 8. law . . . with us—(Romans 2. 17.) Possessing the law, on which they prided themselves, the Jews might have become the wisest of nations; but by their neglecting its precepts, the law became given "in vain," as far as they were concerned. scribes—copyists. "In vain" copies were multiplied. MAURER translates, "The false pen of the scribes hath converted it (the law) into a lie." See Margin, which agrees with Vulgate. 9. dismayed—confounded. what wisdom—lit., the wisdom of what? i. e., wisdom in what respect? The Word of the Lord being the only true source of wisdom (Psalm 119. 93-100; Proverbs 1. 7; 9. 10). 10-12. Repeated from ch. 6. 12-15. See a similar repetition, v. 15; ch. 14. 19. inherit—succeed to the possession of them. 11. (Ezekiel 13. 10.) 13. surely consume—lit., gathering I will gather, or consuming I will consume. no grapes . . . nor figs—(Joel 1. 7; Matthew 21. 19.) things that I have given . . . shall pass away—rather, "I will appoint to them those who shall overwhelm (pass over) them," i. e., I will send the enemy upon them. [MAURER.] English Version accords well with the context: Though their grapes and figs ripen, they shall not be allowed to enjoy them. 14. assemble—for defence. let us be silent—not assault the enemy, but merely defend ourselves in quiet, until the storm blow over. put us to silence—brought us to that state that we can no longer resist the foe; implying silent despair. water of gall—lit., water of the poisonous plant, perhaps the poppy (ch. 9. 15; 23. 15). 15. Repeated (ch. 14. 19). We looked for—owing to the expectations held out by the false prophets. health—healing; i. e., restoration from adversity. 16. his horses—the Chaldean's. was heard—the prophetic past for the future. from Dan—bordering on Phenicia. This was to be Nebuchadnezzar's route in invading Israel; the cavalry in advance of the infantry would scour the country. strong ones—a poetical phrase for steeds, peculiar to Jeremiah (ch. 47. 3; cf. ch. 4. 13, 29; 6. 23). 17. I—Jehovah. cockatrices—basilisks (Isaiah 11. 8), i. e., enemies whose destructive power no means, by persuasion or otherwise, can counteract. Serpent-charmers in the East entice serpents by music, and by a particular pressure on the neck render them incapable of darting (Psalm 58. 4, 5). 18. (Isaiah 22. 4.) The lamentation of the prophet for the impending calamity of his country. against sorrow—or, with respect to sorrow. MAURER translates, "Oh my exhilaration as to sorrow!" i. e., "Oh that exhilaration (comfort, from an Arabic root, to shine as the rising sun) would shine upon me as to my sorrow!" in me—within me. 19. The prophet in vision hears the cry of the exiled Jews, wondering that God should have delivered them up to the enemy, seeing that He is Zion's king, dwelling in her (Micah 3. 11). In the latter half of the verse God replies that their own idolatry, not want of faithfulness on His part, is the cause. because of them that dwell in a far country—rather, "from a land of distances," i. e., a distant land (Isaiah 39. 3). English Version understands the cry to be of the Jews in their own land, because of the enemy coming from their far-off country. strange vanities—foreign gods. 20. Proverbial. Meaning, One season of hope after another has passed, but the looked-for deliverance never came, and now all hope is gone. 21. black—sad in visage with grief (Joel 2. 6). 22. balm—balsam; to be applied to the wounds of my people. Brought into Judea first from Arabia Felix, by the queen of Sheba, in Solomon's time (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities 8. 2). The opobalsamum of Pliny; or else [BOCHART] the resin drawn from the terebinth. It abounded in Gilead, east of Jordan, where, in consequence, many "physicians" established themselves (ch. 46. 11; 51. 8; Genesis 37. 25; 43. 11). health . . . recovered—the Hebrew is lit., lengthening out . . . gone up; hence the long bandage applied to blind up a wound. So the Arabic also. [GESENIUS.]

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-26. JEREMIAH'S LAMENTATION FOR THE JEWS' SINS AND CONSEQUENT PUNISHMENT. 1. This verse is more fitly joined to the last chapter, as v. 23 in the Hebrew (cf. Isaiah 22. 4; Lamentations 2. 11; 3. 48). 2. lodging-place—A caravanserai for caravans, or companies travelling in the desert, remote from towns. It was a square building enclosing an open court. Though a lonely and often filthy dwelling, Jeremiah would prefer even it to the comforts of Jerusalem, so as to be removed from the pollutions of the capital (Psalm 53. 7, 8). 3. bend . . . tongues . . . for lies—i. e., with lies as their arrows; they direct lies on their tongue as their bow (Psalm 64. 3, 4). not valiant for . . . truth—(Ch. 7. 28.) MAURER translates, "They do not prevail by truth" or faith (Psalm 12. 4). Their tongue, not faith, is their weapon. upon . . . earth—rather, "in the land." know not me—(Hosea 4. 1.) 4. supplant—lit., trip up by the heel (Hosea 12. 3). walk with slanders—(Ch. 6. 28.) 5. weary themselves—are at laborious pains to act perversely. [MAURER.] Sin is a hard bondage (Habakkuk 2. 13). 6. Thine—God addresses Jeremiah, who dwelt in the midst of deceitful men. refuse to know me—their ignorance of God is wilful (v. 3; ch. 5. 4, 5). 7. melt . . . try them—by sending calamities on them. for how shall I do—"What else can I do for the sake of the daughter of my people?" [MAURER] (Isaiah 1. 25; Malachi 3. 3). 8. tongue . . . arrows shot out—rather, "a murdering arrow" [MAURER] (v. 3). speaketh peaceably . . . in heart . . . layeth . . . wait—layeth his ambush. [HENDERSON.] (Psalm 55. 21.) 9. (Ch. 5. 9, 23.) 10. Jeremiah breaks in upon Jehovah's threats of wrath with a lamentation for his desolated country. mountains—once cultivated and fruitful: the hill-sides were cultivated in terraces between the rocks. habitations of . . . wilderness—rather, "the pleasant herbage (lit., the choice parts of any thing) of the pasture plain." The Hebrew for wilderness expresses not a barren desert, but an untilled plain, fit for pasture. burned up—because no one waters them; the inhabitants being all gone. none can pass through them—much less inhabit them. fowl—(Ch. 4. 25.)

11. And—omit And. Jehovah here resumes His speech from v. 9. And—(Note, Isaiah 25. 2.) dragons—jackals.

12. Rather, "Who is a wise man? (i. e., Whosoever has inspired wisdom, 2 Peter 3. 15) let him understand this (weigh well the evils impending, and the causes of their being sent); and he to whom the mouth of the Lord hath spoken (i. e., whosoever is prophetically inspired), let him declare it to his fellow-countrymen," if haply they may be roused to repentance, the only hope of safety.

13. Answer to the "for what the land perisheth" (v. 12). 14. (Ch. 7. 24.) Baalim—plural of Baal, to express his supposed manifold powers. fathers taught them—(Galatians 1. 14; 1 Peter 1. 18.) We are not to follow the errors of the fathers, but the authority of Scripture and of God. [JEROME.] 15. feed—(Ch. 8. 14; 23. 15; Psalm 80. 5.) 16. nor their fathers have known—alluding to v. 14, "Their fathers taught them" idolatry; therefore the children shall be scattered to a land which neither their fathers nor they have known. send a sword after them—not even in flight shall they be safe. 17. mourning women—hired to heighten lamentation by plaintive cries, baring the breast, beating the arms, and suffering the locks to flow dishevelled (2 Chronicles 35. 25; Ecclesiastes 12. 5; Matthew 9. 23). cunning—skilled in wailing. 18. (Ch. 14. 17.) 19. The cry of "the mourning women." spoiled—laid waste. dwellings . . . cast us out—fulfilling Leviticus 18. 23; 20. 22. CALVIN translates, "The enemy have cast down our habitations."

20. Yet—rather, "Only." [HENDERSON.] This particle calls attention to what follows. teach . . . daughters wailing—The deaths will be so many that there will be a lack of mourning women to bewail them. The mothers, therefore, must teach their daughters the science to supply the want. 21. death . . . windows—The death-inflicting soldiery, finding the doors closed, burst in by the windows. to cut off . . . children from . . . streets—Death cannot be said to enter the windows to cut off the children in the streets, but to cut them off, so as no more to play in the streets without (Zechariah 8. 5). 23. saith the Lord—containing the thread of discourse from v. 20. dung—(Ch. 8. 2.) handful . . . none . . . gather them—implying that the handful has been so trodden as to be not worth even the poor gleaner's while to gather it. Or the Eastern custom may be referred to: the reaper cuts the grain and is followed by another who gathers it. This grain shall not be worth while gathering. How galling to the pride of the Jews to hear that so shall their carcases be trodden contemptuously under foot! 23. wisdom—political sagacity; as if it could rescue from the impending calamities. might—military prowess. 24. Nothing but an experimental knowledge of God will save the nation. understandeth—theoretically; in the intellect. knoweth—practically: so as to walk in my ways (ch. 22. 16; Job 22. 21; 1 Corinthians 1. 31). loving-kindness—God's mercy is put in the first and highest place, because without it we should flee from God in fear and despair. judgment . . . righteousness—loving-kindness towards the godly; judgment towards the ungodly; righteousness the most perfect fairness in all cases. [GROTIUS.] Faithfulness to his promises to preserve the godly, as well as stern execution of judgment on the ungodly, is included in "righteousness." in the earth—contrary to the dogma of some philosophers, that God does not interfere in terrestrial concerns (Psalms 58. 11). in these . . . I delight—as well in doing them as in seeing them done by others (Micah 6. 8; 7. 18). 25. with the uncircumcised—rather, "all that are circumcised in uncircumcision." [HENDERSON.] The Hebrew is an abstract term, not a concrete, as English Version translates, and as the pious "circumcised" is. The nations specified, Egypt, Judah, &c., were outwardly "circumcised," but in heart were "uncircumcised." The heathen nations were defiled, in spite of their literal circumcision, by idolatry. The Jews, with all their glorying in their spiritual privileges, were no better (ch. 4. 4; Deuteronomy 10. 16; 30. 6; Romans 2. 28, 29; Colossians 2. 11). However, Ezekiel 31. 18; 32. 19, may imply that the Egyptians were uncircumcised; and it is uncertain as to the other nations specified whether they were at that early time circumcised. HERODOTUS says the Egyptians were so; but others think this applies only to the priests and others having a sacred character, not to the mass of the nation; so English Version may be right (Romans 28. 29). 26. Egypt—put first to degrade Judah, who, though in privileges above the Gentiles, by unfaithfulness sank below them. Egypt, too, was the power in which the Jews were so prone to trust, and by whose instigation they, as well as the other peoples specified, revolted from Babylon. in the utmost corners—rather, "having the hair shaven (or clipped) in angles," i. e., having the beard on the cheek narrowed or cut; a Canaanitish custom, forbidden to the Israelites (Leviticus 19. 27; 21. 5). The Arabs are hereby referred to (cf. ch. 25. 23; 49. 32), as the words in apposition show, "that dwell in the wilderness." uncircumcised . . . uncircumcised in heart—The addition of "in the heart" in Israel's case marks its greater guilt in proportion to its greater privileges, as compared with the rest.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-25. CONTRAST BETWEEN THE IDOLS AND JEHOVAH. THE PROPHET'S LAMENTATION AND PRAYER. 1. Israel—The Jews, the surviving representatives of the nation. 2. EICHORN thinks the reference here to be to some celestial portent which had appeared at that time, causing the Jews dismay. Probably the reference is general, viz., to the Chaldees, famed as astrologers, through contact with whom the Jews were likely to fall into the same superstition. way—the precepts or ordinances (Leviticus 18. 3; Acts 9. 2). signs of heaven—The Gentiles did not acknowledge a Great First Cause; many thought events depended on the power of the stars, which some, as PLATO, thought to be endued with spirit and reason. All heavenly phenomena are included, eclipses, comets, &c. one cutteth a tree, &c.—rather, "It (that which they busy themselves about: a sample of their 'customs') is a tree cut out of the forest." [MAURER.] 4. fasten . . . move not—i. e., that it may stand upright without risk of falling, which the god (!) would do, if left to itself (Isaiah 41. 7). 5. upright—or, "They are of turned work, resembling a palm tree." [MAURER.] The point of comparison between the idol and the palm is in the pillar-like uprightness of the latter, it having no branches except at the top. speak not—(Psalm 115. 5.) cannot go—i. e., walk (Psalm 115. 7; Isaiah 46. 1, 7). neither . . . do good—(Isaiah 41. 23.) 6. none—lit., no particle of nothing: nothing whatever; the strongest possible denial (Exodus 15. 11; Psalm 86. 8, 10). 7. (Revelation 15. 4.) to thee doth it appertain—to thee it properly belongs, viz., that thou shouldst be "feared" (taken out of the previous "fear thee") (cf. Ezekiel 21. 27). He alone is the becoming object of worship. To worship any other is unseemly, and an infringement of His inalienable prerogative. none—nothing whatever (Note v. 6; Psalm 89. 6). 8. altogether—Rather, all alike. [MAURER.] Even the so-called "wise" men (v. 7) of the Gentiles are on a level with the brutes and "foolish," viz., because they connive at the popular idolatry (cf. Romans 1. 21-23). Therefore, in Daniel and Revelation, the world-power is represented under a bestial form. Man divests himself of his true humanity, and sinks to the level of the brute, when he severs his connection with God (Psalm 115. 8; Jonah 2. 8). stock is a doctrine of vanities—The stock (put for the worship of all idols whatever, made out of a stock) speaks for itself, that the whole theory of idolatry is vanity (Isaiah 44. 9-11). CASTALIO translates, "the very wood itself confuting the vanity" (of the idol). 9. Everything connected with idols is the result of human effort. Silver spread—(Notes, Isaiah 30. 22; 40. 19.) Tarshish—Tartessus, in Spain, famed for precious metals. Uphaz—(Daniel 10. 5.) As the Septuagint in the Syrian Hexapla in the Margin, Theodotus, the Syrian and Chaldee versions have Ophir, GENSENIUS thinks Uphaz a colloquial corruption (one letter only being changed) for Ophir. Ophir, in Genesis 10. 29, is mentioned among Arabian countries. Perhaps Malacca is the country meant, the natives of which still call their gold mines Ophirs. HEEREN thinks Ophir the general name for the rich countries of the south, on the Arabian, African, and Indian coasts; just as our term, East Indies. cunning—skilful. 10. true God—lit., God Jehovah is truth; not merely true, i. e., veracious, but truth in the reality of His essence, as opposed to the "vanity" or emptiness which all idols are (v. 3, 8, 15; 2 Chronicles 15. 3; Psalm 31. 5; 1 John 5. 20). living God—(John 5. 26; 1 Timothy 6. 17.) He hath life in Himself, which no creature has. All else "live in Him" (Acts 17. 23). In contrast to dead idols. everlasting—(Psalm 10. 16.) In contrast to the temporary existence of all other objects of worship. 11. This verse is in Chaldee, Jeremiah supplying his countrymen with a formula of reply to Chaldee idolaters in the tongue most intelligible to the latter. There may be also derision intended in imitating their barbarous dialect. ROSENMULLER objects to this view, that not merely the words put in the mouths of the Israelites, but Jeremiah's own introductory words, "Thus shall ye say to them," are in Chaldee, and thinks it to be a marginal gloss. But it is found in all the oldest versions. It was an old Greek saying, "Whoever thinks himself a god besides the one God, let him make another world" (Psalm 96. 5). shall perish—(Isaiah 2. 18; Zechariah 13. 2.) these heavens—the speaker pointing to them with his fingers. 12. Continuation of v. 10, after the interruption of the thread of the discourse in v. 11 (Psalm 136. 5, 6). 13. Lit., "At the voice of His giving forth," i. e., when He thundereth (Job 38. 34; Psalm 20. 3-5). waters—(Genesis 1. 7)—above the firmament; heavy rains accompany thunder. vapours . . . ascend—(Psalm 135. 7.) treasures—His stores. 14. in his knowledge—"is rendered brutish by his skill," viz., in idol-making (v. 8, 9). Thus the parallel, "confounded by the graven image," corresponds (so ch. 51. 17). Others not so well translate, "without knowledge," viz., of God (see Isaiah 42. 17; 45. 16; Hosea 4. 6). 15. errors—deceptions; from a Hebrew root, to stutter; then meaning to mock. their visitation they—when God shall punish the idol-worshippers (viz., by Cyrus), the idols themselves shall be destroyed [ROSENMULLER] (v. 11). 16. Portion—from a Hebrew root, "to divide." God is the all-sufficient Good of His people (Numbers 18. 20; Psalm 16. 5; 73. 26; Lamentations 3. 24). not like them—not like the idols, a vain object of trust (Deuteronomy 32. 31). former of all things—The Fashioner (as a potter, Isaiah 64. 8) of the universe. rod of his inheritance—The portion marked off as His inheritance by the measuring rod (Ezekiel 48. 21). As He is their portion, so are they His portion (Deuteronomy 32. 9). A reciprocal tie (cf. ch. 51. 19; Psalm 74. 2, Margin). Others make "rod" refer to the tribal rod or sceptre. 17. wares—thine effects or movable goods (Ezekiel 12. 3) Prepare for migrating as captives to Babylon. The address is to Jerusalem, as representative of the whole people. inhabitant of the fortress—Rather, inhabitant of the fortress. Though thou now seemest to inhabit an impregnable fortress, thou shalt have to remove. "The land" is the champaign region opposed to the "fortified" cities. The "fortress" being taken, the whole "land" will share the disaster. HENDERSON translates, "Gather up thy packages from the ground." ROSENMULLER, for "fortress," translates, "siege," i. e., the besieged city. The various articles, in this view, are supposed to be lying about in confusion on the ground during the siege. 18. sling out—expressing the violence and suddenness of the removal to Babylon. A similar image occurs, ch. 16. 13; 1 Samuel 25. 29; Isaiah 22. 17, 18. at this once—at this time, now. find it so—find it by experience, i. e., feel it (Ezekiel 6. 10). MICHAELIS, translates, "I will bind them together (as in a sling) that they may reach the goal" (Babylon). English Version is best: that they may find it so as I have said (Numbers 23. 19; Ezekiel 6. 10). 19. Judea bewails its calamity. wound—the stroke I suffer under. I must bear—not humble submission to God's will (Micah 7. 9), but sullen impotence. Or, rather, it is prophetic of their ultimate acknowledgment of their guilt as the cause of their calamity (Lamentations 3. 39). 20. tabernacle is spoiled—metaphor from the tents of nomadic life; as these are taken down in a few moments, so as not to leave a vestige of them, so Judea (ch. 4. 20). cords—with which the coverings of the tent are extended. curtains—tent-curtains. 21. pastors—the rulers, civil and religious. This verse gives the cause of the impending calamity. 22. bruit—rumour of invasion. The antithesis is between the voice of God in His prophets which they turned a deaf ear to, and the cry of the enemy, a new teacher, whom they must hear. [CALVIN.] north country—Babylon (ch. 1. 15). 23. Despairing of influencing the people, he turns to God. way of man not in himself—(Proverbs 16. 1; 20. 24; James 4. 13, 14.) I know, O Jehovah, that the march of the Babylonian conqueror against me (Jeremiah identifying himself with his people) is not at his own discretion, but is overruled by thee (Isaiah 10. 5-7; cf. v. 19). that walketh—when he walketh, i. e., sets out in any undertaking. direct . . . steps—to give a prosperous issue to (Psalm 73. 23). 24, 25. Since (I my nation) must be corrected (justice requiring it because of the deep guilt of the nation), I do not deprecate all chastisement, but pray only for moderation in it (ch. 30. 11; Psalm 6. 1; 33. 1); and that the full tide of thy fury may be poured out on the heathen invaders for their cruelty towards thy people. Psalm 79. 6, 7, a psalm to be referred to the time of the captivity, its composer probably repeated this from Jeremiah. The imperative, "Pour out," is used instead of the future, expressing vividly the certainty of the prediction, and that the word of God itself effects its own declarations. Accordingly, the Jews were restored after correction; the Babylonians were utterly extinguished. know thee . . . call . . . on thy name—knowledge of God is the beginning of piety; calling on Him the fruit. heathen . . . Jacob—he reminds God of the distinction He has made between His people whom Jacob represents, and the heathen aliens. Correct us as thy adopted sons, the seed of Jacob; destroy them as outcasts (Zechariah 1. 14, 15, 21).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-23. EPILOGUE OF THE COVENANT FOUND IN THE TEMPLE IN JOSIAH'S REIGN. JUDAH'S REVOLT FROM IT, AND GOD'S CONSEQUENT WRATH. 2. this covenant—alluding to the book of the law (Deuteronomy 27. 28) found in the temple by Hilkiah the high priest, five years after Jeremiah's call to the prophetic office (2 Kings 22. 8 to 23. 25). Hear ye—Others besides Jeremiah were to promulge God's will to the people; it was the duty of the priests to read the law to them (Malachi 2. 7). 3. (Deuteronomy 27. 26; Galatians 3. 10.) 4. in the day—i. e., when. The Sinai covenant was some time after the exodus, but the two events are so connected as to be viewed as one. iron furnace—(Deuteronomy 4. 20; 1 Kings 8. 51.) "Furnace" expresses the searching ordeal; "iron," the long duration of it. The furnace was of earth, not of iron (Psalm 12. 6); a furnace, in heat and duration enough to melt even iron. God's deliverance of them from such an ordeal aggravates their present guilt. do them—viz., the words of the covenant (v. 3). so, &c.—(Leviticus 26. 3, 12.) 5. oath—(Psalm 105. 9, 10.) as it is this day—These are the concluding words of God to the Israelites when formerly brought out of Egypt, "Obey, &c., that I may at this time make good the promise I made to your fathers, &c., to give," &c. [MAURER.] English Version makes the words apply to Jeremiah's time, "As ye know at this time, that God's promise has been fulfilled," viz., in Israel's acquisition of Canaan. So be it—Hebrew, Amen. Taken from Deuteronomy 27. 15-26. Jeremiah hereby solemnly concurs in the justice of the curses pronounced there (see v. 3). 6. Jeremiah was to take a prophetic tour throughout Judah, to proclaim everywhere the denunciations in the book of the law found in the temple. Hear . . . do—(Romans 2. 13; James 1. 22.) 7. rising early—(Ch. 7. 13.) 8. imagination—rather, stubbornness. will bring—the words, "even unto this day" (v. 7), confirm English Version rather than the rendering of ROSENMULLER: "I brought upon them," words—threats (v. 3; Deuteronomy 27. 15-26). 9. conspiracy—a deliberate combination against God and against Jo-

siah's reformation. Their idolatry is not the result of a hasty impulse (Psalm 83. 5; Ezekiel 22. 25). 11. cry unto me—contrasted with "cry unto the gods," &c. (v. 12). not hearken—(Psalm 18. 41; Proverbs 1. 28; Isaiah 1. 15; Micah 3. 4). 12. cry unto the gods . . . not save—(Deuteronomy 32. 37, 38.) Cf. with this verse and beginning of v. 13, ch. 2. 23. in the time of their trouble—i. e., calamity (ch. 2. 27). 13. shameful thing—Hebrew, shame, viz., the idol, not merely shameful, but the essence of all that is shameful (ch. 3. 24; Hosea 9. 10), which will bring shame and confusion on yourselves. [CALVIN.] 14. There is a climax of guilt which admits of no further intercessory prayer (Exodus 32. 10, in the Chaldee version, "leave off praying;" ch. 7. 16; 1 Samuel 16. 1; 15. 35; 1 John 5. 16). Our mind should be at one with God in all that He is doing, even in the rejection of the reprobate. for their trouble—on account of their trouble. Other MSS. read, "in the time of their trouble;" a gloss from v. 12. 15. my beloved—my elect people, Judea; this aggravates their ingratitude (ch. 12. 7). lewdness with many—(Ezekiel 16. 25.) Rather, "that great (or, manifold) enormity;" lit., the enormity, the manifold, viz., their idolatry, which made their worship of God in the temple a mockery (cf. ch. 7. 10; Ezekiel 23. 39). [HENDERSON.] holy flesh—(Haggai 2. 12-14; Titus 1. 15), viz., the sacrifices, which, through the guilt of the Jews, were no longer holy, i. e., acceptable to God. The sacrifices on which they relied well, therefore, no longer protect them. Judah is represented as a priest's wife, who, by adultery, has forfeited her share in the flesh of the sacrifices, and yet boasts of her prerogative at the very same time. [HORSLEY.] when thou doest evil—lit., "when thy evil" (is at hand). PISCATOR translates, "When thy calamity is at hand (according to God's threats), thou gloriest" (against God, instead of humbling thyself). English Version is best (cf. Proverbs 2. 14). 16. called thy name—made thee. olive—(Psalm 52. 8; Romans 11. 17.) The "olive" is chosen to represent the adoption of Judah by the free grace of God, as its oil is the image of richness (cf. Psalm 23. 5; 104. 15). with . . . noise of . . . tumult—or, "at the noise," &c., viz., at the tumult of the invading army (Isaiah 13. 4). [MAURER.] Or, rather, "with the sound of a mighty voice," viz., that of God, i. e., the thunder; thus there is no confusion of metaphors. The tree stricken with lightning has "fire kindled upon it, and the branches are broken," at one and the same time. [HUBBIGANT.] 17. that planted thee—(Ch. 2. 21; Isaiah 5. 2.) against themselves—the sinner's sin is to his own hurt (Note, ch. 7. 19). 18, 19. Jeremiah here digresses to notice the attempt on his life plotted by his townsmen of Anathoth. He had no suspicion of it, until Jehovah revealed it to him (ch. 12. 6). the Lord . . . thou—The change of person from the third to the second accords with the excited feelings of the prophet. then—when I was in peril of my life. their doings—those of the men of Anathoth. His thus alluding to them, before he has mentioned their name, is due to his excitement. 19. lamb—lit., a pet-lamb, such as the Jews often had in their houses, for their children to play with; and the Arabs still have (2 Samuel 12. 3). His own familiar friends had plotted against the prophet. The language is exactly the same as that applied to Messiah (Isaiah 53. 7). Each prophet and patriarch exemplified in his own person some one feature or more in the manifold attributes and sufferings of the Messiah to come; just as the saints have done since His coming (Galatians 2. 20; Philipplians 3. 10; Colossians 1. 24). This adapted both the more experimentally to testify of Christ. devices—(Ch. 18. 18.) tree with . . . fruit—lit., in its fruit or food, i. e., when it is in fruit. Proverbial, to express the destruction of cause and effect together. The man is the tree; his teaching, the fruit. Let us destroy the prophet and his prophecies; viz., those threatening destruction to the nation, which offended them. Cf. Matthew 7. 17, which also refers to prophets and their doctrines. 20. triest . . . heart—(Revelation 2. 23.) revealed—committed my cause. Jeremiah's wish for vengeance was not personal but ministerial, and accorded with God's purpose revealed to him against the enemies alike of God and of His servant (Psalm 37. 34; 54. 7; 112. 8;

118. 7). 21. Prophecy not—(Isaiah 30. 10; Amos 2. 12; Micah 2. 6.) If Jeremiah had not uttered his denunciatory predictions, they would not have plotted against him. None were more bitter than his own fellow-townsmen. Cf. the conduct of the Nazarites towards Jesus of Nazareth (Luke 4. 24-29). 22. The retribution of their intended murder shall be in kind. Just as in Messiah's case (Psalm 69. 8-28). 23. (Ch. 23. 12.) the year of . . . visitation—LXX. translate, "in the year of their," &c., i. e., at the time when I shall visit them in wrath. JEROME supports English Version. "Year" often means a determined time.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-17. CONTINUATION OF THE SUBJECT AT THE CLOSE OF CHAPTER II. He ventures to expostulate with Jehovah as to the prosperity of the wicked, who had plotted against his life (v. 1-4); in reply he is told that he will have worse to endure, and that from his own relatives (v. 5, 6). The heaviest judgments, however, would be inflicted on the faithless people (v. 7-13); and then on the nations co-operating with the Chaldeans against Judah, with, however, a promise of mercy on repentance (v. 14-17). 1. (Psalm 51. 4.) let me talk, &c.—only let me reason the case with thee: inquire of thee the causes why such wicked men as these plotters against my life prosper (cf. Job 12. 6; 21. 7; Psalm 37. 1, 35; 73. 3; Malachi 3. 15). It is right, like Jeremiah, when hard thoughts of God's providence suggest themselves, to fortify our minds by justifying God beforehand, even before we hear the reasons of His dealings. 2. grow—lit., go on, progress. Thou givest them sure dwellings and increasing prosperity. near in . . . mouth . . . far from . . . reins—(Isaiah 29. 13; Matthew 15. 8.) Hypocrites. 3. knowest me—(Psalm 139. 1.) tried . . . heart—(Ch. 11. 20.) toward thee—rather, with thee, i. e., entirely devoted to thee; contrasted with the hypocrites (v. 2), "near in . . . mouth, and far from . . . reins." This being so, how is it that I fare so ill, they so well? pull . . . out—containing the metaphor, from a "rooted tree" (v. 2). prepare—lit., separate, or set apart as devoted. day of slaughter—(James 5. 5.) 4. land mourn—personification (ch. 14. 2; 23. 10). for the wickedness—(Psalm 107. 34.) beasts—(Hosea 4. 3.) He shall not see our last end—Jehovah knows not what is about to happen to us (ch. 5. 12). [ROSENMULLER.] So LXX. (Psalm 10. 11; Ezekiel 8. 12; 9. 9). Rather, "The prophet (Jeremiah, to whom the whole context refers) shall not see our last end." We need not trouble ourselves about his boding predictions. We shall not be destroyed as he says (ch. 5. 12, 13). 5. Jehovah's reply to Jeremiah's complaint. horses—i. e., horsemen: the argument a fortiori. A proverbial phrase. The injuries done thee by the men of Anathoth ("the footmen") are small compared with those which the men of Jerusalem ("the horsemen") are about to inflict on thee. If the former weary thee out, how wilt thou contend with the king, the court, and the priests at Jerusalem? where-in thou trustest, they wearied thee—English Version thus fills up the sentence with the italicized words, to answer to the parallel clause in the first sentence of the verse. The parallelism is, however, sufficiently retained with a less ellipsis: "If (it is only) in a land of peace thou art confident." [MAURER.] swelling of Jordan—In harvest time and earlier (April and May) it overflows its banks (Joshua 3. 15), and fills the valley called the Ghor. Or, "the pride of Jordan," viz., its wooded banks abounding in lions and other wild beasts (ch. 49. 19; 50. 44; Zechariah 11. 3; cf. 2 Kings 6. 2). MAUNDELL says, that between the Sea of Tiberias and Lake Merom the banks are so wooded that the traveller cannot see the river at all without first passing through the woods. If in the champaign country (alone) thou art secure, how wilt thou do when thou fallest into the wooded haunts of wild beasts? 6. even thy brethren—As in Christ's case (Psalm 69. 8; John 1. 11; 7. 5; cf. ch. 9. 4; 11. 19, 21; Matthew 10. 36). Godly faithfulness is sure to provoke the ungodly even of one's own family. called a multitude after thee—(Isaiah 81.

4.) JEROME translates, "cry after thee with a loud (lit., full) voice." believe . . . not . . . though . . . speak fair—(Proverbs 26, 25.) 7. I have forsaken—Jehovah will forsake His temple and the people peculiarly His. The mention of God's close tie to them; as heretofore His, aggravates their ingratitude, and shows that their past spiritual privileges will not prevent God from punishing them. beloved of my soul—image from a wife (ch. 11, 15; Isaiah 54, 5). 8. Is unto me—is become unto me: behaves towards me as a lion which roars against a man, so that he withdraws from the place where he hears it: so I withdrew from my people, once beloved, but now an object of abhorrence because of their rebellious cries against me. 9. speckled bird—many translate, "a ravenous beast, the hyena;" the corresponding Arabic word means hyena; so LXX. But the Hebrew always elsewhere means "a bird of prey." The Hebrew for "speckled" is from a root "to colour;" answering to the Jewish blending together with paganism the altogether diverse Mosaic ritual. The neighbouring nations, birds of prey like herself (for she had sinfully assimilated herself to them), were ready to pounce upon her. assemble . . . beasts of . . . field—The Chaldeans are told to gather the surrounding heathen peoples as allies against Judah (Isaiah 56, 9; Ezekiel 34, 5). 10. pastors—the Babylonian leaders (cf. v. 12; ch. 6, 3). my vineyard—(Isaiah 5, 1, 5). trodden my portion—(Isaiah 63, 18.) 11. mourneth unto me—i. e., before me. EICHORN translates, "by reason of me," because I have given it to desolation (v. 7). because no man layeth it to heart—because none by repentance and prayer seek to deprecate God's wrath. Or, "yet none lays it to heart:" as ch. 5, 3. [CALVIN.] 12. high places—before, he had threatened the plains; now, the hills. wilderness—not an uninhabited desert, but high lands of pasture, lying between Judea and Chaldaea (ch. 4, 11). 13. Description in detail of the devastation of the land (Micah 6, 15). they shall be ashamed of your—The change of persons, in passing from indirect to direct address, is frequent in the prophets. Equivalent to, "Ye shall be put to the shame of disappointment at the smallness of your produce." 14-17. Prophecy as to the surrounding nations, the Syrians, Ammonites, &c., who helped forward Judah's calamity: they shall share her fall; and, on their conversion, they shall share with her in the future restoration. This is a brief anticipation of the predictions in chs. 47, 48., 49. 14. touch—(Zechariah 2, 8.) pluck them out . . . pluck out . . . Judah—(Cf. end of v. 16.) During the thirteen years that the Babylonians besieged Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar, after subduing Cœlo-Syria, brought Ammon, Moab, &c., and finally Egypt, into subjection (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 10, 9, sec. 7). On the restoration of these nations, they were to exchange places with the Jews. The latter were now in the midst of them, but on their restoration they were to be "in the midst of the Jews," i. e., as proselytes to the true God (cf. Micah 5, 7; Zechariah 14, 16). "Pluck them," viz., the Gentile nations; in a bad sense. "Pluck Judah," in a good sense; used to express the force which was needed to snatch Judah from the tyranny of those nations by whom they had been made captives, or to whom they had fled; otherwise they never would have let Judah go. Previously he had been forbidden to pray for the mass of the Jewish people. But here he speaks consolation to the elect remnant among them. Whatever the Jews might be, God keeps His covenant. 15. A promise, applying to Judah, as well as to the nations specified (Amos 9, 14). As to Moab, cf. ch. 48, 47; as to Ammon, ch. 49, 6. 16. swear by my name—(Ch. 4, 2; Isaiah 19, 18; 65, 16); i. e., confess solemnly the true God. built—be made spiritually and temporally prosperous: fixed in sure habitations (cf. ch. 24, 6; 42, 10; 45, 4; Psalm 87, 4, 5; Ephesians 2, 20, 21; 1 Peter 2, 5). 17. (Isaiah 60, 12.)

CHAPTER. XIII.

Ver. 1-27. SYMBOLICAL PROPHECY (v. 1-7.) Many of these figurative acts being either not possible, or not probable, or decorous, seem to have existed only in the mind of the prophet as part of his inward vision. [So

CALVIN.] The world he moved in was not the sensible, but the spiritual world. Inward acts were, however, when it was possible and proper, materialized by outward performance; but not always, and necessarily so. The internal act made a naked statement more impressive, and presented the subject when extending over long portions of space and time more concentrated. The interruption of Jeremiah's official duty by a journey of more than 200 miles twice is not likely to have been literally taken place. 1. put it upon thy loins, &c.—expressing the close intimacy wherewith Jehovah had joined Israel and Judah to Him (v. 11). linen—implying it was the inner garment next the skin, not the outer one. put it not in water—signifying the moral filth of His people, like the literal filth of a garment worn constantly next the skin, without being washed (v. 10). GROTIUS understands a garment not bleached, but left in its native roughness, just as Judah had no beauty, but was adopted by the sole grace of God (Ezekiel 16, 4-6). "Neither wast thou washed in water," &c. 2. Euphrates—In order to support the view that Jeremiah's act was outward, HENDERSON considers that the Hebrew "Phrath" here is Ephratha, the original name of Bethlehem, six miles south of Jerusalem, a journey easy to be made by Jeremiah. The non-addition of the word "river," which usually precedes Phrath, when meaning Euphrates, favours this view. But I prefer English Version. The Euphrates is specified as being near Babylon, the Jews' future place of exile. hole—typical of the prisons in which the Jews were to be confined. the rock—some well-known rock. A sterile region, such as was that to which the Jews were led away (cf. Isaiah 7, 19). [GROTIUS.] 6. after many days—time enough was given for the girdle to become unfit for use. So in course of time the Jews became corrupted by the heathen idolatries around, so as to cease to be witnesses of Jehovah; they must, therefore, be cast away as a "marred" or spoiled girdle. 9. (Leviticus 26, 19.) 10. imagination—rather, obstinacy. 11. (Ch. 33, 9; Exodus 19, 5.) glory—an ornament to glory in. 12. A new image. Do we not . . . know . . . wine—The "bottles" are those used in the East, made of skins; our word hogshead, originally oxhide, alludes to the same custom. As they were used to hold water, milk, and other liquids, what the prophet said, viz., that they should be all filled with wine, was not, as the Jews' taunting reply implied, a truism even literally. The fig. sense which is what Jeremiah chiefly meant, they affected not to understand. As wine intoxicates, so God's wrath and judgments shall reduce them to that state of helpless distraction that they shall rush on their own ruin (ch. 25, 15; 49, 12; Isaiah 51, 17, 22; 63, 6). 13. upon David's throne—lit., who sit for David on his throne; implying the succession of the Davidic family (ch. 22, 4). all—indiscriminately of every rank. 14. dash—(Psalm 2, 9.) As a potter's vessel (Revelation 2, 27). 15. be not proud—pride was the cause of their contumacy, as humility is the first step to obedience (v. 17; Psalm 10, 4). 16. Give glory, &c.—Show by repentance and obedience to God, that you revere His majesty. So Joshua exhorted Achan to "give glory to God" by confessing his crime, thereby showing he revered the All-knowing God. stumble—image from travellers stumbling into a fatal abyss when overtaken by nightfall (Isaiah 5, 30; 59, 9, 10; Amos 8, 9). dark mountains—lit., mountains of twilight or gloom; which cast such a gloomy shadow that the traveller stumbles against an opposing rock before he sees it (John 11, 10; 12, 35). shadow of death—the densest gloom; death-shade (Psalm 44, 19). Light and darkness are images of prosperity and adversity. 17. hear it—my exhortation. in secret—as one mourning and humbling himself for their sin, not self-righteously condemning them (Philippians 3, 18). pride—(Note, v. 15; Job 33, 17.) flock—(v. 20), just as kings and leaders are called pastors. 18. king—Jehoiachin or Jeconiah. queen—the queen-mother who, as the king was not more than eighteen years old, held the chief power. Nelushta, daughter of Elnathan, carried away captive with Jehoiachin by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24, 8-15). Humble yourselves—i. e., Ye shall be humbled, or brought low (ch. 22, 26; 28, 2). your principalities—rather, "your head-ornament." 19. cities of the south—viz., south of Judæa; farthest off from the enemy, who advanced from the north. shut up—i. e., deserted (Isaiah 24. 10); so that none shall be left to open the gates to travellers and merchants again. [HENDERSON.] Rather, shut up so closely by Nebuchadnezzar's forces, sent on before (2 Kings 24. 10, 11), that none shall be allowed by the enemy to get out (cf. v. 20). wholly—lit., fully; completely. 20. from . . . north—Nebuchadnezzar and his hostile army (ch. 1. 14; 6. 22). flock . . . given thee—Jeremiah, amazed at the depopulation caused by Nebuchadnezzar's forces, addresses Jerusalem (a noun of multitude, which accounts for the blending of plural and singular, Your eyes . . . thee . . . thy flock), and asks where is her population (v. 17, "flock") which God had given her? 21. captains and as chief—lit., princes as to headship, or over thy head, viz., the Chaldeans. Rather, translate, "What wilt thou say when God will set them (the enemies, v. 20) above thee, seeing that thou thyself hast accustomed them (to be) with thee as (thy) lovers in the highest place, lit., at thy head?" Thou canst not say God does thee wrong, seeing it was thou that gave occasion to His dealing so with thee, by so eagerly courting their intimacy. Cf. ch. 2. 18, 36; 2 Kings 23. 29, as to the league of Judah with Babylon, which led Josiah to march against Pharaoh-necho, when the latter was about to attack Babylon. [MAURER.] sorrows—pains, throes. 22. if thou say—connecting this verse with "What wilt thou say" (v. 21)? skirts are discovered—i. e., are thrown up so as to expose the person (v. 26; Isaiah 3. 17; Nahum 3. 5). heels made bare—The sandal was fastened by a thong above the heel to the instep. The Hebrew, is, "are violently handled," or "torn off;" i. e., thou art exposed to ignominy. Image from an adulteress. 23. Ethiopian—The Cushite of Abyssinia. Habit is second nature; as therefore it is morally impossible that the Jews can alter their inveterate habits of sin, nothing remains but the infliction of the extremest punishment, their expatriation (v. 24). 24. (Psalm 1. 4.) by the wind—before the wind. of the wilderness—where the wind has full sweep, not being broken by any obstacle. 25. portion of thy measures—the portion which I have measured out to thee (Job 20. 29; Psalm 11. 6). falsehood—(v. 27), false gods and alliances with foreign idolaters. 26. discover . . . upon thy face—rather, "throw up thy skirts over thy face," or head; done by way of ignominy to captive women and to prostitutes (Nahum 3. 5). The Jews' punishment should answer to their crime. As their sin had been perpetrated in the most public places, so God would expose them to the contempt of other nations most openly (Lamentations 1. 8). neighings—(Ch. 5. 8), image from the lust of horses; the lust after idols degrades to the level of the brute. hills—where, as being nearer heaven, sacrifices were thought most acceptable to the gods. wilt thou not . . . ? when—lit., "thou wilt not be made clean after how long a time yet." (So v. 23.) Jeremiah denies the moral possibility of one so long hardened in sin becoming soon cleansed. But see ch. 32. 17; Luke 18. 27.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-22. PROPHECIES ON THE OCCASION OF A DROUGHT SENT IN JUDGMENT ON JUDEA. 1. Lit., "That which was the word of Jehovah to Jeremiah concerning," &c. drought—lit., the withholdings, viz., of rain (Deuteronomy 11. 17; 2 Chronicles 7. 13). The reason why this word should be used especially of the withholding of rain, is, that rain is in those regions of all things the one chiefly needed (ch. 17. 8, Margin). 2. gates—the place of public concourse in each city looks sad, as being no longer frequented (Isaiah 3. 26; 24. 4). black—i. e., they mourn (blackness being indicative of sorrow) (ch. 8. 21). unto the ground—bowing towards it. cry—of distress (1 Samuel 5. 12; Isaiah 24. 11). 3. little ones—rather, "their inferiors," i. e., domestics. pits—cisterns for collecting rain water, often met with in the East, where there are no springs. covered . . . heads—(2 Samuel 15. 30.) A sign of humiliation and mourning. 5. The brute creation is reduced to the utmost extremity for the want of food.

The hind, famed for her affection to her young, abandons them. 6. wild asses—They repair to "the high places" most exposed to the winds, which they "snuff in" to relieve their thirst. eyes—which are usually most keen in detecting grass or water from the "heights," so much so that the traveller guesses from their presence that there must be herbage and water near; but now "their eyes fail." dragons—jackals. [HENDERSON.] Rather the reference is to the great boas and python serpents which raise a large portion of their body up in a vertical column ten or twelve feet high, to survey the neighbourhood above the surrounding bushes, while with open jaws they drink in the air. These giant serpents originated the widely-spread notions which typified the deluge and all destructive agents under the form of a dragon or monster serpent; hence the dragon temples always near water, in Asia, Africa, and Britain, e. g., at Abury, in Wiltshire; a symbol of the ark is often associated with the dragon as the preserver from the waters. [KITTO'S Biblical Cyclopædia.] 7. do thou it—what we beg of thee; Interpose to remove the drought. Jeremiah pleads in the name of his nation (Psalm 109. 21). So "work for us," absolutely used (1 Samuel 14. 6). for thy name's sake—"for our backslidings are so many" that we cannot urge thee for the sake of our doings, but for the glory of thy name; lest, if thou give us not aid, it should be said it was owing to thy want of power (Joshua 7. 9; Psalm 79. 9; 106. 8; Isaiah 48. 9; Ezekiel 10. 44). The same appeal to God's mercy, "for His name's sake," as our only hope, since our sin precludes trust in ourselves, occurs, Psalm 25. 11. 8. (Ch. 17. 13.) Hope of Israel—The reference is, not to the faith of Israel, which had almost ceased, but to the promise and everlasting covenant of God. None but the true Israel make God their "hope." turneth aside to tarry—The traveller cares little for the land he carries but a night in; but thou hast promised to dwell always in the midst of thy people (2 Chronicles 33. 7, 8). MAURER translates, "spreadeth," viz., his tent. 9. astounded—like a "mighty man," at other times able to help (Isaiah 59. 1), but now stunned by a sudden calamity so as to disappoint the hopes drawn from him. art in the midst of us—(Exodus 29. 45, 46; Leviticus 26. 11, 12). called by thy name—(Daniel 9. 18, 19) as thine own peculiar people (Deuteronomy 9. 29). 10. Jehovah's reply to the prayer (v. 7-9; ch. 2. 23-25). Thou—so greatly loved—(Ch. 5. 31.) not refrained . . . feet—they did not obey God's command; "withhold thy foot" (ch. 2. 25), viz., from following after idols. remember . . . iniquity—(Hosea 8. 13; 9. 9.) Their sin is so great, God must punish them. 11. (Ch. 7. 16; Exodus 32. 10.) 12. not hear—because their prayers are hypocritical: their hearts are still idolatrous. God never refuses to hear real prayer (ch. 7. 21, 22; Proverbs 1. 28; Isaiah 1. 15; 58. 3). sword . . . famine . . . pestilence—the three sorest judgments at once; any one of which would be enough for their ruin (2 Samuel 24. 12, 13). 13. Jeremiah urges that much of the guilt of the people is due to the false prophets' influence. assured peace—solid and lasting peace. Lit., peace of truth (Isaiah 39. 8). 14. (Ch. 23. 21.) 15. (Ch. 5. 12, 13.) say, sword and famine . . . consumed—retribution in kind both to the false prophets and to their hearers (v. 16). 16. none to bury—(Psalm 79. 3.) pour their wickedness—i. e., the punishment incurred by their wickedness (ch. 2. 19). 17. (Ch. 9. 1; Lamentations 1. 16.) Jeremiah is desired to weep ceaselessly for the calamities coming on his nation (called a "virgin," as being heretofore never under foreign yoke) (Isaiah 23. 4). 18. go about—i. e., shall have to migrate into a land of exile. HORSELEY translates, "go trafficking about the land (see Margin; ch. 5. 31; 2 Corinthians 4. 2; 2 Peter 2. 3), and take no knowledge" (i. e., pay no regard to the miseries before their eyes) (Isaiah 1. 3; 58. 3). If the lit. sense of the Hebrew verb be retained, I would with English Version understand the words as referring to the exile to Babylon; thus, "the prophet and the priest shall have to go to a strange land to practise their religious traffic (Isaiah 56. 11; Ezekiel 34. 2, 3; Micah 3. 11). 19. The people plead with God, Jeremiah being forbidden to do so. no healing—(Ch. 15. 18.) peace . . . no good—(Ch. 8. 15.) 20.

(Daniel 9. 8.) 21. us—"the throne of thy glory" may be the object of "abhor not" ("reject not"); or "Zion" (v. 19). throne of thy glory—Jerusalem, or, the temple, called God's "footstool" and "habitation" (1 Chronicles 28. 2; Psalm 132. 5). thy covenant—(Psalm 106. 45; Daniel 9. 19.) 22. vanities—idols (Deuteronomy 32. 21). rain—(Zechariah 10. 1, 2.) heavens—viz., of themselves without God (Matthew 5. 45; Acts 14. 17); they are not the First Cause, and ought not to be deified, as they were by the heathen. The disjunctive "or" favours CALVIN'S explanation: "Not even the heavens themselves can give rain, much less can the idol vanities." Art not thou he—viz., who canst give rain?

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-21. GOD'S REPLY TO JEREMIAH'S INTERCESSORY PRAYER. 1. Moses . . . Samuel—eminent in intercessions (Exodus 32. 11, 12; 1 Samuel 7. 9; Psalm 99. 6). be toward—could not be favourably inclined toward them. out of my sight—God speaks as if the people were present before Him, along with Jeremiah. 2. death—deadly plague (ch. 18. 21; 43. 11; Ezekiel 5. 2, 12; Zechariah 11. 9). 3. appoint—(Leviticus 26. 16.) kinds—of punishments. 4. cause . . . to be removed—(Deuteronomy 28. 25; Ezekiel 23. 46.) Rather, "I will give them up to vexation," I will cause them to wander so as nowhere to have repose [CALVIN] (2 Chronicles 29. 8, "trouble," Margin, "commotion"). because of Manasseh—he was now dead, but the effects of his sins still remained.—How much evil one bad man can cause! The evil fruits remain even after he himself has received repentance and forgiveness. The people had followed his wicked example ever since; and it is implied that it was only through the long-suffering of God that the penal consequences had been suspended up to the present time (cf. 1 Kings 14. 46; 2 Kings 21. 11; 23. 26; 24. 3, 4). 5. go aside . . . how thou doest—Who will turn aside (in passing by) to salute thee? (to wish thee "peace"). 6. weary with repenting—(Hosea 13. 14; 11. 8.) I have so often repented of the evil that I threatened (ch. 26. 19; Exodus 32. 14; 1 Chronicles 21. 15), and have spared them, without my forbearance moving them to repentance, that I will not again change my purpose (God speaking in condescension to human modes of thought), but will take vengeance on them now. 7. fan—tribulation (from tribulum, a threshing instrument), which separates the chaff from the wheat (Matthew 3. 12). gates of the land—i. e., the extreme bounds of the land through which the entrance to and exit from it lie. MAURER translates, "I will fan," i. e., cast them forth "to the gates of the land" (Nahum 3. 13). "In the gates;" English Version draws the image from a man cleaning corn with a fan; he stands at the gate of the threshing-floor in the open air, to remove the wheat from the chaff by means of the wind; so God threatens to remove Israel out of the bounds of the land [HOUBIGANT]. 8. Their widows—My people's (v. 7). have brought—prophetic past: I will bring. mother of the young men—"mother" is collective; after the "widows," he naturally mentions bereavement of their sons ("young men"), brought on the "mothers" by "the spoiler;" it was owing to the number of men slain that the "widows" were so many. [CALVIN.] Others take "mother," as in 2 Samuel 20. 19, of Jerusalem the metropolis; "I have brought on them, against the 'mother,' a young spoiler," viz., Nebuchadnezzar, sent by his father, Nabopolassar, to repulse the Egyptian invaders (2 Kings 23. 29; 24. 1), and occupy Judca. But v. 7 shows the future, not the past, is referred to; and "widows" being literal, "mother" is probably so too. at noonday—the hottest part of the day, when military operations were usually suspended; thus it means unexpectedly, answering to the parallel, "suddenly;" openly, as others explain it, will not suit the parallelism (cf. Psalm 91. 6). it—English Version seems to understand by "it" the mother city, and by "him" the "spoiler;" thus "it" will be parallel to "city." Rather, "I will cause to fall upon them (the "mothers" about to be bereft of their sons) suddenly anguish and terrors." the city—rather, from a root "heat," an- guish, or consternation. So LXX. 9. born seven—(1 Samuel 2. 5.) Seven being the perfect number indicates full fruitfulness. anguisheth—because not even one is left of all her sons (v. 8). sun is gone down while . . . yet day—fortune deserts her at the very height of her prosperity (Amos 8. 9). she . . . ashamed—the mothers (she being collective) are put to the shame of disappointed hopes through the loss of all their children. 10. (Ch. 20. 14; Job 3. 1, &c.) Jeremiah seems to have been of a peculiarly sensitive temperament; yet the Holy Spirit enabled him to deliver his message at the certain cost of having his sensitiveness wounded by the enmities of those whom his words offended. man of strife—exposed to strifes on the part of "the whole earth" (Psalm 80. 6). I have neither lent, &c.—proverbial for, "I have given no cause for strife against me." 11. Verily—lit., Shall it not be? i. e., Surely it shall be. thy remnant—the final issue of thy life; thy life, which now seems to thee so sad, shall eventuate in prosperity. [CALVIN.] They who think that they shall be the surviving remnant, whereas thou shalt perish, shall themselves fall, whereas thou shalt remain and be favoured by the conquerors [JUNIUS] (ch. 40. 4, 5; 39. 11, 12). The Keri reads, "I will set thee free (or as MAURER, 'I will establish thee) for good" (ch. 14. 11; Ezra 8. 22; Psalm 119. 122). to treat thee well—lit., to meet thee; so "to be placable, nay, of their own accord to anticipate in meeting thee with kindness." [CALVIN.] I prefer this translation as according with the event (ch. 39. 11, 12; 40. 4, 5). GENESIUS, from ch. 7. 16; 27. 18; Job 21. 15, translates (not only will I relieve thee from the enemy's vexations, but) "I will make thine enemy (that now vexeth thee) apply to thee with prayers" (ch. 38. 14; 42. 2-6). 12. steel—rather, brass or copper, which mixed with "iron" (by the Chalybes near the Euxine Pontus, far north of Palestine), formed the hardest metal, like our steel. Can the Jews, hardy like common iron though they be, break the still harder *Chaldee*s of the north (ch. 1. 14), who resemble the Chalybian iron hardened with copper? Certainly not. [CALVIN.] HENDERSON translates, "Can one break iron, (even) the northern iron, and brass," on the ground that English Version makes ordinary iron not so hard as brass. But it is not brass, but a particular mixture of iron and brass, which is represented as harder than common iron, which was probably then of inferior texture, owing to ignorance of modern modes of preparation. 13. Thy substance . . . sins—Judea's, not Jeremiah's. without price—God casts his people away as a thing worth naught (Psalm 44. 12). So, on the contrary, Jehovah, when about to restore His people, says, He will give Egypt, &c., for their "ransom" (Isaiah 43. 3). even in all thy borders—joined with "Thy substance . . . treasures, as also with "all thy sins," their sin and punishment being commensurate (ch. 17. 3). 14. thee—MAURER supplies them, viz., "thy treasures." EICHORN, needlessly, from Syriac and LXX., reads, "I will make thee to serve thine enemies;" a reading doubtless interpolated from ch. 17. 4. fire—(Deuteronomy 32. 22.) 15. thou knowest—viz., my case; what wrongs my adversaries have done me (ch. 12. 3). revenge me—(Note, ch. 11. 20.) The prophet in this had regard to, not his own personal feelings of revenge, but the cause of God; he speaks by inspiration God's will against the ungodly. Contrast in this the law with the gospel (Luke 23. 34; Acts 7. 60). take me not away in thy long-suffering—by thy long-suffering towards them, suffer them not meanwhile to take away my life. for thy sake I have suffered rebuke—the very words of the antitype, Jesus Christ (Psalm 69. 7, 22-23), which last cf. with Jeremiah's prayer in the beginning of this verse. 16. eat—(Ezekiel 2. 3; 3. 1, 3; Revelation 10. 9, 10.) As soon as thy words were found by me, I eagerly laid hold of and appropriated them. The Keri reads, "thy word." thy word . . . joy—(Job 23. 12; Psalm 119. 72, 111; cf. Matthew 13. 44.) called by thy name—I am thine, thy minister. So the antitype, Jesus Christ (Exodus 23. 21). 17. My "rejoicing" (v. 16) was not that of the profane mockers (Psalm 1. 1; 26. 4, 5) at feasts. So far from having fellowship with these, he was expelled from society, and made to sit "alone," because of his faithful prophecies. because of thy hand—i. e., thine inspiration (Isaiah 8. 11; Ezekiel 1. 3; 3. 14). filled me with indignation—So ch. 6. 11, "full of the fury of the Lord;" so full was he of the subject (God's "indignation" against the ungodly) with which God had inspired him, as not to be able to contain himself from expressing it. The same comparison by contrast between the effect of inspiration, and that of wine, both taking a man out of himself, occurs, Acts 2. 13, 15, 18. 18. (Ch. 30. 15.) "Pain," viz., the perpetual persecution to which he was exposed, and his being left by God without consolation and "alone." Contrast his feeling here with that in v. 16, when he enjoyed the full presence of God, and was inspired by His words. Therefore he utters words of his natural "infirmity" (so David, Psalm 77. 10) here; as before he spake under the higher spiritual nature given him, as a liar, and as—rather, "as a deceiving (river) . . . waters that are not sure" (lasting); opposed to "living (perennial) waters" (Job 6. 15, &c.). Streams that the thirsty traveller had calculated on being full in winter, but which disappoint him in his sorest need, having run dry in the heat of summer. Jehovah had promised Jeremiah protection from his enemies (ch. 1. 18, 19); his infirmity suggests that God had failed to do so. 19. God's reply to Jeremiah. return . . . bring . . . again—Jeremiah, by his impatient language, had left his proper posture towards God; God saith, "If thou wilt return (to thy former patient discharge of thy prophetic function) I will bring thee back" to thy former position: in the Hebrew there is a play of words, "return . . . turn again" (ch. 8. 4; 4. 1). stand before me—minister acceptably to me (Deuteronomy 10. 8; 1 Kings 17. 1; 18. 15). take . . . precious from . . . vile—image from metals: "If thou wilt separate what is precious in thee (the Divine graces imparted) from what is vile (thy natural corruptions, impatience, and hasty words), thou shalt be as my mouth;" my mouthpiece (Exodus 4. 16). return not thou unto them—let not them lead you into their profane ways (as Jeremiah had spoken irreverently, v. 18), but lead thou them to the ways of godliness (v. 16, 17). Ezekiel 22. 26 accords with the other interpretation, which, however, does not so well suit the context, "If thou wilt separate from the promiscuous mass the better ones, and lead them to conversion by faithful warnings," &c. 20, 21. The promise of ch. 1. 18, 19, in almost the same words, but with the addition, adapted to the present attacks of Jeremiah's formidable enemies, "I will deliver thee out of . . . wicked . . . redeem . . . terrible;" the repetition is in order to assure Jeremiah that God is the same now as when He first made the promise, in opposition to the prophet's irreverent accusation of unfaithfulness (v. 18).

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-21. CONTINUATION OF THE PREVIOUS PROPHECY. 2. in this place—in Judea. The direction to remain single was (whether literally obeyed, or only in prophetic vision) to symbolize the coming calamities of the Jews (Ezekiel 24. 15-27) as so severe that the single state would be then (contrary to the ordinary course of things) preferable to the married (cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 8; 26. 29; Matthew 24. 19; Luke 23. 20). 4. grievous deaths—rather, deadly diseases (ch. 15. 2). not . . . lamented—so many shall be the slain (ch. 22. 18). dung—(Psalm 83. 10.) 5. (Ezekiel 24. 17, 22, 23.) house of mourning—(Mark 5. 38.) Margin, mourning-feast; such feasts were usual at funerals. The Hebrew means, in Amos 6. 7, the cry of joy at a banquet; here, and Lamentations 2. 19, the cry of sorrow. 6. cut themselves—indicating extravagant grief (ch. 41. 5; 47. 5), prohibited by the law (Leviticus 19. 28). bold—(Ch. 7. 29; Isaiah 22. 12). 7. tear themselves—rather, "break bread," viz., that eaten at the funeral-feast (Deuteronomy 26. 14; Job 42. 11; Ezekiel 14. 17; Hosea 9. 4). "Bread" is to be supplied, as Lamentations 4. 4; cf. "take" (food) (Genesis 42. 33). give . . . cup of consolation . . . for . . . father—It was the Oriental custom for friends to send vials and wine (the "cup of consolation") to console relatives in mourning-feasts, e. g., children under the death of a "father" or "mother." 8. house of feasting—joyous: as distinguished from mourning-feasts. Have no more to do with this people whether in mourning or joyous feasts. 9. (Ch. 7. 34; 25. 10; Ezekiel 26. 13). 10. (Deuteronomy 29. 24; 1 Kings 9. 8, 9). 11. (Ch. 5. 19; 13. 22; 22. 8, 9). 12. ye—emphatic: so far from avoiding your fathers' bad example, ye have done worse (ch. 7. 26; 1 Kings 14. 9). imagination—rather, stubborn perversity. that they may not hearken—rather, connected with "ye:" "ye have walked . . . so as not to hearken to me." 13. serve other gods—that which was their sin in their own land was their punishment in exile. Retribution in kind. They voluntarily forsook God for idols at home; they were not allowed to serve God, if they wished it, in captivity (Daniel 3. and 6). day and night—irony. You may there serve idols, which ye are so mad after, even to satiety, and without intermission. 14. Therefore—So severe shall be the Jews' bondage that their deliverance from it shall be a greater benefit than that out of Egypt. The consolation is incidental here; the prominent thought is the severity of their punishment, so great that their rescue from it will be greater than that from Egypt [CALVIN]; so the context, v. 13, 17, 18, proves (ch. 23. 7, 8; Isaiah 43. 18). 15. the north—Chaldea. But whilst the return from Babylon is primarily meant, the return hereafter is the full and final accomplishment contemplated, as "from all the lands" proves. "Israel" was not, save in a very limited sense, "gathered from all the lands" at the return from Babylon (cf. ch. 24. 6; 30. 3; 32. 15, Notes). 16. send for—translate, "I will send many;" "I will give the commission to many" (2 Chronicles 17. 7). fishers . . . hunters—successive invaders of Judea (Amos 4. 2; Habakkuk 1. 14, 15). So "net" (Ezekiel 12. 13). As to "hunters," see Genesis 10. 9; Micah 7. 2; the Chaldees were famous in hunting, as the Egyptians, the other enemy of Judea, were in fishing. "Fishers" expresses the ease of their victory over the Jews as that of the angler over fishes; "hunters," the keenness of their pursuit of them into every cave and nook. It is remarkable, the same image is used in a good sense of the Jews' restoration, implying that just as their enemies were employed by God to take them in hand for destruction, so the same shall be employed for their restoration (Ezekiel 47. 9, 10). So spiritually, those once enemies by nature (fishermen many of them literally) were employed by God to be heralds of salvation, "catching men" for life (Matthew 4. 19; Luke 5. 10; Acts 2. 41; 4. 4); cf. here v. 19, "the Gentiles shall come unto thee" (2 Corinthians 12. 16). 17. (Ch. 32. 19; Proverbs 5. 21; 15. 3.) their iniquity—the cause of God's judgments on them. 18. first . . . double—HORSLEY translates, "I will recompense, &c., once and again," lit., the first time repeated: alluding to the two captivities—the Babylonian and the Roman. MAURER, "I will recompense their former iniquities (those long ago committed by their fathers) and their (own) repeated sins" (v. 11, 12). English Version gives a good sense, "First (before "I bring them again into their land"), I will doubly (i. e., fully and amply, ch. 17. 18; Isaiah 40. 2) recompense," &c. carcasses—not sweet-smelling sacrifices acceptable to God, but "carcasses" offered to idols, an offensive odour to God; human victims (ch. 19. 5; Ezekiel 16. 20), and unclean animals (Isaiah 65. 4; 66. 17). MAURER explains it, "the carcasses" of the idols: their images void of sense and life. Cf. v. 19, 20. Leviticus 26. 30 favours this. 19, 20. The result of God's judgments on the Jews will be that both the Jews when restored, and the Gentiles who have witnessed those judgments, shall renounce idolatry for the worship of Jehovah. Fulfilled partly at the return from Babylon, after which the Jews entirely renounced idols, and many proselytes were gathered in from the Gentiles, but not to be realized in its fulness till the final restoration of Israel (Isaiah 2). 20. Indignant protest of Jeremiah against idols. and they are no gods—(Ch. 2. 11; Isaiah 37. 19; Galatians 4. 8.) "They" refers to the idols. A man (a creature himself) making God is a contradiction in terms. Vulgate takes "they" thus: "Shall man make gods, though men themselves are not gods?" 21. Therefore—In order that all may be turned from idols to Jehovah, He will now give awful proof of His Divine power in the judgments He will inflict. this once—If the punishments I have heretofore inflicted have not been severe enough to teach them. my name . . . Lord—Jehovah (Psalm 83. 18); God's incommunicable name, to apply which to idols would be blasphemy. Keeping His threats and promises (Exodus 6. 3).

CHAPTER XVII.

VER. 1-27. THE JEWS' INVETERATE LOVE OF IDOLATRY. THE LXX. omit the first four verses, but other Greek versions have them. 1. The first of the four clauses relates to the third, the second to the fourth, by alternate parallelism. The sense is, They are as keen after idols as if their propensity was "graven with an iron pen (Job 19. 24) on their hearts," or as if it were sanctioned by a law "inscribed with a diamond point" on their altars. The names of their gods used to be written on "the horns of the altars" (Acts 17. 23). As the clause "on their hearts" refers to their inward propensity, so "on . . . altars," the outward exhibition of it. Others refer "on the horns of . . . altars" to their staining them with the blood of victims, in imitation of the Levitical precept (Exodus 29. 12; Leviticus 4. 7, 18), but "written . . . graven," would thus be inappropriate. table of . . . heart—which God intended to be inscribed very differently, viz., with His truths (Proverbs 3. 3; 2 Corinthians 3. 3). your—though "their" preceded, he directly addresses them to charge the guilt home to them in particular. 2. children remember—instead of forsaking the idolatries of their fathers they keep them up (ch. 7. 18). This is given as proof that their sin is "graven upon . . . altars" (v. 1), i. e., is not merely temporary. They corrupt their posterity after them. CASTALIO less probably translates, "They remember their altars as (fondly as) they do their children." groves—rather, images of Astarte, the goddess of the heavenly hosts, represented as a sacred tree, such as is seen in the Assyrian sculptures (2 Kings 21. 7; 2 Chronicles 24. 18). "Image of the grove." The Hebrew for "grove" is Asherah, i. e., Assarah, Astarte, or Ashtaroth. by the green trees—i. e., near them; the sacred trees (idol symbols) of Astarte being placed in the midst of natural trees: "green trees" is thus distinguished from "groves," artificial trees. HENDERSON, to avoid taking the same Hebrew particle in the same sentence differently, "by . . . upon" translates "images of Astarte on the green trees." But it is not probable that images, in the form of a sacred tree, should be hung on trees, rather than near them. 3. mountain—Jerusalem, and especially Zion and the temple. in the field—As Jerusalem was surrounded by mountains (Psalm 125. 2), the sense probably is, Ye rely on your mountainous position (ch. 3. 23), but I will make "my mountain" to become as if it were in a plain (field), so as to give thy substance an easy prey to the enemy. [CALVIN.] "Field" may, however, mean all Judea; and "my mountain" will thus express the country and its capital (Gesenius translates, "together with," instead of in; as the Hebrew is translated, ch. 11. 19; Hosea 5. 6; but this is not absolutely needed), "the substance" of both of which God "will give to the spoil." thy high places—corresponding in parallelism to "my mountain" (cf. Isaiah 11. 9), as "all thy borders," to "the field" (which confirms the view that "field" means all Judea). for sin—connected with "high places" in English Version, viz., frequented for sin, i. e., for idolatrous sacrifices. But ch. 15. 13 makes the rendering probable, "I will give thy substance . . . to . . . spoil . . . on account of thy sin throughout all thy borders." 4. even thyself—rather, "owing to thyself," i. e., by thy own fault (ch. 15. 13). discontinue from—be dispossessed of. Not only thy substance, but thyself shall be carried off to a strange land (ch. 15. 14). 5. Referring to the Jews' proneness to rely on Egypt, in its fear of Assyria and Babylon (Isaiah 31. 1, 3). trusteth—this word is emphatic. We may expect help from men, so far as God enables them to help us, but we must rest our trust in God alone (Psalm 62. 5). 6. heath—In Psalm 102. 17; Isaiah 32. 11; Habakkuk 3. 9, the Hebrew is translated, "bare," "naked," "deserted;" but as the parallel in v. 8 is "tree," some plant must be meant of which this is the characteristic epithet (see ch. 48. 6, Margin), "a naked tree." ROBINSON translates, "the juniper tree," found in the Arabah or Great Valley, here called "the desert," south of the Dead Sea. The "heath" was one of the plants, according to PLINY (13. 21; 16. 26), excluded from religious uses, because it has neither fruit nor seed, and is neither sown nor planted. not see . . . good—(Job 20. 17.) salt land—(Deuteronomy 29. 23), barren ground. 7. (Psalm 34. 8; Proverbs 16. 20; Isaiah 30. 18.) Jeremiah first removed the weeds (false trusts), so that there might be room for the good grain. [CALVIN.] 8. (Psalm 1. 3.) shall not see—i. e., feel. Answering to v. 6; whereas the unbelievers "shall not see (even) when good cometh," the believer "shall not see (so as to be overwhelmed by it even) when heat (fiery trial) cometh." Trials shall come upon him as on all, nay, upon him especially (Hebrews 12. 6); but he shall not sink under them, because the Lord is his secret strength, just as the "roots spread out by a river" (or, "water-course") draw hidden support from it (2 Corinthians 4. 8-11). careful—anxious, as one depending (Luke 12. 20; 1 Peter 5. 7). drought—lit., withholding, viz., of rain (ch. 14. 1); he here probably alludes to the drought which had prevailed, but makes it the type of all kinds of distress. 9. deceitful—from a root, "supplanting," "tripping up insidiously by the heel," from which Jacob (Hosea 12. 3) took his name. In speaking of the Jews' deceit of heart, he appropriately uses a term alluding to their forefather, whose deceit, but not whose faith, they followed. His "supplanting" was in order to obtain Jehovah's blessing. They plant Jehovah for "trust in man" (v. 5), and then think to deceive God, as if it could escape His notice, that it is in man, not in Him, they trust. desperately wicked—"Incurable" [HOLMES] (Micah 1. 9). Trust in one's own heart is as foolish as in our fellow-man (Proverbs 28. 26). 10. Lest any should infer from v. 9, "who can know it?" that even the Lord does not know, and therefore cannot punish, the hidden treachery of the heart, He saith, "I the Lord search the heart," &c. (1 Chronicles 28. 9; Psalm 7. 9; Proverbs 17. 3; Revelation 2. 23). even to give—and that in order that I may give (ch. 32. 19). 11. partridge—(1 Samuel 26. 20). Hebrew "Korea," from a root, to call, alluding to its cry; a name still applied to a bustard by the Arabs. Its nest is liable, being on the ground, to be trodden under foot, or robbed by carnivorous animals, notwithstanding all the beautiful manoeuvres of the parent birds to save the brood. The translation, "sitteth on eggs which it has not laid," alludes to the ancient notion that she stole the eggs of other birds and hatched them as her own; and that the young birds when grown left her for the true mother. It is not needful to make Scripture allude to an exploded notion, as if it were true. MAURER thinks the reference is to Jehoiakim's grasping cupidity (ch. 22. 13-17). Probably the sense is more general; as previously he condemned trust in man (v. 5), he now condemns another object of the deceitful hearts' trust, unjustly gotten riches (Psalm 39. 6; 49. 16, 17; 55. 23). fool—(Proverbs 23. 5; Luke 12. 20); "their folly" (Psalm 49. 13). Himself, and all, shall at last perceive he was not the wise man he thought he was. 12. Throne—The temple of Jerusalem the throne of Jehovah. Having condemned false object of trust, "high places for sin" (v. 3), and an "arm of flesh," he next sets forth Jehovah, and His temple, which was ever open to the Jews, as the true object of confidence, and sanctuary to flee to. HENDERSON makes Jehovah, in v. 13, the subject, and this verse predicate, "A throne of glory, high from the beginning, the place of our sanctuary, the hope of Israel is Jehovah." Throne is thus used for Him who sits on it; cf. thrones (Colossians 1. 16). He is called a "sanctuary" to His people (Isaiah 8. 14; Ezekiel 11. 16). So Syriac and Arabic. 13. me—Jehovah. Though he precedes. This sudden transition is usual in the prophetic style, owing to the prophet's continual realization of Jehovah's presence. all that forsake thee—(Psalm 73. 27; Isaiah 1. 28.) written in the earth—In the dust, i. e., shall be consigned to oblivion. So Jesus' significant writing "on the ground" (probably the accusers' names) (John 8. 6). Names written in the dust are obliterated by a very slight wind. Their hopes and celebrity are wholly in the earth, not in the heavenly book of life (Revelation 13. 8; 20. 12, 15). The Jews, though boasting that they were the people of God, had no portion in heaven, no status before God and His angels. Contrast "written in heaven," i. e., in the muster-roll of its blessed citizens (Luke 10. 20). Also, contrast "written in a book," and "in the rock for ever" (Job 19. 23, 24). Living waters—(Ch. 2. 13.) 14-18. Prayer of the prophet for deliverance from the enemies whom he excited by his faithful denunciations. heal . . . save—not only make me whole (as to the evils of soul as well as body which I am exposed to by contact with ungodly foes, ch. 15. 18), but keep me so. my prate—He whom I have to praise for past favours, and therefore to whom alone I look for the time to come. 15. Where is the word?—(Isaiah 5. 19; Amos 5. 18.) Where is the fulfilment of the threats which thou didst utter as from God? A characteristic of the last stage of apostasy (2 Peter 3. 4). 16. I have not refused thy call of me to be a prophet (Jonah 1. 3), however painful to me it was to utter what would be sure to irritate the hearers (ch. 1. 4, &c.); therefore thou shouldst not forsake me (ch. 15. 15, &c.). to follow thee—lit., after thee; as an under-pastor following thee, the Chief Shepherd (Ecclesiastes 12. 11; 1 Peter 5. 4). neither . . . desired—I have not wished for the day of calamity, though I foretell it as about to come on my countrymen; therefore they have no reason for persecuting me. thou knowest—I appeal to thee for the truth of what I assert. that which came out of my lips—my words (Deuteronomy 23. 23). right before thee—rather, "was before thee;" was known to thee—(Proverbs 5. 21). 17. a terror—viz., by deserting me: all I fear is thine abandoning me; if thou art with me I have no fear of evil from enemies. 18. destroy . . . destruction—"break them with a double breach," Hebrew (ch. 14. 17). On "double," see Note, ch. 16. 18. 19-27. Delivered in the reign of Jehoiakim, who undid the good effected by Josiah's reformation, especially as to the observance of the Sabbath. [EICHORN.] gate of . . . children of . . . people—The gate next the king's palace, called the gate of David, and the gate of the people, from its being the principal thoroughfare: now the Jaffa gate. It is probably the same as "the gate of the fountain" at the foot of Zion, near which were the king's garden and pool (ch. 39. 4; 2 Kings 25. 4; Nehemiah 2. 14; 3. 15; 12. 37). 20. kings—He begins with the kings, as they ought to have repressed such a glaring profanation. 21. Take heed to yourselves—lit., to your souls. MAURER explains, "as ye love your lives;" a phrase used here to give the greater weight to the command. sabbath—The non-observance of it was a chief cause of the captivity, the number of years of the latter, seventy, being exactly made to agree with the number of Sabbaths which elapsed during the 490 years of their possession of Canaan from Saul to their removal (Leviticus 26. 34, 35; 2 Chronicles 36. 21). On the restoration; therefore, stress was especially laid on Sabbath observance (Nehemiah 13. 19). Jerusalem—It would have been scandalous anywhere, but in the capital, Jerusalem, it was an open insult to God. Sabbath-hallowing is intended as a symbol of holiness in general (Ezekiel 20. 12), therefore such stress is laid on it; the Jews' gross impiety is manifested in their setting God's will at naught, in the case of such an easy and positive command. 23. (Ch. 7. 24, 26.) 24. A part put for the whole, "If ye keep the Sabbath and my other laws." 25. kings . . . in chariots—The kingdom at this time had been brought so low that this promise here was a special favour. remain—Hebrew, be inhabited (v. 6; Isaiah 13. 20). 26. plain . . . mountains . . . south—(Joshua 15. 1-4). The southern border had extended to the river of Egypt, but was now much curtailed by Egyptian invasions (2 Chronicles 35. 20; 36. 3, 4). The Hebrew for "south" means dry; the arid desert south of Judea is meant. The enumeration of all the parts of Judea, city, country, plain, hill, and desert, implies that no longer shall there be aught wanting of the integrity of the Jewish land (Zechariah 7. 7). sacrifices—As in v. 22, one constituent of Judea's prosperity is mentioned, viz., its kings on David's throne, the pledge of God being its guardian; so in this verse another constituent, viz., its priests, a pledge of God being propitious to it (Psalm 107. 22). 27. burden . . . in . . . gates . . . fire in the gates—retribution answering to the sin; the scene of their sin shall be the scene of their punishment (ch. 52. 13; 2 Kings 25. 9).

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 1-23. GOD, AS THE SOLE SOVEREIGN, HAS AN ABSOLUTE RIGHT TO DEAL WITH NATIONS ACCORDING TO THEIR CONDUCT TOWARDS HIM; ILLUSTRATED IN A TANGIBLE FORM BY THE POTTER'S MOULDING OF VESSELS FROM CLAY. 2. go down—viz., from the high ground on which the temple stood, near which Jeremiah exercised his prophetic office, to the low ground, where some well-known (this is the force of "the") potter had his workshop. 3. wheels—lit., "on both stones." The potter's horizontal lathe consisted of two round plates, the lower one larger, the upper smaller; of stone originally, but afterwards of wood. On the upper the potter moulded the clay into what shapes he pleased. They are found represented in Egyptian remains. In Exodus 1. 16 alone is the Hebrew word found elsewhere, but in a different sense. 4. marred—spoiled. "Of clay" is the true reading, which was corrupted into "as clay" (Margin), through the similarity of the two Hebrew letters, and from v. 6, "as the clay." 6. Refuting the Jews' reliance on their external privileges as God's elect people, as if God could never cast them off. But if the potter, a mere creature, has power to throw away a marred vessel, and raise up other clay from the ground, "a fortiori" God, the Creator, can cast away the people who prove unfaithful to His election, and can raise others in their stead (cf. Isaiah 45. 9; 64. 8; Romans 9. 20, 21). It is curious that the potter's field should have been the purchase made with the price of Judas' treachery (Matthew 27. 9, 10; a potter's vessel dashed to pieces, cf. Psalm 2. 8, 9; Revelation 2. 27), because of its failing to answer the maker's design, being the very image to depict God's sovereign power to give reprobates to destruction, not by caprice, but in the exercise of His righteous judgment. Matthew quotes Zechariah's words (Zechariah 11. 12, 13) as Jeremiah's, because the latter (ch. 18., 19.) was the source from which the former derived his summary in ch. 11. 12, 13. [HENGSTENBERG.] 7. At what instant—In a moment, when the nation least expects it. Hereby he reminds the Jews how marvellously God had delivered them from their original degradation, i. e., in one and the same day ye were the most wretched, and then the most favoured of all people. [CALVIN.] 8. their evil—in antithesis to, "the evil that I thought to do." repent—God herein adapts Himself to human conceptions. The change is not in God, but in the circumstances which regulate God's dealings: just as we say the land recedes from us when we sail forth, whereas it is we who recede from the land (Ezekiel 18. 21; 33. 11). God's unchangeable principle is to do the best that can be done under all circumstances; if then He did not take into account the moral change in his people (their prayers, &c.), He would not be acting according to His own unchanging principle (v. 9, 10). This is applied practically to the Jews' case (v. 11; see ch. 26. 3; Jonah 3. 10). 11. frame evil—alluding to the preceding image of "the potter," i. e., I, Jehovah, am now as it were the potter framing evil against you; but in the event of your repenting, it is in my power to frame anew my course of dealing towards you. return, &c.—(2 Kings 17. 13.) 12. no hope—thy threats and exhortations are all thrown away (ch. 2. 25). Our case is desperate; we are hopelessly abandoned to our sins and their penalty. In this and the following clauses, "We will walk after our own devices," Jeremiah makes them express the real state of the case, rather than the hypocritical subtrefuges which they would have been inclined to put forth. So Isaiah 30. 10, 11. 13. (Ch. 2. 10, 11.) Even among the heathen it was a thing unheard of, that a nation should lay aside its gods for foreign gods, though their gods are false gods. But Israel forsook the true God for foreign false gods. virgin of Israel—(2 Kings 19. 21.) It enhances their guilt, that Israel was the virgin whom God had specially betrothed to Him. horrible thing—(Ch. 5 30.) 14. Is there any man (living near it) who would leave the snow of Lebanon (i. e., the cool melted snow-water of Lebanon, as he presently explains), which cometh from the rock of the field (a poetical name for Lebanon, which towers aloft above the surrounding field, or comparatively plain country)? None. Yet Israel forsakes Jehovah, the living fountain close at hand, for foreign broken cisterns. Ch. 17. 13; 2. 13, accord with English Version here. MAURER translates, "Shall the snow of Lebanon cease from the rock to water (lit., forsake) my fields" (the whole land around being peculiarly Jehovah's)? Lebanon means the white mountain; so called from the perpetual snow which covers that part called Hermon, stretching north-east of Palestine. that come from another place—that come from far, viz., from the distant lofty rocks of Lebanon. HENDERSON translates, "the compressed waters," viz., contracted within a narrow channel while descending through the gorges of the rocks; "flowing" may in this view be rather "flowing down" (Song of Solomon 4. 15). But the parallelism in English Version is better, "which cometh from the rock," "that cometh from another place." be forsaken—answering to the parallel, "Will a man leave." MAURER translates, "dry up," or "fall" (Isaiah 19. 5); the sense thus being, Will nature ever turn aside from its fixed course. The "cold waters" (cf. Proverbs 25. 25) refer to the perennial streams, fed from the partial melting of the snow in the hot weather. 15. Because—rather, And yet; in defiance of the natural order of things. forgotten me—(Ch. 2. 32.) This implies a previous knowledge of God, whereas He was unknown to the Gentiles; the Jews' forgetting of God, therefore, arose from determined perversity. they have caused . . . to stumble—viz., the false prophets and idolatrous priests have. ancient paths—(Ch. 6. 16): the paths which their pious ancestors trod. Not antiquity indiscriminately, but the example of the fathers who trod the right way, is here commended. them—the Jews. not cast up—not duly prepared; referring to the raised centre of the road. CALVIN translates, "not trodden." They had no precedent of former saints to induce them to devise for themselves a new worship. 16. hissing—(1 Kings 9. 8.) In sign of contempt. That which was to be only the event is ascribed to the purpose of the people, although altogether different from what they would have been likely to hope for. Their purpose is represented as being the destruction of their country, because it was the inevitable result of their course of acting. wag . . . head—in mockery (2 Kings 19. 21; Matthew 27. 39). As "wag . . . head" answers to "hissing," so "astonished" answers to "desolate," for which, therefore, MUNSTER, &c., rather translate, "an object of wonder" (ch. 19. 8). 17. as with an east wind—lit., "I will scatter them, as an east wind" (scatters all before it); the most violent wind (Job 27. 21; Psalm 48. 7; Isaiah 27. 8). Thirty-two MSS. read (without as), "with an east wind." I will show them the back . . . not . . . face—just retribution: as "they turned their back unto me . . . not their face" (ch. 2. 27). 18. (Ch. 11. 19.) Let us bring a capital charge against him, as a false prophet; "for (whereas he foretells that this land shall be left without priests to teach the law, Malachi 2. 7; without scribes to explain its difficulties; and without prophets to reveal God's will), the law shall not perish from the prophet," &c.; since God has made these a lasting institution in His church, and the law declares they shall never perish (Leviticus 6. 18; 10. 11; cf. ch. 5. 12). [GROTIUS.] the wise—scribes and elders joined to the priests. Perhaps they mean to say, we must have right on our side, in spite of Jeremiah's words against us and our prophets, &c. (ch. 23. 15, 16; 29. 25, 32; 5. 31); "for the law shall not perish," &c. I prefer GROTIUS' explanation. with . . . tongue—by a false accusation (Psalm 57. 4; 64. 8; 12. 4; 50. 19). For the tongue (Margin), i. e., for his speaking against us. "In the tongue," i. e., let us kill him, that he may speak no more against us. [CASTALIO.] 19. Give heed—Contrasted with, "let us not give heed" (v. 18). As they give no heed to me, do thou, O Lord, give heed to me, and let my words at least have their weight with thee. 20. In the particulars here specified, Jeremiah was a type of Jesus Christ (Psalm 109. 4, 5; John 15. 25). my soul—my life; me (Psalm 35. 7). I stood before thee . . . to turn away thy wrath—so Moses (Psalm 106. 23; cf. Ezekiel 22. 30). So Jesus Christ, the antitype of previous partial intercessors (Isaiah 59. 16). 21. pour out their blood by the force of the sword—lit., by the hands of the sword. So Ezekiel 35. 5. MAURER with JEROME translates, "deliver them over to the power of the sword." But cf. Psalm 68. 10, Margin; Isaiah 53. 12. In this prayer he does not indulge in personal revenge, as if it were his own cause that was at stake; but he speaks under the dictation of the Spirit, ceasing to intercede, and speaking prophetically, knowing they were doomed to destruction as reprobates; for those not so, he doubtless ceased not to intercede. We are not to draw an example from this, which is a special case, put to death—or, as in ch. 15. 2, "perish by the death-plague." [MAURER.] men . . . young men—HORSLEY distinguishes the former as married men past middle life; the latter, the flower of the unmarried youth. 22. cry—by reason of the enemy bursting in: let their houses be no shelter to them in their calamities. [CALVIN.] digged . . . pit—(V. 20; Psalm 57. 6; 119. 85.) 23. forgive not—(Psalm 109. 9, 10, 14.) blot out—image from an account book (Revelation 20. 12). before thee—Hypocrites suppose God is not near, so long as they escape punishment; but when He punishes, they are said to stand before Him, because they can no longer flatter themselves they can escape His eye (cf. Psalm 90. 8). deal thus—exert thy power against them. [MAURER.] time of thine anger—though He seems to tarry, His time shall come at last (Ecclesiastes 8. 11, 12; 2 Peter 3. 9, 10).

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-15. THE DESOLATION OF THE JEWS FOR THEIR SINS FORETOLD IN THE VALLEY OF HINNOM, THE SYMBOL OF BREAKING A BOTTLE. Referred by MAURER, &c., to the beginning of Zedekiah's reign. 1. bottle—Hebrew, babuk, so called from the gurgling sound which it makes when being emptied. ancients—elders. As witnesses of the symbolic action (v. 10; Isaiah 8. 1, 2), that the Jews might not afterwards plead ignorance of the prophecy. The seventy-two elders, composing the Sanhedrim, or Great Council, were partly taken from "the priests," partly from the other tribes, i. e., "the people," the former presiding over spiritual matters, the latter over civil; the seventy-two represented the whole people. 2. valley of the son of Hinnom—or Tophet, south of Jerusalem, where human victims were offered, and children made to pass through the fire, in honour of Molech. east gate—Margin, sun gate, sunrise being in the east. MAURER translates, the potter's gate. Through it lay the road to the valley of Hinnom (Joshua 15. 8). The potters there formed vessels for the use of the temple, which was close by (cf. v. 10, 14; ch. 13. 2; Zechariah 11. 13). The same as "the water gate toward the east" (Nehemiah 3. 26; 12. 37); so called from the brook Kedron. CALVIN translates, as English Version and Margin, "It was monstrous perversity to tread the law under foot in so conspicuous a place, over which the sun daily rising reminded them of the light of God's law." 3. The scene of their guilt is chosen as the scene of the denunciation against them. kings—the king and queen (ch. 13. 18); or including the king's counsellors and governors under him. tingle—as if struck by a thunder peal (1 Samuel 3. 11; 2 Kings 21. 12). 4. (Isaiah 65. 11.) estranged this place—devoted it to the worship of strange gods; alienating a portion of the sacred city from God, the rightful Lord of the temple, city and whole land. nor their fathers—viz., the godly among them; their ungodly fathers God makes no account of. blood of innocence—slain in honour of Molech (ch. 7. 31; Psalm 106. 37). 5. commanded not—nay, more, I commanded the opposite (Leviticus 18. 21; see ch. 7. 31, 32). 6. no more . . . Tophet—from Hebrew, toph, a drum; for in sacrificing children to Molech drums were beaten to drown their cries. Thus the name indicated the joy of the people at the fancied propitiation of the god by this sacrifice; in antithesis to its joyless name subsequently. valley of

slaughter—it should be the scene of slaughter, no longer of children, but of men; not of "innocents" (v. 4), but of those who richly deserved their fate. The city could not be assailed without first occupying the valley of Hinnom, in which was the only fountain; hence arose the violent battle there. 7. make void the counsel—defeat their plans for repelling the enemy (2 Chronicles 32, 1-4; Isaiah 19, 3; 22, 9, 11). Or their schemes of getting help by having recourse to idols. [CALVIN.] in this place—the valley of Hinnom was to be the place of the Chaldean encampment; the very place where they looked for help from idols was to be the scene of their own slaughter. 8. (Note, ch. 18, 16.) 9. (Deuteronomy 28, 53; Lamentations 4, 10.) 10. break . . . bottle—a symbolical action, explained in v. 11. the men—the elders of the people and of the priests (v. 1; cf. ch. 51, 63, 64). 11. as one breaketh a potter's vessel—expressing God's absolute sovereignty (ch. 18, 6; Psalm 2, 9; Isaiah 30, 14, Margin; Lamentations 4, 2; Romans 9, 20, 21). cannot be made whole again—a broken potter's vessel cannot be restored, but a new one may be made of the same material. So God raised a new Jewish seed, not identical with the destroyed rebels, but by substituting another generation in their stead. [GROTIUS.] no place to bury—(Ch. 7, 32.) 12. make this city as Tophet—i. e., as defiled with dead bodies as Tophet. 13. shall be defiled—with dead bodies (v. 12; 2 Kings 23, 10). because of all the houses—Rather (explanatory of the previous "the houses . . . and . . . houses"), "even all the houses," &c. [CALVIN.] roofs—being flat, they were used as high places for sacrifices to the sun and planets (ch. 32, 29; 2 Kings 23, 11, 12; Zephaniah 1, 5). The Nabateans, south and east of the Dead Sea, a nation most friendly to the Jews, according to Strabo, had the same usage. 14. court of the Lord's house—near Tophet. The largest court, under the open air, where was the greatest crowd (2 Chronicles 20, 5). 15. her towns—the suburban villages and towns near Jerusalem, such as Bethany.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-18. JEREMIAH'S INCARCERATION BY PASHUR, THE PRINCIPAL OFFICER OF THE TEMPLE, FOR PROPHECYING WITHIN ITS PRECINCTS; HIS RENEWED PREDICTIONS AGAINST THE CITY, &c., ON HIS LIBERATION. 1. son—Descendant. of Immer—One of the original "governors of the sanctuary and of the house of God," twenty-four in all, i. e., sixteen of the sons of Eleazar and eight of the sons of Ithamar (1 Chronicles 24, 14). This Pashur is distinct from Pashur, son of Melchiah (ch. 21, 1). The "captains" (Luke 22, 4) seem to have been over the twenty-four guards of the temple, and had only the right of apprehending any who were guilty of delinquency within it; but the Sanhedrim had the judicial power over such delinquents [GROTIUS] (ch. 26, 8, 10, 16). 2. The fact that Pashur was of the same order and of the same family as Jeremiah aggravates the indignity of the blow (1 Kings 22, 24; Matthew 26, 67). stocks—An instrument of torture with five holes, in which the neck, two hands, and two feet were thrust, the body being kept in a crooked posture (ch. 29, 26). From a Hebrew root, "to turn," or "rack." This marks Pashur's cruelty. high—i. e., the upper gate (2 Kings 15, 35). gate of Benjamin—a gate in the temple wall, corresponding to the gate of Benjamin, properly so called, in the city wall, in the direction of the territory of Benjamin (ch. 7, 2; 37, 13; 38, 7). The temple gate of Benjamin, being on a lofty position, was called "the high gate," to distinguish it from the city wall gate of Benjamin. 3. Pashur—Compounded of two roots, meaning "largeness" (and so "security") "on every side," in antithesis to Magor-missabit, "terror round about" (v. 10; ch. 6, 25; 46, 5; 49, 29; Psalm 31, 13). 4. terror . . . to all thy friends—who have believed thy false promises (v. 6). The sense must be in order to accord with "fear round about" (v. 3). I will bring terror on thee and on all thy friends, that terror arising from thyself, viz., thy false prophecies. Thou and thy prophecies will be seen, to the dismay both of thee and thy dupes, to have caused their ruin and

thine. MAURER's translation is therefore not needed, "I will give up thee and all thy friends to terror." 5. strength—i. e., resources. labours—fruits of labour, gain, wealth. 6. prophesied lies—viz., that God cannot possibly leave this land without prophets, priests, and teachers ("the wise") (ch. 18, 18; cf. ch. 5, 31). 7. Jeremiah's complaint, not unlike that of Job, breathing somewhat of human infirmity in consequence of his imprisonment. Thou didst promise never to give me up to the will of mine enemies, and yet thou hast done so. But Jeremiah misunderstood God's promise, which was not that he should have nothing to suffer, but that God would deliver him out of sufferings (ch. 1, 19). deceived—others translate as Margin, "thou hast enticed" or "persuaded me," viz., to undertake the prophetic office, "and I was persuaded," i. e., suffered myself to be persuaded to undertake what I find too hard for me. So the Hebrew word is used in a good sense (Genesis 9, 27, Margin; Proverbs 25, 15; Hosea 2, 14). stronger than I—Thou whose strength I could not resist hast laid this burden on me, and hast prevailed (hast made me prophesy, in spite of my reluctance) (ch. 1, 5-7); yet, when I exercise my office, I am treated with derision (Lamentations 3, 14). 8. Rather, "Whenever I speak, I cry out." "Concerning violence and spoil, I (am compelled to) cry out," i. e., complain. [MAURER.] English Version in the last clause is more graphic, "I cried violence and spoil" (ch. 6, 7)! I could not speak in a calm tone; their desperate wickedness compelled me to "cry out." because—Rather, therefore; the apodosis of the previous sentence; because in discharging my prophetic functions, I not merely spake, but cried; and cried, violence, &c.; therefore the word of the Lord was made a reproach to me (v. 7). 9. his word was—or lit., "there was in my heart, as it were, a burning fire," i. e., the Divine afflatus or impulse to speak was as, &c. (Job 32, 18, 19; Psalm 39, 3). weary with forbearing, and I could not—"I laboured to contain myself, but I could not" (Acts 18, 5; cf. ch. 23, 9; 1 Corinthians 9, 16, 17). 10. For—Not referring to the words immediately preceding, but to "I will not make mention of Him;" the "defaming" or detraction of the enemy on every side (see Psalm 31, 13) tempted him to think of prophesying no more. Report . . . we will report—The words of his adversaries one to the other; give any information against him (true or false) which will give colour for accusing him; and "we will report it," viz., to the Sanhedrim, in order to crush him. familiars—lit., men of my peace; those who pretended to be on peaceable terms with me (Psalm 41, 9). Jeremiah is type of Messiah, referred to in that Psalm. (See ch. 33, 22; Job 19, 19; Psalm 55, 13, 14; Luke 11, 53, 54.) watched for my halting—(Psalm 35, 15, Margin, "halting;" Psalm 38, 17; 71, 10, Margin.) GESENIUS not so well translates, according to Arabic idiom, "those guarding my side" (i. e., my most intimate friends always at my side), in apposition to "familiars," and the subject of say (instead of saying). The Hebrew means properly "side," then "halting," as the halt bend on one side. enticed—to commit some sin. 11. not prevail—as they hoped to do (v. 10; ch. 15, 20). prosper—in their plot. 12. priest the righteous—in latent contrast to the hasty judgments of men (ch. 11, 20; 17, 10). opened—i. e., committed (cf. 2 Kings 19, 14; Psalm 35, 1). 13. delivered . . . soul—This deliverance took place when Zedekiah succeeded to Jeconiah. 14-18. The contrast between the spirit of this passage and the preceding thanksgiving is to be explained thus: to show how great was the deliverance (v. 13), he subjoins a picture of what his wounded spirit had been previous to his deliverance; I had said in the time of my imprisonment, "Cursed be the day;" my feeling was that of Job (Job 3, 3, 10, 11, whose words Jeremiah therefore copies). Though Jeremiah's zeal had been stirred up, not so much for self as for God's honour trampled on by the rejection of the prophet's words, yet it was intemperate when he made his birth a subject for cursing, which was really a ground for thanksgiving. 15. A man-child—The birth of whom is in the East a special subject of joy; whereas that of a female is often not so. 16. the cities—Sodom and Gomorrah. cry . . .

morning . . . noontide—i. e., Let him be kept in alarm the whole day (not merely at night when terrors ordinarily prevail, but in daytime when it is something extraordinary with terrifying war-shouts, as those in a besieged city (ch. 18. 22). 17. he—"that man" (v. 15, 16). from the womb—i. e., at that time whilst I was still in the womb.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver 1-14. ZEDEKIAH CONSULTS JEREMIAH WHAT IS TO BE THE EVENT OF THE WAR: GOD'S ANSWER. Written probably when, after having repulsed the Egyptians who brought succours to the Jews (ch. 37. 5-8; 2 Kings 24. 7), the Chaldees were a second time advancing against Jerusalem, but were not yet closely besieging it (v. 4, 13). [ROSEN-MULLER.] This chapter probably ought to be placed between chs. 37. and 38.; since what the "princes," in ch. 38. 2, represent Jeremiah as having said, is exactly what we find in v. 9 of this ch. 21. Moreover, the same persons as here (v. 1) are mentioned in ch. 37. 3; 38. 1, viz., Pashur and Zephaniah. What is here more fully related is there simply referred to in the historical narrative. Cf. ch. 52. 24; 2 Kings 25. 18. [MAURER.] Zedekiah—A prince having some reverence for sacred things, for which reason he sends an honourable embassy to Jeremiah; but not having moral courage to obey his better impulses. Pashur—son of Melchiah, of the fifth order of priests, distinct from Pashur, son of Immer (ch. 20. 1), of the sixteenth order (1 Chronicles 24. 9, 14). Zephaniah—of the twenty-fourth order. They are designated, not by their father, but by their family (1 Chronicles 24. 18). 2. Nebuchadnezzar—The more usual way of spelling the name in Jeremiah than Nebuchadnezzar. From Persic roots, meaning either "Nebo, the chief of the gods," or, "Nebo, the god of fire." He was son of Nabopolassar, who committed the command of the army against Egypt, at Carchemish, and against Judea, to the crown-prince. according to all his wondrous works—Zedekiah hopes for God's special interposition, such as was vouchsafed to Hezekiah against Sennacherib (2 Kings 19. 35, 36). he—Nebuchadnezzar. go up from us—rise up from the siege which he sat down to lay (ch. 37. 5, 11, Margin; Numbers 16. 24, 27; 1 Kings 15. 19, Margin). 4. God of Israel—Those "wondrous works" (v. 2) do not belong to you; God is faithful; it is you who forfeit the privileges of the covenant by unfaithfulness. "God will always remain the God of Israel, though He destroy thee and thy people." [CALVIN.] turn back the weapons—I will turn them to a very different use from what you intend them. You now with them fight against the Chaldees "without the walls" (the Jewish defenders being as yet able to sally forth more freely, and defend the fountains outside the walls in the valley under Mount Zion; see v. 13; ch. 19. 6, 7), but soon ye shall be driven back within the city [MAURER], and "in the midst" of it I will cause all your arms to be gathered in one place ("I will assemble them," viz., your arms) by the Chaldean conquerors [GROTIUS], who shall slay you with those very arms. [MENOCHIUS.] 5. The Jews shall have not merely the Chaldees, but Jehovah Himself in wrath at their provocations, fighting against them. Every word enhances the formidable character of God's opposition, "I myself . . . outstretched hand . . . strong arm (no longer in Exodus 6. 6, and in the case of Sennacherib, in your behalf, but) in anger . . . fury . . . great wrath." 7. the people, and such—rather, explanatory, "the people, viz., such as are left," &c. seek their life—content with nothing short of their death; not content with plundering and enslaving them. smite with . . . sword—This was the fate of Zedekiah's sons, and many of the Jewish nobles. Zedekiah himself, though not put to a violent death, died of grief. Cf. as to the accurate fulfilment, ch. 34. 4; Ezekiel 12. 13; 2 Kings 25. 6, 7. 8. "Life," if ye surrender, "death," if ye persist in opposing the Chaldees (cf. Deuteronomy 30. 19). The individuality of Jeremiah's mission from God is shown in that he urges to unconditional surrender; whereas all former prophets had urged the people to oppose their invaders (Isalah 7. 16; 37. 33, 35). 9. (Ch. 38. 2, 17, 18.) falleth to—deserts to. life

. . . a prey—proverbial, to make one's escape with life, like a valuable spoil or prey that one carries off; the narrowness of the escape, and the joy felt at it, are included in the idea (ch. 39. 18). 10. set . . . face against—determined to punish (Leviticus 17. 10). 13. house of David—the royal family and all in office about the king. He calls them so, because it was the greater disgrace that they had so degenerated from the piety of their forefather, David; and to repress their glorying in their descent from him, as if they were therefore inviolable; but God will not spare them as apostates. in the morning—alluding to the time of dispensing justice (Job 24. 17; Psalm 101. 8); but the sense is mainly proverbial, for "with promptness" (Psalm 90. 14; 143. 8). MAURER translates, "every morning," lest my fury . . . like fire—Already it was kindled, and the decree of God gone forth against the city (v. 4, 5), but the king and his house may yet be preserved by repentance and reformation. God urges to righteousness, not as if they can thereby escape punishment wholly, but as the condition of a mitigation of it. 13. Inhabitant of the valley, and rock of the plain—Jerusalem personified; situated for the most part on hills, with valleys at the bottom of them, as the valley of Hinnom, &c.; and beyond the valleys and mountains again, a position most fortified by nature, whence the inhabitants fancied themselves beyond the reach of enemies; but since God is "against" them, their position will avail nothing for them. The "valley" between Mount Zion and Moriah is called Tyropæon. ROBINSON takes, "rock of the plain" as Mount Zion, on which is a level tract of some extent. It is appropriately here referred to, being the site of the royal residence of the "house of David," addressed (v. 12). 14. fruit of your doings—(Proverbs 1. 31; Isalah 3. 10, 11.) forest thereof—viz., of your city, taken from v. 13. "Forest" refers to the dense mass of houses built of cedar, &c. from Lebanon (ch. 22. 7; 52. 13; 2 Kings 25. 9).

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1-30. EXHORTATION TO REPENTANCE; JUDGMENT ON SHALLUM, JEHOIAKIM, AND CONIAH. Belonging to an earlier period than ch. 21., viz., the reigns of Shallum or Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jeconiah (v. 10, 13, 20). Jeremiah often groups his prophecies, not by chronological order, but by similarity of subjects; thus v. 3 in this chapter corresponds to ch. 21. 12. GROTIUS thinks that Jeremiah here repeats to Zedekiah what he had announced to that king's predecessors formerly (viz., his brother and brother's son), of a similar bearing, and which had since come to pass; a warning to Zedekiah. Probably, in arranging his prophecies they were grouped for the first time in the present order, designed by the Holy Spirit to set forth the series of kings of Judah, all four alike, falling in "righteousness," followed at last by the "King," a righteous Branch raised into David, in the house of Judah, "the Lord our righteousness" (ch. 23. 6). The unrighteousness of Zedekiah suggested the review of his predecessors' failure in the same respects, and consequent punishment, which ought to have warned him, but did not. 1. Go down—The temple (where Jeremiah had been prophesying) was higher than the king's palace on Mount Zion (ch. 36. 10, 12; 2 Chronicles 23. 20). Hence the phrase, "Go down." the king of Judah—perhaps including each of the four successive kings, to whom it was consecutively addressed, here brought together in one picture: Shallum, v. 11; Jehoiakim, v. 13-18; Jeconiah, v. 24; Zedekiah, the address to whom (ch. 21. 1, 11, 12) suggests notice of the rest. 2. these gates—of the king's palace. 3. Jehoiakim is meant here especially: he, by oppression, levied the tribute imposed on him by Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt (2 Chronicles 36. 3), and taxed his people, and took their labour without pay, to build gorgeous palaces for himself (v. 13-17), and shed innocent blood, e.g., that of Urijah the prophet (ch. 26. 20-24; 2 Kings 23. 35; 24. 4). 4. upon the throne of David—lit., for David on his throne (see Note, ch. 13. 13). This verse is repeated substantially from ch. 17. 25. his servants—so the Kerl. But Chetib, singular, "his servant;" i. e., distributively, "each with his servants;" ch. 17. 25, "their princes." 5. I swear by myself—(Hebrews 6. 13, 17.) God swears because it seemed to them incredible that the family of David should be cast off. this house—the king's, where Jeremiah spake (v. 4). 6. *Though thou art as beautiful as Gilead, and as majestic in mine eyes (before me) as the summit of Lebanon, yet surely (the Hebrew is a formula of swearing to express certainly: If I do not make thee, &c., believe me not ever hereafter: so "as truly as I live," Numbers 14. 23; "surely," Numbers 14. 35), &c. The mention of Gilead may allude not only to its past beauty, but covertly also to its desolation by the judgment on Israel; a warning now to Judah and the house of David. "Lebanon" is appropriately mentioned, as the king's house was built of its noble cedars. cities—not other cities, but the different parts of the city of Jerusalem (2 Samuel 12. 27; 2 Kings 10. 25). [MAURER.] 7. prepare—lit., sanctify, or solemnly set apart for a particular work (cf. Isaiah 13. 3). thy choice cedars—Isaiah 37. 24.) Thy palaces built of choice cedars (Song of Solomon 1. 17). 8. (Deuteronomy 20. 21, 25). The Gentile nations, more intelligent than you, shall understand that which ye do not, viz., that this city is a spectacle of God's vengeance. [CALVIN.] 9. (2 Kings 22. 17.) 10, 11. Weep not for—i. e., not so much for Josiah, who was taken away by death from the evil to come (2 Kings 22. 20; Isaiah 57. 1); as for Shallum or Jehoahaz, his son (2 Kings 23. 30), who, after a three months' reign, was carried off by Pharaoh-necho into Egypt, never to see his native land again (2 Kings 23. 31-34). Dying saints are justly to be envied, whilst living sinners are to be pitied. The allusion is to the great weeping of the people at the death of Josiah, and on each anniversary of it, in which Jeremiah himself took a prominent part (2 Chronicles 35. 24, 25). The name "Shallum" is here given in irony to Jehoahaz, who reigned but three months; as if he were a second Shallum, son of Jabesh, who reigned only one month in Samaria (2 Kings 15. 13; 2 Chronicles 36. 1-4). Shallum means retribution, a name of no good omen to him [GROTIUS]; originally the people called him Shallom, indicative of peace and prosperity. But Jeremiah applies it in irony. 1 Chronicles 3. 15, calls Shallum the fourth son of Josiah. The people raised him to the throne before his brother Eliakim or Jehoiakim, though the latter was the elder (2 Kings 23. 31, 36; 2 Chronicles 36. 1); perhaps on account of Jehoiakim's extravagance (v. 13, 15). Jehoiakim was put in Shallum's (Jehoahaz's) stead by Pharaoh-necho. Jeconiah, his son, succeeded. Zedekiah (Mattaniah), uncle of Jeconiah, and brother of Jehoiakim and Jehoahaz, was last of all raised to the throne by Nebuchadnezzar. He shall not return—The people perhaps entertained hopes of Shallum's return from Egypt, in which case they would replace him on the throne, and thereby free themselves from the oppressive taxes imposed by Jehoiakim. 13. Not only did Jehoiakim tax the people (2 Kings 23. 35) for Pharaoh's tribute, but also took their forced labour, without pay, for building a splendid palace; in violation of Leviticus 19. 13; Deuteronomy 24. 14, 15. Cf. Micah 3. 10; Habakkuk 2. 9; James 5. 4. God will repay in justice those who will not in justice pay those whom they employ. 14. wide—lit., a house of dimensions ("measures"). Cf. Numbers 13. 32, Margin, "men of statures." large—rather, as Margin, "airy," from Hebrew root, "to breathe freely." Upper rooms in the East are the principal apartments. cutteth him out windows—the Hebrew, if a noun, is rather, "my windows;" then the translation ought to be, "and let my windows (Jehoiakim speaking) be cut out for it," i. e., in the house; or, "and let (the workman) cut out my windows for it." But the word is rather an adjective; "he cutteth it (the house) out for himself, so as to be full of windows." The following words accord with this construction, "and (he makes it) cleft with cedar." &c. [MAURER.] Retaining English Version, there must be understood something remarkable about the windows, since they are deemed worthy of notice. GESIENUS thinks the word dual, "double windows," the blinds being two-leaved, as now on the Continent. vermillion—Hebrew, shashar, called so from a people of India beyond the Ganges, by whom it is exported (PLINY, 6. 19). The old vermillion was composed of sulphur and quicksilver; not of red lead, as* our vermillion. 15. closest thyself—rather, thou viest, i. e., art emulous to surpass thy forefathers in the magnificence of thy palaces. eat and drink—did not Josiah, thy father, enjoy all that man really needs for his bodily wants? Did he need to build costly palaces to secure his throne? Nay, he did secure it by "judgment and justice;" whereas thou, with all thy luxurious building, sittest on a tottering throne. then—on that account, therefore. 16. was not this to know me—viz., to show by deeds that one knows God's will, as was the case with Josiah (cf. John 13. 17; contrast Titus 1. 16). 17. thine—as opposed to thy father, Josiah. 18. Ah my brother! . . . sister!—Addressing him with such titles of affection as one would address to a deceased friend beloved as a brother or sister (cf. 1 Kings 13. 30). This expresses, They shall not lament him with the lamentation of private individuals [VATABLUS], or of blood-relatives [GROTIUS]: as "Ah! lord," expresses public lamentation in the case of a king [VATABLUS], or that of subjects. [GROTIUS.] HENDERSON thinks, "Ah! sister," refers to Jehoiakim's queen, who, though taken to Babylon, and not left unburied on the way, as Jehoiakim, yet was not honoured at her death with royal lamentations, such as would have been poured forth over her at Jerusalem. He notices the beauty of Jeremiah's manner in his prophecy against Jehoiakim. In v. 13, 14 he describes him in general terms; then, in v. 15-17, he directly addresses him without naming him; at last, in v. 18, he names him, but in the third person, to imply that God puts him to a distance from him. The boldness of the Hebrew prophets proves their Divine mission; were it not so, their reproofs to the Hebrew kings, who held the throne by Divine authority, would have been treason. Ah his glory!—"Alas! his majesty." 19. burial of an ass—i. e., he shall have the same burial as an ass would get, viz., he shall be left a prey for beasts and birds. [JEROME.] This is not formally narrated. But 2 Chronicles 36. 6 states that "Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon;" his treatment there is nowhere mentioned. The prophecy here, and in ch. 36. 30, harmonizes these two facts. He was slain by Nebuchadnezzar, who changed his purpose of taking him to Babylon, on the way thither, and left him unburied outside Jerusalem. 2 Kings 24. 6, "Jehoiakim slept with his fathers," does not contradict this; it simply expresses his being gathered to his fathers by death, not his being buried with his fathers (Psalm 49. 19). The two phrases are found together, as expressing two distinct ideas (2 Kings 15. 33; 16. 20). 20. Delivered in the reign of Jehoiachin (Jeconiah or Coniah), son of Jehoiakim; appended to the previous prophecy respecting Jehoiakim, on account of the similarity of the two prophecies. He calls on Jerusalem, personified as a mourning female, to go up to the highest points visible from Jerusalem, and lament there (ch. 3. 21, Note) the calamity of herself, bereft of allies and of her princes, who are one after the other being cast down. Bashan—north of the region beyond Jordan; the mountains of Anti-libanus are referred to (Psalm 68. 15). from the passages—viz., of the rivers (Judges 12. 6); or else the borders of the country (1 Samuel 13. 23; Isaiah 10. 29). The passes (1 Samuel 14. 4). MAURER translates, "Abarim," a mountainous tract beyond Jordan, opposite Jericho, and south of Bashan; this accords with the mention of the mountains Lebanon and Bashan (Numbers 27. 12; 33. 47). lovers—the allies of Judea, especially Egypt, now unable to help the Jews, being crippled by Babylon (2 Kings 24. 7). 21. I admonished thee in time. Thy sin has not been a sin of ignorance or thoughtlessness, but wilful. prosperity—given thee by me; yet thou wouldst not hearken to the gracious Giver. The Hebrew is plural, to express, "In the height of thy prosperity;" so "droughts" (Isaiah 58. 11). thou saidst—not in words, but in thy conduct, virtually. thy youth—from the time that I brought thee out of Egypt, and formed thee into a people (ch. 7. 25; 2. 2; Isaiah 47. 12). 22. wind—the Chaldees, as a parching wind that sweeps rapidly over and withers vegetation (ch. 4. 11, 12; Psalm 103. 16; Isaiah 40. 7). eat up . . . pastors—i. e., thy kings (ch. 2. 8). There is a happy play on words. The pastors, whose office it is to feed the sheep, shall themselves be fed on. They who should drive the flock from place to place for pasture shall be driven into exile by the Chaldees. 23. Inhabitant of Lebanon—viz., Jerusalem, whose temple, palaces, and principal habitations were built of cedars of Lebanon. how gracious—Irony. How graciously thou wilt be treated by the Chaldees, when they come on thee suddenly, as pangs on a woman in travail (ch. 6. 24). Nay, all thy fine buildings will win no favour for thee from them. MAURER, &c., translate, "How shalt thou be to be pitied!" 24. As I live—God's most solemn formula of oath (ch. 46. 18; 4. 2; Deuteronomy 32. 40; 1 Samuel 25. 34). Coniah—Jeconiah or Jehoiachin. The contraction of the name is meant in contempt. signet—such ring-seals were often of the greatest value (Song of Solomon 8. 6; Haggai 2. 23). Jehoiachin's popularity is probably here referred to. right hand—the hand most valued. I would pluck thee thence—(Cf. Obadiah 4.) "an account of thy father's sins, as well as thine own (2 Chronicles 36. 9). There is a change here, as often in Hebrew poetry, from the third to the second person, to bring the threat more directly home to him. After a three months and ten days' reign, the Chaldees deposed him. In Babylon, however, by God's favour he was ultimately treated more kindly than other royal captives (ch. 52. 31-34). But none of his direct posterity ever came to the throne. 25. give . . . into . . . hand—"I will pluck thee" from "my right hand," and "will give thee into the hand of them that seek thy life." 26. thy mother—Nehushta, the queen-dowager (2 Kings 24. 6, 8, 15; see ch. 13. 18). 27. they—Coniah and his mother. He passes from the second person (v. 26) to the third person here, to express alienation. The king is as it were put out of sight, as if unworthy of being spoken with directly. desire—lit., lift up their soul (ch. 44. 14; Psalm 24. 4; 25. 1). Judea was the land which they in Babylon should pine after in vain. 28. broken idol—Coniah was idolized once by the Jews; Jeremiah, therefore, in their person, expresses their astonishment at one from whom so much had been expected being now so utterly cast aside. vessel . . . no pleasure—(Psalm 31. 12; Hosea 8. 8.) The answer to this is given (Romans 9. 20-23; contrast 2 Timothy 2. 21). his seed—(See Note, v. 29.) 29, 30. O earth! earth! earth!—Jeconiah was not actually without offspring (cf. v. 28, "his seed;" 1 Chronicles 3. 17, 18; Matthew 1. 12), but he was to be "written childless," as a warning to posterity, i. e., without a lineal heir to his throne. It is with a reference to the three kings, Shallum, Jehoiakim, and Jeconiah, that the earth is thrice invoked. [BENGEL.] Or, the triple invocation is to give intensity to the call for attention to the announcement of the end of the royal line, so far as Jehoiachin's seed is concerned. Though Messiah (Matthew 1.), the heir of David's throne, was lineally descended from Jeconiah, it was only through Joseph, who, though His legal, was not His real father. Matthew gives the legal pedigree through Solomon down to Joseph; Luke the real pedigree, from Mary, the real parent, through Nathan, brother of Solomon, upwards (Luke 3. 31). no man of his seed . . . upon the throne—this explains the sense in which "childless" is used. Though the succession to the throne failed in his line, still the promise to David (Psalm 89. 30-37) was revived in Zerubbabel, and consummated in Christ.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1-40. THE WICKED RULERS TO BE SUPERSEDED BY THE KING, WHO SHOULD REIGN OVER THE AGAIN UNITED PEOPLES, ISRAEL AND JUDAH. This forms the epitome to the denunciations of the four kings, in ch. 21. 22. 1. pastors—Shallum, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah (Ezekiel 34. 2). 2. Ye have not . . . visited them . . . I will visit upon you—just retribution. Play upon the double sense of "visit." "Visit upon," viz., in wrath (Exodus 32. 34). 3, 4. Restoration of Judah from Babylon foretold in language which in its fulness can only apply to the final restoration of both "Judah" and "Israel" (cf. v. 6); also "out of all countries." In this verse and v. 8; also, "neither shall they be lacking," i. e., none shall be missing or detached from the rest: a prophecy never yet fully accomplished. It holds good also of the spiritual Israel, the elect of both Jews and Gentiles (Malachi 3. 16, 17; John 10. 23; 17. 12). As to the literal Israel also, see ch. 32. 37; Isaiah 54. 13; 60. 21; Ezekiel 34. 11-16). shepherds . . . shall feed them—(Ch. 3. 15; Ezekiel 34. 23-31.) Zerubbabel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Maccabees were but typical of the consummating fulfilment of these prophecies under Messiah. 5. As Messianic prophecy extended over many years in which many political changes took place in harmony with these, it displayed its riches by a variety more effective than if it had been manifested all at once. As the moral condition of the Jews required in each instance, so Messiah was exhibited in a corresponding phase, thus becoming more and more the soul of the nation's life: so that He is represented as the antitypical Israel (Isaiah 49. 3). unto David—HENGSTENBERG observes that Isaiah dwells more on His prophetic and priestly office, which had already been partly set forth (Deuteronomy 18. 18; Psalm 110. 4). Other prophets dwell more on His kingly office. Therefore here He is associated with "David" the King: but in Isaiah 11. 1 with the then poor and unknown "Jesse." righteous Branch—"the Branch of righteousness" (ch. 33. 15). "The Branch" simply (Zechariah 3. 8; 6. 12). "The Branch of the Lord" (Isaiah 4. 2). prosper—the very term applied to Messiah's undertaking (Isaiah 52. 13; Margin; 53. 10). Righteousness or justice is the characteristic of Messiah elsewhere too, in connection with our salvation or justification (Isaiah 53. 11; Daniel 9. 24; Zechariah 9. 9). So in the New Testament He is not merely "righteous" Himself, but "righteousness to us" (1 Corinthians 1. 30), so that we become "the righteousness of God in Him" (Romans 10. 3, 4; 2 Corinthians 5. 19-21; Philippians 3. 9). execute judgment and justice on earth—(Psalm 72. 2; Isaiah 9. 7; 32. 1, 18.) Not merely a spiritual reign in the sense in which He is "our righteousness," but a righteous reign "in the earth" (ch. 3. 17, 18). In some passages He is said to come to judge, in others to reign. In Matthew 25. 34, He is called "the King." Psalm 9. 7, unites them. Cf. Daniel 7. 22, 26, 27. 6. Judah . . . Israel . . . dwell safely—Cf. ch. 33. 16, where "Jerusalem" is substituted for "Israel" here. Only Judah, and that only in part, has as yet returned. So far are the Jews from having enjoyed, as yet, the temporal blessings here foretold as the result of Messiah's reign, that their lot has been, for eighteen centuries, worse than ever before. The accomplishment must, therefore, be still future, when both Judah and Israel in their own land shall dwell safely under a Christocracy, far more privileged than even the old theocracy (ch. 32. 37; Deuteronomy 33. 28; Isaiah 54. 60; 65. 17-25; Zechariah 14. 11). shall be called the Lord—i. e., shall be (Isaiah 9. 6) "Jehovah," God's incommunicable name. Though when applied to created things, it expresses only some peculiar connection they have with Jehovah (Genesis 22. 14; Exodus 17. 15), yet when applied to Messiah it must express His Godhead manifested in justifying power towards us (1 Timothy 3. 16). "Our" marks His manhood, which is also implied in His being a Branch raised unto David, whence His human title, "Son of David" (cf. Matthew 22. 42-45). "Righteousness" marks His Godhead, for God alone can justify the ungodly (cf. Romans 4. 5; Isaiah 45. 17, 24, 25). 7, 8. Repeated from ch. 16. 14, 15.—The prophet said the same things often, in order that his sayings might make the more impression. The same promise as in v. 3, 4. The wide dispersion of the Jews at the Babylonish captivity prefigures their present wider dispersion (Isaiah 11. 11; Joel 3. 6). Their second deliverance is to exceed far the former one from Egypt. But the deliverance from Babylon was inferior to that from Egypt in respect to the miracles performed and the numbers delivered. The final deliverance under Messiah must, therefore, be meant, of which that from Babylon was the earnest. 9. because of the prophets—so the Masorites and Targum. But Vulgate, LXX., &c., make this the inscription of the prophecy, CONCERNING THE PROPHETS: as in ch. 46. 2; 48. 1; 49. 1. Jeremiah expresses his horror at the so-called "prophets" not warning the people, though iniquity—so fearfully abounded, soon to be followed by awful judgments. bones shake—(Habakkuk 3, 16.) drunken—God's judgments are represented as stupefying like wine. The effects of the Holy Spirit also are compared to those of wine (Acts 2, 17). In both cases ecstasy was produced. This accounts for the denial of wine to those likely to be inspired, Nazarites, &c. (Luke 1, 15). It was necessary to put it out of men's power to ascribe inspired ecstasy to the effects of wine. because of . . . words of . . . holiness—because of Jehovah's holy words, wherewith He threatened severe penalties, soon to be inflicted, against the breakers of His law. 10. adulterers—spiritual, i. e., forsakers of God, Israel's true Husband (Isaiah 54, 5), for idols, at the instigation of the false "prophets" (v. 9, 15). Literal "adultery" and fornication, the usual concomitants of idolatry, are also meant. swearing—MAURER, &c., translate, "Because of the curse (of God on it), the land mourneth" (Deuteronomy 27, 15-26; 28, 15-68; Isaiah 24, 6). More than usual notoriety had been given to the curses of the law, by the finding and reading of it in Josiah's time (2 Kings 22, 11, &c.). But Hosea 4, 2, 3, favours English Version (cf. ch. 12, 4). A drought was sent by God on the pastures ("pleasant places," oases) in the desert on account of the "profane-ness" of the priests, prophets, and people (v. 11). course . . . evil—They (both prophets and people) rush into wickedness (v. 21; Isaiah 59, 7). force . . . not right—Their powers are used not on the side of rectitude, but on that of falsehood. 11. profane—(Ezekiel 23, 39; Zephaniah 3, 4) in my house—(Ch. 7, 30.) They built altars to idols in the very temple (2 Kings 23, 12; Ezekiel 8, 3-16). Cf. as to covetousness under the roof of the sanctuary, Matthew 21, 13; John 2, 16. 12. slippery ways in . . . darkness—their "way" is their false doctrine which proves fatal to them (ch. 13, 16; Psalm 35, 6; Proverbs 4, 19). I will bring evil . . . visitation—still more calamities than those already inflicted. See Note, ch. 11, 23; "visitation," viz., in wrath. 13. folly—lit., insipidity, unsavouriness (Job 6, 6), not having the salt of godliness (Colossians 4, 6). in Baal—in the name of Baal; in connection with his worship (see ch. 2, 8). caused . . . to err—(Isaiah 9, 16.) 14. "Jerusalem" and Judah were even worse than "Samaria" and the ten tribes; the greater were the privileges of the former, the greater was their guilt. They had the temple in their midst, which the ten tribes had not; yet in the temple itself they practised idolatry. strengthen . . . hands of evil-doers—(Ezekiel 13, 22.) as Sodom—(Deuteronomy 32, 32; Isaiah 1, 10.) 15. gall—poison (Note, ch. 8, 14; 9, 15.) 16. make you vain—they seduce you to vanity, i. e., idolatry, which will prove a vain trust to you (ch. 2, 5; 2 Kings 17, 15; Jonah 2, 8) [GESENIUS]. Rather, "they delude you with vain promises of security" (v. 17; cf. Psalm 62, 10). [MAURER.] of . . . own heart—of their own invention (v. 21; ch. 14, 14). 17. say still—Hebrew, say in saying, i. e., say incessantly. peace—(Ch. 6, 14; Ezekiel 13, 10; Zechariah 10, 2.) imagination—Hebrew, obstinacy. no evil—(Micah 3, 11.) 18. A reason is given why the false prophets should not be heeded: They have not stood in the counsels of Jehovah (an image from ministers present in a standing posture at councils of Eastern kings) (cf. v. 22; Job 15, 8). The spiritual man alone has the privilege (Genesis 18, 17; Psalm 25, 14; Amos 3, 7; John 15, 15; 1 Corinthians 2, 16). 19. So far from all prosperity awaiting the people as the false prophets say (v. 17), wrath is in store for them. grievous—lit., eddying, whirling itself about, a tornado. In ch. 30, 23, "continuing" is substituted for "grievous." fall grievously—it shall be hurled on. 20. in . . . latter days—i. e., "the year of their visitation" (v. 12). Primarily the meaning is, the Jews will not "consider" now God's warnings (Deuteronomy 32, 29); but when the prophecies shall be fulfilled in their Babylonish exile, they will consider and see, by bitter experience, their sinful folly. The ultimate scope of the prophecy is, the Jews, in their final dispersion, shall at last "consider" their sin, and turn to Messiah "perfectly" (Hosea 3, 5; Zechariah 12, 5, 10-14; Luke 13, 35). 21. sent . . . spoken—"sent" refers to the primary call; "spoken" to the subsequent charges given to be executed. A call is required, not only external, on the part of men, but also internal from God, that one should undertake a pastor's office. [CALVIN.] 22. stood in . . . counsel—(v. 18.) they should have turned them from their evil way—they would have given such counsels to the people as would have turned them from their sins (ch. 25, 5; Isaiah 55, 11), and so would have averted punishment. Their not teaching the law in which God's counsel is set forth proves they are not His prophets, though they boast of being so (Matthew 7, 15-20). 23. Let not the false prophets fancy that their devices (v. 25) are unknown to me. Are ye so ignorant as to suppose that I can only see things near me, viz., things in heaven, and not earthly things as being too remote? 24. (Psalm 139, 7, &c.; Amos 9, 2, 3.) fill heaven and earth—with my omniscience, providence, power, and essential being (1 Kings 8, 27). 25. dreamed—I have received a prophetic communication by dream (Numbers 12, 6; Deuteronomy 13, 1, &c.; Joel 2, 28). 26. prophets—a different Hebrew form from the usual one, "prophesiers." "How long," cries Jeremiah, impatient of their impious audacity, "shall these prophecy-mongers go on prophesying lies?" The answer is given, v. 23-34. 27. They "think" to make my people utterly to forget me. But I will oppose to those dreamers my true prophets. fathers . . . for Baal—(Judges 3, 7; 8, 33, 34.) 28. God answers the objection which might be started, "What, then, must we do, when lies are spoken as truths, and prophets oppose prophets?" Do the same as when wheat is mixed with chaff: do not reject the wheat because of the chaff mixed with it, but discriminate between the false and the true revelations. The test is adherence to, or forgetfulness of, me and my law (v. 27). that hath a dream—that pretends to have a divine communication by dream, let him tell it "faithfully," that it may be compared with "my word" (2 Corinthians 4, 2). The result will be the former (both the prophets and their fictions) will soon be seen to be chaff; the latter (the true prophets and the word of God in their mouth) wheat (Psalm 1, 4; Hosea 13, 3). 29. As the "fire" consumes the "chaff," so "my word" will consume the false prophets (Matthew 3, 12; Hebrews 4, 12). "My word" which is "wheat," i. e., food to the true prophet and his hearers, is a consuming "fire," and a crushing "hammer" (Matthew 21, 44) to false prophets and their followers (2 Corinthians 2, 16). The word of the false prophets may be known by its promising men peace in sin. "My word," on the contrary, burns and breaks the hard-hearted (ch. 20, 9). The "hammer" symbolizes destructive power (ch. 50, 23; Nahum 2, 1, Margin). 30. steal my words—a twofold plagiarism; one steals from the other, and all steal words from Jehovah's true prophets, but missaply them (see ch. 28, 2; John 10, 1; Revelation 22, 19). 31. use—rather, "take" their tongue: a second class (cf. v. 30) require, in order to bring forth a revelation, nothing more than their tongues, wherewith they say, He (Jehovah) saith: they bungle in the very formula instead of the usual "Jehovah saith," being only able to say "(He) saith." 32. Third class: inventors of lies. The climax, and worst of the three. lightness—wanton inventions (Zephaniah 3, 4). not profit—i. e., greatly injure. 33. What is the burden—play on the double sense of the Hebrew: an oracle and a burden. They scoffingly ask, Has he got any new burden (burdensome oracle: for all his prophecies are disasters) to announce (Malachi 1, 1)? Jeremiah indignantly repeats their own question, Do you ask, What burden? This, then, it is, "I will forsake you." My word is burdensome in your eyes, and you long to be rid of it. You shall get your wish. There will be no more prophecy: I will forsake you, and that will be a far worse "burden" to you. 34. The burden—Whoever shall in mockery call the Lord's word "a burden," shall be visited (Margin) in wrath. 35. The result of my judgments shall be, ye shall address the prophet more reverentially hereafter, no longer calling his message a burden, but a Divine response or word: "What hath the Lord answered?" 36. every man's word . . . his burden—as they mockingly call all prophecies burdens, as if calamities were the sole subject of prophecy, so it shall prove to them. God will take them at their own word. Living God—not lifeless as their dumb idols, ever living so as to be able to punish. 39. I will

... forget you—just retribution for their forgetting Him (Hosea 4. 6). But God cannot possibly forget His children (Isaiah 49. 15). Rather for "forget" translate, "I will altogether lift you up (like a 'burden,' alluding to their mocking term for God's messages) and cast you off." God makes their wicked language fall on their own head. [CALVIN.] Cf. v. 36, "every man's word shall be his burden." 40. not be forgotten—If we translate v. 39 as English Version, the antithesis is, though I forget you, your shame shall not be forgotten.

Ver. 1-10. THE RESTORATION OF THE CAPTIVES IN BABYLON, AND THE DESTRUCTION OF THE REFRACTORY PARTY IN JUDEA AND IN EGYPT, REPRESENTED UNDER THE TYPE OF A BASKET OF GOOD, AND ONE OF BAD, FIGS. 1. Lord showed me—Amos 7. 1, 4, 7; 8. 1, contains the same formula, with the addition of "thus" prefixed. carried . . . captive Jeconiah—(Ch. 22. 24; 2 Kings 24. 12, &c.; 2 Chronicles 36. 10.) carpenters, &c.—one thousand artisans were carried to Babylon, both to work for the king there, and to deprive Jerusalem of their services in the event of a future siege (2 Kings 24. 16). 2. figs . . . first ripe—the boccora, or early fig (Note, Isaiah 28. 4). Baskets of figs used to be offered as first-fruits in the temple. The good figs represent Jeconiah and the exiles in Babylon; the bad, Zedekiah and the obstinate Jews in Judea. They are called good and bad respectively, not in an absolute, but a comparative sense, and in reference to the punishment of the latter. This prophecy was designed to encourage the despairing exiles, and to reprove the people at home, who prided themselves as superior to those in Babylon, and abused the forbearance of God (cf. ch. 52. 31-34). 5. acknowledge—regard with favour, like as thou lookest on the good figs favourably. for their good—Their removal to Babylon saved them from the calamities which befell the rest of the nation, and led them to repentance there; so God bettered their condition (2 Kings 25. 27-30). Daniel and Ezekiel were among these captives. 6. (Ch. 12. 15.) not pull . . . down . . . not pluck . . . up—only partially fulfilled in the restoration from Babylon; antipically and fully to be fulfilled hereafter (ch. 32. 41; 33. 7). 7. (Ch. 30. 22; 31. 33; 32. 33.) Their conversion from idolatry to the one true God, through the chastening effect of the Babylonian captivity, is here expressed in language which, in its fulness, applies to the more complete conversion hereafter of the Jews, "with their whole heart" (ch. 29. 13), through the painful discipline of their present dispersion. The source of their conversion is here stated to be God's prevenient grace. for they shall return—Repentance, though not the cause of pardon, is its invariable accompaniment: it is the effect of God's giving a heart to know him. 8. in . . . Egypt—many Jews had fled for refuge to Egypt, which was leagued with Judea against Babylon. 9. removed, &c.—(Ch. 15. 4.) CALVIN translates, "I will give them up to agitation, in all," &c. This verse quotes the curse (Deuteronomy 28. 25, 37.) Cf. ch. 29. 18, 22; Psalm 44. 13, 14.

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 1-33. PROPHECY OF THE SEVENTY YEARS' CAPTIVITY; AND AFTER THAT THE DESTRUCTION OF BABYLON, AND OF ALL THE NATIONS THAT OPPRESSED THE JEWS. 1. fourth year of Jehoiakim—called the third year in Daniel 1. 1. But probably Jehoiakim was set on the throne by Pharaoh-necho on his return from Carchemish about July, whereas Nebuchadnezzar mounted the throne January 21, b. c. 604; so that Nebuchadnezzar's first year was partly the third, partly the fourth, of Jehoiakim. Here first Jeremiah gives specific dates. Nebuchadnezzar had previously entered Judea in the reign of his father Nabopolassar. 3. From the thirteenth year of Josiah, in which Jeremiah began to prophesy (ch. 1. 1), to the end of Josiah's reign, was nineteen years (2 Kings 22. 1); the three months (2 Kings 23. 31) of Jehoahaz's reign, with the not quite complete four years of Jeho-

lakim (v. 1), added to the nineteen years, make up twenty-three years in all. 4. rising early—(Ch. 7. 13, Note.) "The prophets" refer to Urijah, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, &c. It aggravates their sin, that God sent not merely one but many messengers, and those messengers prophets; and, that during all those years specified, Jeremiah and his fellow-prophets spared no effort, late and early. 5. Turn . . . dwell—In Hebrew there is expressed by sameness of sounds the correspondence between their turning to God and God's turning to them to permit them to dwell in their land; Shubu . . . shebu, "Return" . . . so shall ye "remain." every one from . . . evil—each must separately repent and turn from his own sin. None is excepted, lest they should think their guilt extenuated, because the evil is general. 6. He instances one sin, as representative of all their sins, idolatry; as nothing is dearer to God than a pure worship of Himself. 7. Though ye provoke me to anger (Deuteronomy 32. 21), yet it is not me, but yourselves, whom ye thereby hurt (Proverbs 8. 36; 20. 2). 9. the north—(Note, ch. 1. 14, 15.) The Medes and other northern peoples, confederate with Babylon, are included with the Chaldeans. my servant—my agent for punishing (ch. 27. 6; 43. 10; cf. ch. 40. 2). Cf. Isaiah 44. 28, Cyrus, "my shepherd." God makes even unbelievers unconsciously to fulfil His designs. A reproof to the Jews, who boasted that they were the servants of God; yet a heathen king is to be more the servant of God than they, and that as the agent of their punishment. 10. (Ch. 7. 34; Revelation 18. 23.) The land shall be so desolated that even in the houses left standing there shall be no inhabitant; a terrible stillness shall prevail; no sound of the hand-mill (two circular stones, one above the other, for grinding corn, worked by two females, Exodus 11. 5; Matthew 24. 41; in daily use in every house, and therefore forbidden to be taken in pledge, Deuteronomy 24. 6) nor night-light, so universal in the East that the poorest house has it, burning all night. candle—lamp (Job 21. 17; 18. 6). 11. seventy years—(Ch. 27. 7.) The exact number of years of Sabbaths in 490 years, the period from Saul to the Babylonian captivity; righteous retribution for their violation of the Sabbath (Leviticus 26. 34, 35; 2 Chronicles 36. 21). The seventy years probably begin from the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Jerusalem was first captured, and many captives, as well as the treasure of the temple, were carried away; they end with the first year of Cyrus, who, on taking Babylon, issued an edict for the restoration of the Jews (Ezra 1. 1.) Daniel's seventy prophetic weeks are based on the seventy years of the captivity (cf. Daniel 9. 2, 24). 13. all . . . written in this book, which Jeremiah . . . prophesied against all . . . nations—It follows from this, that the prophecies against foreign nations (ch. 46-51) must have been already written. Hence LXX. insert here those prophecies. But if they had followed immediately (v. 13), there would have been no propriety in the observation in the verse. The very wording of the reference shows that they existed in some other part of the book, and not in the immediate context. It was in this very year, the fourth of Jehoiakim (ch. 36. 1, 2), that Jeremiah was directed to write in a regular book for the first time all that he had prophesied against Judah and foreign "nations" from the beginning of his ministry. Probably, at a subsequent time, when he completed the whole work, including ch. 46-51, Jeremiah himself inserted the clause, "all that is written in this book, which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all the nations." The prophecies in question may have been repeated, as others in Jeremiah, more than once; so in the original smaller collection they may have stood in an earlier position; and, in the fuller subsequent collection, in their later and present position. 14. serve themselves—(Ch. 27. 7; 30. 8; 34. 10.) Avail themselves of their services as slaves. them also—the Chaldees, who heretofore have made other nations their slaves, shall themselves also in their turn be slaves to them. MAURER translates, "shall impose servitude on them, even them." recompense them—viz., the Chaldees and other nations against whom Jeremiah had prophesied (v. 13), as having oppressed the Jews. their deeds—rather, deed, viz., their bad treatment of the Jews (ch. 50. 29; 51. 6, 24; cf. 2 Chronicles 36. 17). 15. wine-cup—Cf. ch. 13. 12, 13, as to this image, to express stupefying judgments; also ch. 49. 12; 51. 7. Jeremiah often embodies the imagery of Isaiah in his prophecies (Lamentations 4. 21; Isaiah 51. 17-22; Revelation 16. 19; 18. 6). The wine-cup was not literally given by Jeremiah to the representatives of the different nations; but only in symbolical vision. 16. be moved—reel (Nahum 3. 11). 18. Jerusalem—Put first: for "judgment begins at the house of God;" they being most guilty whose religious privileges are greatest (1 Peter 4. 17). kings—Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah. as it is this day—the accomplishment of the curse had already begun under Jehoiakim. This clause, however, may have been inserted by Jeremiah at his final revision of his prophecies in Egypt. 19. Pharaoh—Put next after Jerusalem, because the Jews had relied most on him, and Egypt and Judea stood on a common footing (ch. 46. 2, 25). 20. mingled people—mercenary foreign troops serving under Pharaoh-hophra in the time of Jeremiah. The employment of these foreigners provoked the native Egyptians to overthrow him. Psammetichus, father of Pharaoh-necho, also had given a settlement in Egypt to Ionian and Carian adventurers (HERODOTUS, 2. 152, 154). Cf. ch. 50. 37; note, Isaiah 19. 2, 3; 20. 1; Ezekiel 30. 5. The term is first found in Exodus 12. 38. Uz—In the geographical order here, between Egypt and the states along the Mediterranean; therefore not the "Uz" of Job 1. 1 (north of Arabia Deserta), but the northern part of Arabia Petraea, between the sea and Idumea (Lamentations 4. 21; see Genesis 36. 20, 28). remnant of Ashdod—called a remnant, because Ashdod had lost most of its inhabitants in the twenty-nine years' siege by Psammetichus. Cf. also Isaiah 20. 1, note. Gath is not mentioned, because it was overthrown in the same war. 21. Edom . . . Moab . . . Ammon—Joined together, as being related to Israel (see ch. 48. 49). 22. all the kings of Tyrus—the petty kings of the various dependencies of Tyre. isles—a term including all maritime regions (Psalm 72. 10). 23. Dedan—north of Arabia (Genesis 25. 3, 4). Tema . . . Buz—neighbouring tribes north of Arabia (Job 32. 2). all . . . in . . . utmost corners—rather, "having the hair cut in angles," a heathenish custom (see note, ch. 9. 26). 24. mingled people—not in the same sense as v. 20; the motley crowd, so called in contempt (cf. ch. 49. 28, 31; 50. 37). By a different pointing it may be translated the Arabs; but the repetition of the name is not likely. BLANEY thinks there were two divisions of what we call Arabia, the west (Araba) and the east. The west included Arabia Petraea and the parts on the sea bordering on Egypt, the land of Cush. The east, Arabia Felix and Deserta. The latter are "the mixed race" inhabiting the desert. 25. Zimri—Perhaps the Zabra mentioned by PROLEMY between Mecca and Medina. Zimran also, as Dedan, was one of Abraham's sons by Keturah (Genesis 25. 2). Elam—Properly, west of Persia; but used for Persia in general. 26. Sheshach—Babylon; as the parallelism in ch. 51. 41 proves. In the Cabalistic system (called Athbash), the first Hebrew letter in the alphabet being expressed by the last Sheshach would exactly answer to Babel. Jeremiah may have used this system (as perhaps in ch. 51. 41) for concealment at the time of this prediction, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, while Nebuchadnezzar was before Jerusalem. In ch. 51. 41 there can be no concealment, as Babylon is expressly mentioned. MICHAELIS more simply explains the term "brazen-gated" (cf. Isaiah 45. 2). Others, "the house of a prince." Rather, it comes from the Babylonian goddess, Shach, by reduplication of the first letter; from her Misael was named Meshach by the Babylonians. The term Shace was applied to a festival at Babylon, alluded to in ch. 51. 39, 57; Isaiah 21. 5. It was during this feast that Cyrus took Babylon (HERODOTUS, 1.) Thus Jeremiah mystically denotes the time of its capture by this term. [GLASSIUS.] 27. rise no more—the heathen nations in question should fall to rise no more. The Jews should fall but for a time, and then rise again. Therefore, the epithet is given, "the God of Israel." 28. if they refuse to take the cup—no effort of theirs to escape destruction will avail. 29. If I spared not mine elect people on account of sin, much less will I spare you (Ezekiel 9. 6; Obadiah 16; Luke 23. 31; 1 Peter 4. 17). be unpunished—"be treated as innocent." 30. roar—image from a destructive lion (Isaiah 42. 13; Joel 3. 16). upon his habitation—rather, "His pasturage;" keeping up the image of a lion roaring against the flock in the pasture. The roar was first to go forth over Judea, wherein were "the sheep of His pasture" (Psalm 100. 3), and thence into heathen lands. shout . . . tread . . . grapes—(Ch. 48. 33; Isaiah 16. 9, 10.) 31. controversy—cause at issue (Micah 6. 2). plead with all flesh—(Isaiah 66. 16.) God shows the whole world that He does what is altogether just in punishing. 32. from the coasts—rather, "from the uttermost regions." Like a storm which arises in one region and then diffuses itself far and wide, so God's judgments shall pass "from nation to nation," till all has been fulfilled; no distance shall prevent the fulfilment. 33. not be lamented—(Ch. 16. 4, 6.) neither gathered—to their fathers, in their ancestral tombs (ch. 8. 2). dung—(Psalm 83. 10.) 34. shepherds—princes (ch. 22. 22). Here he returns to the Jews and their rulers, using the same image as in v. 30, "pasture." Note. wallow yourselves—cover yourselves as thickly with ashes, in token of sorrow, as one who rolls in them (ch. 6. 26; Ezekiel 27. 30). [MAURER.] principal—leaders. LXX. translate, rams, carrying out the image (cf. Isaiah 14. 9, Margin; Zechariah 10. 3). days of your slaughter . . . of . . . dispersions—rather, "your days for slaughter (i. e., the time of your being slain), and your dispersions (not "of your dispersions"), are accomplished" (are come). precious vessel—ye were once a precious vessel, but ye shall fall, and so be a broken vessel (cf. ch. 22. 28, Note). "Your past excellency shall not render you safe now. I will turn to your ignominy whatever glory I conferred on you." [CALVIN.] 35. Lil. "Flight shall fail the shepherds, &c., escaping (shall fail) the principal," &c. (Amos 2. 14). The leaders will be the first objects for slaughter; escape by flight will be out of their power. 37. habitations—rather, carrying out the image (v. 30, Note), pastures. The pasturages where, peaceably and without incursion of wild beasts, the flocks have fed, shall be destroyed; i. e., the regions where, heretofore, there was peace and security (alluding to the name Salem, or Jerusalem, "possessing peace"). 38. his covert—the temple, where heretofore, like a lion, as its defender, by the mere terror of His voice He warded off the foe; but now he leaves it a prey to the Gentiles. [CALVIN.] fierceness of . . . oppressor—rather, as the Hebrew, for "oppressor" is an adjective feminine, the word sword is understood, which, in ch. 46. 16; 50. 16, is expressed (indeed, some MSS. and LXX. read sword instead of "fierceness" here; probably interpolated from ch. 46. 16), "the oppressing sword." The Hebrew for oppressing means also a dove; there may be, therefore, a covert allusion to the Chaldee standard bearing a dove on it, in honour of Semiramis, the first queen, said in popular superstition to have been nourished by doves when exposed at birth, and at death to have been transformed into a dove. Her name may come from a root referring to the cooling of a dove. That bird was held sacred to the goddess Venus. Vulgate so translates, "the anger of the dove," his . . . anger—If the anger of Nebuchadnezzar cannot be evaded, how much less that of God (cf. v. 37)!

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 1-24. JEREMIAH DECLARED WORTHY OF DEATH, BUT BY THE INTERPOSITION OF AHIKAM SAVED; THE SIMILAR CASES OF MICAH AND URJIAH BEING ADDUCED IN THE PROPHET'S FAVOUR. The prophecies which gave the offence were those given in detail in chs. 7., 8., 9. (cf. v. 6 here with ch. 7. 12, 14); and summarily referred to here [MAURER], probably pronounced at one of the great feasts (that of tabernacles, according to USHER; for the inhabitants of "all the cities of Judah" are represented as present, v. 2). See Note, ch. 7. 1. 2. in the court—the largest court, from which he could be heard by the whole people. come to worship—worship is vain without obedience

(1 Samuel 15. 21, 22), all the words—(Ezekiel 3. 10.) dimitish not a word—(Deuteronomy 4. 2; 12. 32; Proverbs 30. 6; Acts 20. 27; 2 Corinthians 2. 17; 4. 2; Revelation 22. 19.) Not suppressing or softening aught for fear of giving offence; nor setting forth coldly and indirectly what can only by forcible statement do good. 3. If so be—expressed according to human conceptions; not as if God did not foreknow all contingencies, but to mark the obstinacy of the people and the difficulty of healing them; and to show His own goodness in making the offer which left them without excuse. [CALVIN.] 5. prophets—the inspired interpreters of the law (v. 4), who adapted it to the use of the people: 6. like Sathioh—(Note, ch. 7. 12, 14; 1 Samuel 4. 10-12; Psalm 78. 60.) curse—(Ch. 24. 9; Isaiah 65. 15.) 8. priests—The captain (or prefect) of the temple had the power of apprehending offenders in the temple with the sanction of the priests, prophets—the false prophets. The charge against Jeremiah was that of uttering falsehood in Jehovah's name, an act punishable with death (Deuteronomy 18. 20). His prophecy against the temple and city (v. 11) might speciously be represented as contradicting God's own words (Psalm 132. 14). Cf. the similar charge against Stephen (Acts 6. 13, 14). 10. princes—members of the Council of State or Great Council, which took cognizance of such offences. heard—the clamour of the popular tumult. came up—from the king's house to the temple, which stood higher than the palace. sat—as judges, in the gate, the usual place of trying such cases. new gate—originally built by Jotham (2 Kings 15. 35, "the higher gate") and now recently restored. 12. Lord sent me—a valid justification against any laws alleged against him. against . . . against—rather, concerning. Jeremiah purposely avoids saying, "against," which would needlessly irritate. They had used the same Hebrew word (v. 11), which ought to be translated concerning, though they meant it in the unfavourable sense. Jeremiah takes up their word in a better sense, implying that there is still room for repentance: that his prophecies aim at the real good of the city; for or concerning this house . . . city. [GROTIUS.] 13. (Ver. 3, 19.) 14. Jeremiah's humility is herein shown, and submission to the powers that be (Romans 13. 1). 15. bring . . . upon yourselves—So far will you be from escaping the predicted evils by shedding my blood, that you will, by that very act, only incur heavier penalties (Matthew 23. 35). 16. princes . . . all the people—The fickle people, as they were previously influenced by the priests to clamour for his death (v. 8), so now under the princes' influence require that he shall not be put to death. Cf. as to Jesus, Jeremiah's antitype, the hosannas of the multitude a few days before the same people, persuaded by the priests as in this case, cried, Away with Him, crucify Him (Matthew 21., and 27. 20-25). The priests, through envy of his holy zeal, were more his enemies than the princes, whose office was more secular than religious. A prophet could not legally be put to death unless he prophesied in the name of other gods (therefore, they say, "in the name of the Lord"), or after that his prophecy had failed in its accomplishment. Meanwhile, if he foretold calamity, he might be imprisoned. Cf. Micaiah's case (1 Kings 22. 1-28). 17. Cf. Gamaliel's interposition (Acts 5. 34, &c.), elders—some of the "princes" mentioned (v. 16), those whose age, as well as dignity, would give weight to the precedents of past times which they adduce. 18. (Micah 3. 12.) Morashtite—called so from a village of the tribe Judah. Hezekiah—The precedent in the reign of such a good king proved that Jeremiah was not the only prophet, or the first, who threatened the city and the temple without incurring death. mountain of the house—Moriah, on which stood the temple (peculiarly called "the house") shall be covered with woods instead of buildings. Jeremiah, in quoting previous prophecies, never does so without alteration; he adapts the language to his own style, showing thereby his authority in his treatment of Scripture, as being himself inspired. 19. Hezekiah, so far from killing him, was led "to fear the Lord," and pray for remission of the sentence against Judah (2 Chronicles 32. 26). Lord repented—(Exodus 32. 14; 2 Samuel 24. 16.) Thus—if we kill Jeremiah. 20. As the flight and capture of Urijah must have occupied some time, "the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim" (v. 1) must not mean the very beginning, but the second or third year of his eleven years' reign. And . . . also—perhaps connected with v. 24, as the comment of the writer, not the continuation of the speech of the elders: "And although also a man that prophesied . . . Urijah, &c. (proving how great was the danger in which Jeremiah stood, and how wonderful the providence of God in preserving him), nevertheless the hand of Ahikam," &c. [GLASSIUS.] The context, however, implies rather that the words are the continuation of the previous speech of the elders. They adduce another instance besides that of Micah, though of a different kind, viz., that of Urijah: he suffered for his prophecies, but they imply, though they do not venture to express it, that thereby sin has been added to sin, and that it has done no good to Jehoiakim, for that the notorious condition of the state at this time shows that a heavier vengeance is impending if they persevere in such acts of violence. [CALVIN.] 22. Jehoiakim sent . . . into Egypt—He had been put on the throne by Pharaoh of Egypt (2 Kings 23. 34). This explains the readiness with which he got the Egyptians to give up Urijah to him, when that prophet had sought an asylum in Egypt. Urijah was faithful in delivering his message, but faulty in leaving his work, so God permitted him to lose his life, while Jeremiah was protected in danger. The path of duty is often the path of safety. 23. graves of the common people—lit., sons of the people (cf. 2 Kings 23. 6). The prophets seem to have had a separate cemetery (Matthew 23. 29). Urijah's corpse was denied this honour, in order that he should not be regarded as a true prophet. 24. Ahikam—son of Shaphan the scribe, or royal secretary. He was one of those whom King Josiah, when struck by the words of the book of the law, sent to inquire of the Lord (2 Kings 22. 12, 14). Hence his interference here in behalf of Jeremiah is what we should expect from his past association with that good king. His son, Gedaliah, followed in his father's steps, so that he was chosen by the Babylonians as the one to whom they committed Jeremiah for safety after taking Jerusalem, and on whose loyalty they could depend in setting him over the remnant of the people in Judea (ch. 39. 14; 2 Kings 25. 22). people to put him to death—Princes often, when they want to destroy a good man, prefer it to be done by a popular tumult rather than by their own order, so as to reap the fruit of the crime without odium to themselves (Matthew 27. 20).

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-22. THE FUTILITY OF RESISTING NEBUCHAD-NEZZAR ILLUSTRATED TO THE AMBASSADORS OF THE KINGS, DESIRING TO HAVE THE KING OF JUDAH CONFEDERATE WITH THEM, UNDER THE TYPE OF YOKES. JEREMIAH EXHORTETH THEM AND ZEDEKIAH TO YIELD. 1. Jehoiakim—The prophecy that follows was according to this reading given in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, fifteen years before it was published in the reign of Zedekiah to whom it refers; it was thus long deposited in the prophet's bosom, in order that by it he might be supported under trials in his prophetic career in the interim. [CALVIN.] But "Zedekiah" may be the true reading. So the Syriac and Arabic Versions. Ver. 3, 12; ch. 28. 1, confirms this. Also, one of KENNICOTT'S MSS. The English Version reading may have originated from the first verse of ch. 26. "Son of Josiah" applies to Zedekiah as truly as to "Jehoiakim" or "Ellakim." The fourth year, in a general sense here, as in ch. 28. 1, he called "the beginning of his reign," as it lasted eleven years (2 Kings 24. 18). It was not long after the fourth year of his reign that he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 51. 59; 52. 3; 2 Kings 24. 20), in violation of an oath before God (2 Chronicles 36. 13). 2. bonds—by which the yoke is made fast to the neck (ch. 5. 5). yokes—lit., the carved piece of wood attached at both ends to the two yokes on the necks of a pair of oxen, so as to connect them. Here the yoke itself. The plural is used, as he was to wear one himself, and give the others to the ambassadors (v. 3; ch. 28. 10, 12), proves that the symbolical act was in this instance (though not in others, ch. 25, 15) actually done (cf. Isaiah 20, 2, &c.; Ezekiel 12, 3, 11, 18). 3. Appropriate symbol, as these ambassadors had come to Jerusalem to consult as to shaking off the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar. According to Pherecydes in Clemens Alexandrinus Stromateis, 567, Idanthura, king of the Scythians, intimated to Darius, who had crossed the Danube, that he would lead an army against him, by sending him, instead of a letter, a mouse, a frog, a bird, an arrow, and a plough. The task assigned to Jeremiah required great faith, as it was sure to provoke alike his own countrymen and the foreign ambassadors and their kings, by a seeming insult, at the very time that all were full of confident hopes grounded on the confederacy. 5. God here, as elsewhere, connects with the symbol doctrine, which is as it were its soul, without which it would be not only cold and frivolous, but even dead. [CALVIN.] God's mention of His supreme power is in order to refute the pride of those who rely on their own power (Isaiah 45, 12). given it unto whom it seemed meet unto me—(Psalm 115, 15, 16; Daniel 4, 17, 25, 32.) Not for his merits, but of my own sole good pleasure. [ESTIUS.] 6. beasts of the field—Not merely the horses to carry his Chaldean soldiers, and oxen to draw his provisions [GROTIUS]; not merely the deserts, mountains, and woods, the haunts of wild beasts, implying his unlimited extent of empire [ESTIUS]; but the beasts themselves by a mysterious instinct of nature. A reproof to men that they did not recognize God's will, which the very beasts acknowledged (cf. Isaiah 1, 3). As the beasts are to submit to Christ, the Restorer of the dominion over nature, lost by the first Adam (cf. Genesis 1, 28; 2, 19, 20; Psalm 8, 6-8), so they were appointed to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, the representative of the world-power and prefigurer of Antichrist; this universal power was suffered to be held by him to show the unfitness of any to wield it "until He come whose right it is" (Ezekiel 21, 27). 7. son . . . son's son—(2 Chronicles 36, 20). Nebuchadnezzar had four successors—Evil-merodach, his son; Neriglissar, husband of Nebuchadnezzar's daughter; his son, Labosodarchod; and Naboned (with whom his son, Belshazzar, was joint king, son of Evilmerodach. But Neriglissar and Labosodarchod were not in the direct male line; so that the prophecy held good to "his son and his son's son," and the intermediate two are omitted. time of his land—i. e., of its subjugation or its being "visited" in wrath (v. 22; ch. 25, 12; 29, 10; 50, 27; Daniel 5, 26). serve themselves of him—make him their servant (ch. 25, 14; Isaiah 13, 22). So "his day" for the destined day of his calamity (Job 18, 20). 8. until I have consumed them by his hand—until by these consuming visitations I have brought them under his power. 9. ye—the Jews especially, for whom the address to the rest was intended. enchanters—augurs [CALVIN], from a root, the eyes, i. e., lookers at the stars and other means of taking omens of futurity; or another root, a fixed time, observers of times: forbidden in the law (Leviticus 19, 26; Deuteronomy 18, 10, 11, 14). 10. to remove you—expressing the event which would result. The very thing they profess by their enchantments to avert, they are by them bringing on you. Better to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, and remain in your land, than to rebel, and be removed from it. 11. serve . . . till it—The same Hebrew root expresses serve and till, or cultivate. Serve ye the king of Babylon, and the land will serve you. [CALVIN.] 12. I spake also—translate, "And I spake," &c. Special application of the subject to Zedekiah. 13. Why . . . die—by running on your own ruin in resisting Nebuchadnezzar after this warning (Ezekiel 13, 31). 14. lie—(Ch. 14, 14.) 15. in my name—the devil often makes God's name the plea for lies (Matthew 4, 6; 7, 22, 23; v. 15-20, the test whereby to know false prophets). 16. The "vessels" had been carried away to Babylon in the reign of Jeconiah (2 Kings 24, 13); also previously in that of Jehoiakim (2 Chronicles 36, 5-7). 18. at Jerusalem—i. e., in other houses containing such vessels, besides the house of God and the king's palace. Nebuzaradan, captain of the guard under Nebuchadnezzar, carried all away (2 Kings 25, 13-17; 2 Chronicles 36, 18). The more costly vessels had been previously removed in the reigns of Jehoiakim and Jeconiah. 19. (Ch. 52, 17, 20, 21.) 23. until . . . I visit them—in wrath by Cyrus (ch. 32, 5). In seventy years from the first carrying away of captives in Jehoiachin's reign (ch. 20, 10; 2 Chronicles 36, 21). restore them—by the hand of Cyrus (Ezra 1, 7). By Artaxerxes (Ezra 7, 19).

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-17. PROPHECIES IMMEDIATELY FOLLOWING THOSE IN CHAP. 27. HANANIAH BREAKS THE YOKES TO SIGNIFY THAT NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S YOKE SHALL BE BROKEN. JEREMIAH FORETELLS THAT YOKES OF IRON ARE TO SUCCEED THOSE OF WOOD, AND THAT HANANIAH SHALL DIE. 1. in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah—The Jews often divided any period into two halves, the beginning and the end. As Zedekiah reigned eleven years, the fourth year would be called the beginning of his reign; especially as during the first three years affairs were in such a disturbed state that he had little power or dignity, being a tributary; but in the fourth year he became strong in power. Hananiah—Another of this name was one of the three godly youths who braved Nebuchadnezzar's wrath in the fear of God (Daniel 1, 6, 7; 3, 12). Probably a near relation, for Azariah is associated with him; as Azur with the Hananiah here. The godly and ungodly are often in the same family (Ezekiel 18, 14-20). Gibeon—one of the cities of the priests, to which order he must have belonged. 2. broken the yoke—I have determined to break: referring to Jeremiah's prophecy (ch. 27, 12). 3. two full years—i. e., years of days. So "a month of days," i. e., all its days complete (Genesis 29, 14, Margin; 41, 1). It was marvellous presumption to speak so definitely without having any Divine revelation. 4. bring again—Jeconiah—not necessarily implying that Hananiah wished Zedekiah to be superseded by Jeconiah. The main point intended was, that the restoration from Babylon should be complete. But, doubtless, the false prophet foretold Jeconiah's return (2 Kings 24, 12-15), to ingratiate himself with the populace, with whom Jeconiah was a favourite (ch. 22, 24, Note). 5. the prophet Jeremiah—the epithet, "the prophet," is prefixed to "Jeremiah" throughout this chapter, to correspond to the same epithet before "Hananiah;" except v. 12, where "the prophet" has been inserted in English Version. The rival claims of the true and the false prophet are thus put in the more prominent contrast. 6. Amen—Jeremiah prays for the people, though constrained to prophesy against them (1 Kings 1, 36). The event was the appointed test between contradictory predictions (Deuteronomy 18, 21, 22). "Would that what you say were true!" I prefer the safety of my country even to my own estimation. The prophets had no pleasure in announcing God's judgment, but did so as a matter of stern duty, not thereby divesting themselves of their natural feelings of sorrow for their country's woe. Cf. Exodus 32, 32; Romans 9, 3, as instances of how God's servants, intent only on the glory of God and the salvation of the country, forgot self, and uttered wishes in a state of feeling transported out of themselves. So Jeremiah wished not to diminish aught from the word of God, though as a Jew he uttered the wish for his people. [CALVIN.] 8. prophets . . . before me—Hosea, Joel, Amos, and others. evil—a few MSS. read famine, which is more usually associated with the specification of war and pestilence (ch. 15, 2; 18, 21; 27, 8, 13). But evil here includes all the calamities flowing from war, not merely famine, but also desolation, &c. Evil being the more difficult reading, is less likely to be the interpolated one than famine, which probably originated in copying the parallel passages. 9. peace—Hananiah had given no warning as to the need of conversion, but had foretold prosperity unconditionally. Jeremiah does not say that all are true prophets who foretell truths in any instance (which Deuteronomy 18, 1, 2, disproves); but asserts only the converse, viz., that whoever as Hananiah predicts what the event does not confirm, is a false prophet. There are two tests of prophets: (1.) The event, Deuteronomy 18, 22. (2.) The word of God, Isaiah 8, 20. 10. the yoke—(Ch. 27, 2.) Impious audacity to break what God had appointed as a solemn pledge of

the fulfilment of His word. Hence Jeremiah deigns no reply (v. 11; Matthew 7. 6). 11. neck of all nations—opposed to ch. 27. 7. 13. Thou hast broken . . . wood . . . thou shalt make . . . iron—Not here, "Thou hast broken . . . wood," and "I will make . . . iron" (cf. v. 16). The same false prophets who, by urging the Jews to rebel, had caused them to throw off the then comparatively easy yoke of Babylon, thereby brought on them a more severe yoke imposed by that city. "Yokes of iron," alluding to Deuteronomy 28. 48. It is better to take up a light cross in our way, than to pull a heavier on our own heads. We may escape destroying providences by submitting to humbling providences. So, spiritually, contrast the "easy yoke" of Christ with the "yoke of bondage" of the law (Acts 15. 10; Galatians 5. 1). 14. I have put—Though Hananiah and those like him were secondary instruments in bringing the iron yoke on Judea, God was the great First Cause (ch. 27. 4-7). 15. makest . . . trust in a lie—(Ch. 29. 31; Ezekiel 13. 22.) 16. this year . . . die—The prediction was uttered in the fifth month (v. 1); Hananiah's death took place in the seventh month, i. e., within two months after the prediction, answering with awful significance to the two years in which Hananiah had foretold that the yoke imposed by Babylon would end. rebellion—opposition to God's plain direction, that all should submit to Babylon (ch. 29. 32).

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1-32. LETTER OF JEREMIAH TO THE CAPTIVES IN BABYLON, TO COUNTERACT THE ASSURANCES GIVEN BY THE FALSE PROPHETS OF A SPEEDY RESTORATION. 1. residue of the elders—Those still surviving from the time when they were carried to Babylon with Jeconiah; the other elders of the captives had died by either a natural or a violent death. 2. queen—Nehushta, the queen-mother, daughter of Elnathan (2 Kings 24. 8, 15). (Elnathan, her father, perhaps is the same as the one ch. 26. 22.) She reigned jointly with her son. princes—All the men of authority were taken away, lest they should organize a rebellion. Jeremiah wrote his letter whilst the calamity was still recent, to console the captives under it. 3. Zedekiah . . . sent unto Babylon—In ch. 51. 59, Zedekiah himself goes to Babylon; here he sends ambassadors. Whatever was the object of the embassy, it shows that Zedekiah only reigned at the pleasure of the king of Babylon, who might have restored Jeconiah, had he pleased. Hence, Zedekiah permitted Jeremiah's letter to be sent, not only as being led by Hananiah's death to attach greater credit to the prophet's words, but also as the letter accorded with his own wish that the Jews should remain in Chaldea till Jeconiah's death. Hilkiah—the high priest who found the book of the law in the house of the Lord, and showed it to "Shaphan" the scribe (the same Shaphan probably as here), who showed it to King Josiah (2 Kings 22. 8, &c.). The sons of Hilkiah and Shaphan inherited from their fathers some respect for sacred things. So in ch. 36. 25, "Gemariah" interceded with King Jehoiakim that the prophet's roll should not be burned. 5. Build . . . houses—In opposition to the false prophets' suggestions, who told the captives that their captivity would soon cease, Jeremiah tells them that it will be of long duration, and that therefore they should build houses, as Babylon is to be for long their home. 6. that ye . . . be . . . not diminished—It was God's will that the seed of Abraham should not fail; thus consolation is given them, and the hope, though not of an immediate, yet of an ultimate return. 7. (Ezra 6. 10; Romans 13. 1; 1 Timothy 2. 2) Not only bear the Babylonian yoke patiently, but pray for your masters, i. e., whilst the captivity lasts. God's good time was to come when they were to pray for Babylon's downfall (ch. 51. 35; Psalm 137. 8). They were not to forestall that time. True religion teaches patient submission, not sedition, even though the prince be an unbeliever. In all states of life let us not throw away the comfort we may have, because we have not all we would have. There is here a foretaste of gospel love towards enemies (Matthew 5. 44). 8. your dreams which ye caused to be dreamed—The Latin

adage saith, "The people wish to be deceived, so let them be deceived." Not mere credulity misleads men, but their own perverse "love of darkness rather than light." It was not priests who originated priestcraft, but the people's own morbid appetite to be deceived; e. g., Aaron and the golden calf (Exodus 32. 1-4). So the Jews caused or made the prophets to tell them encouraging dreams (ch. 23. 25, 26; Ecclesiastes 5. 7; Zechariah 10. 2; John 3. 19-21). 10. (Note, ch. 25. 11, 12; Daniel 9. 2). This proves that the seventy years date from Jeconiah's captivity, not from the last captivity. The specification of time was to curb the impatience of the Jews, lest they should hasten before God's time. good word—promise of a return. 11. I know—I alone; not the false prophets who know nothing of my purposes, though they pretend to know. thoughts . . . I think—(Isaiah 55. 9.) Glaucing at the Jews who had no "thoughts of peace," but only of "evil" (misfortune), because they could not conceive how deliverance could come to them. The moral malady of man is twofold—at one time vain confidence, then, when that is disappointed, despair. So the Jews first laughed at God's threats, confident that they should speedily return; then, when cast down from that confidence, they sank in inconsolable despondency. expected end—lit., end and expectation, i. e., an end, and that such an end as you wish for. Two nouns joined by and, standing for a noun and adjective. So in ch. 36. 27, "the roll and the words," i. e., the roll of words; Genesis 3. 16, "sorrow and conception," i. e., sorrow in conception. Cf. Proverbs 23. 18, where, as here, end means a happy issue. 13. Fulfilled (Daniel 9. 3, &c.). When God designs mercy, he puts it into the hearts of His people to pray for the mercy designed. When such a spirit of prayer is poured out, it is a sure sign of coming mercy. go—to the temple and other places of prayer; contrasted with their previous stolt as to going to seek God. 13. (Leviticus 26. 40-42, 44, 45) 14. to be found—(Psalm 32. 6; Isaiah 55. 6.) turn . . . captivity—play upon sounds, shabti . . . shebith. 15. Because—referring not to the preceding words, but to v. 10, 11, "Jehovah saith this to you" (i. e., the prophecy of the continuance of the captivity seventy years), "because ye have said, The Lord hath raised us up prophets in Babylon," viz., foretelling our speedy deliverance (this their prophecy is supposed, not expressed; accordingly, v. 16-19 contradicts this false hope again, v. 8, 9, 21). He, in this 15th verse, turns his address from the godly (v. 12-14) to the ungodly listeners to false prophets. 16. people . . . in this city . . . not gone forth—So far from your returning to Jerusalem soon, even your brethren still left dwelling there shall themselves also be cast into exile. He mentions "the throne of David," lest they should think that, because David's kingdom was to be perpetual, no severe, though temporary, chastisements could interpose (Psalm 89. 29-36). 17. vile figs—Hebrew, "horrible," or nauseous, from a root, to regard with loathing (see ch. 24. 8, 10). 18. removed to all . . . kingdoms—(Ch. 15. 4; Deuteronomy 28. 25.) curse, &c.—(Ch. 29. 6; 13. 16; 19. 8.) 21. Zedekiah—brother of Zephaniah (v. 25), both being sons of Maaseiah. Probably of the same family as the false prophet under Ahab in Israel (1 Kings 22. 11, 24). 22. shall be taken . . . a curse—i. e., a formula of imprecation. Lord make thee like Zedekiah—(Cf. Genesis 43. 20; Isaiah 65. 15.) roasted in the fire—a Chaldean punishment (Daniel 3. 0). 23. villainy—lit., sinful folly (Isaiah 32. 6). 24-32. A second communication which Jeremiah sent to Babylon, after the messenger who carried his first letter had brought a letter from the false prophet Shemaiah to Zephaniah, &c., condemning Jeremiah and reproving the authorities for not having apprehended him. Nehelamite—a name derived either from his father or from a place; alluding at the same time to the Hebrew meaning, "a dreamer" (cf. v. 8). 25. in thy name—without sanction of "the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel," which words stand in antithesis to thy name (John 5. 43). Zephaniah—the second priest, or substitute (Sagan) of the high priest. He was one of those sent to consult Jeremiah by Zedekiah (ch. 21. 1). Slain by Nebuchadnezzar at the capture of Jerusalem (2 Kings 25. 13, 21). Zephaniah was in particular addressed, as being

likely to take up against Jeremiah the prophet's prediction against his brother Zedekiah at Babylon (v. 21). Zephaniah was to read it to the priests, and in the presence of all the people, in the temple. 26. thee . . . in the stand of Jehoiada—Zephaniah's promotion as second priest, owing to Jehoiada's being then in exile, was unexpected. Shemaliah thus accuses him of ingratitude towards God, who had so highly exalted him before his regular time. ye should be officers . . . for every man—ye should, as bearing rule in the temple (ch. 20. 1, Note), apprehend every false prophet like Jeremiah. mad—inspired prophets were often so called by the ungodly (2 Kings 9. 11; Acts 26. 24; 2. 13, 15, 17, 18). Jeremiah is in this a type of Christ, against whom the same charge was brought (John 10. 20). prison—rather, the stocks (ch. 20. 2, Note). stocks—from a root, to confine; hence rather, a narrow dungeon. According to Deuteronomy 17. 8, 9, the priest was judge in such cases, but had no right to put into the stocks; this right he had assumed to himself in the troubled state of the times. 27. of Anathoth—said contemptuously, as "Jesus of Nazareth." maketh himself—as if God had not made him one, but himself. 28. Referring to Jeremiah's first letter to Babylon (v. 5). 29. Zephaniah . . . read . . . in the ears of Jeremiah—He seems to have been less prejudiced against Jeremiah than the others; hence he reads the charge to the prophet, that he should not be condemned without a hearing. This accords with Shemaliah's imputation against Zephaniah for want of zeal against Jeremiah (v. 26, 27.) Hence the latter was chosen by King Zedekiah as one of the deputation to Jeremiah (ch. 21. 1; 37. 3). 30. This resumes the thread of the sentence which began at v. 25, but was left there not completed. Here, in v. 30, it is completed, not however in continuity, but by a new period. The same construction occurs, Romans 5. 12-15. 32. not . . . a man to dwell—(Deuteronomy 28. 18.) not . . . behold the good—as he despised the lawful time, and wished to return before the time God had expressly announced, in just retribution he should not share in the restoration from Babylon at all. rebellion—going against God's revealed will as to the time (ch. 28. 16).

CHAPTER XXX.

VER. 1-24. RESTORATION OF THE JEWS FROM BABYLON AFTER ITS CAPTURE, AND RAISING UP OF MESSIAH. 2. Write . . . in a book—After the destruction of Jerusalem he is not ordered as heretofore to speak, but to write the succeeding prophecy (v. 4, &c.), so as thereby it might be read by his countrymen wheresoever they might be in their dispersion. 3. bring again . . . captivity of . . . Israel and Judah—The restoration not merely of the Jews (treated of in this ch. 30.), but also of the ten tribes ("Israel;" treated of in ch. 31.), together forming the whole nation (v. 18; ch. 32. 44; Ezekiel 39. 25; Amos 9. 14, 15). "Israel" is mentioned first, because its exile was longer than that of Judah. Some captives of the Israelite ten tribes returned with those of Judah (Luke 2. 36; "Aser" is mentioned). But these are only a pledge of the full restoration hereafter (Romans 11. 26, "All Israel"). Cf. ch. 16. 15. This 3d verse is a brief statement of the subject before the prophecy itself is given. 5. We have heard . . . trembling—God introduces the Jews speaking that which they will be reduced to at last in spite of their stubbornness. Threat and promise are combined: the former briefly, viz., the misery of the Jews in the Babylonian captivity down to their "trembling" and "fear" arising from the approach of the Medo-Persian army of Cyrus against Babylon; the promise is more fully dwelt on, viz., their "trembling" will issue in a deliverance as speedy as is the transition from a woman's labour-pangs to her joy at giving birth to a child (v. 6). 6. Ask—Consult all the authorities, men or books, you can, you will not find an instance. Yet in that coming day men will be seen with their hands pressed on their loins, as women do to repress their pangs. God will drive men through pain to gestures more fitting a woman than a man (ch. 4. 31; 6. 24). The metaphor is often used to express the previous pain followed by the sudden deliverance of Israel, as in the case of a woman in childbirth (Isaiah 66. 7-9). paleness—properly the colour of herbs blasted and fading; the green paleness of one in jaundice; the sickly paleness of terror. 7. great—marked by great calamities (Joel 2. 11, 31; Amos 5. 18; Zephaniah 1. 14). none like it . . . But he shall be saved—(Daniel 12. 1.) The partial deliverance at Babylon's downfall prefigures the final, complete deliverance of Israel, literal and spiritual, at the downfall of the mystical Babylon (Revelation 18., 19). 8. his yoke . . . thy neck—his, i. e., Jacob's (v. 7), the yoke imposed on him. The transition to the second person is frequent, God speaking of Jacob or Israel, at the same time addressing him directly. So "him" rightly follows; "foreigners shall no more make him their servant" (ch. 25. 14). After the deliverance by Cyrus, Persia, Alexander, Antiochus, and Rome, made Judea their servant. The full of deliverance meant must, therefore, be still future. 9. Instead of serving strangers (v. 8), they shall serve the Lord, their rightful King in the theocracy (Ezekiel 31. 27). David their king—No king of David's seed has held the sceptre since the captivity; for Zerubbabel, though of David's line, never claimed the title of "king." The Son of David, Messiah, must therefore be meant; so the Targum (cf. Isaiah 55. 3, 4; Ezekiel 34. 23, 24; 37. 24; Hosea 3. 5; Romans 11. 25-32). He was appointed to the throne of David (Isaiah 9. 7; Luke 1. 32). He is here joined with Jehovah as claiming equal allegiance. God is our "King," only when we are subject to Christ; God rules us not immediately, but through His Son (John 5. 22, 23, 27). raise up—applied to the judges whom God raised up as deliverers of Israel out of the hand of its oppressors (Judges 2. 16; 3. 9). So Christ was raised up as the antitypical Deliverer (Psalm 2. 6; Luke 1. 69-Acts 2. 30; 13. 23). 10. from afar—Be not afraid as if the distance of the places whither ye are to be dispersed precludes the possibility of return. seed—Though through the many years of captivity intervening yourselves may not see the restoration, the promise shall be fulfilled to your seed, primarily at the return from Babylon, fully at the final restoration. quiet . . . none . . . make . . . afraid—(Ch. 23. 6; Zechariah 14. 11.) 11. though . . . full end of all nations . . . yet . . . not . . . of thee—(Amos 9. 8.) The punishment of reprobates is final and fatal; that of God's people temporary and corrective. Babylon was utterly destroyed: Israel after chastisement was delivered. in measure—lit., with judgment, i. e., moderation, not in the full rigour of justice (ch. 10. 24; 46. 23; Psalm 6. 1; Isaiah 27. 8). not . . . altogether unpunished—(Exodus 34. 7.) 12. The desperate circumstances of the Jews are here represented as an incurable wound. Their sin is so grievous that their hope of the punishment (their exile) soon coming to an end is vain (ch. 8. 22; 15. 18; 2 Chronicles 36. 16). 13. none to plead—a new image from a court of justice. bound up—viz., with the bandages applied to tie up a wound. no healing medicines—lit., medicines of healing, or else applications (lit., ascensions) of medicaments. 14. lovers—the peoples formerly allied to thee, Assyria and Egypt (cf. Lamentations 1. 2). seek thee not—have cast away all concern for thee in thy distress. wound of an enemy—a wound such as an enemy would inflict. God condescends to employ language adapted to human conceptions. He is incapable of "enmity" or "cruelty;" it was their grievous sin which righteously demanded a grievous punishment, as though He were an "enemy" (ch. 5. 6; Job 13. 24; 30. 21). 15. Why criest thou—as if God's severity was excessive. Thou hast no reason to complain, for thine affliction is just. Thy cry is too late, for the time of repentance and mercy is past. [CALVIN.] 16. Therefore—Connected with v. 43, because "There is none to plead thy cause," &c., "therefore" I will plead thy cause, and heal thy wound, by overwhelming thy foes. Verse 15 is inserted to amplify what was said at the close of v. 14. When the false ways of peace, suggested by the so-called prophets, had only ended in the people's irremediable ruin, the true prophet comes forward to announce the grace of God as bestowing repentance and healing. devour thee . . . be devoured . . . spoil . . . be a spoil . . . prey upon . . . give for a prey—retribution in kind (cf. Note, ch. 2, 3; Exodus 23, 22; Isaiah 33, 1). 17. (Ch. 8, 22; 33, 6.) outcast—as a wife put away by her husband (Isaiah 62, 4, contrasted with v. 12). Zion—alluding to its Hebrew meaning, dryness; “sought after” by none, as would be the case with an arid region (Isaiah 62, 12). The extremity of the people, so far from being an obstacle to, will be the chosen opportunity of, God’s grace. 18. bring again . . . captivity—(Ch. 33, 7, 11.) tents—used to intimate that their present dwellings in Chaldea were but temporary as tents. have mercy on . . . dwelling-places—(Psalm 102, 13.) own heap—on the same hill, i. e., site, a hill being the usual site chosen for a city (cf. Joshua 11, 13, Margin). This better answers the parallel clause, “after the manner thereof” (i. e., in the same becoming way as formerly), than the rendering, “Its own heap of ruins,” as in ch. 49, 2. palace—the king’s, on Mount Zion. remain—rather, shall be inhabited (Note, ch. 17, 6, 25). This confirms English Version, “palace,” not as others translate, “the temple” (see 1 Kings 16, 18; 2 Kings 15, 25). 19. thanksgiving—The Hebrew word includes confession as well as praise; for, in the case of God, the highest praises we can bestow are only confessing what God really is (BENGEL) (ch. 17, 26; 31, 12, 13; 33, 11; Isaiah 35, 19; 51, 11). multiply them—(Zechariah 10, 8.) 20. as afortime—as flourishing as in the time of David. 21. their nobles—rather, “their Glorious One,” or “Leader” (cf. Acts 3, 15; Hebrews 2, 10), answering to “their Governor” in the parallel clause. of themselves—of their own nation, a Jew, not a foreigner; applicable to Zerubbabel, or J. Hyrcanus (hereditary high priest and governor), only as types of Christ (Genesis 49, 10; Micah 5, 2; Romans 9, 5), the antitypical “David” (v. 9). cause him to draw near—as the great Priest (Exodus 19, 22; Leviticus 21, 17), through whom believers also have access to God (Hebrews 10, 19–22). His priestly and kingly characters are similarly combined (Psalm 110, 4; Zechariah 6, 13). who . . . engaged . . . heart to approach—lit., pledged his heart, i. e., his life; a thing unique; Messiah alone hath made His life responsible as the surety (Hebrews 7, 22; 9, 11–15), in order to gain access not only for Himself, but for us to God. Heart is here used for life, to express the courage which it needed to undertake such a tremendous suretyship. The question implies admiration at one being found competent by His twofold nature, as God and man, for the task. Cf. the interrogation (Isaiah 63, 1–3). 22. ye shall be my people, &c.—The covenant shall be renewed between God and His people through Messiah’s mediation (v. 21; ch. 31, 1, 33; 32, 38; Ezekiel 11, 20; 36, 28). 23, 24. (Ch. 23, 19.) Vengeance upon God’s foes always accompanies manifestations of His grace to His people. continuing—lit., sojourning, abiding constantly; appropriately here in the case of Babylon, which was to be permanently destroyed, substituted for “whirling itself about” (“grievous” in English Version) (ch. 23, 19, 20, see Notes there), where the temporary downfall of Judea is spoken of.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1–40. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECY IN CHAP. 30. As in that chapter the restoration of Judah, so in this the restoration of Israel’s ten tribes is foretold. 1. At the same time—“In the latter days” (ch. 30, 24). The God of—manifesting my grace to (Genesis 17, 7; Matthew 22, 32; Revelation 21, 3). all . . . Israel—not the exiles of the south kingdom of Judah only, but also the north kingdom of the ten tribes; and not merely Israel in general, but “all the families of Israel.” Never yet fulfilled (Romans 11, 26). 2. Upon the grace manifested to Israel “In the wilderness” God grounds His argument for renewing His favours to them now in their exile; because His covenant is “everlasting” (v. 3), and changes not. The same argument occurs, Hosea 13, 5, 9, 10; 14, 4, 5, 8. Babylon is fitly compared to the “wilderness,” as in both alike Israel was as a stranger far from his appointed “rest” or home, and Babylon is in Isaiah 40, 3 called a “desert” (cf. ch. 50, 12). I went to cause him to rest—viz., in the pillar of cloud and fire, the symbol of God’s presence, which went before Israel to search a resting-place (Numbers 10, 33; Isaiah 63,

14) for the people, both a temporary one at each halt in the wilderness, and a permanent one in Canaan (Exodus 33, 14; Deuteronomy 3, 20; Joshua 21, 44; Psalm 95, 11; Hebrews 3, 11). 3. Israel gratefully acknowledges in reply God’s past grace; but at the same time tactfully implies by the expression “of old,” that God does not appear to her now. “God appeared to me of old, but now I am forsaken!” God replies, Nay, I love thee with the same love now as of old. My love was not a momentary impulse, but from “everlasting” in my counsels, and to “everlasting” in its continuance; hence originated the covenant whereby I gratuitously adopted thee (Malachi 1, 2; Romans 11, 28, 29). Margin translates, “from afar,” which does not answer so well as “of old,” to “in the wilderness” (v. 2), which refers to the olden times of Israel’s history. with loving-kindness . . . drawn—(Hosea 11, 4.) Rather, “I have drawn out continually my loving-kindness toward thee.” So Psalm 36, 10, “Continue (Margin, Draw out at length) thy loving-kindness.” By virtue of my everlasting love I will still extend my loving-kindness to thee. So Isaiah 44, 21, “O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of me.” 4. I will build . . . thou shalt be built—The combination of the active and passive to express the same fact implies the infallible certainty of its accomplishment. “Build,” i. e., establish in prosperity (ch. 33, 7). adorned with . . . tabrets—(1 Samuel 18, 6.) Or, “adorn thyself with thy timbrels,” used by damsels on occasions of public rejoicings (Exodus 15, 20; Judges 11, 34). Israel had cast away all instruments of joy in her exile (Psalm 137, 4). dances—holy joy, not carnal mirth. 5. Samaria—the metropolis of the ten tribes; here equivalent to Israel. The mountainous nature of their country suited the growth of the vine. eat . . . as common—lit., shall profane, i. e., shall put to common use. For the first three years after planting, the vine was “not to be eaten of;” on the fourth year the fruit was to be “holy to praise the Lord withal;” on the fifth year the fruit was to be eaten of as common, no longer restricted to holy use (Leviticus 19, 23–25; cf. Deuteronomy 20, 6; 28, 30, Margin). Thus the idea here is, “The same persons who plant shall reap the fruits;” it shall no longer be that one shall plant and another reap the fruit. 6. The watchmen, stationed on eminences (types of the preachers of the gospel), shall summon the ten tribes to go up to the annual feasts at Jerusalem (“Zion”), as they used to do before the revolt and the setting up of the idol calves at Dan and Beer-sheba (Ezekiel 37, 21, 22). Mount Ephraim—not one single mountain, but the whole mountainous region of the ten tribes. our God—from whom we formerly revolted, but who is now our God. An earnest of that good time to come is given in the partial success of the gospel in its first preaching in Samaria (John 4; Acts 8, 5–25). 7. The people are urged with praises and prayers to supplicate for their universal restoration. Jehovah is represented in the context (v. 1, 8), as promising immediately to restore Israel. They therefore praise God for the restoration, being as certain of it as if it were actually accomplished; and at the same time pray for it, as prayer was a means to the desired end. Prayer does not move God to grant our wishes, but when God has determined to grant our wishes, He puts it into our hearts to pray for the thing desired. Cf. Psalm 102, 13–17, as to the connection of Israel’s restoration with the prayers of His people (Isaiah 62, 1–6). for Jacob—on account of Jacob; on account of his approaching deliverance by Jehovah. among—for, i. e., on account of, would more exactly suit the parallelism to “for Jacob.” chief of the nations—Israel: as the parallelism to “Jacob” proves (cf. Exodus 19, 5; Psalm 135, 4; Amos 6, 1). God estimates the greatness of nations not by man’s standard of material resources, but by His electing favour. 8. north—Assyria, Media, &c. (Note, ch. 3, 12, 18; 23, 8). gather from . . . coasts of . . . earth—(Ezekiel 20, 34, 41; 34, 13.) blind . . . lame, &c.—not even the most infirm and unfit persons for a journey shall be left behind, so universal shall be the restoration. a great company—or, they shall return “in a great company.” [MAURER.] 9. weeping—for their past sins which caused their exile (Psalm 126, 5, 6). Although they come with weeping, they shall return with joy (cf.

50, 4, 5). supplications—(Cf. v. 18, 19; ch. 3. 21-25; Zechariah 12. 10.) Margin translates, "favours," as in Joshua 11. 20; Ezra 9. 8; thus God's favours or compassions are put in opposition to the people's weeping; their tears shall be turned into joy. But English Version suits the parallelism best. I will cause . . . to walk by . . . waters . . . straight way—(Isaiah 35. 6-8; 43. 19; 49. 10, 11.) God will give them waters to satisfy their thirst as in the wilderness-journey from Egypt. So spiritually (Matthew 5. 6; John 7. 37). Ephraim—the ten tribes no longer severed from Judah, but forming one people with it. my first-born—(Exodus 4. 22; Hosea 11. 1; Romans 9. 4.) So the elect Church (2 Corinthians 6. 18; James 1. 18). 10. The tidings of God's interposition in behalf of Israel will arrest the attention of even the uttermost Gentile nations. he that scattered will gather—He who scattered knows where to find Israel; He who smote can also heal. keep—not only will gather, but keep safely to the end (John 13. 1; 17. 11). shepherd—(Isaiah 40. 11; Ezekiel 34. 12-14.) 11. ransomed . . . from . . . hand of . . . stronger—no strength of the foe can prevent the Lord from delivering Jacob (Isaiah 49. 24, 25). 12. height of Zion—(Ezekiel 17. 23.) flow—there shall be a conflux of worshippers to the temple on Zion (Isaiah 2. 2; Micah 4. 1). to the goodness of . . . Lord—(See v. 14.) Benevolent, i. e., to the Lord as the source of all good things (Hosea 3. 5), to pray to Him and praise Him, for these blessings of which He is the Fountain-head. watered garden—(Isaiah 58. 11.) Not merely for a time, but continually full of holy comfort. not sorrow any more—referring to the Church triumphant, as well as literal Israel (Isaiah 35. 10; 65. 19; Revelation 21. 4). 13. young . . . old—(Zechariah 8. 4, 5.) 14. my goodness—(v. 12.) 15. Ramah—In Benjamin, east of the great northern road, two hours' journey from Jerusalem. Rachel, who all her life had pined for children (Genesis 30. 1), and who died with "sorrow" in giving birth to Benjamin (Genesis 35. 18, 19, Margin; 1 Samuel 10. 2), and was buried at Ramah, near Bethlehem, is represented as raising her head from the tomb, and as breaking forth into "weeping" at seeing the whole land depopulated of her sons, the Ephraimites. Ramah was the place where Nebuzaradan collected all the Jews in chains, previous to their removal to Babylon (ch. 40. 1). God therefore consoles her with the promise of their restoration. Matthew 2. 17, 18 quotes this as fulfilled in the massacre of the innocents under Herod. "A lesser and a greater event, of different times, may answer to the single sense of one passage of Scripture, until the prophecy is exhausted." [BENGE.] Besides the temporary reference to the exiles in Babylon, the Holy Spirit foreshadowed ultimately Messiah's exile in Egypt, and the desolation caused in the neighbourhood of Rachel's tomb by Herod's massacre of the children, whose mothers had "sons of sorrow" (Benoni), just as Rachel had. The return of Messiah (the representative of Israel) from Egypt, and the future restoration of Israel, both the literal and the spiritual (including the innocents), at the Lord's second advent, are antitypical of the restoration of Israel from Babylon, which is the ground of consolation held out here by Jeremiah. The clause, "They were not," i. e., were dead (Genesis 42. 13), does not apply so strictly to the exiles in Babylon as it does to the history of Messiah and His people—past, present, and future. So the words, "There is hope in thine end," are to be fulfilled ultimately, when Rachel shall meet her murdered children at the resurrection, at the same time that literal Israel is to be restored. "They were not," in Hebrew, is singular; each was not: each mother at the Bethlehem massacre had but one child to lament, as the limitation of age in Herod's order, "two years and under," implies; this use of the singular distributively (the mothers weeping severally, each for her own child), is a coincidence between the prophecy of the Bethlehem massacre and the event, the more remarkable as not being obvious; the singular, too, is appropriate as to Messiah in His Egyptian exile, who was to be a leading object of Rachel's lamentation. 16. thy work—thy parental weeping for thy children. [ROSENMULLER.] Thine affliction in the loss of thy children, murdered for

Christ's sake, shall not be fruitless to thee, as was the case in thy giving birth to the "child of thy sorrow," Benjamin. Primarily, also, thy grief shall not be perpetual: the exiles shall return, and the land be inhabited again. [CALVIN.] come again—(Hosea 1. 11.) 17. hope in . . . end—all thy calamities shall have a prosperous issue. 18. Ephraim—representing the ten tribes. benoaning himself—The spirit of penitent supplication shall at last be poured on Israel as the necessary forerunner of their restoration (Zechariah 12. 10-14). Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised—In the first clause the chastisement itself is meant; in the second the beneficial effect of it in teaching the penitent true wisdom. bullock unaccustomed to . . . yoke—A similar image occurs, Deuteronomy 32. 15. Cf. "stiff-necked," Acts 7. 51; Exodus 32. 9, an image from refractory oxen. Before my chastisement I needed the severe correction I received, as much as an untamed bullock needs the goad. Cf. Acts 9. 5, where the same figure is used of Saul whilst unconverted. Israel has had a longer chastisement than Judah, not having been restored even at the Jews' return from Babylon. Hereafter, at its restoration, it shall confess the sore discipline was all needed to "accustom" it to God's "easy yoke" (Matthew 11. 29, 30). turn thou me—by thy converting Spirit (Lamentations 5. 21). But why does Ephraim pray for conversion, seeing that he is already converted? Because we are converted by progressive steps, and need the same power of God to carry forward, as to originate, our conversion (John 6. 44, 65; cf. with Isaiah 27. 3; 1 Peter 1. 5; Philippians 1. 6). 19. after that I was turned, I repented—Repentance in the full sense follows, not precedes, our being turned to God by God (Zechariah 12. 10). The Jews' "looking to Him whom they pierced" shall result in their "mourning for Him." Repentance is the tear that flows from the eye of faith turned to Jesus. Himself gives it; we give it not of ourselves, but must come to Him for it (Acts 5. 31). instructed—made to learn by chastisement. God's Spirit often works through the corrections of His providence. smote upon . . . thigh—(Ezekiel 21. 12.) A token of indignant remorse, shame, and grief, because of his past sin. bear . . . reproach of . . . youth—"Because the calamities which I bore were the just punishment of my scandalous wantonness against God in my youth;" alluding to the idols set up at Dan and Bethel immediately after that the ten tribes revolted from Judah. His sense of shame shows that he no longer delights in his sin. 20. Is Ephraim my dear son? &c.—The question implies that a negative answer was to be expected. Who would have thought that one so undutiful to His heavenly Father as Ephraim had been should still be regarded by God as a "pleasant child?" Certainly he was not so in respect to his sin. But by virtue of God's "everlasting love" (v. 3) on Ephraim's being "turned" to God, he was immediately welcomed as God's "dear son." This 20th verse sets forth God's readiness to welcome the penitent (v. 18, 19), anticipating his return with prevent grace and love. Cf. Luke 15. 20: "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him and had compassion," &c. spake against—threatened him for his idolatry. remember—with favour and concern, as in Genesis 8. 1; 30. 22. bowels . . . troubled for him—(Deuteronomy 32. 36; Isaiah 63. 15; Hosea 11. 8)—viz., with the yearnings of compassionate love. The "bowels" include the region of the heart, the seat of the affections. 21. way-marks—pillars to mark the road for the returning exiles. Caravans set up pillars, or pointed heaps of stones, to mark the way through the desert against their return. So Israel is told by God to mark the way by which they went in leaving their country for exile; for by the same way they shall return. highway—(Isaiah 35. 8, 10.) 22. go about—viz., after human helps (ch. 2. 18, 23, 36). Why not return immediately to me? MAURE translates, as in Song of Solomon 5. 6, "How long wilt thou withdraw thyself?" Let thy past backslidings suffice thee now that a new era approaches. What God finds fault with in them is, that they looked hither and thither, leaning on contingencies, instead of at once trusting the word of God, which promised their restoration. To assure them of this, God promises to create a new thing in their land, A woman shall compass a man. CALVIN explains this: Israel, who is feeble as a woman, shall be superior to the warlike Chaldeans; the captives shall reduce their captors to captivity. HENGSTENBERG makes the "woman" the Jewish Church, and the "man" Jehovah, her husband, whose love she will again seek (Hosea 2, 6, 7). MAURER, A woman shall protect (Deuteronomy 32, 10, Margin; Psalm 32, 10) a man, i. e., You need fear no foes in returning, for all things shall be so peaceful that a woman would be able to take man's part, and act as his protector. But the Christian fathers almost unanimously (Augustine, &c.) interpreted it of the Virgin Mary compassing Christ in her womb. This view is favoured:—(1.) By the connection; it gives a reason why the exiles should desire a return to their country, viz., because Christ was conceived there. (2.) The word "created" implies a Divine power put forth in the creation of a body in the Virgin's womb by the Holy Ghost for the second Adam, such as was exerted in creating the first Adam (Luke 1, 35; Hebrews 10, 5). (3.) The phrase, "a new thing," something unprecedented; a man whose like had never existed before, at once God and man; a mother out of the ordinary course of nature, at once mother and virgin. An extraordinary mode of generation; one conceived by the Holy Ghost without man. (4.) The specification "in the land" (not "earth," as English Version), viz., of Judah, where probably Christ was conceived, in Hebron (cf. Luke 1, 39, 41, 42, 44, with Joshua 21, 11) or else in Nazareth, "in the territory" of Israel, to whom v. 5, 6, 15, 18, 21 refer; His birth was at Bethlehem (Micah 5, 2; Matthew 2, 5, 6). As the place of His nativity, and of His being reared (Matthew 2, 23), and of His preaching (Haggai 2, 7; Malachi 3, 1), are specified, so it is likely the Holy Spirit designated the place of His being conceived. (5.) The Hebrew for "woman" implies an individual, as the Virgin Mary, rather than a collection of persons. (6.) The restoration of Israel is grounded on God's covenant in Christ, to whom, therefore, allusion is naturally made as the foundation of Israel's hope (cf. Isaiah 7, 14). The Virgin Mary's conception of Messiah in the womb answers to the "Virgin of Israel" (therefore so called, v. 21), i. e., Israel and her sons at their final restoration, receiving Jesus as Messiah (Zechariah 12, 10). (7.) The reference to the conception of the child Messiah accords with the mention of the massacre of "children" referred to v. 15 (cf. Matthew 2, 17). (8.) The Hebrew for "man" is properly "mighty man," a term applied to God (Deuteronomy 10, 17); and to Christ (Zechariah 13, 7; cf. Psalm 45, 3; Isaiah 9, 6). [CALVIUS.] 23. Jerusalem again shall be the metropolis of the whole nation, the seat of "justice" (Psalm 122, 5-8; Isaiah 1, 26), and of sacred worship ("holiness," Zechariah 8, 3) on "Mount" Moriah. 24. Judah . . . cities . . . husbandmen . . . they with flocks—Two classes, citizens and countrymen, the latter divided into agriculturists and shepherds, all alike in security, though the latter were to be outside the protection of city walls. "Judah" here stands for the country, as distinguished from its cities. 25. The weary, sorrowful, and indigent state of Israel will prove no obstacle in the way of my helping them. 26. The words of Jeremiah: Upon this (or By reason of this) announcement of a happy restoration, I awaked from the prophetic dream vouchsafed to me (ch. 23, 25) with the sweet impression thereof remaining on my mind. "Sleep" here means dream, as in Psalm 90, 5. 27. He shows how a land so depopulated shall again be peopled. God will cause both men and beasts in it to increase to a multitude (Ezekiel 36, 9-11; Hosea 2, 23). 28. (Ch. 41, 27.) The same God who, as it were (in human language), was on the watch for all means to destroy, shall be as much on the watch for the means of their restoration. 29. In those days—After their punishment has been completed, and mercy again visits them, fathers . . . eaten . . . sour grape . . . children's teeth . . . on edge—The proverb among the exiles' children born in Babylon, to express that they suffered the evil consequences of their fathers' sins rather than of their own (Lamentations 5, 7; Ezekiel 18, 2, 3). 30. (Galatians 6, 5, 7.) 31. the days new covenant with . . .

Israel . . . Judah—The new covenant is made with literal Israel and Judah, not with the spiritual Israel, i. e., believers, except secondarily, and as grafted on the stock of Israel (Romans 11, 16-27). For the whole subject of chs. 30, and 31, is the restoration of the Hebrews (ch. 30, 4, 7, 10, 18; 31, 7, 10, 11, 23, 24, 27, 36). With the "remnant according to the election of grace" in Israel, the new covenant has already taken effect. But with regard to the whole nation, its realization is reserved for the last days, to which Paul refers this prophecy in an abridged form (Romans 11, 27). 32. Not . . . the covenant that I made with . . . fathers—The Old Testament covenant as contrasted with our gospel covenant (Hebrews 8, 8-12; 10, 16, 17, where this prophecy is quoted to prove the abrogation of the law by the gospel), of which the distinguishing features are its securing by an adequate atonement the forgiveness of sins, and by the inworking of effectual grace ensuring permanent obedience. An earnest of this is given partially in the present eclectic or elect Church gathered out of Jews and Gentiles. But the promise here to Israel in the last days is national and universal, and effected by an extraordinary outpouring of the Spirit (v. 33, 34; Ezekiel 11, 17-20), independent of any merit on their part (Ezekiel 36, 25-32; 37, 1-28; 39, 29; Joel 2, 23-28; Zechariah 12, 10; 2 Corinthians 3, 16). took . . . by . . . hand—(Deuteronomy 1, 31; Hosea 11, 3.) although I was an husband—(Cf. ch. 3, 14; Hosea 2, 7, 8.) But LXX., Syriac and St. Paul (Hebrews 8, 9) translate, "I regarded them not;" and GESSENIUS, &c., justify this rendering of the Hebrew from the Arabic. The Hebrews regarded not God, so God regarded them not. 33. will be their God—(Ch. 32, 38.) 34. True, specially of Israel (Isaiah 54, 13); secondarily, true of believers (John 6, 45; 1 Corinthians 2, 10; 1 John 2, 20). forgive . . . iniquity . . . remember . . . no more—(ch. 33, 8; 50, 20; Micah 7, 18); applying peculiarly to Israel (Romans 11, 27). Secondarily, all believers (Acts 10, 43). 35. divideth . . . sea when . . . waves . . . roar . . . Lord of hosts . . . name—quoted from Isaiah 51, 15, the genuineness of which passage is thus established on Jeremiah's authority. 36. a nation—Israel's national polity has been broken up by the Romans. But their preservation as a distinct people amidst violent persecutions, though scattered among all nations for eighteen centuries, unamalgamated, whereas all other peoples under such circumstances have become incorporated with the nations in which they have been dispersed, is a perpetual standing miracle (cf. ch. 33, 20; Psalm 148, 6; Isaiah 54, 9, 10). 37. (Cf. 33, 22.) for all that they have done—viz., all the sins. God will regard His own covenant promise, rather than their merits. 38. tower of Hananeel—the city shall extend beyond its former bounds (Nehemiah 3, 1; 12, 39; Zechariah 14, 10). gate of . . . corner—(2 Kings 14, 13; 2 Chronicles 28, 9.) 39. measuring-line—(Ezekiel 40, 8; Zechariah 2, 1.) Gareb—from a Hebrew root, to scrape; Syriac, leprosy; the locality outside of the city, where lepers were removed. Goath—from a root, to toil, referring to the toilsome ascent there: outside of the city of David, towards the south-west, as Gareb was north-west. [JUNIUS.] 40. valley of . . . dead—Tophet, where the bodies of malefactors were cast (Isaiah 30, 33), south of the city. fields . . . Kldron—so 2 Kings 23, 4. Fields in the suburbs reaching as far as Kldron, east of the city. horse gate—through it the king's horses were led forth for watering to the brook Kldron (2 Kings 11, 16; Nehemiah 3, 28). for ever—The city shall not only be spacious, but both "holy to the Lord," i. e., freed from all pollutions, and everlasting (Joel 3, 17, 20; Revelation 21, 2, 10, 27).

CHAPTER XXXII.

VER. 1-14. JEREMIAH, IMPRISONED FOR HIS PROPHECY AGAINST JERUSALEM, BUYS A PATRIMONIAL PROPERTY (HIS RELATIVE HANAMEEL'S), IN ORDER TO CERTIFY TO THE JEWS THEIR FUTURE RETURN FROM BABYLON. 1. tenth year—The siege of Jerusalem had already begun, in the tenth month of the ninth year of Zedekiah (ch. 39, 1; 2 Kings 25, 1). 2. In . . . court of . . . prison—i. e., in the open space occupied by the guard, whence he was not allowed to depart, but where any of his friends might visit him (v. 12; ch. 38, 13, 28). Marvellous obstinacy, that at the time when they were experiencing the truth of Jeremiah's words in the pressure of the siege, they should still keep the prophet in confinement. [CALVIN.] The circumstances narrated (v. 3-5) occurred at the beginning of the siege, when Jeremiah foretold the capture of the city (v. 1; ch. 34, 1-7; 39, 1). He was at that time put into free custody in the court of the prison. At the raising of the siege by Pharaoh-hophra, Jeremiah was on the point of repairing to Benjamin, when he was cast into "the dungeon," but obtained leave to be removed again to the court of the prison (ch. 37, 12-21). When there he urged the Jews, on the second advance of the Chaldeans to the siege, to save themselves by submission to Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 38, 2, 3); in consequence of this the king, at the instigation of the princes, had him cast into a mirey dungeon (ch. 38, 4-6); again he was removed to the prison court at the intercession of a courtier (v. 7-13), where he remained till the capture of the city (v. 28), when he was liberated (ch. 39, 11, &c.; 40, 1, &c.). 4. his eyes shall behold his eyes—i. e.*, only before reaching Babylon, which he was not to see. Ch. 39, 6, 7 harmonizes this prophecy (ch. 32, 4) with the seemingly opposite prophecy, Ezekiel 12, 13, "He shall not see." 5. visit him—in a good sense (ch. 27, 22); referring to the honour paid Zedekiah at his death and burial (ch. 34, 4, 5). Perhaps, too, before his death he was treated by Nebuchadnezzar with some favour. though ye fight . . . shall not prosper—(Ch. 21, 4.) 6. Jeremiah said—resuming the threat of v. 1, which was interrupted by the parenthesis (v. 2-5). 7. son of Shallum thine uncle—therefore, Jeremiah's first cousin. field . . . in Anathoth—a sacerdotal city: and so having 1000 cubits of suburban fields outside the wall attached to it (Numbers 35, 4, 5). The prohibition to sell these suburban fields (Leviticus 25, 34) applied merely to their alienating them from Levites to another tribe; so that this chapter does not contravene that prohibition. Besides, what is here meant is only the purchase of the use of the field till the year of jubilee. On the failure of the owner, the next of kin had the right of redeeming it (Leviticus 25, 25, &c.; Ruth 4, 3-6). 8. Then I knew—Not that Jeremiah previously doubted the reality of the Divine communication, but, the effect following it, and the prophet's experimentally knowing it, confirmed his faith and was the seal to the vision. The Roman historian, FLORUS (2, 6), records a similar instance: During the days that Rome was being besieged by Hannibal, the very ground on which he was encamped was put up for sale at Rome, and found a purchaser; implying the calm confidence of the ultimate issue entertained by the Roman people. 9. seventeen shekels of silver—As the shekel was only 2s. 4d., the whole would be under £2, a rather small sum, even taking into account the fact of the Chaldean occupation of the land, and the uncertainty of the time when it might come to Jeremiah or his heirs. Perhaps the "seven shekels," which in the Hebrew (see Margin) are distinguished from the "ten pieces of silver," were shekels of gold. [MAURER.] 10. subscribed—I wrote in the deed, "book of purchase" (v. 12). weights—coined money was not in early use; hence money was weighed (Genesis 23, 16). 11. evidence . . . sealed . . . open—Two deeds were drawn up in a contract of sale; the one, the original copy, witnessed and sealed with the public seal; the other not so, but open, and therefore less authoritative, being but a copy. GATKES thinks, that the purchaser sealed the one with his own seal, the other he showed to witnesses that they might write their names on the back of it, and know the contents; and that some details, e. g., the conditions and time of redemption were in the sealed copy, which the parties might not choose to be known to the witnesses, and which were therefore not in the open copy. The sealed copy, when opened after the seventy years' captivity, would greatly confirm the faith of those living at that time. The "law and custom" refer, probably, not merely to the sealing up of the conditions and details of purchase, but also to the law of redemption, according to which, at the return to Judea, the deed would show that

Jeremiah had bought the field by his right as next of kin. (Leviticus 25, 13-16). [LUDOVICUS DE DREU.] 12. Baruch—Jeremiah's amanuensis and agent (ch. 36, 4, &c.). before all—in sales everything clandestine was avoided; publicity was required. So here, in the court of prison, where Jeremiah was confined, there were soldiers and others, who had free access to him, present (ch. 38, 1). 14. in an earthen vessel—that the documents might not be injured by the moisture of the surrounding earth; at the same time, being buried, they could not be stolen, but would remain as a pledge of the Jews' deliverance until God's time should come. 15. (Cf. v. 24, 25, 37, 43, 44.) 16. Jeremiah, not comprehending how God's threat of destroying Judah could be reconciled with God's commanding him to purchase land in it as if in a free country, has recourse to his grand remedy against perplexities, prayer. 17. hast made . . . heaven—Jeremiah extols God's creative power, as a ground of humility on his part as man: It is not my part to call thee, the mighty God, to account for thy ways (cf. ch. 12, 1). too hard—In v. 27 God's reply exactly accords with Jeremiah's prayer (Genesis 18, 14; Zechariah 8, 6; Luke 1, 37). 18. (Exodus 34, 7; Isaiah 65, 6.) This is taken from the decalogue (Exodus 20, 5, 6). This is a second consideration to check hasty judgments as to God's ways: Thou art the gracious and righteous Judge of the world. 19. counsel . . . work—devising . . . executing (Isaiah 28, 29). eyes . . . open upon all—(Job 34, 21; Proverbs 5, 21.) to give . . . according to . . . ways—(Ch. 17, 10.) 20. even unto this day—thou hast given "signs" of thy power from the day when thou didst deliver Israel out of Egypt by mighty miracles, down to the present time. [MAURER.] CALVIN explains it, "memorable even unto this day," among other men—not in Israel only, but among foreign peoples also. Cf. for "other" understood, Psalm 73, 5. made thee a name—(Exodus 9, 16; 1 Chronicles 17, 21; Isaiah 63, 12.) as at this day—a name of power, such as thou hast at this day. 21. (Psalm 136, 11, 12.) 22. given . . . didst swear—God gave it by a gratuitous covenant, not for their deserts. 23. all . . . thou commandedst . . . all this evil—their punishment was thus exactly commensurate with their sin. It was not fortuitous. 24. mounts—mounds of earth, raised as breastworks by the besieging army, behind which they employed their engines, and which they gradually pushed forward to the walls of the city. behold, thou seest it—connected with v. 25. Thou seest all this with thine own eyes, and yet (what seems inconsistent with it) thou commandest me to buy a field. 25. for the city, &c.—rather, though, &c. 27. Jehovah retorts Jeremiah's own words: I am indeed, as thou sayest (v. 17), the God and Creator of "all flesh," and "nothing is too hard for me;" thine own words ought to have taught thee that, though Judea and Jerusalem are given up to the Chaldeans now for the sins of the Jews, yet it will not be hard to me, when I please, to restore the state so that houses and lands therein shall be possessed in safety (v. 36-44). 29. burn . . . houses upon whose roofs . . . incense unto Baal—retribution in kind. They burnt incense to Baal, on the houses, so the houses shall be burnt (ch. 19, 13). The god of fire was the object of their worship; so fire shall be the instrument of their punishment, to provoke me—indicating the design, not merely the event. They seemed to court God's "anger," and purposely to "provoke" Him. 30. have . . . done—lit., have been doing; implying continuous action. only . . . evil . . . only provoked me—they have been doing nothing else but evil; their sole aim seems to have been to provoke me. their youth—the time when they were in the wilderness, having just before come into national existence. 31. provocation of mine anger—lit., "for mine anger." CALVIN, therefore, connects these words with those at the end of the verse, "this city has been to me an object for mine anger (viz.), by reason of the provocations mentioned, v. 30), &c., that I should remove it," &c. Thus, there will not be the repetition of the sentiment, v. 30, as in English Version; the Hebrew also favours this rendering. However, Jeremiah delights in repetitions. In English Version the words, "that I should remove it," &c., stand independently, as the result of what precedes. The time is ripe for taking vengeance on them (2 Kings 23, 27). from the day that they built it—Solomon completed the building of the city; and it was he who, first of the Jewish kings, turned to idolatry. It was originally built by the idolatrous Canaanites. 32. priests . . . prophets—(Nehemiah 9, 32, 34.) Hence, learn, though ministers of God apostatize, we must remain faithful. 33. (Ch. 2, 27; 7, 13.) 34. (Ch. 7, 30, 31; Ezekiel 8, 5-17.) 35. cause . . . pass through . . . fire—by way of purification, they passed through with bare feet (Leviticus 18, 21). Molech—meaning king; the same as Milcom (1 Kings 11, 33). I commanded not—this cuts off from the superstitious the plea of a good intention. All "will-worship" exposes to God's wrath (Colossians 2, 18, 23). 36. And now therefore—rather, But now, nevertheless. Notwithstanding that their guilt deserves lasting vengeance, God, for the elect's sake and for His covenant's sake, will, contrary to all that might have been expected, restore them. ye say, It shall be delivered into . . . king of Babylon—The reprobate pass from the extreme of self-confidence to that of despair of God's fulfilling His promise of restoring them. 37. (Note, ch. 16, 15.) The "all" countries implies a future restoration of Israel more universal than that from Babylon. 38. (Ch. 30, 22; 24, 7.) 39. one heart—all seeking the Lord with one accord, in contrast to their state when only scattered individuals sought Him (Ezekiel 11, 19, 20; Zephaniah 3, 9). for . . . good of them—(Psalm 34, 12-15.) 40. (Ch. 31, 31, 33; Isaiah 55, 3.) not depart from me—never yet fully realized as to the Israelites. I will not turn away from them . . . good—(Isaiah 30, 21.) Jehovah compares Himself to a sedulous preceptor following his pupils everywhere to direct their words, gestures, &c. put my fear in . . . hearts . . . not depart from me—Both the conversion and perseverance of the saints are the work of God alone, by the operation of the Holy Spirit. 41. rejoice over them—(Deuteronomy 30, 9; Isaiah 62, 5; 65, 19; Zephaniah 3, 17.) plant . . . assuredly—rather, in stability, i. e., permanently, for ever (ch. 24, 6; Amos 9, 15). 42. (Ch. 31, 28.) The restoration from Babylon was only a slight foretaste of the grace to be expected by Israel at last through Christ. 43. (Ver. 15.) whereof ye say, It is desolate—(Ch. 33, 10.) 44. Referring to the forms of contract (v. 10-12). Benjamin—specified as Anathoth, Jeremiah's place of residence where the field lay (v. 8), was in it.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 1-26. PROPHECY OF THE RESTORATION FROM BABYLON, AND OF MESSIAH AS KING AND PRIEST. 1. shut up—(Ch. 32, 2, 3; 2 Timothy 2, 9.) Though Jeremiah was shut up in bondage, the word of God was "not bound." 2. maker thereof—rather, the doer of it, viz., that which Jeremiah is about to prophesy, the restoration of Israel, an act which is thought now impossible, but which the Almighty will effect. formed it—viz., Jerusalem (ch. 32, 44). [CALVIN.] Rather, that formed, i. e., moulds His purpose into due shape for execution (Isaiah 37, 26). Lord . . . his name—(Exodus 3, 14, 15.) 3. Call . . . I will answer—(Ch. 29, 12; Psalm 91, 15.) Jeremiah, as the representative of the people of God, is urged by God to pray for that which God has determined to grant, viz., the restoration. God's promises are not to slacken, but to quicken the prayers of His people (Psalm 132, 13, 17; Isaiah 62, 6, 7). mighty things—Hebrew, "inaccessible things," i. e., incredible, hard to man's understanding [MAURER], viz., the restoration of the Jews, an event despaired of. "Hidden," or "recondite." [PISCATOR.] thou knowest not—yet God had revealed those things to Jeremiah, but the unbelief of the people in rejecting the grace of God had caused him to forget God's promise, as though the case of the people admitted of no remedy. 4. houses . . . thrown down by the mounts—viz., by the missiles cast from the besiegers' mounds (ch. 32, 24); "and by the sword" follows properly, as, after missiles had prepared the way, the foe next advanced to close quarters "with the sword." 5. They—The Jews; the defenders of the "houses" (v. 4), "come forward to fight with the Chaldeans," who burst into the city through the "thrown-down houses," but all the effect that they produce "is, to fill them (the houses) with" their own "dead bodies." 6. (Ch. 30, 17.) The answer to Jeremiah's mournful question (ch. 8, 22). cure—*lit., the long linen bandage employed in dressing wounds. truth—*i. e., stability; I will bring forth for them abundant and permanent peace, i. e., prosperity. 7. cause . . . to return—*i. e., reverse (v. 11; ch. 32, 44). The specification, both of "Judah" and "Israel," can only apply fully to the future restoration. as at the first—(Isaiah 1, 26.) 8. cleanse—(Ezekiel 36, 25; Zechariah 13, 1; Hebrews 9, 13, 14.) Alluding to the legal rites of purification. all their iniquity . . . all their iniquities—both the principle of sin within, and its outward manifestations in acts. The repetition is in order that the Jews may consider how great is the grace of God in not merely pardoning (as to the punishment), but also cleansing them (as to the pollution of guilt); not merely one iniquity, but all (Micah 7, 18). 19. it—the city. a name . . . a praise—(Ch. 13, 11; Isaiah 62, 7.) them—the inhabitants of Jerusalem. they shall fear . . . for all the goodness—(Psalm 130, 4.) The Gentiles shall be led to "fear" God by the proofs of His power displayed in behalf of the Jews; the ungodly among them shall "tremble" for fear of God's judgments on them; the penitent shall reverentially fear and be converted to him (Psalm 102, 15; Isaiah 60, 3). 10. ye say . . . desolate—(Ch. 32, 43.) 11. (Ch. 7, 34; 16, 9.) Praise the Lord, &c.—The words of Psalm 136, 1, which were actually used by the Jews at their restoration (Ezra 3, 11). sacrifice of praise—(Psalm 107, 22; 116, 17). This shall continue when all other sacrifices shall be at an end. 12. habitation of shepherds . . . flocks—In contrast to v. 10, "without man . . . inhabitant . . . without beast" (ch. 32, 43; cf. ch. 31, 24; 50, 19; Isaiah 65, 10). 13. pass . . . under . . . hands of him that telleth them—Shepherds, in sending forth and bringing back their sheep to the folds, count them by striking each as it passes with a rod, implying the shepherd's provident care that not one should be lost (Leviticus 27, 32; Micah 7, 14; cf. John 10, 23, 29; 17, 12). 14. perform—"I will make to rise;" God's promise having for a time seemed to lie dead and abortive. [CALVIN.] 15. Repeated from ch. 23, 5. the land—the Holy Land: Israel and Judah (ch. 23, 6). 16. Jerusalem—In ch. 23, 6, instead of this, it is "Israel." "The name" in the Hebrew has here to be supplied from that passage; and for "he" (Messiah, the antitypical "Israel") the antecedent there (Isaiah 49, 3), we have "she" here, i. e., Jerusalem. She is called by the same name as Messiah, "The Lord our Righteousness," by virtue of the mystical oneness between her (as the literal representative of the spiritual Church) and her Lord and Husband. Thus, whatever belongs to the Head belongs also to the members (Ephesians 5, 30, 32). Hence the Church is called "Christ" (Romans 16, 7; 1 Corinthians 12, 12). The Church hereby professes to draw all her righteousness from Christ (Isaiah 45, 24, 25). It is for the sake of Jerusalem, literal and spiritual, that God the Father gives this name (Jehovah, Tsidkenu, "The Lord our Righteousness") to Christ. 17. The promises of perpetuity of the throne of David fulfilled in Messiah, the son of David (2 Samuel 7, 16; 1 Kings 2, 4; Psalm 89, 4, 29, 36; cf. Luke 1, 32, 33). 18. Messiah's literal priesthood (Hebrews 7, 17, 21, 24-28), and His followers' spiritual priesthood and sacrifices (v. 11; Romans 12, 1; 15, 16; 1 Peter 2, 5, 9; Revelation 1, 6), shall never cease, according to the covenant with Levi, broken by the priests, but fulfilled by Messiah (Numbers 25, 12, 13; Malachi 2, 4, 5, 8). 20. covenant of the day—*i. e., covenant with the day: answering to "covenant with David" (v. 21, also v. 25, "with day;" cf. ch. 31, 35, 36; Leviticus 26, 42; Psalm 89, 34, 37). 22. (Genesis 15, 5; 22, 17). The blessing there promised belonged to all the tribes; here it is restricted to the family of David and the tribe of Levi, because it was on these that the welfare of the whole people rested. When the kingdom and priesthood flourish in the person of Messiah, the whole nation shall temporally and spiritually prosper. 24. this people—certain of the Jews, especially those who spoke with Jeremiah in the court of the prison (ch. 32, 12; 38, 1). the two families—Judah and Israel. before them—in their judgment. They suppose that I have utterly cast off Israel so as to be no more a nation. The expression, “my people,” of itself, shows God has not cast off Israel for ever. 25. (Ch. 31. 35, 36; Genesis 8. 22; Psalm 74. 16, 17.) I who have established the laws of nature am the same God who have made a covenant with the Church. 26. Isaac—(Psalm 105. 9; Amos 7. 9, 16.)

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 1-22. CAPTIVITY OF ZEDEKIAH AND THE PEOPLE FORTOLD FOR THEIR DISOBEDIENCE AND PERFDY. The prophecy (v. 1-7) as to Zedekiah is an amplification of that in ch. 32. 1-5, in consequence of which Jeremiah was then shut up in the court of the prison. The prophecy (v. 8-22) refers to the Jews, who, afraid of the capture of the city, had, in obedience to the law, granted freedom to their servants at the end of seven years, but on the intermission of the siege forced them back into bondage. 1. Jerusalem and . . . all the cities thereof—(Note, ch. 19. 15.) It was amazing blindness in the king, that, in such a desperate position, he should reject admonition. 3. (Ch. 32. 4.) 4, 5. Mitigation of Zedekiah's punishment. the burnings of thy fathers—thy funeral shall be honoured with the same burning of aromatic spices as there was at the funerals of thy fathers (2 Chronicles 16. 14; 21. 19). The honours here mentioned were denied to Jehoiakim (ch. 22. 18). Ah, lord!—The Hebrews in their chronology (Seder olam) mention the wailing used over him, “Alas! King Zedekiah is dead, drinking the dregs (i. e., paying the penalty for the sins) of former ages.” 7. these . . . remained—alone (cf. 2 Chronicles 11. 5, 9). 8. By the law a Hebrew, after having been a bond-servant for six years, on the seventh was to be let go free (Exodus 21. 22; Deuteronomy 15. 12). Zedekiah made a covenant—with solemn ceremonial in the temple (v. 15, 18, 19). them—bond-servants (v. 9). 9. none . . . serve himself of a Jew—(Leviticus 25. 39-46.) 11. During the interruption of the siege by Pharaoh-hopra (cf. v. 21, 22, with ch. 37. 5-10), the Jews reduced their servants to bondage again. 13. The last year of Zedekiah was the sabbatical year. How just the retribution, that they who, against God's law and their own covenant, enslaved their brethren, should be doomed to bondage themselves; and that the bond-servants should enjoy the sabbatical freedom at the hands of the foe (ch. 52. 16) which their own countrymen denied them! 14. At the end of seven years—i. e., not on the eighth year, but within the limit of the seventh year, not later than the end of the seventh year (Exodus 21. 2; 23. 10; Deuteronomy 15. 12). So “at the end of three years” (Deuteronomy 14. 23; 2 Kings 18. 10), and “after three days, I will rise again” (Matthew 27. 63), i. e., on the third day (cf. Matthew 27. 64). 15. in the house . . . called by my name—the usual place of making such covenants (2 Kings 23. 3; cf. 1 Kings 8. 31; Nehemiah 10. 29). 16. polluted my name—by violating your oath (Exodus 20. 7). 17. not . . . proclaiming liberty—Though the Jews had ostensibly emancipated their bond-servants, they virtually did not do so by revoking the liberty which they had granted. God looks not to outward appearances, but to the sincere intention. I proclaim a liberty—retribution answering to the offence (Matthew 7. 2; 18. 32, 33; Galatians 6. 7; James 2. 13). The Jews who would not give liberty to their brethren shall themselves receive “a liberty” calamitous to them. God will manumit them from His happy and safe service (Psalm 121. 3), which is real “liberty” (Psalm 119. 45; John 8. 36; 2 Corinthians 3. 17), only to pass under the terrible bondage of other task-masters, the “sword,” &c. to be removed—the Hebrew expresses agitation (Note, ch. 15. 4). Cf. Deuteronomy 28. 25, 48, 64, 65, as to the restless agitation of the Jews in their ceaseless removals from place to place in their dispersion. 18. passed between the parts thereof—the contracting parties in the “covenant” (not here the law in general, but their covenant made before God in His house to emancipate their slaves, v. 8, 9) passed through the parts of the animal cut in two, implying that they prayed so to be cut in sun-

der (Matthew 24. 51; Greek, cut in two) if they should break the covenant (Genesis 15. 10, 17). 20. I will even give—resuming the sentence begun, but not completed (v. 18), “I will give,” &c. seek their life—implacably: satisfied with nothing short of their blood; not content with booty. dead bodies—The breakers of the covenant shall be cut in pieces, as the calf between whose parts they passed. 21. gone up—i. e., raised the siege in order to meet Pharaoh-hopra (ch. 37. 7-10). The departure of the Chaldeans was a kind of manumission of the Jews; but as their manumission of their bond-servants was recalled, so God revoked His manumission of them from the Chaldeans. 22. I will command—Nebuchadnezzar, impelled unconsciously by a Divine instigation, returned on the withdrawal of the Egyptians.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 1-19. PROPHECY IN THE REIGN OF JEHOIAKIM, WHEN THE CHALDEANS, IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE SYRIANS AND MOABITES, INVADED JUDEA. By the obedience of the Rechabites to their father, Jeremiah condemns the disobedience of the Jews to God their Father. The Holy Spirit has arranged Jeremiah's prophecies by the moral rather than the chronological connection. From the history of an event fifteen years before, the Jews, who had brought back their manumitted servants into bondage, are taught how much God loves and rewards obedience, and hates and punishes disobedience. 2. Rechabites—a nomadic tribe belonging to the Kenites of Hemath (1 Chronicles 2. 55), of the family of Jethro, or Hobab, Moses' father-in-law (Exodus 18. 9, &c.; Numbers 10. 29-32; Judges 1. 16). They came into Canaan with the Israelites, but, in order to preserve their independence, chose a life in tents without a fixed habitation (1 Samuel 15. 6). Besides the branch of them associated with Judah and extending to Amalek, there was another section at Kadesh, in Naphthali (Judges 4. 11, 17). They seem to have been proselytes of the gate. Jonadab, son of Rechab, whose charge not to drink wine they so strictly obeyed, was zealous for God (2 Kings 10. 15-23). The Nabatheans of Arabia observed the same rules (Diodorus Siculus, 19. 94). bring . . . into . . . house of . . . Lord—because there were suitable witnesses at hand there from among the priests and chief men, as also because he had the power immediately to address the people assembled there (v. 13). It may have been also as a reproof of the priests, who drank wine freely, though commanded to refrain from it when in the discharge of their duties. [CALVIN.] chambers—which were round about the temple, applied to various uses, e. g., to contain the vestments, sacred vessels, &c. 3. Jaazaniah—the elder and chief of the clan. 4. man of God—a prophet (Deuteronomy 33. 1; 1 Samuel 2. 27; 1 Kings 12. 22; 2 Kings 4. 7), also “a servant of God” in general (1 Timothy 6. 11), one not his own, but God's; one who has parted with all right in himself to give himself wholly to God (2 Timothy 3. 17). He was so revered that none would call in question what was transacted in his chamber. keeper of the door—Hebrew, of the vessel. Probably the office meant is that of the priest who kept in charge the capitation money paid for the use of the temple and the votive offerings, such as silver vessels, &c. There were seven such keepers. [GROTIUS.] Cf. 2 Kings 12. 9; 25. 18; 1 Chronicles 9. 13, 19, which support English Version. I said . . . Drink—Jeremiah does not say, The Lord saith, Drink; for then they would have been bound to obey. Contrast the case (1 Kings 13. 7-26). 6. Jonadab . . . our father—i. e., forefather and director, 300 years before (2 Kings 10. 15). They were called Rechabites, not Jonadabites, having received their name from Rechab the father, previously to their adopting the injunctions of Jonadab his son. This case affords no justification for slavish deference to the religious opinions of the Christian fathers; for Jonadab's injunction only affected matters of the present life: moreover, it was not binding on their consciences, for they deemed it not unlawful to go to Jerusalem in the invasion (v. 11). What is praised here is not the father's injunction, but the obedience of the sons. [CALVIN.] 7.

tents (Judges 4. 17.) live many days—according to the promise connected with the fifth commandment (Exodus 20. 12; Ephesians 6. 2, 3). strangers—they were not of the stock of Jacob, but sojourners in Israel. Types of the children of God, pilgrims on earth, looking for heaven as their home; having little to lose, so that losing times cost them little alarm; sitting loose to what they have (Hebrews 10. 34; 11. 9, 10, 13-16). 8. all that he charged us . . . all our days, we . . . wives . . . sons . . . daughters—unreserved obedience in all particulars, at all times, and on the part of all, without exception: in all which respects Israel's obedience to God was wanting. Contrast 1 Samuel 15. 20, 21; Psalm 78. 34-37, 41, 56, 57. 11. Chaldeans . . . Syrians—when Jehoiakim revolted from Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24. 1, 2). Necessity sets aside all other laws. This is the Rechabites' excuse for their seeming disobedience to Jonadab in temporarily settling in a city. Herein was seen the prescient wisdom of Jonadab's commands; they could at a moment's notice migrate, having no land-possession to tie them. 14. obey . . . father's commandments: notwithstanding I—(Malachi 1. 6.) rising early and speaking—God Himself speaking late and early by His various ways of providence and grace. In v. 15; 2 Chronicles 36. 15, a distinct mode of address is alluded to, viz., God sending His servants. 15. (Ch. 18. 11; 25. 5, 6.) I enjoined nothing unreasonable, but simply to serve me, and I attached to the command a gracious promise, but in vain. If Jonadab's commands, which were arbitrary and not moral obligations in themselves, were obeyed, much more ought mine, which are in themselves right. 17. because I have spoken . . . not heard . . . I . . . called . . . not answered—(Proverbs 1. 24; Isaiah 65. 12.) 19. not want a man to stand before me—there shall always be left representatives of the clan to worship me (ch. 15. 1, 19); or, "before me" means simple existence, for all things in existence are in God's sight (Psalm 89. 36). The Rechabites returned from the captivity. WOLFF found traces of them in Arabia.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VER. 1-32. BARUCH WRITES, AND READS PUBLICLY JEREMIAH'S PROPHECIES COLLECTED IN A VOLUME. THE ROLL IS BURNED BY JEHOIAKIM, AND WRITTEN AGAIN BY BARUCH AT JEREMIAH'S DICTATION. 1. fourth year—The command to write the roll was given in the fourth year, but it was not read publicly till the fifth year. As Isaiah subjoined to his predictions a history of events confirming his prophecies (Isaiah 36., 37., 38., 39.), so Jeremiah also in ch. 37., 38., 39., 40., 41., 42., 43.; but he prefaces his history with the narrative of an incident that occurred some time ago, showing that he, not only by word, but in writing, and that twice, had testified all that he is about to state as having subsequently come to pass. [GROTIUS.] At the end of Jehoiakim's third year, Nebuchadnezzar enrolled an army against Jerusalem, and took it in the end of the fifth or beginning of the sixth year, and carried away captive Jehoiakim, Daniel, &c. Jehoiakim returned the same year, and for three years was tributary: then withheld tribute. Nebuchadnezzar returned and took Jerusalem, and carried off Jehoiakim, who died on the road. This harmonizes this chapter with 2 Kings 24, and Daniel 1. See Note, ch. 22. 19. 2. roll of a book—a book formed of prepared skins made into a roll. Cf. "volume of the book," i. e., the Pentateuch (Psalm 40. 7). It does not follow that his prophecies were not before committed to writing; what is implied is, they were now written together in one volume, so as to be read continuously to the Jews in the temple. against . . . nations—(Ch. 25. 15, &c.) from . . . days of Josiah—(Ch. 25. 3.) From Josiah's thirteenth year (ch. 1. 2). 3. hear—consider seriously. return . . . from . . . evil way—(Jonah 3. 8.) 4. all . . . words of . . . Lord—God specially suggesting what might otherwise have escaped his memory, and directing the choice of words, as well as the substance (John 14. 26; 16. 13). 5. I am shut up—not in prison, for there is no account of his imprisonment under Jehoiakim, and v. 19, 26 are inconsistent with it: but, "I am prevented," viz., by some hindrance; or, through fear of the king, to whose anger

Baruch was less exposed, as not being the author of the prophecy. 6. go—on the following year (v. 9). fasting day—(See v. 9.) An extraordinary fast, in the ninth month, whereas the fast on the great day of atonement was on the tenth day of the seventh month (Leviticus 16. 29; 23. 27-32), appointed to avert the impending calamity, when Nebuchadnezzar having, in the year before (i. e., the fourth of Jehoiakim), smitten Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish, it was feared, would attack Judea, as the ally of Egypt (2 Kings 23. 34, 35). The fast was likely to be an occasion on which Jeremiah would find the Jews more softened, as well as a larger number of them met together. 7. present . . . supplication—lit., supplication shall fall; alluding to the prostrate attitude of the supplicants (Deuteronomy 9. 25; Matthew 26. 39), as petitioners fall at the feet of a king in the East. So Hebrew, ch. 38. 26; Daniel 9. 13, Margin. 9. they proclaimed . . . to all the people . . . to all, &c.—rather, "all the people . . . all the people proclaimed a fast." [MICHAELIS.] The chiefs appointed the fast by the wish of the people. In either version the ungodly king had no share in appointing the fast. 10. chamber—Baruch read from the window or balcony of the chamber looking into the court where the people were assembled. However, some of the chambers were large enough to contain a considerable number (Nehemiah 13. 5). Gemariah—distinct from the Gemariah, son of Hil-kiah, in ch. 29. 3. Shaphan—the same person as in 2 Kings 22. 3. scribe—secretary of state, or he who presided over the public records. higher court—that of the priests, the court of the people being lower (2 Chronicles 4. 9). new gate—(Ch. 26. 10.) The east gate. 12. scribe's chamber—an apartment in the palace occupied by the secretary of state. princes—holding a council of state at the time. Elnathan—who had already been an instrument of evil in Jehoiakim's hand (ch. 26. 22, 23). Hananiah—the false prophet (ch. 23. 10-17). 14. Jehudi—of a good family, as appears from his pedigree being given so fully, but in a subordinate position, come—instead of requiring Baruch to come to them, they ought to have gone to the temple, and there professed their penitence. But pride forbade it. [CALVIN.] 16. afraid, both one and other—Hebrew, fear-stricken, they turned to one another (cf. Genesis 42. 28). This showed, on their part, hesitancy, and some degree of fear of God, but not enough to make them willing to sacrifice the favour of an earthly king. We will surely tell the king—Not the language of threatening, but implying that the matter is of such moment, that the king ought to be made acquainted with it, so as to seek some remedy against the Divine anger. 17. What they wished to know was, whether what Baruch had read to them was written by him from memory after hearing Jeremiah repeating his prophecies continuously, or accurately from the prophet's own dictation. 18. his mouth—Baruch replies, it was by the oral dictation of the prophet; v. 2 accords with this view, rather than with the notion that Jeremiah repeated his prophecies from MSS. ink—his specification of the "ink" implies, I added nothing save the hand, pen, and ink. 19. Showing that they were not altogether without better feelings (cf. v. 16, 25). 20. chamber—there were chambers in the king's palace round the court or great hall, as in the temple (v. 10). The roll was "laid up" there for safe-keeping, with other public records. 21. sent Jehudi—Note, how unbelievers flee from God, and yet seek Him through some kind of involuntary impulse. [CALVIN.] Jehudi seems to have been the king's ready tool for evil. 22. winter-house—(Amos 3. 15.) ninth month—viz., of the religious year, i. e., November or December. fire on . . . hearth—rather, the stove was burning before him. In the East neither chimneys nor ovens are used, but, in cold weather, a brazen vessel containing burning charcoal; when the wood has burned to embers, a cover is placed over the pot to make it retain the heat. 23. three or four leaves—not distinct leaves as in a book, but the consecutive spaces on the long roll in the shape of doors (whence the Hebrew name is derived), into which the writing is divided: as the books of Moses in the synagogue in the present day are written in a long parchment rolled round a stick, the writing being divided into columns, like pages. penknife—the writer's knife with which the reed, used as a pen, was mended. "He" refers to the king (v. 22). As often as Jehudi read three or four columns, the king cut asunder the part of the roll read; and so he treated the whole, until all the parts read consecutively were cut and burnt; v. 24, "all these words," imply that the whole volume was read through, not merely the first three or four columns (1 Kings 22. 8). 24. The king and his "servants" were more hardened than the "princes" and councillors (v. 12-16. Notes). Contrast the humble fear exhibited by Josiah at the reading of the law (2 Kings 22. 11). 25. (Note, v. 16.) The "nevertheless" aggravates the king's sin; though God would have drawn him back through their interest, he persisted; judicial blindness and reprobation! 26. Hammelech—not as Margin, "of the king." Jehoiakim at this time (the fifth year of his reign) had no grown-up son; Jeconiah, his successor, was then a boy of eleven (cf. 2 Kings 23. 36, with 24. 8). hid them—(Psalm 31. 20; 83. 3; Isaiah 26. 20.) 27. roll, and . . . words—i. e., the roll of words. 28. all the former words—It is in vain that the ungodly resist the power of Jehovah; not one of His words shall fall to the ground (Matthew 5. 18; Acts 9. 5; 5. 39). 29. say to Jehoiakim—not in person, as Jeremiah was "hidden" (v. 26), but by the written word of prophecy. saying, Why—This is what the king had desired to be said to Jeremiah if he should be found; kings often dislike the truth to be told them. 30. He shall have none to sit upon the throne—fulfilled (2 Kings 24. 8, &c.; 25). He had successors, but not directly of his posterity, except his son Jeconiah, whose three months' reign is counted as nothing. Zedekiah was not son, but uncle of Jeconiah, and was raised to the throne in contempt of him and his father Jehoiakim (ch. 22. 30). dead body . . . cast out—(Ch. 22. 18, 19.) day . . . heat . . . night . . . frost—there are often these variations of temperature in the East between night and day (Genesis 31. 40). 32. added besides . . . many like words—Sinners gain nothing but additional punishment by setting aside the word of Jehovah. The law was similarly rewritten after the first tables had been broken owing to Israel's idolatry (Exodus 32., 34).

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 1-21. HISTORICAL SECTIONS, CHAP. 37-44. THE CHALDEANS RAISE THE SIEGE, TO GO AND MEET PHARAOH-HOPHRA. ZEDEKIAH SENDS TO JEREMIAH TO PRAY TO GOD IN BEHALF OF THE JEWS; IN VAIN. JEREMIAH TRIES TO ESCAPE TO HIS NATIVE PLACE, BUT IS ARRESTED. ZEDEKIAH ABATES THE RIGOUR OF HIS IMPRISONMENT. 1. Coniah—curtailed from Jeconiah by way of reproach. whom—referring to Zedekiah, not to Coniah (2 Kings 24. 17). 2. Amazing stupidity, that they were not admonished by the punishment of Jeconiah [CALVIN] (2 Chronicles 36. 12, 14)! 3. Zedekiah . . . sent—fearing lest, in the event of the Chaldeans overcoming Pharaoh-hophra, they should return to besiege Jerusalem. See Note in beginning of ch. 21.; that chapter chronologically comes in between ch. 37. and 38. The message of the king to Jeremiah here in ch. 37. is, however, somewhat earlier than that in ch. 21.; here it is whilst the issue between the Chaldeans and Pharaoh was undecided; there it is when, after the repulse of Pharaoh, the Chaldeans were again advancing against Jerusalem; hence, whilst Zephaniah is named in both embassies, Jehucal accompanies him here, Pashur there. But, as Pashur and Jehucal are both mentioned in ch. 38. 1, 2, as hearing Jeremiah's reply, which is identical with that in ch. 21. 9, it is probable the two messages followed one another at a short interval; that in this ch. 37. 3, and the answer, v. 7-10, being the earlier of the two. Zephaniah—an abettor of rebellion against God (ch. 29. 25), though less virulent than many (v. 29; ch. 29.), punished accordingly (ch. 52. 24-27). 4. Jeremiah . . . not put . . . into prison—he was no longer in the prison court, as he had been (ch. 32. 2; 33. 1), which passages refer to the beginning of the siege, not to the time when the Chaldeans renewed the siege, after having withdrawn for a time to

meet Pharaoh. 5. After this temporary diversion, caused by Pharaoh in favour of Jerusalem, the Egyptians returned no more to its help (2 Kings 24. 7). Judea had the misfortune to lie between the two great contending powers, Babylon and Egypt, and so was exposed to the alternate inroads of the one or the other. Josiah, taking side with Assyria, fell in battle with Pharaoh-necho at Megiddo (2 Kings 23. 29). Zedekiah, seeking the Egyptian alliance in violation of his oath, was now about to be taken by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Chronicles 36. 13; Ezekiel 17. 15, 17). 7. shall return—without accomplishing any deliverance for you. 8. (Ch. 34. 22.) 9. yourselves—Hebrew, "souls." 10. yet . . . they—even a few wounded men would suffice for your destruction. 11. broken up—"gone up." 12. Benjamin—to his own town, Anathoth. to separate himself—Margin translates, "to slip away," from a Hebrew root, "to be smooth," so, to slip away as a slippery thing that cannot be held. But it is not likely the prophet of God would flee in a dishonourable way; and "in the midst of the people" rather implies open departure along with others, than clandestine slipping away by mixing with the crowd of departing people. Rather, it means, to separate himself, or to divide his place of residence, so as to live partly here, partly there, without fixed habitation, going to and fro among the people. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] MAURER translates, "to take his portion thence," to realize the produce of his property in Anathoth [HENDERSON], or to take possession of the land which he bought from Hanameel. [MAURER.] 13. ward—i. e., the guard, or watch. Hananiah—whose death Jeremiah predicted (ch. 28. 16); the grandson in revenge takes Jeremiah into custody on the charge of deserting ("thou fallest away," ch. 38. 19; 52. 15; 1 Samuel 29. 3) to the enemy. His prophecies gave colour to the charge (ch. 21. 9; 38. 4). 15. scribe—one of the court secretaries; often in the East part of the private house of a public officer serves as a prison. 16. dungeon . . . cabins—the prison consisted of a pit (the "dungeon") with vaulted cells round the sides of it. The "cabins," from a root, to bend one's self. 17. secretly—Zedekiah was ashamed to be seen by his courtiers consulting Jeremiah (John 12. 43; 5. 44; 19. 38). thou shalt be delivered—Had Jeremiah consulted his earthly interests, he would have answered very differently. Contrast ch. 6. 14; Isaiah 30. 10; Ezekiel 13. 10. 18. What—In what respect have I offended? 19. Where are now your prophets—The event has showed them to be liars; and, as surely as the king of Babylon has come already, notwithstanding their prophecy, so surely shall he return. 20. be accepted—rather, "let my supplication be humbly presented" (ch. 36. 7, Note). [HENDERSON.] lest I die there—in the subterranean dungeon (v. 16), from want of proper sustenance (v. 21.). The prophet naturally shrank from death, which makes his spiritual firmness the more remarkable; he was ready to die rather than swerve from his duty. [CALVIN.] 21. court of the prison—(Ch. 32. 2; 38. 13, 23.) bakers' street—persons in the same business commonly reside in the same street in cities in the East. all the bread . . . spent—Jeremiah had bread supplied to him until he was thrown into the dungeon of Malchiah, at which time the bread in the city was spent. Cf. this verse with ch. 38. 9; that time must have been very shortly before the capture of the city (ch. 52. 6). God saith of His children, "In the days of famine they shall be satisfied" (Psalm 37. 19; Isaiah 33. 16). Honest reproof (v. 17), in the end often gains more favour than flattery (Proverbs 23. 23).

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 1-28. JEREMIAH PREDICTS THE CAPTURE OF JERUSALEM, FOR WHICH HE IS CAST INTO A DUNGEON, BUT IS TRANSFERRED TO THE PRISON COURT ON THE INTERCESSION OF EBED-MELECH, AND HAS A SECRET INTERVIEW WITH ZEDEKIAH. All this was subsequent to his imprisonment in Jonathan's house, and his release on his interview with Zedekiah. The latter occurred before the return of the Chaldeans to the siege; the similar events in this chapter occurred after it. 1. Jucal—Jehucal (Ch. 37. 3.) Pashur—(Ch. 21. 1; cf. v. 9 of ch. 21. with v. 2 of this ch. 38.)

the deputation in ch. 21. 1, to whom Jeremiah gave this reply, if not identical with the hearers of Jeremiah (ch. 38. 1), must have been sent just before the latter "heard" him speaking the same words. Zephaniah is not mentioned here as in ch. 21. 1, but is so in ch. 37. 3. Jucal is mentioned here and in the previous deputation (ch. 37. 3), but not in ch. 21. 1. Shephatiah and Gedaliah here do not occur either in ch. 21. 1 or ch. 37. 3. The identity of his words in both cases is natural, when uttered, at a very short interval, and one of the hearers (Pashur) being present on both occasions. unto all the people—they had free access to him in the court of the prison (ch. 32. 12). life . . . a prey—he shall escape with his life; though losing all else as in a shipwreck, he shall carry off his life as his gain, saved by his going over to the Chaldeans. (Note, ch. 21. 9.) 4. Had Jeremiah not had a Divine commission he might justly have been accused of treason; but having one, which made the result of the siege certain, he acted humanely as interpreter of God's will under the theocracy, in advising surrender (cf. ch. 26. 11). 5. the king is not he—Zedekiah was a weak prince, and now in his straits afraid to oppose his princes. He hides his dislike of their overweening power, which prevented him shielding Jeremiah as he would have wished, under complimentary speeches. "It is not right that the king should deny aught to such faithful and wise statesmen;" the king is not such a one as to deny you your wishes. [JEROME.] 6. dungeon—lit., the cistern. It was not a subterranean prison as that in Jonathan's house (ch. 37. 15), but a pit or cistern, which had been full of water, but was emptied of it during the siege, so that only "mire" remained. Such empty cisterns were often used as prisons (Zechariah 9. 11); the depth forbade hope of escape. Hammelech—(Ch. 36. 26.) His son followed in the father's steps, a ready tool for evil. sunk in the mire—Jeremiah herein was a type of Messiah (Psalm 69. 2, 14). "I sink in deep mire," &c. 7. Ebed-melech—The Hebrew designation given this Ethiopian, meaning king's servant. Already, even at this early time, God wished to show what good reason there was for calling the Gentiles to salvation. An Ethiopian stranger saves the prophet whom his own countrymen, the Jews, tried to destroy. So the Gentiles believed in Christ whom the Jews crucified, and Ethiopians were among the earliest converts (Acts 2. 10, 41; 8. 27-39). Ebed-melech probably was keeper of the royal harem, and so had private access to the king. The eunuchs over harems in the present day are mostly from Nubia or Abyssinia. 8. went forth . . . and spake—not privately, but in public; a proof of fearless magnanimity. die for hunger in the place where he is, for . . . no . . . bread in . . . city—(Cf. ch. 37. 21.) He had heretofore got a piece of bread supplied to him. "Seeing that there is the utmost want of bread in the city, so that even if he were at large, there could no more be regularly supplied to him, much less now in a place where none remember or pity him, so that he is like to die for hunger." "No more bread," i. e., no more left of the public store in the city (ch. 37. 21); or, all but no bread left anywhere. [MAURER.] 10. with thee—Hebrew, "in thine hand," i. e., at "thy disposal" (1 Samuel 16. 2). "From hence," i. e., from the gate of Benjamin where the king was sitting (v. 7). thirty men—not merely to draw up Jeremiah, but to guard Ebed-melech against any opposition on the part of the princes (v. 1-4), in executing the king's command. Ebed-melech was rewarded for his faith, love, and courage, exhibited at a time when he might well fear the wrath of the princes, to which even the king had to yield (ch. 39. 16-18). 11. cast clouts—"torn clothes." [HENDERSON.] rotten rags—"worn-out garments." God can make the meanest things His instruments of goodness to His people (1 Corinthians 1. 27-29). under . . . arm-holes—"under the joints of thine hands," i. e., where the fingers join the hand, the clothes being in order that the hands should not be cut by the cords. [MAURER.] 13. court of . . . prison—Ebed-melech prudently put him there to be out of the way of his enemies. 14. third entry—The Hebrews in determining the position of places faced the east, which they termed "that which is in front;" the south was thus called "that which is on the right hand;" the north, "that which is on the left hand;" the west, "that which is behind." So beginning with the east they might term it the first or principal entry; the south the second entry; the north the "third entry" of the outer or inner court. [MAURER.] The third gate of the temple facing the palace; for through it the entrance lay from the palace into the temple (1 Kings 10. 5, 12). It was westward (1 Chronicles 26. 16, 18; 2 Chronicles 9. 11). [GROTIUS.] But in the future temple it is eastward (Ezekiel 46. 1, 2, 8). 15. wilt thou not hearken unto me—Zedekiah does not answer this last query; the former one he replies to in v. 16. Rather translate, "Thou wilt not hearken to me." Jeremiah judges so from the past conduct of the king. Cf. v. 17 with v. 19. 16. Lord . . . made us this soul—(Isaiah 57. 16.) Implying, "may my life (soul) be forfeited if I deceive thee." [CALVIN.] 17. princes—(Ch. 39. 3.) He does not say "to the king himself," for he was at Riblah, in Hamath (ch. 39. 5; 2 Kings 25. 6). "If thou go forth" (viz., to surrender; 2 Kings 24. 12; Isaiah 36. 16), God foreknows future conditional contingencies, and ordains not only the end, but also the means to the end. 19. Afraid of the Jews—more than of God (Proverbs 29. 25; John 9. 22; 12. 43). mock me—treat me injuriously (1 Samuel 31. 4). 22. women—The very evil which Zedekiah wished to escape by disobeying the command to go forth shall befall him in its worst form thereby. Not merely the Jewish deserters shall "mock" him (v. 19), but the very "women" of his own palace and harem, to gratify their new lords, will taunt him. A noble king in sooth, to suffer thyself to be so imposed on! Thy friends—Hebrew, men of thy peace (see ch. 20. 10; Psalm 41. 9, Margin). The king's ministers and the false prophets who misled him. sunk in . . . mire—proverbial for, Thou art involved by "thy friends'" counsels in inextricable difficulties. The phrase perhaps alludes to v. 6; a just retribution for the treatment of Jeremiah, who literally "sank in the mire." they are turned . . . back—having involved thee in the calamity, they themselves shall provide for their own safety by deserting to the Chaldeans (v. 19). 23. children—(Ch. 39. 6; 41. 10.) "Wives . . . children . . . thou;" an ascending climax. 24. Let no man know—If thou wilt not tell this to the people, I will engage thy safety. 25. Kings are often such only in title; they are really under the power of their subjects. 26. presented—lit., made my supplication to fall; implying supplication with humble prostration (Note, ch. 36. 7). Jonathan's house—(ch. 37. 15), different from Malchiah's dungeon (v. 6). This statement was true, though not the whole truth; the princes had no right to the information; no sanction is given by Scripture here to Jeremiah's representation of this being the cause of his having come to the king. Fear drove him to it. Cf. Genesis 20. 2, 12; on the other hand, 1 Samuel 16. 2, 5. left off speaking with—Hebrew, "were silent from him," i. e., withdrawing from him they left him quiet (1 Samuel 7. 8, Margin). 28. he was [there] when Jerusalem was taken—These words are made the beginning of ch. 39. by many; but the accents and sense support English Version.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Ver. 1-18. JERUSALEM TAKEN. ZEDEKIAH'S FATE. JEREMIAH CARED FOR. EBED-MELECH ASSURED. This chapter consists of two parts; the first describes the capture of Jerusalem, the removal of the people to Babylon, and the fate of Zedekiah, and that of Jeremiah. The second the assurance of safety to Ebed-melech. 1. ninth year . . . tenth month—and on the tenth day of it (ch. 52. 4; 2 Kings 25. 1-4). From v. 2, "eleventh year . . . fourth month . . . ninth day," we know the siege lasted one and a half years, excepting the suspension of it caused by Pharaoh. Nebuchadnezzar was present in the beginning of the siege, but was at Riblah at its close (v. 3. 6; cf. ch. 38. 17). 3. sat—expressing military occupation or encampment. middle gate—the gate from the upper city (comprehending Mount Zion) to the lower city (north of the former and much lower); it was into the latter (the north side) the Chaldeans forced an entry, and took up their position opposite the gate of the "middle" wall, between the lower and upper city. Zedekiah fled in the opposite, i. e., the south direction (v. 4). Nergalsharezzer, Saugarnebo—proper names formed from those of the Idols, Nergal and Nebo (2 Kings 17. 30; Isaiah 46. 1). Rab-saris—meaning chief of the eunuchs. Rab-mag—chief of the magi; brought with the expedition in order that its issue might be foreknown through his astrological skill. Mag is a Persian word, meaning great, powerful. The magi were a sacerdotal caste among the Medes, and supported the Zoroastrian religion. 4. the king's garden—the "gate" to it from the upper city above was appropriated to the kings alone; "stairs" led down from Mount Zion and the palace to the king's garden below (Nehemiah 3. 15). two walls—Zedekiah might have held the upper city longer, but want of provisions drove him to flee by the double wall south of Zion, towards the plains of Jericho (v. 5), in order to escape beyond Jordan to Arabia Deserta. He broke an opening in the wall to get out (Ezekiel 12. 12). 5. Riblah—north of Palestine (see ch. 1. 14; Numbers 34. 11). Hamath is identified by commentators with Antioch, in Syria, on the Orontes, called Epiphania, from Antiochus Epiphanes. gave judgment upon him—lit., spoke judgments with him, i. e., brought him to trial as a common criminal, not as a king. He had violated his oath (Ezekiel 17. 13-19; 2 Chronicles 36. 13). 6. slew . . . sons . . . before his eyes—previous to his eyes being "put out" (v. 7); lit., dug out. The Assyrian structures depict the delight with which the kings struck out, often with their own hands, the eyes of captive princes. This passage reconciles ch. 32. 4, "his eyes shall behold his eyes;" with Ezekiel 12. 13, "he shall not see Babylon, though he shall die there." slew all . . . nobles—(Ch. 27. 20.) 8. burned . . . the houses—(Ch. 52. 12, 13.) Not immediately after the taking of the city, but in the month after, viz., the fifth month (cf. v. 2). The delay was probably caused by the princes having to send to Riblah to know the king's pleasure as to the city. 9. remnant—excepting the poorest (v. 10), who caused Nebuchadnezzar no apprehensions. those . . . that fell to him—the deserters were distrusted; or they may have been removed at their own request, lest the people should vent their rage on them as traitors, after the departure of the Chaldeans. rest . . . that remained—distinct from the previous "remnant:" there he means the remnant of those besieged in the city, whom Nebuchadnezzar spared; here, those scattered through various districts of the country which had not been besieged. [CALVIN.] 10. left . . . the poor . . . which had nothing—the poor have least to lose; one of the providential compensations of their lot. They who before had been stripped of their possessions by the wealthy Jews obtain, not only their own, but those of others. 11. Jeremiah's prophecies were known to Nebuchadnezzar through deserters (v. 9; ch. 38. 19), also through the Jews carried to Babylon with Jeconiah (cf. ch. 40. 2). Hence the king's kindness to him. 12. look well to him—Hebrew, set thine eyes upon him; provide for his well-being. 13. Nebuzaradan . . . sent—he was then at Ramah (ch. 40. 1). 14. Gedaliah—son of Ahikam, the former supporter of Jeremiah (ch. 26. 24). Gedaliah was the chief of the deserters to the Chaldeans, and was set over the remnant in Judea as one likely to remain faithful to Nebuchadnezzar. His residence was at Mizpah (ch. 40. 5). home—the house of Gedaliah, wherein Jeremiah might remain as in a safe asylum. As in ch. 40. 1 Jeremiah is represented as "bound in chains" when he came to Ramah among the captives to be carried to Babylon, this release of Jeremiah is thought by MAURER to be distinct from that in ch. 40. 5, 6. But he seems first to have been released from the court of the prison, and to have been taken to Ramah, still in chains, and then committed in freedom to Gedaliah. dwelt among the people—i. e., was made free. 15-18. Belonging to the time when the city was not yet taken, and when Jeremiah was still in the court of the prison (ch. 38. 13). This passage is inserted here because it was now that Ebed-melech's good act (ch. 38. 7-12; Matthew 25. 43) was to be rewarded in his deliverance. 16. Go—not literally, for he was in confinement, but figuratively. before thee—In thy sight. 17. the men of whom thou art afraid—(Ch. 38. 1, 4-6.) The courtiers and princes hostile to thee for having delivered Jeremiah shall have a danger coming so home to themselves as to have no power to hurt. Heretofore intrepid, he was now afraid; this prophecy was therefore the more welcome to him. 18. like . . . for a prey—(Notes, ch. 21. 9; 38. 2; 45. 5.) put . . . trust in me—(Ch. 38. 7-9.) Trust in God was the root of his fearlessness of the wrath of men, in his humanity to the prophet (1 Chronicles 5. 20; Psalm 37. 40). The "life" he thus risked was to be his reward, being spared beyond all hope, when the lives of his enemies should be forfeited ("for a prey").

CHAPTER XL.

Ver. 1-16. JEREMIAH IS SET FREE AT RAMAH, AND GOES TO GEDALIAH, TO WHOM THE REMNANT OF JEWS REPAIR. JOHANAN WARNS GEDALIAH OF ISHMAEL'S CONSPIRACY IN VAIN. 1. word that came—the heading of a new part of the book (ch. 41. 44), viz., the prophecies to the Jews in Judea and Egypt after the taking of the city, blended with history. The prophecy does not begin till ch. 42. 7, and the previous history is introductory to it. bound in chains—though released from the court of the prison (Note, ch. 39. 14), in the confusion at the burning of the city he seems to have been led away in chains with the other captives, and not till he reached Ramah to have gained full liberty. Nebuzaradan had his quarters at Ramah, in Benjamin, and there he collected the captives previous to their removal to Babylon (ch. 31. 15). He in releasing Jeremiah obeyed the king's commands (ch. 39. 11). Jeremiah's "chains" for a time were due to the negligence of those to whom he had been committed; or else to Nebuzaradan's wish to upbraid the people with their perverse ingratitude in imprisoning Jeremiah [CALVIN]; hence he addresses the people (ye . . . your) as much as Jeremiah (v. 2, 3). 2. The Babylonians were in some measure aware, through Jeremiah's prophecies (ch. 39. 11), that they were the instruments of God's wrath on His people. 3. ye—(Note, v. 1.) His address is directed to the Jews as well as to Jeremiah. God makes the very heathen testify for Him against them (Deuteronomy 29. 24, 25). 4. look well unto thee—the very words of Nebuchadnezzar's charge (ch. 39. 12). all the land is before thee . . . seemeth good—(Genesis 20. 15, Margin.) Jeremiah alone had the option given him of staying where he pleased, when all the rest were either carried off, or forced to remain there. 5. while he was not yet gone back—parenthetical. When Jeremiah hesitated whether it would be best for him to go, Nebuzaradan proceeded to say, "Go, then, to Gedaliah," &c. (not as English Version, "Go back, also"), if thou preferrest (as Nebuzaradan inferred from Jeremiah's hesitancy) to stop here rather than go with me. victuals—(Isaiah 33. 16.) reward—rather, a present. This must have been a seasonable relief to the prophet, who probably lost his all in the siege. 6. Mizpah—in Benjamin, north-west of Jerusalem (ch. 41. 5, 6, 9). Not the Mizpah in Gilead, beyond Jordan (Judges 10. 17). Jeremiah showed his patriotism and piety in remaining in his country amidst afflictions, and notwithstanding the ingratitude of the Jews, rather than go to enjoy honours and pleasures in a heathen court (Hebrews 11. 24-26). This vindicates his purity of motive in his withdrawal (ch. 37. 12-14). 7. captains . . . in the fields—The leaders of the Jewish army had been "scattered" throughout the country on the capture of Zedekiah (ch. 52. 8), in order to escape the notice of the Chaldeans. 8. Netophathite—from Netophah, a town in Judah (2 Samuel 23. 29). Maachathite—from Maachathi, at the foot of Mount Hermon (Deuteronomy 3. 14). 9. Fear not—They were afraid that they should not obtain pardon from the Chaldeans for their acts. He therefore assured them of safety by an oath. serve—lit., to stand before (v. 10; ch. 52. 12), i. e., to be at hand ready to execute the commands of the king of Babylon. 10. Mizpah—lying on the way between Babylon and Judah, and so convenient for transacting business between the two countries. As for me . . . but ye—he artfully, in order to conciliate them, represents the burden of the service to the Chaldeans as falling on him, whilst they may freely gather their wine, fruits, and oil. He does not now add that these very fruits were to constitute the chief part of the tribute to be paid to Babylon: which, though fruitful in corn, was less productive of grapes, figs, and olives. [HERODOTUS, 1. 193.] The grant of "vineyards" to the "poor" (ch. 39. 10) would give hope to the discontented of enjoying the best fruits (v. 12). 11. Jews . . . in Moab—who had fled thither at the approach of the Chaldeans. God thus tempered the severity of his vengeance that a remnant might be left. 13. in the fields—not in the city, but scattered in the country (v. 7). 14. Baalis—called from the idol Baal, as was often the case in heathen names. Ammonites—so it was to them that Ishmael went after murdering Gedaliah (ch. 41. 10). slay—lit., strike thee in the soul, i. e., a deadly stroke. Ishmael—being of the royal seed of David (ch. 41. 1), he envied Gedaliah the presidency to which he thought himself entitled; therefore he leagued himself with the ancient heathen enemy of Judah. believed . . . not—generous, but unwise unsuspectingness (Ecclesiastes 9. 16). 16. thou speakest falsely—a mystery of providence that God should permit the righteous, in spite of warning, thus to rush into the trap laid for them! Isaiah 57. 1 suggests a solution.

CHAPTER XLI.

Ver. 1-18. ISHMAEL MURDERS GEDALIAH AND OTHERS, THEN FLEES TO THE AMMONITES. JOHANAN PURSUES HIM, RECOVERS THE CAPTIVES, AND PURPOSES TO FLEE TO EGYPT FOR FEAR OF THE CHALDEANS. 1. seventh month—the second month after the burning of the city (ch. 52. 12, 13), and the princes—not the nominative. And the princes came; for the "princes" are not mentioned either in the next verse or in 2 Kings 25. 25; but, "Ishmael being of the seed royal and of the princes of the king." [MAUBER.] But the ten men were the "princes of the king;" thus MAURER'S objection has no weight: so English Version. eat bread together—Ishmael murdered Gedaliah, by whom he was hospitably received, in violation of the sacred right of hospitality (Psalm 41. 9). 2. slew him whom the king of Babylon had made governor—This assigns a reason for their slaying him, as well as showing the magnitude of their crime (Daniel 2. 21; Romans 13. 1). slew all the Jews—namely, the attendants and ministers of Gedaliah; or, the military alone, about his person, translate, "even (not and, as English Version) the men of war." The main portion of the people with Gedaliah, including Jeremiah, Ishmael carried away captive (v. 10, 16). 4. no man knew it—i. e., outside Mizpah. Before that tidings of the murder had gone abroad. 4. heard shaven, &c.—indicating their deep sorrow at the destruction of the temple and city. cut themselves—a heathen custom, forbidden (Leviticus 19. 27, 28; Deuteronomy 14. 1). These men were mostly from Samaria, where the ten tribes, previous to their deportation, had fallen into heathen practices. offerings—unbloody. They do not bring sacrificial victims, but "incense," &c., to testify their piety. house of . . . Lord—i. e., the place where the house of the Lord had stood (2 Kings 25. 9). The place in which a temple had stood, even when it had been destroyed, was held sacred. [PAPINIAN.] Those "from Shiloh" would naturally seek the house of the Lord, since it was at Shiloh it originally was set up (Joshua 18. 1). 6. weeping—pretending to weep, as they did, for the ruin of the temple. Come to Gedaliah—as if he was one of Gedaliah's retinue. 7. and cast them into . . . pit—he had not killed them in the pit (cf. v. 9); these words are therefore rightly supplied in English Version. the pit—the pit or cistern made by Asa to guard against a want of water when Baasha was about to besiege the city (v. 9. 1; 1 Kings 15. 22). The trench or fosse round the city. [GROTIUS.] Ishmael's motive for the murder seems to have been a suspicion that they were coming to live under Gedaliah. 8. treasures—it was customary to hide grain in cavities underground in troubled times. "We have treasures," which we will give, if our lives be spared.

slew . . . not—(Proverbs 13. 8.) Ishmael's avarice and needs overcame his cruelty. 9. because of Gedaliah—rather, "near Gedaliah," viz., those intercepted by Ishmael on their way from Samaria to Jerusalem, and killed at Mizpah, where Gedaliah had lived. So 2 Chronicles 17. 15, "next;" Nehemiah 3. 2, Margin, lit., as here, "at his hand." "In the reign of Gedaliah." [CALVIN.] However, English Version gives a good sense; Ishmael's reason for killing them was because of his supposing them to be connected with Gedaliah. 10. the king's daughters—(Ch. 43. 6.) Zedekiah's. Ishmael must have got additional followers (whom the hope of gain attracted), besides those who originally set out with him (v. 1), so as to have been able to carry off all the residue of the people. He probably meant to sell them as slaves to the Ammonites (ch. 40. 14, Note). 11. Johanan—the friend of Gedaliah who had warned him of Ishmael's treachery, but in vain (ch. 40. 8, 13). 12. the . . . waters . . . in Gibeon—(2 Samuel 2. 13.) A large reservoir or lake. Gibeon—on the road from Mizpah to Ammon: one of the sacerdotal cities of Benjamin, four miles north-west of Jerusalem, now El-jib. 13. glad—at the prospect of having a deliverer from their captivity. 14. cast about—came round. 16. men of war—"the men of war," stated in v. 3 to have been slain by Ishmael, must refer to the military about Gedaliah's person; "the men of war" here to those not so. eunuchs—the kings of Judah had adopted the bad practice of having harems and eunuchs from the surrounding heathen kingdoms. 17. dwelt—for a time, until they were ready for their journey to Egypt (ch. 42). habitation of Chimham—his caravanserai close by Bethlehem. David, in reward for Barzillai's loyalty, took Chimham his son under his patronage, and made over to him his own patrimony in the land of Bethlehem. It was thence called the habitation of Chimham (Geruth-Chimham), though it reverted to David's heirs in the year of jubilee. Caravanserais (a compound Persian word, meaning "the house of a company of travellers") differ from our Inns, in that there is no host to supply food, but each traveller must carry with him his own. 18. afraid—lest the Chaldeans should suspect all the Jews of being implicated in Ishmael's treason, as though the Jews sought to have a prince of the house of David (v. 1). Their better way towards gaining God's favour would have been to have laid the blame on the real culprit, and to have cleared themselves. A tortuous policy is the parent of fear. Righteousness inspires with boldness (Psalm 53. 5; Proverbs 28. 1).

CHAPTER XLII.

Ver. 1-22. THE JEWS AND JOHANAN INQUIRE OF GOD, THROUGH JEREMIAH, AS TO GOING TO EGYPT, PROMISING OBEDIENCE TO HIS WILL. THEIR SAFETY ON CONDITION OF STAYING IN JUDEA, AND THEIR DESTRUCTION IN THE EVENT OF GOING TO EGYPT, ARE FORETOLD. THEIR HYPOCRISY IN ASKING FOR COUNSEL WHICH THEY MEANT NOT TO FOLLOW, IF CONTRARY TO THEIR OWN DETERMINATION, IS REPROVED. 2. Jeremiah—he probably was one of the number carried off from Mizpah, and dwelt with Johanan (ch. 41. 16). Hence the expression is, "came near" (v. 1), not "sent." Let . . . supplication be accepted—lit., fall (Nose, ch. 36. 7; 37. 20). pray for us—(Genesis 20. 7; Isaiah 37. 4; James 5. 16.) thy God—(v. 5.) The Jews use this form to express their belief in the peculiar relation in which Jeremiah stood to God as His accredited prophet. Jeremiah in his reply reminds them, that God is their God, as well as his ("your God"), as being the covenant people (v. 4). They in turn acknowledge this in v. 6, "the Lord our God." few of many—as had been foretold (Leviticus 26. 22). 3. They consulted God, like many, not so much to know what was right, as wishing Him to authorize what they had already determined on, whether agreeable to His will or not. So Ahab in consulting Micalah (1 Kings 22. 13). Cf. Jeremiah's answer (v. 4) with Micalah's (1 Kings 22. 14). 4. I have heard—i. e., I accede to your request. your God—being His by adoption, ye are not your own, and are bound to whatever He wills (Exodus 19. 5, 6; 1 Corinthians 6. 19

20. answer you—i. e., through me. keep nothing back—(1 Samuel 3, 18; Acts 20, 20.) 5. Lord be a true . . . witness—(Genesis 31, 50; Psalm 89, 37; Revelation 1, 5; 3, 14; 19, 11.) 6. evil—not moral evil, which God cannot command (James 1, 13), but what may be disagreeable and hard to us. Plety obeys God, without questioning, at all costs. See the instance defective in this, that it obeyed only so far as was agreeable to itself (1 Samuel 15, 3, 9, 13-15, 20-23). 7. ten days—Jeremiah did not speak of himself, but waited God's time and revelation, showing the reality of his inspiration. Man left to himself would have given an immediate response to the people, who were impatient of delay. The delay was designed to test the sincerity of their professed willingness to obey, and that they should have full time to deliberate (Deuteronomy 8, 2). True obedience bows to God's time, as well as His way and will. 10. If ye . . . abide—viz., under the Babylonian authority, to which God hath appointed that all should be subject (Daniel 2, 37, 38). To resist was to resist God. build . . . plant—metaphor for, I will firmly establish you (ch. 24, 6). I repent . . . of the evil—(Ch. 18, 8; Deuteronomy 32, 36.) I am satisfied with the punishment I have inflicted on you, if only you add not a new offence. [GROTIVS.] God is said to "repent," when he alters His outward ways of dealing. 12. show mercies—rather, I will excite (in him) feelings of mercy towards you. [CALVIN.] cause you to return—permit you to return to the peaceable enjoyment of the possessions from which you are wishing to withdraw through fear of the Chaldeans. By departing in disobedience they should incur the very evils they wished thereby to escape; and by staying they should gain the blessings which they feared to lose by doing so. 13. if ye say, &c.—avowed rebellion against God, who had often (Deuteronomy 17, 16), as now, forbidden their going to Egypt, lest they should be entangled in its idolatry. 14. where we shall see no war—here they betray their impety in not believing God's promise (v. 10, 11), as if He were a liar (1 John 5, 10). 15. wholly set your faces—firmly resolve (Luke 9, 51) in spite of all warnings (ch. 44, 12). 16. sword, which ye feared, shall overtake you—The very evils we think to escape by sin, we bring on ourselves thereby. What our hearts are most set on often prove fatal to us. Those who think to escape troubles by changing their place will find them wherever they go (Ezekiel 11, 8). The "sword" here is that of Nebuchadnezzar, who fulfilled the prediction in his expedition to Africa (according to MEGASTHENES, a heathen writer), 300 B. C. 17. all the men—excepting the "small number" mentioned (ch. 44, 14, 23), viz., those who were forced into Egypt against their will, Jeremiah, Baruch, &c., and those who took Jeremiah's advice and fled from Egypt before the arrival of the Chaldeans. 18. As mine anger, &c.—As ye have already, to your sorrow, found me true to my word, so shall ye again (ch. 7, 20; 18, 16). shall see this place no more—ye shall not return to Judea, as those shall who have been removed to Babylon. 19. I have admonished—lit., testified, i. e., solemnly admonished, having yourselves as my witnesses; so that if ye perish, ye yourselves will have to confess that it was through your own fault, not through ignorance, ye perished. 20. dissembled in your hearts—rather, "ye have used deceit against your (own) souls." It is not God, but yourselves, whom ye deceive, to your own ruin, by your own dissimulation (Galatians 6, 7). [CALVIN.] But the words following accord best with English Version, ye have dissembled in your hearts (v. 3, note) towards me, when ye sent me to consult God for you. 21. declared it—viz., the Divine will. I . . . but ye—antithesis. I have done my part; but ye do not yours. It is no fault of mine that ye act not rightly. 22. sojourn—for a time, until they could return to their country. They expected, therefore, to be restored, in spite of God's prediction to the contrary.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ver. 1-13. THE JEWS CARRY JEREMIAH AND BARUCH INTO EGYPT. JEREMIAH FORETELLS BY A TYPE THE CONQUEST OF EGYPT BY NEBUCHADNEZZAR, AND THE FATE

OF THE FUGITIVES. 2. Azariah—the author of the project of going into Egypt. A very different man from the Azariah in Babylon (Daniel 1, 7; 3, 12-18). proud—pride is the parent of disobedience and contempt of God. 3. Baruch—he being the younger spake out the revelations which he received from Jeremiah more vehemently. From this cause, and from their knowing that he was in favour with the Chaldeans, arose their suspicion of him. Their perverse fickleness was astonishing. In ch. 42, they acknowledged the trustworthiness of Jeremiah, of which they had for so long so many proofs; yet here they accuse him of a lie. The mind of the unregenerate man is full of deceits. 5. remnant . . . returned from all nations—(Ch. 40, 11, 12.) 6. the king's daughters—Zedekiah's (ch. 41, 10). 7. Tappanhes—(Ch. 2, 16, note.) Daphne on the Tanitic branch of the Nile, near Pelusium. They naturally came to it first, being on the frontier of Egypt, towards Palestine. 9. stones—to be laid as the foundation beneath Nebuchadnezzar's throne (v. 10). clay—mortar, brick-kiln—bricks in that hot country are generally dried in the sun, not burned. The palace of Pharaoh was being built or repaired at this time; hence arose the mortar and brick-kiln at the entry. Of the same materials as Pharaoh's house was built of, the substructure of Nebuchadnezzar's throne should be constructed. By a visible symbol implying that the throne of the latter shall be raised on the downfall of the former. Egypt at that time contended with Babylon for the empire of the East. 10. my servant—God often makes one wicked man or nation a scourge to another (Ezekiel 29, 18, 19, 20). royal pavilion—the rich tapestry (lit., ornament) which hung round the throne from above. 11. such as are for death to death—i. e., the deadly plague. Some he shall cause to die by the plague arising from insufficient or bad food; others, by the sword; others he shall lead captive, according as God shall order it (ch. 15, 2, note). 12. houses of . . . gods—he shall not spare even the temple, such will be his fury. A reproof to the Jews, that they betook themselves to Egypt, a land whose own safety depended on helpless idols. burn . . . carry . . . captives—burn the Egyptian idols of wood, carry to Babylon those of gold and other metals. array himself with the land, &c.—Isaiah 49, 18 has the same metaphor. as a shepherd, &c.—he shall become master of Egypt as speedily and easily as a shepherd, about to pass on with his flock to another place, puts on his garment. 13. images—statues or obelisks. Bethshemesh—i. e., the house of the sun, in Hebrew; called by the Greeks Heliopolis; by the Egyptians, On (Genesis 41, 45); east of the Nile, and a few miles north of Memphis. Ephraim Syrus says, the statues rose to the height of sixty cubits; the base was ten cubits. Above there was a mitre of 1000 pounds weight. Hieroglyphics are traced around the only obelisk remaining in the present day, sixty or seventy feet high. On the fifth year after the overthrow of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar, leaving the siege of Tyre, undertook his expedition to Egypt (Josephus, Antiquities, 10, 9, 7). The Egyptians, according to the Arabs, have a tradition that their land was devastated by Nebuchadnezzar in consequence of their king having received the Jews under his protection, and that it lay desolate forty years. But see note, Ezekiel 29, 2, 13. shall he burn—here the act is attributed to Nebuchadnezzar, the instrument, which in v. 12 is attributed to God. If even the temples be not spared, much less private houses.

CHAPTER XLIV.

Ver. 1-30. JEREMIAH REPROVES THE JEWS FOR THEIR IDOLATRY IN EGYPT, AND DENOUNCES GOD'S JUDGMENTS ON THEM AND EGYPT ALIKE. 1. Migdol—meaning a tower. A city east of Egypt, towards the Red Sea (Exodus 14, 2; Numbers 33, 7). Noph—Memphis, now Cairo (ch. 2, 16). Pathros—Upper Egypt (Isaiah 11, 11). 2. evil . . . upon Jerusalem—If I spared not my own sacred city, much less shall ye be safe in Egypt, which I loathe. 3. they went—implying perverse assiduity; they went out of their way to burn incense (one species of idolatry put for all kinds), &c. 4. (2 Chronicles 36, 15). 7. now—after so many warnings. commit . . . this . . . evil against your souls—(Ch. 7. 19; Numbers 16. 33; Proverbs 8. 36.) It is not God whom you injure, but yourselves. 8. in . . . Egypt—where they polluted themselves to ingratiate themselves with the Egyptians. ye be gone—not compelled by fear, but of your own accord, when I forbade you, and when it was free to you to stay in Judea. that ye might cut yourselves off—they, as it were, purposely courted their own ruin. 9. Have you forgotten how the wickednesses of your fathers were the source of the greatest calamities to you? their wives—the Jewish queens were great promoters of idolatry (1 Kings 11. 1-8; 15. 13; 16. 31). the land of Judah—they defiled the land which was holy unto God. 10. They . . . you—the third person puts them to a distance from God on account of their alienating themselves from Him. The second person implies that God formerly had directly addressed them. humbled—lil., contrite (Psalm 51. 17). neither . . . feared—(Proverbs 23. 14.) 11. cut off all Judah—i. e., all the idolaters; v. 23 shows that some returned to Judea (cf. ch. 42. 17). 14. none . . . shall escape . . . that they should return, &c.—The Jews had gone to Egypt with the idea that a return to Judea, which they thought hopeless, to their brethren in Babylon, would be an easy matter to themselves in Egypt: the exact reverse should happen in the case of each respectively. The Jews whom God sent to Babylon were there weaned from idolatry, and were restored; those who went to Egypt by their perverse will were hardened in idolatry, and perished there. have a desire—lil., lift up their soul, i. e., their hopes (cf. ch. 22. 27, Margin; Deuteronomy 24. 15). none shall return but such as shall escape—viz., the "small number" (v. 23) who were brought by force into Egypt, as Jeremiah and Baruch, and those who, in accordance with Jeremiah's advice, should flee from Egypt before the arrival of the Chaldeans (Note, ch. 42. 17). CALVIN less probably refers the words to the return of the exiles in Babylon, which the Jews in Egypt regarded as hopeless. 15. their wives—the idolatry began with them (1 Kings 11. 4; 1 Timothy 2. 14). Their husbands' connivance implicated them in the guilt. 16. we will not—(Ch. 6. 16.) 17. whatsoever . . . goeth . . . out of our . . . mouth—whatever vox we have uttered to our gods (v. 25; Deuteronomy 23. 23; Judges 11. 36). The source of all superstitions is that men oppose their own will and fancies to God's commands. queen of heaven—(Note, ch. 7. 18.) Ashtaroth or Astarte. we . . . fathers . . . kings, &c.—The evil was restricted to no one class: all from the highest to the lowest shared the guilt. then had we plenty—fools attribute their seeming prosperity to God's connivance at their sin; but see Proverbs 1. 32; Ecclesiastes 8. 11-13. In fact, God had often chastised them for their idolatry (see Judges 2. 14) but it is the curse of impiety not to perceive the hand of God in calamities. victuals—Men cast away the bread of the soul for the bread that perisheth (Deuteronomy 8. 3; John 6. 27). So Esau (Hebrews 12. 16). 18. They impute their calamities to their service of God, but these are often marks of His favour, not of wrath, to do His people good at their latter end (Deuteronomy 8. 16). 19. Make . . . cakes to worship her—MAURER translates, "to form her image." Crescent-shaped cakes were offered to the moon. Vulgate supports English Version. without her men—The women mentioned, v. 15, "a great multitude" here speak: we have not engaged in secret night-orgies which might justly be regarded unfavourably by our husbands: our sacred rites have been open, and with their privacy. They wish to show how unreasonable it is that Jeremiah should oppose himself alone to the act of all, not merely women, but men also. The guilty, like these women, desire to shield themselves under the complicity of others. Instead of helping one another towards heaven, husband and wife often ripen one another for hell. 21. The incense . . . did not the Lord remember—Jeremiah owns that they did as they said, but in retort asks, did not God repay their own evil-doing? Their very land in its present desolation attests this (v. 22), as was foretold (ch. 25. 11, 18, 38). 23. law—the moral precepts. statutes—the ceremonial testimonies—the judicial (Daniel 9. 11, 12). 25. Ye . . .

have both spoken with . . . mouths, and fulfilled with . . . hand—ironical praise. They had pleaded their obligation to fulfil their vows, in excuse for their idolatry. He answers, no one can accuse you of unsteadiness as to your idolatrous vows; but steadfastness towards God ought to have prevented you from making, or, when made, from keeping such vows. ye will surely accomplish . . . vows—Jeremiah hereby gives them up to their own fatal obstinacy. 26. I have sworn—I, too have made a vow which I will fulfil. Since ye will not hear me speaking and warning, hear me swearing. by my great name—i. e., by myself (Genesis 22. 16), the greatest by whom God can swear (Hebrews 6. 13, 14). my name shall no more be named—The Jews, heretofore, amidst all their idolatry, had retained the form of appeal to the name of God and the law, the distinctive glory of their nation; God will allow this no more (Ezekiel 20. 29): there shall be none left there to profane His name thus any more. 27. watch over . . . for evil—(Ch. 1. 10; Ezekiel 7. 6.) The God, whose providence is ever sollicitously watching over His people for good, shall sollicitously, as it were, watch for their hurt. Contrast ch. 31. 28; 32. 41. 28. small number—(Notes, v. 14, 28; and ch. 42. 17; Isaiah 27. 13); cf. "all-consumed" (v. 27). A band easily counted, whereas they were expecting to return triumphantly in large numbers. shall know—most of them experimentally, and to their cost. whose words . . . mine, or theirs—Hebrew, that from me and them. Jehovah's words are His threats of destruction to the Jews; theirs, the assertion that they expected all goods from their gods (v. 17), &c. "Mine;" by which I predict ruin to them. "Theirs;" by which they give themselves free scope in iniquity. shall stand (Psalm 33. 11.) 29. this . . . sign unto you—the calamity of Pharaoh-hophra (Note, v. 30) shall be a sign to you that as he shall fall before his enemy, so you shall subsequently fall before Nebuchadnezzar (Matthew 24. 8). [GROTIUS.] CALVIN makes the "sign" to be simultaneous with the event signified, not antecedent to it, as in Exodus 3. 12. The Jews believed Egypt impregnable, so shut in was it by natural barriers. The Jews being "punished in this place" will be a sign that their view is false, and God's threat true. He calls it "a sign unto you," because God's prediction is equivalent to the event, so that they may even now take it as a sign. When fulfilled it would cease to be a sign to them: for they would be dead. 30. Hophra—in Herodotus called Apries. He succeeded Psammis, the successor of Pharaoh-necho, who was beaten by Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish, on the Euphrates. Amasis rebelled against, and overcame him, in the city Sais. them that seek his life—HERODOTUS, in curious accordance with this, records that Amasis, after treating Hophra well at first, was instigated, by persons who thought they could not be safe unless he were put to death, to strangle him. "His enemies" refer to Amasis, &c.; the words are accurately chosen, so as not to refer to Nebuchadnezzar, who is not mentioned till the end of the verse, and in connection with Zedekiah (Ezekiel 20. 3; 30. 21). Amasis' civil war with Hophra pioneered the way for Nebuchadnezzar's invasion in the twenty-third year of his reign (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 10. 11).

CHAPTER XLV.

Ver. 1-5. JEREMIAH COMFORTS BARUCH. After the completion of the prophecies and histories appertaining to the Jewish people and kings, Jeremiah subjoins one referring to an individual, Baruch; even as there are subjoined to the epistles of Paul addressed to churches, epistles to individuals, some of which were prior in date to the former. Afterwards follow the prophecies referring to other nations, closing the book. [GROTIUS.] The date of the events here told is eighteen years before the taking of the city; this chapter in point of time follows ch. 36. Baruch seems to have been regularly employed by Jeremiah to commit his prophecies to writing (ch. 36. 1, 4, 32). 1. these words—his prophecies from the thirteenth year of Josiah to the fourth of Jehoiakim. 3. Thou didst say, &c.—Jeremiah does not spare his disciple, but unveils his fault, viz., fear for his life by reason of the suspicions which he incurred in the eyes of his countrymen (cf. ch. 36. 17), as if he was a favourer of the Chaldeans (ch. 43. 3), and instigator of Jeremiah; also ingratitude in speaking of his "grief," &c., whereas he ought to deem himself highly blessed in being employed by God to record Jeremiah's prophecies. added—rescued from the peril of my first writing (ch. 36. 26). I am again involved in a similar peril. He upbraids God as dealing harshly with him. I fainted—rather, I am weary. no rest—no quiet resting-place. 4. that which I have built . . . planted I will pluck up—(Isaiah 5. 5.) This whole nation (the Jews) which I founded and planted with such extraordinary care and favour, I will overthrow. 5. seekest thou great things for thyself—thou art over-fastidious and self-seeking. When my own peculiar people, a "whole" nation (v. 4), and the temple, are being given to ruin, dost thou expect to be exempt from all hardship? Baruch had raised his expectations too high in this world, and this made his distresses harder to be borne. The frowns of the world would not disquiet us, if we did not so eagerly covet its smiles. What folly to seek great things for ourselves here, where every thing is little, and nothing certain! all flesh—the whole Jewish nation and even foreign peoples (ch. 25. 26). but thy life . . . for a prey—esteem it enough at such a general crisis that thy life shall be granted thee. Be content with this boon of life which I will rescue from imminent death, even as when all things are given up to plunder, if one escape with aught, he has a something saved as his "prey" (ch. 21. 9). It is striking how Jeremiah, who once used such complaining language himself, is enabled now to minister the counsel requisite for Baruch when falling into the same sin (ch. 12. 1-5; 15. 10-18). This is part of God's design in suffering His servants to be tempted, that their temptations may adapt them for ministering to their fellow-servants when tempted.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Ver. 1-28. THE PROPHECIES, CHAPTERS 46.-52., REFER TO FOREIGN PEOPLES. He begins with Egypt, being the country to which he had been removed. Chapter 46. contains two prophecies concerning it; the discomfiture of Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, and the long subsequent conquest of Egypt by the same king; also the preservation of the Jews (v. 27, 28). 1. General heading of the next six chapters of prophecies concerning the Gentiles; the prophecies are arranged according to nations, not by the dates. 2. Inscription of the first prophecy. Pharaoh-necho—he, when going against Carchemish (Cercusium, near the Euphrates), encountered Josiah, king of Judah (the ally of Assyria), at Megiddo, and slew him there (2 Kings 23. 29; 2 Chronicles 35. 20-24); but was four years subsequently overcome at Carchemish, by Nebuchadnezzar, as is foretold here; and lost all the territory which had been subject to the Pharaohs west of the Euphrates, and between it and the Nile. The prediction would mitigate the Jews' grief for Josiah, and show his death was not to be unavenged (2 Kings 24. 7). He is famed as having fitted out a fleet of discovery from the Red Sea, which doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and returned to Egypt by the Mediterranean. 3. Derisive summons to battle. With all your mighty preparation for the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, when ye come to the encounter ye shall be "dismayed" (v. 5). Your mighty threats shall end in nothing. buckler—smaller, and carried by the light-armed cavalry. shield—of larger size, and carried by the heavily-armed infantry. 4. Harness the horses—viz., to the war-chariots, for which Egypt was famed (Exodus 14. 7; 15. 4). get up, ye horsemen—get up into the chariots. MAURER, because of the parallel "horses," translates, "Mount the steeds." But it is rather describing the successive steps in equipping the war-chariots; first harness the horses to them, then let the horsemen mount them. brigandines—cuirasses, or coats of mail. 5. (Note, v. 3.) The language of astonishment, that an army so well equipped should be driven back in "dismay." The prophet sees this in prophetic vision. fled apace—lit., fled a flight, i. e., flee precipitately. look not back—they do not even dare to look back at their pursuers. 6. Let not—equivalent to the strongest negation. Let not any of the Egyptian warriors think to escape by swiftness or by might. toward the north—i. e., in respect to Egypt or Judea. In the northward region, by the Euphrates (see v. 2). 7. as a flood—(Ch. 47. 2; Isaiah 8. 7, 8; Daniel 11. 22.) The figure is appropriate in addressing Egyptians, as the Nile, their great river, yearly overspreads their lands with a turbid, muddy flood. So their army, swelling with arrogance, shall overspread the region south of Euphrates; but it, like the Nile, shall retreat as fast as it advanced. 8. Answer to the question in v. 7. waters . . . moved like the rivers—the rise of the Nile is gentle; but at the mouth it, unlike most rivers, is much agitated, owing to the sandbanks impeding its course, and so it rushes into the sea like a cataract. 9. Ironical exhortation, as in v. 3. The Egyptians, owing to the heat of their climate and abstinence from animal food, were physically weak, and therefore employed mercenary soldiers. Ethiopians—Hebrew, Cush; Abyssinia and Nubia. Libyans—Phut, Mauritania, west of Egypt (cf. Genesis 10. 6). shield—the Libyans borrowed from Egypt the use of the long shield extending to the feet. (XENOPHON, Cyr., 6, and 7.) Lydians—not the Lydians west of Asia Minor (Genesis 10. 22; Ezekiel 30. 5), but the Ludim, an African nation descended from Egypt (Mizraim) (Genesis 10. 13; Ezekiel 30. 5; Nahum 3. 9). handle and bend the bow—the employment of two verbs expresses the manner of bending the bow, viz., the foot being pressed on the centre, and the hands holding the ends of it. 10. vengeance—for the slaughter of Josiah (2 Kings 23. 29). sword shall devour . . . be . . . drunk—poetical personification (Deuteronomy 32. 42). a sacrifice—(Isaiah 31. 6; Ezekiel 39. 17.) The slaughter of the Egyptians is represented as a sacrifice to satiate His righteous vengeance. 11. Gilead . . . balm—(Note, ch. 8. 22); viz., for curing the wounds; but no medicine will avail, so desperate shall be the slaughter. virgin—Egypt is so called on account of her effeminate luxury, and as having never yet been brought under foreign yoke. thou shalt not be cured—lit., there shall be no cure for thee (ch. 30. 13; Ezekiel 30. 21). Not that the kingdom of Egypt should cease to exist, but it should not recover its former strength; the blow should be irremediable. 12. mighty . . . stumbled against . . . mighty . . . fallen both together—their very multitude shall prove an impediment in their confused flight, one treading on the other. 13, &c. Prophecy of the invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, which took place sixteen years after the taking of Jerusalem. Having spent thirteen years in the siege of Tyre, and having obtained nothing for his pains, he is promised by God Egypt for his reward in humbling Tyre (Ezekiel 29. 17-20; 30.; 31). The intestine commotions between Amasis and Pharaoh-hophra prepared his way (cf. Isaiah 19. 1, &c., Notes). 14. Declare . . . publish—as if giving sentence from a tribunal. Migdol . . . Noph . . . Tahpanhes—east, south, and north. He mentions the three other quarters, but omits the west, because the Chaldeans did not advance thither. These cities, too, were the best known to the Jews, as being in their direction. sword shall devour round about thee—viz., the Syrians, Jews, Moabites, and Ammonites (Note, ch. 48. 1). The exhortation is ironical, as v. 4, 10. 15. thy valiant men—MSS., the LXX., and Vulgate read, "thy valiant one," Apis, the bull-shaped Egyptian idol worshipped at Noph or Memphis. The contrast this is between the palpable impotence of the idol and the might attributed to it by the worshippers. The Hebrew term, strong, or valiant, is applied to bulls (Psalm 22. 12). Cambyses in his invasion of Egypt destroyed the sacred bull. drive them—(Cf. v. 5.) The Hebrew word is used of a sweeping rain (Proverbs 28. 3). 16. He—Jehovah. made many to fall—lit., multiplied the faller, i. e., fallers. one fell upon another—(Y. 6. 12); even before the enemy strikes them (Leviticus 26. 37). let us go again to our own people—the language of the confederates and mercenaries, exhorting one another to desert the Egyptian standard, and return to their respective homes (v. 9, 21). from the oppressing sword—from the cruel sword, viz., of the Chaldeans (cf. ch. 25, 38). 17. there—in their own country severally, the foreign soldiers (v. 16) cry, "Pharaoh is," &c. but a noise—He threatens great things, but when the need arises, He does nothing; His threats are mere noise (cf. 1 Corinthians 13. 1). MAURER translates, "is ruined," lit. (in appropriate abruptness of language), "Pharaoh, king, &c., ruin." The context favours English Version, His vauntings of what he would do when the time of battle should come have proved to be empty sounds; he hath passed the time appointed (viz., for battle with the Chaldeans). 18. As the mountains Tabor and Carmel tower high above the other hills of Palestine, so Nebuchadnezzar (v. 29) when he comes shall prove himself superior to all his foes. Carmel forms a bold promontory jutting out into the Mediterranean. Tabor is the higher of the two; therefore it is said to be "among the mountains;" and Carmel "by the sea." the king . . . Lord of hosts—(Ch. 48. 15). In contrast to "Pharaoh king of Egypt . . . but a noise" (v. 17). God the true King, the Lord of hosts, shall cause Nebuchadnezzar to come. Whereas Pharaoh shall not come to battle at the time appointed, notwithstanding his boasts, Nebuchadnezzar shall come according to the prediction of the King, who has all hosts in His power, however ye Egyptians may despise the prediction. 19. furnish thyself—lit., make for thyself vessels (viz., to contain food and other necessaries for the journey) for captivity. daughter—so in v. 11. dwelling in Egypt—i. e., the inhabitants of Egypt, the Egyptians, represented as the daughter of Egypt (ch. 48. 18; 2 Kings 19. 21). "Dwelling" implies that they thought themselves to be securely fixed in their habitations, beyond the reach of invasion. 20. heifer—wanton, like a fat untamed heifer (Hosea 10. 11). Appropriate to Egypt, where Apis was worshipped under the form of a fair bull marked with spots. destruction—i. e., a destroyer: Nebuchadnezzar. Vulgate translates, "a goader," answering to the metaphor, "one who will goad the heifer" and tame her. The Arabic idiom favours this. [ROSENMULLER.] cometh . . . cometh—the repetition implies, it cometh surely and quickly (Psalm 96. 13). out of the north—(Note, ch. 1. 14; 47. 2). 21. Translate, "Also her hired men (mercenary soldiers, v. 9, 10), who are in the midst of her like fatted bullocks, even they also are turned back," i. e., shall turn their backs to flee. The same image, "heifers . . . bullocks" (v. 20, 21), is applied to Egypt's foreign mercenaries, as to herself. Pampered with the luxuries of Egypt, they become as enervated for battle as the natives themselves. 22. The cry of Egypt when invaded shall be like the hissing of a serpent roused by the woodcutters from its lair. No longer shall she loudly roar like a heifer, but with a low murmur of fear, as a serpent hissing. with axes—the Scythian mode of armour. The Chaldeans shall come with such confidence as if not about to have to fight with soldiers, but merely to cut down trees offering no resistance. 23. her forest—(Isalah 10. 34.) though it cannot be searched—They cut down her forest, dense and unsearchable (Job 5. 9; 9. 10; 36. 26) as it may seem: referring to the thickly-set cities of Egypt, which were at that time a thousand and twenty. The Hebrew particle is properly, for, because. because—the reason why the Chaldeans shall be able to cut down so dense a forest of cities as Egypt; they themselves are countless in numbers. grasshoppers—locusts (Judges 6. 5). 25. multitude—Hebrew, "Amon" (Nahum 3. 8. Margin, "No-Ammon"), the same as Thebes or Diospolis in Upper Egypt, where Jupiter Ammon had his famous temple. In English Version, "multitude" answers to "populous No" (Nahum 3. 8; and Ezekiel 30. 15). The reference to "their gods" which follows, makes the translation more likely, "Ammon of No," i. e., No and her idol Ammon; so the Chaldee Version. So called either from Ham, the son of Noah; or, the nourisher, as the word means. their kings—the kings of the nations in league with Egypt. 26. afterward . . . inhabited—under Cyrus forty years after the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, it threw off the Babylonian yoke, but has never regained its former prowess (v. 11; Ezekiel 29. 11-15). 27, 28.

Repeated from ch. 30. 10, 11. When the Church [and literal Israel] might seem utterly consumed, there still remains hidden hope, because God as it were raises his people from the dead (Romans 11. 15). Whereas the godless "nations" are consumed even though they survive, as the Egyptians after their overthrow; because they are radically accursed and doomed. [CALVIN.]

CHAPTER XLVII.

Ver. 1-7. PROPHECY AGAINST THE PHILISTINES. 1. Pharaoh-necho probably smote Gaza on his return after defeating Josiah at Megiddo (2 Chronicles 35. 20). [GROTIUS.] Or, Pharaoh-hophres (ch. 37. 5, 7) is intended; probably on his return from his fruitless attempt to save Jerusalem from the Chaldeans, he smote Gaza in order that his expedition might not be thought altogether in vain [CALVIN] (Amos 1. 6, 7). 2. waters—(Isalah 8. 7.) The Chaldeans from the north are compared to the overwhelming waters of their own Euphrates. The smiting of Gaza was to be only the prelude of a greater disaster to the Philistines. Nebuzaradan was left by Nebuchadnezzar, after he had taken Jerusalem, to subdue the rest of the adjoining cities and country. 3. (Cf. ch. 4. 29.) fathers . . . not look back to . . . children—each shall think only of his own safety, not even the fathers regarding their own children. So desperate shall be the calamity, that men shall divest themselves of the natural affections. for feebleness of hands—the hands, the principal instrument of action, shall have lost all power; their whole hope shall be in their feet. 4. every helper—The Philistines, being neighbours to the Phœnicians of Tyre and Sidon, would naturally make common cause with them in the case of invasion. These cities would have no helper left when the Philistines should be destroyed. Caphtor—the Caphtorim and Philistines both came from Mizraim (Genesis 10. 13, 14). The Philistines are said to have been delivered by God from Caphtor (Amos 9. 7). Perhaps before the time of Moses they dwelt near and were subjugated by the Caphtorim (Deuteronomy 2. 23), and subsequently delivered. "The remnant" means here those still left after the Egyptians had attacked Gaza and Palestine; or rather those left of the Caphtorim after the Chaldeans had attacked them previous to their attack on the Philistines. Some identify Caphtor with Cappadocia; GESENIUS, with Crete (Ezekiel 25. 16, Cherethims); KITTO, Cyprus. Between Palestine and Idumea there was a city Caparvorsa; and their close connection with Palestine on the one hand, and Egypt (Mizraim, Genesis 10. 13, 14) on the other hand, makes this locality the most likely. 5. Baldness . . . cut thyself—Palestine is represented as a female who has torn off her hair and cut her flesh, the heathenish (Leviticus 19. 28) token of mourning (ch. 48. 37). their valley—the long strip of low plain occupied by the Philistines along the Mediterranean, west of the mountains of Judea. LXX. read Anakim, the remains of whom were settled in those regions (Numbers 13. 28). Joshua dislodged them, so that none were left but in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Joshua 11. 21, 22). But the parallel (v. 7), "Ashkelon . . . the sea-shore," establishes English Version here, "Ashkelon . . . their valley." 6. Jeremiah, in the person of the Philistines afflicting themselves (v. 5), apostrophizes the sword of the Lord, entreating mercy (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 41; Ezekiel 21. 3-5, 9, 10). Put up thyself—Hebrew, "Gather thyself," i. e., Retire or Return. 7. Jeremiah, from addressing the sword in the second person, turns to his hearers and speaks of it in the third person. Lord . . . given it a charge—(Ezekiel 14. 17.) the sea-shore—the strip of land between the mountains and Mediterranean, held by the Philistines; "their valley" (Note, v. 5). there hath he appointed it—(Micah 6. 9.) There hath He ordered it to rage.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Ver. 1-17. PROPHECY AGAINST MOAB. It had taken part with the Chaldeans against Judea (2 Kings 24. 2).

Fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, when also he attacked Egypt (ch. 43. 8-13) and Ammon (ch. 49. 1-6). [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 10. 9, 7.] Jeremiah in this prophecy uses that of Isaiah 15. 16, amplifying and adapting it to his purpose under inspiration, at the same time confirming its Divine authority. Isaiah, however, in his prophecy refers to the devastation of Moab by the Assyrian king. Shalmaneser; Jeremiah refers to that by Nebuchadnezzar. 1. Nebo—A mountain and town of Moab; its meaning is "that which fruitlet-fies." Kiriathaim—A city of Moab, consisting of two cities, as the word means; originally held by the Emin (Genesis 14. 5). Misgab—meaning elevation. It lay on an elevation. 2. no more praise—(Isaiah 16. 14.) in Heshbon—The foe having taken Heshbon, the chief city of Moab (v. 45), in it devise evil against Moab ("it") saying, Come, &c. Heshbon was midway between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok; it was the residence of Sihon, king of the Amorites, and afterwards a Levitical city in Gad (Numbers 21. 26). There is a play of words in the Hebrew, "Heshbon, Hashbu." Heshbon means a place of devising or counsel. The city, heretofore called the seat of counsel, shall find other counsellors, viz., those who devise its destruction. thou shalt be cut down . . . Madmen—Rather, by a play of words on the meaning of madmen ('silence), Thou shalt be brought to silence, so as well to deserve thy name (Isaiah 15. 1). Thou shalt not dare to utter a sound. 3. Horonaim—the same as the city Avara, mentioned by Ptolemy. The word means the double caves (Nehemiah 2. 10; Isaiah 15. 5). 4. little ones . . . cry—heightening the distress of the scene. The foe do not spare even infants. 5. going up of Luhith . . . going down of Horonaim—Horonaim lay in a plain, Luhith on a height. To the latter, therefore, the Moabites would flee with "continual weeping," as a place of safety from the Chaldeans. Lit., Weeping shall go up upon weeping. 6. They exhort one another to flee. heath—or the juniper (see Note, ch. 17. 6). MAURER translates, "Be like one naked in the wilderness." But the sense is, Live in the wilderness like the heath, or juniper; do not "trust in" walls (v. 7). [GROTIUS.] (Cf. Matthew 24. 16-18.) 7. thy works—viz., fortifications built by thy work. Moab was famous for its fortresses (v. 18). The antithesis is to v. 6, "Be . . . in the wilderness," where there are no fortified cities. thou . . . also—like the rest of the surrounding peoples, Judah, &c. Chemosh—the tutelary god of Moab (Numbers 21. 29; Judges 11. 24; 1 Kings 11. 7; 2 Kings 23. 13). When a people was vanquished, their gods also were taken away by the victors (ch. 43. 12). 8. the valley . . . shall perish—i. e., those dwelling in the valley. 9. Give wings, &c.—(Psalm 55. 6.) Unless it get wings, it cannot escape the foe. "Wings," the Hebrew root meaning is a flower (Job 14. 2), so the flower-like plumage of a bird. 10. work of . . . Lord—the divinely-appointed utter devastation of Moab. To represent how entirely this is God's will, a curse is pronounced on the Chaldeans, the instrument, if they do it negligently (Margin) or by halves (Judges 5. 23); cf. Saul's sin as to Amalek (1 Samuel 15. 3, 9), and Ahab's as to Syria (1 Kings 20. 42). 11. settled on . . . lees—(Note, Isaiah 25. 6; Zephaniah 1. 12). As wine left to settle on its own lees retains its flavour and strength, which it would lose by being poured from one vessel into another, so Moab, owing to its never having been dislodged from its settlements, retains its pride of strength unimpaired. emptied from vessel, &c.—to make it fit for use, it used to be filtered from vessel to vessel. scent—retaining the image. The bouquet or perfume of the wine. 12. wanderers—Rather, poursers out, retaining the image of v. 11, i. e., the Chaldeans who shall remove Moab from his settlements, as men pour wine from off the lees into other vessels. "His vessels" are the cities of Moab; the broken "bottles" the men slain. [GROTIUS.] The Hebrew and the kindred Arabic word means, to turn on one side, so as to empty a vessel. [MAURER.] 13. ashamed—have the shame of disappointment as to the hopes they entertained of aid from Chemosh, their idol. Beth-el—(1 Kings 12. 27, 29)—i. e., the golden calf set up there by Jeroboam. 15. gone up . . . gone down—in antithesis. out of her cities—

Rather, "Moab . . . and her cities are gone up," viz., pass away in the ascending smoke of their conflagration (Joshua 8. 20, 21; Judges 20. 40). When this took place, the young warriors would go down from the burning citadels only to meet their own slaughter. [GROTIUS.] English Version is somewhat favoured by the fact that "gone out" is singular, and cities plural. The antithesis favours GROTIUS. 16. near—to the prophet's eye, though probably twenty-three years elapsed between the utterance of the prophecy in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (2 Kings 24. 2) and its fulfilment in the fifth year of Nebuchadnezzar. 17. bemoan—not that Moab deserves pity, but this mode of expression pictures more vividly the grievousness of Moab's calamities. all ye that know his name—those at a greater distance whom the fame of Moab's "name" had reached, as distinguished from those "about him," i. e., near. strong staff . . . rod—Moab is so called as striking terror into and oppressing other peoples (Isaiah 9. 4; 14. 4, 5); also because of its dignity and power (Psalm 110. 2; Zechariah 11. 7). 18. (Isaiah 47. 1) do not inhabit—now so securely settled as if in a lasting habitation. thirst—Dibon, being situated on the Arnon, abounded in water (Isaiah 15. 9). In sad contrast with this, and with her "glory" in general, she shall be reduced not only to shame, but to the want of the commonest necessities ("thirst") in the arid wilderness (v. 6). 19. Aroer—on the north bank of the Arnon, a city of Ammon (Deuteronomy 2. 36; 3. 12). As it was on "the way" of the Moabites who fled into the desert, its inhabitants "ask" what is the occasion of Moab's flight, and so learn the lot that awaits themselves (cf. 1 Samuel 4. 13, 16). 20. Answer of the flying Moabites to the Ammonite Inquirers (v. 19; Isaiah 16. 2). He enumerates the Moabite cities at length, as it seemed so incredible that all should be so utterly ruined. Many of them were assigned to the Levites, whilst Israel stood. in Arnon—the north boundary between Moab and Ammon (v. 19; Numbers 21. 13). 21. plain—(v. 8.) Not only the mountainous regions, but also the plain, shall be wasted. Holon—(Cf. Joshua 15. 51.) Jahazah—(Numbers 21. 23; Isaiah 15. 4). Mephaath—(Joshua 13. 18; 21. 37.) 22. Beth-diblahthaim—the house of Diblahthaim: "Almon-diblahthaim" (Numbers 33. 46); "Diblahth" (Ezekiel 6. 13). Not far from Mount Nebo (Numbers 33. 46, 47). 23. Beth-gamul—meaning the city of camels. Beth-meon—the house of habitation. Beth-baal-meon (Joshua 13. 17). Now its ruins are called Mium. 24. Kerioth—(Joshua 15. 25; Amos 2. 2). Bozrah—See Note, Isaiah 34. 6. At one time under the dominion of Edom, though belonging originally to Moab (Genesis 36. 33; Isaiah 63. 1). Others think the Bozrah in Edom distinct from that of Moab. "Bezer" (Joshua 21. 36). 25. horn—the emblem of strength and sovereignty; it is the horned animal's means of offence and defence (Psalm 75. 5, 10; Lamentations 2. 3). 26. drunken—(Note, ch. 13. 12; 25. 17.) Intoxicated with the cup of Divine wrath, so as to be in helpless distraction. magnified . . . against . . . Lord—boasted arrogantly against God's people, that whereas Israel was fallen, Moab remained flourishing. wallow in . . . vomit—Following up the image of a drunken man, i. e., shall be so afflicted by God's wrath as to disgorge all his past pride, riches, and vain-glory, and fall in his shameful abasement. he also . . . derision—he in his disaster shall be an object of derision to us, as we in ours have been to him (v. 27). Retribution in kind. 27. (Zephaniah 2. 8.) a derision—The Hebrew has the article: referring to v. 26, "Was not Israel (the whole nation) the object of derision to thee?" Therefore as formerly for its exultation over the calamity (2 Kings 17. 6) of the ten tribes under the Assyrian Shalmaneser (Isaiah 15. 16), so now for its exultation over the fall of Judah, under the Chaldean Nebuchadnezzar, Moab is to suffer. God takes up His people's cause as His own (Obadiah 18-13). was he . . . among thieves—(Ch. 2. 26.) Proverbial. What did Israel do to deserve such derision? Was he detected in theft, that thou didst so exult over him in speaking of him? Though guilty before God, Israel was guiltless towards thee. since—since ever thou didst begin speaking of him. skippedst for joy—at Israel's calamity [CALVIN]; or, "thou didst shake thy head" in "derision." [MAURER.] 28. Doves often have their nests in the "sides" of caverns. No longer shalt thou have cities to shelter thee: thou shalt have to flee for shelter to caves and deserts (Psalm 55, 6, 8; Song of Solomon 2, 14). 29. pride—(Isaiah 16, 6, 7.) Moab was the trumpeter of his own fame. Jeremiah adds "loftiness and arrogance" to Isaiah's picture, so that Moab had not only not been bettered by the chastisement previously endured as foretold by Isaiah, but had even become worse; so that his guilt, and therefore his sentence of punishment, are increased now. Six times Moab's pride (or the synonyms) are mentioned, to show the exceeding hatefulness of his sin. 30. I know—Moab's "proud arrogance" (v. 29) or "wrath," against my people, is not unknown to me. It shall not be so—the result shall not be so as he thinks: his lies shall not so effect what he aims at by them. CALVIN translates, "his lies are not right (i. e., his vauntings are vain, because God will not give them effect): they shall not do so" as they project in their minds, for God will set at naught their plans. 31. I will cry . . . for . . . Moab—not that it deserves pity, but the prophet's "crying" for it vividly represents the greatness of the calamity. Kir-heres—Kir-hareseth, in Isaiah 16, 7, see Note there. It means the city of potters, or else the city of the sun. [GROTIUS.] Here "the men of Kir-heres" are substituted for "the foundations of Kir-hareseth," in Isaiah 16, 7. The change answers probably to the different bearing of the disaster under Nebuchadnezzar, as compared with that former one under Shalmaneser. 32. with the weeping—with the same weeping as Jazer, now vanquished, wept with for the destruction of its vines. The same calamity shall befall thee, Sibmah, as befell Jazer. The Hebrew preposition here is different from that in Isaiah 16, 9, for which reason MAURER translates, "with more than the weeping of Jazer." English Version understands it of the continuation of the weeping: after they have wept for Jazer, fresh subject of lamentation will present itself for the wasting of the vine-abounding Sibmah. plants . . . gone over . . . sea of Jazer—As LXX. read "cities of Jazer," and as no traces of a lake near Jazer are found, the reading of English Version is doubtful. Retaining the present reading, we avoid the difficulty by translating [GROTIUS], "Thy plants (i. e., citizens: alluding to the 'vine') are gone over the sea (i. e., shall be transported beyond sea to Cyprus, and such distant lands subject to Babylon; and this, too, in summer-time), whereas Jazer (i. e., the men of Jazer) reached the sea" (shore only, but are not transported beyond sea); so that worse shall befall thee than befalls Jazer. spoiler—Nebuzaradan. 33. the plentiful field—rather, Carmel: as the parallel "land of Moab" requires, though in Isaiah 16, 10, it is "the plentiful field." Joy is taken away as from the nearer regions (Canaan and Palestine), so from the farther "land of Moab; " what has happened Judah shall befall Moab too (v. 26, 27). [MAURER.] However, Moab alone seems to be spoken of here; nor does the parallelism forbid "plentiful field" answering to "Moab." English Version is therefore better. shouting—repeated, as at the conclusion of the vintage, men sing over and over again the same cry of joy. their shouting . . . no shouting—a shouting shall be heard, but not the joyous shouting of labourers treading the grapes, but the terrible battle-cry of the foe. 34. From the cry of Heshbon, &c.—Those who fly from Heshbon on its capture shall continue the cry even as far as Elealeh, &c. There will be continued cries in all quarters, from one end to the other, everywhere slaughter and wasting. as an heifer of three years old—Moab heretofore not having known foreign yoke, and in its full strength, as compared to an heifer of three years old, never yet yoked, nor as yet worn out with many birth-givings (cf. Note, Isaiah 15, 5). waters . . . of Nimrim—i. e., the well-watered and therefore luxuriant pastures of Nimrim. desolate—the Hebrew is stronger: not merely shall be "desolate," but desolation itself multiplied: plural, desolations. The most fertile tracts shall be dried up. 35. him that offereth—viz., whole burnt offerings, as the Hebrew requires. [GROTIUS.] Cf. the awful burnt offering of the king of Moab (2 Kings

3, 27). high places—(Isaiah 16, 12.) 36. (Notes, Isaiah 15, 7; 16, 11.) like pipes—a plaintive instrument, therefore used at funerals and in general mourning. riches . . . gotten—lit., the abundance . . . that which is over and above the necessaries of life. GROTIUS translates, "They who have been left remaining shall perish;" they who have not been slain by the enemy shall perish by disease and famine. 37. (Note, ch. 47, 5; Isaiah 15, 2, 3.) on all hands—i. e., arms, in which such cuttings used to be made in token of grief (cf. Zechariah 13, 6). 38. vessel . . . no pleasure—(Note, ch. 22, 28.) A vessel cast aside by the potter as refuse, not answering his design. 39. It—Moab. How . . . how—prodigious, yet sure to happen. turned the back—not daring to show her face. derision . . . dismaying to all—a derision to some; a dismaying to others in beholding such a judgment of God, fearing a like fate for themselves. 40. he—Nebuzaradan, the captain of Nebuchadnezzar. as . . . eagle—not to bear them "on eagles' wings" (Exodus 19, 4; Deuteronomy 32, 11, 12), as God does His people, but to pounce on them as a prey (ch. 49, 22; Deuteronomy 28, 49; Habakkuk 1, 8). 41. as . . . woman in . . . pangs—(Isaiah 13, 8.) 42. (Note, v. 26.) 43, 44. (Note, Isaiah 24, 17, 18). 44. When thou thinkest thou hast escaped one kind of danger, a fresh one will start up. 45. under . . . shadow of Heshbon—They thought that they would be safe in Heshbon. because of the force—i. e., "they that fled because of the force" of the enemy: they that fled from it. GLASSIUS translates, "through want of strength." So the Hebrew participle is translated (Psalm 109, 24), "Faileth of fatness," i. e., "Faileth through want of fatness;" also Lamentations 4, 9. but a fire, &c.—copied in part from Sihon's hymn of victory (Numbers 21, 27, 28). The old "proverb" shall hold good again. As in ancient times Sihon, king of the Amorites, issued forth from his city, Heshbon, as a devouring "flame," and consumed Moab, so now the Chaldeans, making Heshbon their starting-point, shall advance to the destruction of Moab. midst of Sihon—i. e., the city of Sihon. corner of Moab—i. e., Moab from one corner to the other. crown of . . . head—the most elevated points of Moab. Making some alterations, he here copies Balaam's prophecy (Numbers 24, 17). Margin there translates "princes" for corners; if so, "crown of . . . head" here refers to the nobles. tumultuous—sons of tumult: those who have tumultuously revolted from Babylon. Heshbon passed from the Amorite to the Israelite sway. Moab had wrested it from Israel, and helped the Chaldeans against the Jews; but revolting from Babylon, they brought ruin on themselves in turn. 46. Copied from Numbers 21, 29. 47. Restoration promised to Moab, for righteous Lot's sake, their progenitor (Genesis 19, 37; Exodus 20, 6; Psalm 89, 30-33). Cf. as to Egypt, ch. 46, 26; Ammon, ch. 49, 6; Elam, ch. 49, 29. Gospel blessings, temporal and spiritual, to the Gentiles in the last days, are intended.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Ver. 1-39. PREDICTIONS AS TO AMMON, IDUMEA, DAMASCUS, KEDAR, HAZOR, AND ELAM. The event of the prophecy as to Ammon preceded that as to Moab (Note, v. 3); and in Ezekiel 21, 26-28, the destruction of Ammon is subjoined to the deposition of Zedekiah. Hath Israel . . . no heir?—viz., to occupy the land of Gad, after itself has been carried away captive by Shalmaneser. Ammon, like Moab, descended from Lot, lay north of Moab, from which it was separated by the river Arnon, and east of Reuben and Gad (Joshua 13, 24, 25) on the same side of Jordan. It seized on Gad when Israel was carried captive. Judah was by the right of kindred the heir, not Ammon; but Ammon joined with Nebuchadnezzar against Judah and Jerusalem (2 Kings 24, 2), and exulted over its fall (Psalm 83, 4-7, 8; Zephaniah 2, 8, 9). It had already, 'in the days of Jeroboam, in Israel's affliction, tried to "enlarge its border" (2 Kings 14, 26; Amos 1, 1, 13). their king—(Amos 1, 15); referring to Melechom, their tutelary idol (Zephaniah 1, 5); and so the LXX. read it here as a proper name (2 Kings 11, 5, 33; 2 Kings 23, 13),

The Ammonite god is said to do what they do, viz., occupy the Israelite land of Gad. To Jehovah, the theocratic "King" of Israel, the land belonged of right; so that their Molech or Melechom was a usurper-king, his people—the people of Melchom, "their king." Cf. "people of Chemosh," ch. 48. 46. 2. Rabbah—the great, metropolis of Ammon (2 Samuel 12. 26-30). Its destruction is foretold also in Ezekiel, 25. 5; Amos 1. 14, 15. her daughters—the towns and villages, dependencies of the metropolis (Joshua 15. 45). shall . . . be heir—shall possess those who possessed him. The full accomplishment of this is still future; partially fulfilled under the Maccabees (1 Maccabees 5. 6). 3. Heshbon . . . Ai—Nebuchadnezzar, coming from the north, first attacked Ammon, then its brother and neighbour, Moab. As Ai of Ammon had already suffered destruction, Heshbon of Moab being near it might well fear the same fate. hedges—their cities being destroyed, the outcasts have no place of shelter save behind the "hedges" of vineyards and gardens; or else the enclosures of their villages. their king—Melchom, the idol, as the mention of "his priests" shows (cf. ch. 48. 7). 4. thy flowing valley—rather, "thy valley shall flow," viz., with the blood of the slain; in sad contrast to their "valleys" in which they had heretofore "gloried," and flowing with milk and honey. [GROTIUS.] Or else, as Margin, "shall flow away." backsliding—apostate from Jehovah, the God of their father Lot, to Molech. treasures—her resources for resisting the foe. Who shall, &c. Who can come, &c. (ch. 21. 13). 5. every man right forth—whithersoever chance may lead him (ch. 46. 5; Genesis 19. 17); straight before him, onwards at random (Amos 4. 3). none . . . gather up him, &c.—there shall be none to gather together the wandering fugitives, so as to entertain them and restore them to their own homes. 6. (Cf. ch. 48. 47.) For the sake of "righteous" Lot their progenitor. Partially fulfilled under Cyrus; in gospel times more fully. 7. concerning Edom—A distinct prophecy, copied in part from Obadiah, but with the freedom of one inspired himself, and foretelling a later calamity. Obadiah's was fulfilled probably in Sennacherib's time (cf. Isaiah 34. 5; Amos 1. 11); Jeremiah's about the same time as his preceding prophecies (v. 12; Ezekiel 25. 12). wisdom—for which the Arabs and the people of Teman (a city of Edom) in particular, were famed (Genesis 36. 15; 1 Kings 4. 30; see Job, everywhere; Obadiah 8). vanished—lit., poured out, i. e., exhausted (cf. Isaiah 19. 3, Margin). [MAURER.] Or, as the kindred Ethiopic word means, worn-out. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] 8. turn—viz., your backs in flight. dwell deep—in deep defiles and caves [GROTIUS], which abound in Idumea. Others refer it to the Arab custom of retiring into the depth of the desert when avoiding an offended foe (v. 30). Dedan—a tribe bordering on and made subject by Idumea; descended from Jokshan, son of Abraham and Keturah (Genesis 25. 1-3). Esau—the naming of Edom's progenitor, reprobated by God, recalls the remembrance of the old curse on him for his profanity, both his sin and its punishment being perpetuated in his descendants (Hebrews 12. 16, 17). 9. (Obadiah 5.) Grape-gatherers, yea even thieves, leave something behind them; but the Chaldeans will sweep Idumea clean of everything. 10. Edom became politically extinct after the time of the Romans. uncovered his secret places—where he hid himself (v. 8) and his treasures (Isaiah 45. 3). I have caused that nothing should be so hidden as that the conqueror should not find it. brethren—Ammon. neighbours—the Philistines. 11. "Thy fatherless and widows must rest their hope in God alone, as none of the adult males shall be left alive, so desperate will be the affairs of Edom. The verse also, besides this threat, implies a promise of mercy to Esau in God's good time, as there was to Moab and Ammon (v. 6; ch. 48. 47); the extinction of the adult males is the prominent idea (cf. v. 12). 12. (Ch. 25. 15, 16, 29.) they whose judgment was not to drink the cup—the Jews to whom, by virtue of the covenant relation, it did not belong to drink the cup, who, it might have been expected, would be spared. He regards not the merits of the Jews, for they were as bad or worse than others; but the grace and adoption of

God; it is just and natural ("judgment") that God should pardon His sons sooner than allens. [CALVIN.] 13. Bozrah—(Note, ch. 48. 24.) 14. (Obadiah 1-3.) ambassador . . . unto the heathen—a messenger from God to stir up the Chaldeans against Edom. 15. David and Joab had already humbled Edom (2 Samuel 8. 14). 16. terribleness—the terror which thou didst inspire into others. deceived thee—rendered these proudly confident, as if none would dare to assail thee. dwellst in . . . rock—Petra, the chief city of Idumea, was cut in the rocks; its ruins are very remarkable. The wholesouled of Idumea abounds in cave-dwellings and rocks. though . . . nest . . . eagle—(Job 39. 27; Obadiah 3, 4.) The eagle builds its nest in the highest craggy eyry. 17. (Cf. 1 Kings 9. 8.) 18. (Ch. 50. 40; Deuteronomy 29. 23; Amos 4. 11.) no man shall abide there—i. e., of the Idumeans. The Romans had a garrison there. 19. he—Nebuchadnezzar, or Nebuzaradan; the name would at once suggest itself to the minds of the hearers (ch. 48. 40; 46. 18). swelling—as a lion which the overflow of the Jordan forced out of his lair on the banks, to ascend the neighbouring heights. [CALVIN.] See as to the translation, "pride of the Jordan." Note, ch. 12. 5. habitation of . . . strong—the fastnesses of Idumea (cf. Numbers 24. 21). MAURER translates, "An ever-verdant (lit., perennial) pasturage," i. e., Idumea heretofore having enjoyed uninterrupted tranquillity; so in v. 20 the image is retained, the Idumeans being compared to "a flock," and their king to "a shepherd," in this verse, and the enemy to "a lion" (cf. ch. 50. 17-19). English Version accords more with the Hebrew. suddenly—in the twinkling of an eye, as the Hebrew implies. him . . . her—I will make Nebuzaradan enter Idumea, and then, having in the twinkling of an eye effected the conquest, go away speedily elsewhere. Instead of "but," translate, for. GROTIUS translates, "run upon her, or 'to her,'" instead of "run away from her." MAURER understands it, "I will make him (the Idumean) run away from her" (i. e., from his own land); the similar change of reference of the pronouns (ch. 50. 44) favours this. who is a chosen man, &c.—God calls the choicest warriors to him, to set "over" the work of devastating Idumea. God will surely execute His purpose, for He can call forth from all sides what agents He chooses. who is like me?—(Exodus 15. 11.) who will appoint me the time?—viz., for entering into a trial in judgment with me (see Margin). Image from law courts (Job 9. 19). shepherd—leader of the Idumeans; following up the previous image, "a lion:" no Idumean shepherd shall withstand the lion sent by Jehovah (Job 41. 10), or save the Idumean flock. 20. least of the flock—the weakest and humblest of the Chaldean host. Cf. ch. 6. 3, where the hostile leaders and their hosts are called "shepherds and their flocks." draw . . . out—"shall drag them away captive" [GROTIUS]; shall drag them to and fro, as a lion (v. 19) does feeble sheep. [MAURER.] with them—i. e., the habitation which they possess. 21. was heard in—i. e., shall be heard at, Red Sea—a considerable distance from Idumea; though the district at the Elantic bay of the Red Sea originally belonged to Idumea, and the sea itself was called from Edom, i. e., red (Genesis 25. 30, Margin). Others translate, "the weedy sea" (Margin), and derive the name, "Red Sea," from its red weeds; the former view is preferable. 22. (Cf. ch. 48. 40, 41.) Bozrah—(Note, ch. 48. 24.) 23. Prophecy as to Damascus, &c. (Isaiah 17. 1; 10. 9). The kingdom of Damascus was destroyed by Assyria, but the city revived, and it is as to the latter Jeremiah now prophesies. The fulfilment was probably about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (JOSEPHUS, 10. 9, 7). Hamath is confounded—at the tidings of the overthrow of the neighbouring Damascus. on the sea—i. e., at the sea; the dwellers at it are alarmed. Other MSS. read, "like the sea." "There is anxiety (restless) as is the sea: they cannot quiet it," i. e., it cannot be quieted (Isaiah 57. 20). it—whatever dwellers are there "cannot be quiet." 25. city of praise—The prophet, in the person of a citizen of Damascus deploring its calamity, calls it "the city of praise," i. e., celebrated with praises everywhere for its beauty (ch. 33. 9; 51. 41). "How is it possible that such a city has not been left whole—has not been spared by the foe?" Cf. "left," Luke 17. 35, 36. So Israel left standing some of the Canaanite cities (Joshua 11. 13). of my joy—i. e., in which I delighted. 26. Therefore—i. e., Since Damascus is doomed to fall, therefore, &c. 27. palaces of Ben-hadad—that palace whence so many evils and such cruelty to Israel emanated; thus implying the cause of Damascus' overthrow. Not the Ben-hadad of 2 Kings 13. 3; Amos 1. 4; it was a common name of the Syrian kings (cf. 1 Kings 15. 18; meaning son of Hadad the idol). 28. Kedar—son of Ishmael (Genesis 25. 13). The Kedarenes led a wandering predatory life in Arabia Petraea, as the Bedouin Arabs (2 Chronicles 21. 16, 17; Psalm 120. 5). Kedar means blackness (Song of Solomon 1. 5). Hazor—not the city in Palestine, but a district in Arabia Petraea. "Kingdoms" refer to the several combinations of clans, each under its own sheikh. men of the East—Kedar and Hazor were east of Judea (Judges 6. 3; Job 1. 3). 29. tents—in which they dwelt, from which they are called Scenites, i. e., tent-dwellers. curtains—viz., with which the tents were covered (ch. 4. 20; 10. 20; Psalm 104. 2). they shall cry unto them, Fear, &c.—The foe, on crying Fear, &c., shall discomfit them (the Kedarenes) by their mere cry. 30. (Note, v. 8.) No conqueror would venture to follow them into the desert. 31. wealthy—rather, tranquil (1 Chronicles 4. 40). neither gates nor bars—The Arabs, lying out of the track of the contending powers of Asia and Africa, took no measures of defence, and had neither walled cities nor gates (Ezekiel 38. 11). They thought their scanty resources and wilderness position would tempt no foe. alone—separated from other nations, without allies; and from one another scattered asunder. So as to Israel's isolation (Numbers 23. 9; Deuteronomy 33. 2; Micah 7. 14). 32. camels—their chief possessions; not fields or vineyards. in utmost . . . corners—who seemed least likely to be dispersed. Or else, "having the hair shaven (or clipped) in angles" (ch. 9. 26; 25. 23). [GROTIUS.] calamity from all sides—which will force even those in "corners" to "scatter" themselves. 33. (Malachi 1. 3.) 34. Elam—part of Susiana, west of Persia proper, but used to designate Persia in general. Elam proper, or Elymans, nearer Judea than Persia, is probably here meant; it had helped Nebuchadnezzar against Judea; hence its punishment. It may have been idolatrous, whereas Persia proper was monotheistic mainly. 35. bow—Elam was famed for its bowmen (Isaiah 22. 6). chief of their might—in opposition to "bow," i. e., bowmen, who constituted their main strength. 36. four winds, &c.—Nebuchadnezzar's army containing soldiers from the four quarters. 37. consumed—as a distinct nation (Daniel 8. 2-27). Fulfilled under Alexander and his successors. 38. I will show myself King by my judgments there, as though my tribunal were erected there. The throne of Cyrus, God's instrument, set up over Media, of which Elam was a part, may be meant. [GROTIUS.] Or rather, that of Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 43. 10). Then the restoration of Elam (v. 39) will refer partly to that which took place on the reduction of Babylon by Cyrus, prince of Persia and Media. 39. latter days—The full restoration belongs to gospel times. Elamites were among the first who heard and accepted it (Acts 2. 9).

CHAPTER L.

Ver. 1-46. BABYLON'S COMING DOWNFALL; ISRAEL'S REDEMPTION. After the predictions of judgment to be inflicted on other nations by Babylon, follows this one against Babylon itself, the longest prophecy, consisting of 100 verses. The date of its utterance was the fourth year of Zedekiah, when Seraiah, to whom it was committed, was sent to Babylon (ch. 51. 59, 60). The repetitions in it make it likely that it consists of prophecies uttered at different times, now collected by Jeremiah to console the Jews in exile, and to vindicate God's ways by exhibiting the final doom of Babylon, the enemy of the people of God, after her long prosperity. The style, imagery, and dialogues prove its genuineness in opposition to those who deny this. It shows his faithfulness; though under obligation to the king of Babylon, he owed a higher one to God, who directed him to prophesy against Babylon. 1. Cf. Isaiah 45.; 46.; 47. But as the time of fulfillment drew nearer, the prophecies are now proportionally more distinct than then. 2. Declare . . . among . . . nations—who would rejoice at the fall of Babylon their oppressor. standard—to indicate the place of meeting to the nations where they were to hear the good news of Babylon's fall [ROSENMULLER]; or, the signal to summon the nations together against Babylon (ch. 51. 12, 27). [MAURER.] Bel—the tutelary god of Babylon; the same idol as the Phœnician Baal, i. e., lord, the sun (Isaiah 46. 1). confounded—because unable to defend the city under their protection. Merodach—another Babylonian idol; meaning in Syria little lord; from which Merodach-baladan took his name. 3. a nation—the Medes, north of Babylon (ch. 51. 48). The devastation of Babylon here foretold includes not only that by Cyrus, but also that more utter one by Darius, who took Babylon by artifice when it had revolted from Persia, and mercilessly slaughtered the inhabitants, hanging 4000 of the nobles; also the final desertion of Babylon, owing to Seleucia having been built close by under Seleneus Nicanor. 4. Fulfilled only in part when some few of the ten tribes of "Israel" joined Judah in a "covenant" with God, at the restoration of Judah to its land (Nehemiah 9. 38; 10. 29). The full event is yet to come (ch. 31. 9; Hosea 1. 11; Zechariah 12. 10). weeping—with joy at their restoration beyond all hope; and with sorrow at the remembrance of their sins and sufferings (Ezra 3. 12, 13; Psalm 126. 5, 6). seek . . . Lord—(Hosea 3. 5) 5. thitherward—rather, hitherward, Jeremiah's prophetic stand-point being at Zion. "Faces hitherward" implies their steadfastness of purpose not to be turned aside by any difficulties on the way. perpetual covenant—in contrast to the old covenant "which they brake" (ch. 31. 31, &c.; 32. 40). They shall return to their God first, then to their own land. 6. (Isaiah 53. 6) on the mountains—whereon they sacrificed to idols (ch. 2. 20; 3. 6, 23). resting-place—for the "sheep;" continuing the image; Jehovah is the resting-place of His sheep (Matthew 11. 28). They rest in His "bosom" (Isaiah 40. 11). Also His temple at Zion, their "rest," because it is His (Psalm 132. 8, 14). 7. devoured—(Psalm 79. 7.) "Found them" implies that they were exposed to the attacks of those who ever happened to meet them. adversaries said—for instance, Nebuzaradan (ch. 40. 2, 3; cf. Zechariah 11. 5.) The Gentiles acknowledged some supreme divinity. The Jews' gnit was so palpable that they were condemned even in the judgment of heathens. Some knowledge of God's peculiar relation to Judea reached its heathen invaders through the prophets (ch. 2. 3; Daniel 9. 16); hence the strong language they use of Jehovah here, not as worshippers of Him themselves, but as believing Him to be the tutelary God of Judah ("the hope of their fathers," Psalm 22. 4; they do not say our hope), as each country was thought to have its local god, whose power extended no farther. habitation—(Psalm 90. 1; 91. 1). Alluding to the tabernacle, or, as in Ezekiel 34. 14, fold, which carries out the image in v. 6, "resting-place" of the "sheep." But it can only mean habitation (ch. 31. 23), which confirms English Version here. hope of their fathers—This especially condemned the Jews that their apostasy was from that God whose faithfulness their fathers had experienced. At the same time these "adversaries" unconsciously use language which corrects their own notions. The covenant with the Jews' "fathers" is not utterly set aside by their sin, as their adversaries thought; there is still "a habitation" or refuge for them with the God of their fathers. 8. (Ch. 51. 6, 45; Isaiah 48. 20; Zechariah 2. 6, 7; Revelation 18. 4). Immediately avail yourselves of the opportunity of escape. be as . . . he-goats before . . . flocks—let each try to be foremost in returning, animating the weak, as he-goats lead the flock; such were the companions of Ezra (Ezra 1. 5, 6). 9. from thence—i. e., from the north country. expert—lit., prosperous. Besides "might," "expertness" is needed, that an arrow may do execution. The Margin has a different Hebrew reading; destroying, lit., bereaving, childless-making (ch. 15. 7). LXX. and Syriac support English Version. in vain—without killing him at whom it was aimed (2 Samuel 1, 22). 11. (Isalah 47. 6.) grown fat—and so, skip wantonly, at grass—fat and frisky. But there is a disagreement of gender in Hebrew reading thus. The Keri reading is better: "a heifer threshing;" the strongest were used for threshing, and as the law did not allow their mouth to be muzzled in threshing (Deuteronomy 25. 4), they waxed wanton with eating. bellows as bulls—rather, "neigh as steeds," lit., "strong ones," a poetical expression for steeds (Note, ch. 8. 16). [MAURER.] 12. Your mother—Babylon, the metropolis of the empire, hindermost—marvellous change, that Babylon, once the queen of the world, should be now the hindermost of nations, and at last, becoming "a desert," cease to be a nation! 13. (Isalah 13. 20.) 14. Summons to the Median army to attack Babylon. against . . . Lord—by oppressing His people their cause is His cause. Also by profaning His sacred vessels (Daniel 5. 2). 15. Shout—Inspire one another to the onset with the battle-cry. given . . . hand—an idiom for, submitted to the conquerors (1 Chronicles 29, 24, Margin; Lamentations 5. 6), as she hath done, do unto her—just retribution in kind. She had destroyed many, so must she be destroyed (Psalm 137. 8). So as to spiritual Babylon (Revelation 18. 6.) This is right, because "it is the vengeance of the Lord;" but this will not justify private revenge in kind (Matthew 5. 44; Romans 12, 19-21); even the Old Testament law forbade this, though breathing a sterner spirit than the New Testament (Exodus 23. 4, 5; Proverbs 25. 21, 22). 16. Babylon had the extent rather of a nation than of a city. Therefore grain was grown within the city wall sufficient to last for a long siege (ARISTOTLE, Pol. 3. 2; PLINY, 18. 17). Conquerors usually spare agriculturists, but in this case all alike were to be "cut off." for fear of . . . oppressing sword—because of the sword of the oppressor. every one to his people—from which they had been removed to Babylon from all quarters by the Chaldean conquerors (ch. 51. 9; Isalah 13. 14). 17. Hoins—hostile kings (ch. 4. 7; 49. 19). Assyria—(2 Kings 17. 6, Shalmaneser; Ezra 4. 2, Esar-haddon.) Nebuchadnezzar—(2 Kings 24. 10, 14.) 18. punish . . . king of Babylon—Nabonidus, or Labynitus, as . . . punished . . . Assyrian—Sennacherib and other kings [GROTIUS] (2 Kings 19. 37). 19. (Isalah 65. 10; Ezekiel 34. 13, 14.) 20. The specification of "Israel," as well as Judah, shows the reference is to times yet to come. iniquity . . . none—not merely idolatry, which ceased among the Jews ever since the Babylonian captivity, but chiefly their rejection of Messiah. As in a cancelled debt, it shall be as it had never been; God, for Christ's sake, shall treat them as innocent (ch. 31. 34). Without cleansing away of sin, remission of punishment would be neither to the honour of God nor to the highest interests of the elect. whom I reserve—the elect "remnant" (Isalah 1. 9). The "residue" (Zechariah 14. 2; 13. 8. 9). 21. Merathaim—a symbolical name for Babylon, the doubly rebellious, viz., against God. Cf. v. 24, "thou hast striven against the Lord;" and v. 29, "proud against the Lord." The "doubly" refers to, first, the Assyrian's oppression of Israel, next, the kindred Chaldean's oppression of Judah (cf. v. 17-20, 33; especially v. 18). Pekod—(Ezekiel 23. 23); a chief province of Assyria, in which Nineveh, now overthrown, once lay. But, as in Merathaim, the allusion is to the meaning of Pekod, viz., visitation; the inhabitants whose time of deserved visitation in punishment is come; not, however, without reference to the now Babylonian province, Pekod. The visitation on Babylon was a following up of that on Assyria. after them—even their posterity, and all that is still left of Babylon, until the very name is extinct. [GROTIUS.] Devastate the city, after its inhabitants have deserted it. all . . . 1 . . . commanded—by Isalah (Isalah 13. 1, &c.). 23. hammer—i. e., Babylon, so called because of its ponderous destructive power; just as "Martel," i. e., a little hammer, was the surname of a king of the Franks (Isalah 14. 6). 24. I—Thou hast to do with God, not merely with men. taken . . . not aware—HERODOTUS relates that one half of the city was taken before those in the other were "aware" of it. Cyrus turned the waters of

Euphrates where it was defended into a different channel, and so entered the city by the dried-up channel at night, by the upper and lower gates (Daniel 5. 30, 31). 25. weapons of his indignation—the Medes and Persians (Isalah 13. 5). 26. from the utmost border—viz., of the earth. Or, from all sides. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] storehouses—or, "her houses filled with men and goods," [MICHAELIS.] When Cyrus took it, the provisions found there were enough to have lasted for many years. as heaps—make of the once glorious city heaps of ruins. Vast mounds of rubbish now mark the site of ancient Babylon. "Tread her as heaps of corn which are wont to be trodden down in the threshing-floor." [GROTIUS.] 27. bullocks—i. e., princes and strong warriors (ch. 46. 21; Psalm 22. 12; Isalah 34. 7). go down to . . . slaughter—the slaughter-houses lay low beside the river; therefore it is said, "go down;" appropriate to Babylon on the Euphrates, the avenue through which the slaughterers entered the city. 28. declare in Zion . . . temple—Some Jews "fleeing" from Babylon at its fall shall tell in Judea how God avenged the cause of Zion and her temple that had been profaned (ch. 52. 13; Daniel 1. 2; 5. 2). 29. archers—lit., very many and powerful; hence the Hebrew word is used of archers (Job 16. 13) from the multitude and force of their arrows. according to all that she hath done—(Note, v. 15.) proud against the Lord—not merely cruel towards men (Isalah 47. 10). 30. (Note, ch. 49. 26.) in the streets—the Babylonians were so discouraged by having lost some battles, that they retired within their walls and would not again meet Cyrus in the field. 31. most proud—lit., pride, i. e., man of pride; the king of Babylon. visit—punish (v. 27). 33. Israel and . . . Judah were oppressed—He anticipates an objection, in order to answer it: Ye have been, no doubt, "oppressed," therefore ye despair of deliverance; but, remember your "Redeemer is strong," and therefore can and will deliver you. 34. strong—as opposed to the power of Israel's oppressor (Revelation 18. 8). plead . . . cause—as their advocate. Image from a court of justice; appropriate as God delivers His people not by mere might, but by righteousness. His plea against Satan and all their enemies is his own everlasting love, reconciling mercy and justice in the Redeemer's work and person (Micah 7. 9; Zechariah 3. 1-5; 1 John 2. 1). give rest . . . disquiet—There is a play on the similarity of sounds in the two Hebrew verbs, to express more vividly the contrast: "that He may give quiet to the land of Judah (heretofore disquieted by Babylon); but disquiet to the inhabitants of Babylon (heretofore quietly secure)" (Isalah 14. 6-8). 35-37. The repetition of "A sword" in the beginning of each verse, by the figure anaphora, heightens the effect; the reiterated judgment is universal; the same sad stroke of the sword is upon each and all connected with guilty Babylon. wise men—(Isalah 47. 13.) Babylon boasted that it was the peculiar seat of wisdom and wise men, especially in astronomy and astrology. 36. liars—those whom he before termed "wise men," he here calls "liars" (impostors), viz., the astrologers (cf. Isalah 44. 25; Romans 1. 21-25; 1 Corinthians 1. 20). 37. as women—divested of all manliness (Nahum 3. 13). 38. drought—Altering the pointing, this verse will begin as the three previous verses, "A sword." However, all the pointed MSS. read, "A drought," as English Version. Cyrus turned off the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and so marched through the dried-up bed into the city (ch. 51. 32). Babylonia once was famed for its corn, which often yielded from one to two hundred-fold. [HERODOTUS.] This was due to its network of water-courses from the Euphrates for irrigation, traces of which [LAYARD] are seen still on all sides, but dry and barren (Isalah 44. 27). their idols—lit., terrors. They are mad after idols that are more calculated to frighten than to attract (ch. 51. 44, 47, 52; Daniel 3. 1). Mere bugbears to frighten children with. 39. wild beasts of the desert—wild cats, remarkable for their howl. [BOCHART.] wild beasts of the islands—jackals (note, Isalah 13. 21). owls—rather, female ostriches; they delight in solitary places. Lit., daughters of crying. Cf. as to spiritual Babylon, Revelation 18. 2. no more inhabited for ever—the accumulation of phrases is to express the final and utter extinction of Babylon; fulfilled not immediately, but by degrees; Cyrus took away its supremacy. Darius Hystaspes deprived it, when it had rebelled, of its fortifications. Seleucus Nicanor removed its citizens and wealth to Seleucia, which he founded in the neighbourhood; and the Parthians removed all that was left to Ctesiphon. Nothing but its walls was left under the Roman emperor Adrian. 40. (Isaiah 13. 19.) Repeated from ch. 49. 18. 41-43. (Cf. ch. 6. 22-24.) The very language used to describe the calamities which Babylon inflicted on Zion is that here employed to describe Babylon's own calamity inflicted by the Medes. Retribution in kind. kings—the allies and satraps of the various provinces of the Medo-Persian empire; Armenia, Hyrcania, Lydia, &c. coasts—the remote parts. 42. cruel—the character of the Persians, and even of Cyrus, notwithstanding his wish to be thought magnanimous (Isaiah 13. 18). like a man—so orderly and united is their "array," that the whole army moves to battle as one man. [GROTIUS.] 43. hands waxed feeble—attempted no resistance; immediately was overcome, as HERODOTUS tells us. 44-46. Repeated mainly from ch. 49. 19-21. The identity of God's principle in His dealing with Edom, and in that with Babylon, is implied by the similarity of language as to both. 46. cry . . . among the nations—In Edom's case it is, "at the cry the noise thereof was heard in the Red Sea." The change implies the wider extent to which the crash of Babylon's downfall shall be heard.

CHAPTER LI.

VER. 1-61. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECY AGAINST BABYLON BEGUN IN CHAP. 50. 1. in the midst of them that rise . . . against me—lit., in the heart of them, &c. Cf. Psalm 36. 2, "the midst of the sea," Margin, "the heart of the seas;" Ezekiel 27. 4, Margin; Matthew 12. 40. In the centre of the Chaldeans. "Against me," because they persecute my people. The cabalistic mode of interpreting Hebrew words (by taking the letters in the inverse order of the alphabet, the last letter representing the first, and so on, ch. 25. 26) would give the very word Chaldeans here; but the mystical method cannot be intended, as "Babylon" is plainly so called in the immediately preceding parallel clause. wind—God needs not warlike weapons to "destroy" His foes; a wind or blast is sufficient; though, no doubt, the "wind" here is the invading host of Medes and Persians (ch. 4. 11; 2 Kings 19. 7). 2. fanners—(Note, ch. 15. 7.) The fanners separate the wheat from the chaff; so God's judgments shall sweep away guilty Babylon as chaff (Psalm 1. 4). 3. Against him that bendeth—viz., the bow, i. e., the Babylonian archer. let the archer bend—i. e., the Persian archer (ch. 50. 4). The Chaldean version and JEROME, by changing the vowel points, read, "Let not him (the Babylonian) who bendeth his bow bend it." But the close of the verse is addressed to the Median invaders, therefore it is more likely that the first part of the verse is addressed to them, as in English Version, not to the Babylonians, to warn them against resistance as vain, as in the Chaldean version. The word bend is thrice repeated: "Against him that bendeth let him that bendeth bend," to imply the utmost straining of the bow. 4. (Notes, ch. 49. 26; 50. 30, 37.) 5. forsaken—As a widow (Hebrew). Israel is not severed from her husband, Jehovah (Isaiah 54. 5-7), by a perpetual divorce. though . . . sin—though the land of Israel has been filled with sin, i. e., with the punishment of their sin, devastation. But, as the Hebrew means for, or and therefore, not though, translate, "and therefore their (the Chaldeans') land has been filled with (the penal consequences of) their sin." [GROTIUS.] 6. Warning to the Israelite captives to flee from Babylon, lest they should be involved in the punishment of her "Iniquity." So as to spiritual Babylon and her captives (Revelation 18. 4). 7. Babylon is compared to a cup, because she was the vessel in the hand of God, to make drunken with His vengeance the other peoples (ch. 13. 12; 25. 15, 16). Cf. as to spiritual Babylon, Revelation 14. 8; 17. 4. The cup is termed "golden," to express the splendour and opulence of Babylon; whence also in the image seen by Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel 2. 38) the head representing Babylon is of gold (cf. Isaiah 14. 4). 8, 9. Her friends and confederates, who behold her fall, are invited to her aid. They reply, her case is incurable, and that they must leave her to her fate. 8. (Isaiah 21. 9; Revelation 14. 8; 18. 2, 9.) balm—(Ch. 8. 22; 46. 11.) 9. We would have healed—We attempted to heal. her judgments—her crimes provoking God's "judgments." [GROTIUS.] reacheth unto heaven—(Genesis 18. 21; Jonah 1. 2; Revelation 18. 5.) Even the heathen nations perceive that her awful fall must be God's judgment for her crying sins (Psalm 9. 16; 64. 9). 10. Next after the speech of the confederates of Babylon, comes that of the Jews celebrating with thanksgivings the promise-keeping faithfulness of their covenant God. brought forth, &c.—(Psalm 37. 6.) our righteousness—not the Jews' merits, but God's faithfulness to Himself and to His covenant, which constituted the "righteousness" of His people, i. e., their justification in their controversy with Babylon, the cruel enemy of God and His people. Cf. ch. 23. 6, "The Lord our righteousness;" Micah 7. 9. Their righteousness is His righteousness. declare in Zion—(Psalm 102. 13-21.) 11. Make bright—lit., pure. Polish and sharpen. gather—lit., fill: i. e., gather in full number, so that none be wanting. So, "gave in full tale" (1 Samuel 18. 27). GÆSENIUS, not so well, translates, "Fill with your bodies the shields" (cf. Song of Solomon 4. 4). He means to tell the Babylonians, Make what preparations you will, all will be in vain (cf. ch. 46. 3-6). kings of . . . Medes—He names the Medes rather than the Persians, because Darius, or Cyaxares, was above Cyrus in power and the greatness of his kingdom. temple—(Ch. 50. 28.) 12. With all your efforts, your city shall be taken. standard—to summon the defenders together to any point threatened by the besiegers. 13. waters—(V. 32, 36; Note, Isaiah 21. 1.) The Euphrates surrounded the city, and being divided into many channels formed islands. Cf. as to spiritual Babylon "waters," i. e., "many peoples," Revelation 17. 1, 15. A large lake also was near Babylon. measure—lit., cubit, which was the most common measure, and therefore is used for a measure in general. The time for putting a limit to thy covetousness. [GÆSENIUS.] There is no "and" in the Hebrew: translate, "thine end, the retribution for thy covetousness." [GROTIUS.] MAURER takes the image to be from weaving: "the cubit where thou art to be cut off;" for the web is cut off, when the required number of cubits is completed (Isaiah 38. 12). 14. by himself—lit., by His soul (2 Samuel 15. 21; Hebrews 6. 13). fill . . . with caterpillars—locusts (Nahum 3. 15). Numerous as are the citizens of Babylon, the invaders shall be more numerous. 15-19. Repeated from ch. 10. 12-16; except that "Israel" is not in the Hebrew of v. 19, which ought, therefore, to be translated, "He is the Former of all things, and (therefore) of the rod of His inheritance" (i. e., of the nation peculiarly his own). In ch. 10. the contrast is between the idols and God; here it is between the power of populous Babylon and that of God: "Thou dwellest upon many waters" (v. 13); but God can, by merely "uttering His voice," create "many waters" (v. 16). The "earth" (in its material aspect) is the result of His "power;" the "world" (viewed in its orderly system) is the result of His "wisdom," &c. (v. 15). Such an Almighty Being can be at no loss for resources to effect His purpose against Babylon. 20. (Note, ch. 50. 23.) "Break in pieces" refers to the "hammer" there (cf. Nahum 2. 1, Margin). The club also was often used by ancient warriors. 22. old and young—(2 Chronicles 36. 17.) 24. The detail of particulars (v. 20-23) is in order to express the indiscriminate slaughters perpetrated by Babylon on Zion, which, in just retribution, are all to befall herself (ch. 50. 15, 20). in your sight—addressed to the Jews. 25. destroying mountain—called so, not from its position, for it lay low (v. 13; Genesis 11. 2, 9), but from its eminence above other nations, many of which it had "destroyed;" also, because of its lofty pinnacles, towers, hanging gardens resting on arches, and walls, fifty royal cubits broad and two hundred high. roll thee down from the rocks—i. e., from thy rock-like fortifications and walls. burnt mountain—(Revelation 8. 8.) A volcano, which, after having spent itself in pouring its "destroying" lava on all the country around, falls into the vacuum, and becomes extinct, the surrounding "rocks" alone marking where the crater had been. Such was the appearance of Babylon after its destruction, and as the pumice stones of the volcano are left in their place, being unfit for building, so Babylon should never rise from its ruins. 26. corner . . . stone . . . foundations—The corner-stone was the most important one in the building, the foundation-stones came next in importance (Ephesians 2. 20). So the sense is, even as there shall be no stones useful for building left of thee, so no leading prince, or governors, shall come forth from thy inhabitants. 27. (Ch. 50. 29.) As in v. 12 the Babylonians were told to "set up the standard," so here her foes are told to do so: the latter, to good purpose; the former, in vain. Ararat—Upper or Major Armenia, the regions about Mount Ararat. Minni—Lower or Lesser Armenia. RAWLINSON says that Van was the capital of Minni. It was conquered by Tetrassas, the general of Tembar II., the Assyrian king whose wars are recorded on the black obelisk now in the British Museum. Aschenaz—a descendant of Japhet (Genesis 10. 3), who gave his name to the sea now called the Black Sea; the region bordering on it is probably here meant, viz., Asia Minor, including places named Ascania in Phrygia and Bithynia. Cyrus had subdued Asia Minor and the neighbouring regions, and from these drew levies in proceeding against Babylon. rough caterpillars—the horsemen in multitude, and in appearance bristling with javelins and with crests, resemble "rough caterpillars," or locusts of the hairy-crested kind (Nahum 3. 15). 28. kings of . . . Medes—(v. 11.) The satraps and tributary kings under Darius, or Cyaxares. his dominion—the king of Media's dominion. 29. land shall tremble . . . every purpose of . . . Lord shall be performed—elegant antithesis between the trembling of the land or earth, and the stability of "every purpose of the Lord" (cf. Psalm 46. 1-3). 30. forborne to fight—for the city was not taken by force of arms, but by stratagem, according to the counsel given to Cyrus by two eunuchs of Belshazzar who deserted. remained in . . . holds—not daring to go forth to fight; many, with Nabonidus, withdrew to the fortified city Borsippa. 31. (Note, ch. 50. 24.) One post—One courier after another shall announce the capture of the city. The couriers despatched from the walls, where Cyrus enters, shall "meet" those sent by the king. Their confused running to and fro would result from the sudden panic at the entrance of Cyrus into the city, which he had so long besieged ineffectually; the Babylonians had laughed at his attempts, and were feasting at the time without fear. taken at one end—which was not known for a long time to the king and his courtiers feasting in the middle of the city; so great was its extent that, when the city was already three days in the enemy's hands, the fact was not known in some parts of the city. [ARISTOTLE, Pol. 3. 2.] 32. passages are stopped—the guarded fords of the Euphrates are occupied by the enemy (Note, ch. 50. 38). reeds . . . burned—lit., the marsh. After draining off the river, Cyrus "burned" the stockade of dense tree-like "reeds" on its banks, forming the outworks of the city's fortifications. The burning of these would give the appearance of the marsh or river itself being on "fire." 33. like a threshing-floor, it is time to thresh her—rather, "like a threshing-floor at the time of threshing," or "at the time when it is trodden." The treading, or threshing, is here put before the harvest, out of the natural order, because the prominent thought is the treading down or destruction of Babylon. In the East the treading out of the corn took place only at harvest-time. Babylon is like a threshing-floor not trodden for a long time; but the time of harvest, when her citizens shall be trodden under foot, shall come. [CALVIN.] "Like a threshing-floor full of corn, so is Babylon now full of riches, but the time of harvest shall come, when all her prosperity shall be cut off." [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] GROTIUS distinguishes the "harvest" from the "threshing;" the former is the slaying of her citizens, the latter the pillaging and destruction of the city (cf. Joel 3. 13; Revelation

14. 15, 18). 34. me—Zion speaks. Her groans are what bring down retribution in kind on Babylon (ch. 50. 17; Psalm 102. 13, 17, 20). empty vessel—he has drained me out. dragon—the serpent often "swallows" its prey whole. Or a sea monster. [GROTIUS.] filled his belly . . . cast me out—like a beast, which, having "filled" himself to satiety, "casts out" the rest. [CALVIN.] After filling all his storehouses with my goods, he has cast me out of this land. [GROTIUS.] 35. my flesh—which Nebuchadnezzar hath "devoured" (v. 34). Zion thus calls her kinsmen (Romans 11. 14) slain throughout the country or carried captives to Babylon. [GROTIUS.] Or, as "my blood" follows, it and "my flesh" constitute the whole man: Zion, in its totality, its citizens, and all its substance, have been a prey to Babylon's violence (Psalm 137. 8). 36. plead . . . cause—(Ch. 50. 34.) sea—the Euphrates (v. 13; ch. 50. 38). Cf. Isaiah 19. 5, "sea," i. e., the Nile (Isaiah 21. 1). 37. (Ch. 50. 26, 39; Revelation 18. 2). 38, 39. The capture of Babylon was effected on the night of a festival in honour of its idols. roar . . . yell—the Babylonians were shouting in drunken revelry (cf. Daniel 5. 4). 39. In their heat I will make their feasts—In the midst of their being heated with wine I will give them "their" potions,—a very different cup to drink, but one which is their due, the wine-cup of my stupefying wrath (cf. 25. 15; 49. 12; Isaiah 51. 17; Lamentations 4. 21). rejoice, and sleep . . . perpetual, &c.—that they may exult, and in the midst of their jubilant exultation sleep the sleep of death (v. 57; Isaiah 21. 4. 5). 41. Sheshach—Babylon (cf. Note, ch. 25. 26). Called so from the goddess Shach, to whom a five days' festival was kept, during which, as in the Roman Saturnalia, the most unbridled licentiousness was permitted; slaves ruled their masters, and in every house one called Zogan, arrayed in a royal garment, was chosen to rule all the rest. He calls Babylon "Sheshach," to imply that it was during this feast the city was taken. [SCALIGER.] 42. The sea—The host of Median invaders. The image (cf. ch. 47. 2; Isaiah 8. 7, 8) is appropriately taken from the Euphrates, which, overflowing in spring, is like a "sea" near Babylon (v. 13, 32, 36). 43. Her cities—The cities, her dependencies. So, "Jerusalem and the cities thereof" (ch. 34. 1). Or, the "cities" are the inner and outer cities, the two parts into which Babylon was divided by the Euphrates. [GROTIUS.] 44. Bel . . . swallowed—in allusion to the many sacrifices to the idol which its priests pretended it swallowed at night; or rather, the precious gifts taken from other nations and offered to it (which it is said to have "swallowed;" cf. "devoured," "swallowed," v. 34; ch. 50. 17), which it should have to disgorge (cf. v. 13; ch. 50. 37). Of these gifts were the vessels of Jehovah's temple in Jerusalem (2 Chronicles 36. 7; Daniel 1. 2). The restoration of these, as foretold here, is recorded, Ezra 1. 7-11. flow—as a river; fitly depicting the influx of pilgrims of all "nations" to the idol. 45, 46. (Note, v. 6.) 46. And lest—Cf., for the same ellipsis, Genesis 3. 22; Exodus 13. 17; Deuteronomy 8. 12. "And in order that your heart may not faint at the (first) rumour" (of war), I will give you some intimation of the time. In the first "year" there shall "come a rumour" that Cyrus is preparing for war against Babylon. "After that, in another year, shall come a rumour," viz., that Cyrus is approaching, and has already entered Assyria. Then is your time to "go out" (v. 45). Babylon was taken the following or third year of Belshazzar's reign. [GROTIUS.] violence in the land—of Babylon (Psalm 7. 16). ruler against ruler—or, "ruler upon ruler," a continual change of rulers in a short space. Belshazzar and Nabonidus, supplanted by Darius or Cyaxares, who is succeeded by Cyrus. 47. GROTIUS translates, "Because then (viz., on the third year) the time shall have come, that," &c. confounded—at seeing their gods powerless to help them. her slain—in retribution* for "Israel's slain" (v. 49) who fell by her hand. GROTIUS translates, "her dancers," as in Judges 21. 21, 23; 1 Samuel 18. 6, the same Hebrew word is translated, alluding to the dancing revelry of the festival during which Cyrus took Babylon. 48. heaven . . . earth . . . sing for Babylon—(Isaiah 14. 7-13; 44. 23; Revelation 18. 20.) 49. caused . . . to fall—lit., has been for the falling, i. e., as Babylon made this its one aim to fill all places with the slain of Israel, so at Babylon shall all the slain of that whole land (not as English Version, "of all the earth"). [MAURER.] HENDERSON translates, "Babylon also shall fall, ye slain of Israel. Those also of Babylon shall fall, O ye slain of all the earth." But, "in the midst of her," v. 47, plainly answers to "at Babylon," v. 49, English Version. 50. escaped . . . sword—viz., of the Medes. So great will be the slaughter that even some of God's people shall be involved in it, as they had deserved. afar off—though ye are banished far off from where ye used formerly to worship God. let Jerusalem come into your mind—whilst in exile remember your temple and city, so as to prefer them to all the rest of the world wherever ye may be (Isalah 62, 6). 51. The prophet anticipates the Jews' reply; I know you will say in despair, "We are confounded," &c. "Wherefore (God saith to you) behold, I will," &c. (v. 52). [CALVIN.] I prefer taking v. 51 as the prayer which the Jews are directed to offer in exile (v. 50), "let Jerusalem come into your mind" (and say in prayer to God), "We are confounded." This view is confirmed by Psalm 44, 15, 16; 79, 4; 102, 17-20; Isalah 62, 6, 7. for strangers—the "reproach," which especially has stung us, is when they taunted us with the fact that they had burned the temple, our peculiar glory, as though our religion was a thing of naught. 52. Wherefore—Because of these signs of the Jews directed to God (v. 21). I . . . judgment upon . . . images—in opposition to the Babylonian taunt that Jehovah's religion was a thing of naught, since they had burned His temple (v. 51); I will show that, though I have thus visited the Jews' neglect of me, yet those gods of Babylon cannot save themselves, much less their votaries, who shall "through all her land" lie and "groan" with wounds. 53. Cf. Obadiah 4 as to Edom (Amos 9, 2). Though . . . yet from me—We are not to measure God's power by what seems to our perceptions natural or probable. 55. great voice—where once was the great din of a mighty city, there shall be the silence of death. [VATABLUS.] Or the "great voice" of the revellers (v. 33, 39; Isalah 22, 2). Or the voice of mighty boasting [CALVIN] (cf. v. 53). her waves—"when" her calamities shall cause her to give forth a widely different "voice," even such a one as the waves give that lash the shores (v. 42). [GROTIUS.] Or "when" is connected thus: "the great voice" in her, when her "waves," &c. (cf. v. 13). CALVIN translates, "their waves," i. e., the Medes bursting on her as impetuous waves; so v. 42. But the parallel, "a great voice," belongs to her, therefore the "wave"-like "roar" of "their voice" ought also belong to her (cf. v. 54). The "great voice" of commercial din, boasting and feasting, is "destroyed;" but in its stead there is the wave-like roar of her voice in her "destruction" (v. 54). 56. taken—when they were least expecting it, and in such a way that resistance was impossible. 57. (Ver. 39; Daniel 5, 1, &c.) 58. broad walls—eighty-seven feet broad [ROSENMULLER]; fifty cubits [GROTIUS]. A chariot of four horses abreast could meet another on it without collision. The walls were two hundred cubits high, and four hundred and eighty-five stadia, or sixty miles in extent. gates—one hundred in number, of brass; twenty-five on each of the four sides, the city being square; between the gates were two hundred and fifty towers. BEROSUS says triple walls encompassed the outer, and the same number the inner city. Cyrus caused the outer walls to be demolished. Taking the extent of the walls to be three hundred and sixty-five stadia, as DIODORUS states, it is said two hundred thousand men completed a stadium each day, so that the whole was completed in one year. labour . . . in the fire—The event will show that the builders of the walls have "laboured" only for the "fire" in which they shall be consumed. "In the fire" answers to the parallel, "burned with fire." Translate, "shall have laboured in vain," &c. Cf. Job 3, 14, "built desolate places for themselves," i. e., grand places, soon about to be desolate ruins. Jeremiah has in view here Habakkuk 2, 13. 59-61. A special copy of the prophecy prepared by Jeremiah was delivered to Seraiah, to console the Jews in their Babylonian exile. Though he was to throw it into the Euphrates, a symbol of Babylon's fate, no doubt he retained the substance in memory, so as to be able orally to communicate it to his countrymen. went with Zedekiah—Rather, "in behalf of Zedekiah;" sent by Zedekiah to appease Nebuchadnezzar's anger at his revolt. [CALVIN.] fourth year—so that Jeremiah's prediction of Babylon's downfall was thus solemnly written, and sealed by a symbolical action, six whole years before the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. quiet prince—Cf. 1 Chronicles 22, 9, "a man of rest." Seraiah was not one of the courtiers hostile to God's prophets, but "quiet" and docile; ready to execute Jeremiah's commission, notwithstanding the risk attending it. GLASSIUS translates, "prince of Menuchah" (cf. 1 Chronicles 2, 52, Margin). MAURER translates, "commander of the caravan," on whom it devolved to appoint the resting-place for the night. English Version suits the context best. 61. read—not in public, for the Chaldeans would not have understood Hebrew; but in private, as is to be inferred from his addressing himself altogether to God (v. 62). [CALVIN.] 62. O Lord, thou—and not merely Jeremiah or any man is the author of this prophecy; I therefore here in thy presence embrace as true all that I read. 63. blind a stone, &c.—(Revelation 18, 21.) So the Phœceans in leaving their country, when about to found Marseilles, threw lead into the sea, binding themselves not to return till the lead should swim. 64. they shall be weary—the Babylonians shall be worn out, so as not to be able to recover their strength. Thus far . . . Jeremiah—Hence it is to be inferred that the last chapter is not included in Jeremiah's writings, but was added by some inspired man, mainly from 2 Kings 24, 18 to ch. 25., to explain and confirm what precedes. [CALVIN.]

CHAPTER LII.

Ver. 1-34. WRITTEN BY SOME OTHER THAN JEREMIAH (PROBABLY EZRA) AS AN HISTORICAL SUPPLEMENT TO THE PREVIOUS PROPHECIES (Note, ch. 51, 64). Jeremiah, having already (chs. 39, 40.) given the history in the proper place, was not likely to repeat it here. Its canonical authority as inspired is shown by its being in the LXX. version. It contains the capture and burning of Jerusalem, &c., Zedekiah's punishment, and the better treatment of Jehoiachin under Evil-merodach, down to his death. These last events were probably subsequent to Jeremiah's time. 3. through . . . anger of . . . Lord . . . Zedekiah rebelled—His "anger" against Jerusalem, determining Him to "cast out" His people "from His presence" heretofore manifested there, led Him to permit Zedekiah to rebel (2 Kings 23, 26, 27; cf. Exodus 9, 12; 10, 1; Romans 9, 18). That rebellion, being in violation of his oath "by God," was sure to bring down God's vengeance (2 Chronicles 36, 13; Ezekiel 17, 15, 16, 18). 4. forts—Rather, towers of wood [KIMCHI], for watching the movements of the besieged from the height, and annoying them with missiles. 7. (Note, ch. 39, 4.) 9. gave judgment upon him—as guilty of rebellion and perjury (v. 3; cf. Ezekiel 23, 24). 11. Ezekiel 12, 13: "I will bring him to Babylon, yet shall he not see it," prison—lit., the house of visitations, or punishments, i. e., where there was penal work enforced on the prisoners, as grinding. Hence LXX. render it "the house of the mill." So Samson, after his eyes were put out, "ground" in the Philistine prison-house (Judges 16, 21). 12. tenth day—but in 2 Kings 25, 8, it is said "the seventh day." Nebuzaradan started from Riblah on the "seventh" day, and arrived in Jerusalem on the "tenth" day. Seeming discrepancies, when cleared up, confirm the genuineness of Scripture; for they show there was no collusion between the writers; as in all God's works there is latent harmony under outward varieties. 13. all the houses . . . and all the houses of the great—the "and" defines what houses especially are meant, viz., the houses of the great men. 15. poor of . . . people—added to the account in 2 Kings 25, 11. "The poor of the people" are of the city, as distinguished from "the poor of the land," i. e., of the country. 17. brake—that they might be more portable. Fulfilling the prophesy (ch. 27. 19). See 1 Kings 7. 15, 23, 27, 50. Nothing is so particularly related here as the carrying away of the articles in the temple. The remembrance of their beauty and preciousness heightens the bitterness of their loss, and the evil of sin which caused it, brass . . . brazen—rather copper . . . of copper. 18. (Exodus 27. 3.) 19. of gold in gold—implying that the articles were of solid gold and silver respectively, not of a different metal inside, or alloyed. [GROTIUS.] Whole: not breaking them as was done to the brass (v. 17). 20. bulls . . . under the bases—but the bulls were not “under the bases,” but under the sea (1 Kings 7. 25, 27, 38); the ten bases were not under the sea, but under the ten lavers. In English Version, “bases,” therefore, must mean the lower parts of the sea under which the bulls were. Rather, translate, “the bulls were in the place of (i. e., by way of; so the Hebrew, 1 Samuel 14. 9), bases,” or supports to the sea. [BUXTORFF.] So LXX. 2 Kings 25. 16 omits the “bulls,” and has “and the bases;” so GROTIUS here reads “the bulls (which were) under (the sea) and the bases.” 21. eighteen cubits—but in 2 Chronicles 3. 15, it is “thirty-five cubits.” The discrepancy is thus removed. Each pillar was eighteen common cubits. The two together, deducting the base, were thirty-five, as stated in 2 Chronicles 3. 15. [GROTIUS.] Other ways, e. g., by reference to the difference between the common and the sacred cubit, are proposed: though we are not able positively to decide now which is the true way, at least those proposed to show that the discrepancies are not irreconcilable. 22. five cubits—so 1 Kings 7. 16. But 2 Kings 25. 17 has “three cubits.” There were two parts in the chapter: the one lower and plain, of two cubits; the other, higher and curiously carved, of three cubits. The former is omitted in 2 Kings 25. 17, as belonging to the shaft of the pillar; the latter alone is there mentioned. Here the whole chapter of five cubits is referred to. 23. on a side—lit. (on the side), towards the air or wind, i. e., the outside of the capitals of the pillars conspicuous to the eye, opposed to the four remaining pomegranates which were not seen from the outside. The pomegranates here are ninety-six; but in 1 Kings 7. 20 they are 200 on each chapter, and 400 on the two (2 Chronicles 4. 13). It seems there were two rows of them, one above the other, and in each row 100. They are here said to be ninety-six, but presently after 100, and so in 1 Kings 7. 20. Four seem to have been unseen to one looking from one point; and the ninety-six are only those that could be seen [VATABLUS]; or, the four omitted here are those separating the four sides, one pomegranate at each point of separation (or at the four corners) between the four sides. [GROTIUS.] 24. Seraiah—different from the Seraiah (ch. 51. 59), son of Neriah. Probably son of Azariah (1 Chronicles 6. 14). Zephaniah—son of Maaseiah (Notes, ch. 21. 1; 29. 25). 25. seven men—but in 2 Kings 25. 19 it is “five.” Perhaps two were less illustrious persons and are therefore omitted. principal scribe of the host—(Isaiah 33. 18.) His office was to preside over the levy and enroll recruits. RAWLINSON observes, the Assyrian records are free from the exaggerated expressions found in the Egyptian. A minute account was taken of the spoil. Two “scribes of the host” are seen in every bas-relief, writing down the various objects brought to them: the heads of the slain, the prisoners, cattle, sheep, &c. 28. seventh year—in 2 Kings 24. 12, 14, 16, it is said “the eighth year” of Nebuchadnezzar. No doubt it was in part about the end of the seventh year, in part about the beginning of the eighth. Also in 2 Kings 24. 10,000 (v. 14), and 7000 men of might, and 1000 craftsmen (v. 16), are said to have been carried away. But here 3023. Probably the latter 3023 were of the tribe of Judah, the remaining 7000 out of the 10,000 were of the other tribes, out of which many Israelites still had been left in the land. The 1000 “craftsmen” were exclusive of the 10,000, as appears, by comparing 2 Kings 24. 14 with v. 16. Probably the 3023 of Judah were first removed in the end of “the seventh year,” the 7000 and 1000 craftsmen in the “eighth year.” This was at the first captivity under Jehoiachin. 29. eighteenth year—when Jerusalem was taken. But in v. 15, and 2 Kings 25. 8, “the nineteenth year.” Probably it was in the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth. [LYRA.] eight hundred and thirty and two—the most illustrious persons are meant, who no doubt were carried away first, in the end of the eighteenth year. 30. Not recorded in Kings or Chronicles. Probably it took place during the commotions that followed the death of Gedaliah (ch. 41. 18; 2 Kings 25. 26). four thousand and six hundred—The exact sum-total of the numbers specified here, viz., 3023, 832, 745, not including the general multitude, and the women and children (v. 15; ch. 39. 9; 2 Kings 25. 11). 31. (2 Kings 25. 27–30.) five and twentieth day—but in 2 Kings 25. 27, it is “the twenty-seventh day.” Probably on the twenty-fifth the decree for his elevation was given, and the preparations for it made by releasing him from prison; and on the twenty-seventh day it was carried into effect. Evil-merodach—son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar [LYRA]; and the Hebrew writers say, that during Nebuchadnezzar’s exclusion from men among beasts Evil-merodach administered the government, and that when Nebuchadnezzar at the end of seven years was restored, hearing of his son’s misconduct, and that he had exulted in his father’s calamity, he threw him into prison, where the latter met Jeconiah and contracted a friendship with him, whence arose the favour which subsequently he showed him. God, in his elevation, rewarded his having surrendered to Nebuchadnezzar (cf. ch. 38. 17 with 2 Kings 24. 12). lifted up . . . head—(Cf. Genesis 40. 13, 20; Psalm 3. 3; 27. 6.) 32. set his throne above—a mark of respect. the kings—the Hebrew text reads (the other) “kings.” “The kings” is a Masoretic correction. 33. changed . . . garments—gave him garments suitable to a king. did . . . eat bread before him—(2 Samuel 9. 13.) 34. every day a portion—rather, “its portion,” Margin (cf. Margin, 1 Kings 8. 59).

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

In the Hebrew Bible these Elegies of Jeremiah, five in number, are placed among the Chetuvim, or Holy Writings (“the Psalms,” &c., Luke 24. 44), between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. But though in classification of compositions it belongs to the Chetuvim, it probably followed the prophecies of Jeremiah originally. For thus alone can we account for the prophetic books being enumerated by JOSEPHUS (c. Apion) as thirteen: he must have reckoned Jeremiah and Lamentations as one book, as also Judges and Ruth, the two books of Samuel, &c., Ezra and Nehemiah. The Lamentations naturally follow the book which sets forth the circumstances forming the subject of the Elegies. Similar lamentations occur 2 Samuel 1. 19, &c.; 3. 33. The Jews read it in their synagogues on the ninth of the month Ab, which is a fast for the destruction of their holy city. As in 2 Chronicles 35. 25, “lamentations” are said to have been “written” by Jeremiah on the death of Josiah, besides it having been made “an ordinance in Israel” that “singing women" should "speak" of that king in lamentations; JOSEPHUS (Antiquities 1. 6), JEROME, &c., thought that they are contained in the present collection. But plainly the subject here is the overthrow of the Jewish city and people, as the LXX. expressly state in an introductory verse to their version. The probability is that there is embodied in these Lamentations much of the language of his original Elegy on Josiah, as 2 Chronicles 35, 25 states; but it is now applied to the more universal calamity of the whole state, of which Josiah's sad death was the forerunner. Thus ch. 4. 20, originally applied to Josiah, was "written," in its subsequent reference, not so much of him, as of the throne of Judah in general, the last representative of which, Zedekiah, had just been carried away. The language, which is true of good Josiah, is too strong in favour of Zedekiah, except when viewed as representative of the crown in general. It was natural to embody the language of the Elegy on Josiah in the more general lamentations, as his death was the presage of the last disaster that overthrew the throne and state.

The title more frequently given by the Jews to these Elegies is, "How" (Hebrew, Eechah), from the first word, as the Pentateuch is similarly called by the first Hebrew word of Genesis 1. The LXX. call it "Lamentations," from whom we derive the name. It refers not merely to the events which occurred at the capture of the city, but to the sufferings of the citizens (the penalty of national sin) from the very beginning of the siege; and perhaps from before it, under Manasseh and Josiah (2 Chronicles 33. 11; 35. 20-25); under Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah (2 Chronicles 36. 3, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, &c.). LOWTH says, "Every letter is written with a tear, every word the sound of a broken heart." The style is midway between the simple elevation of prophetic writing and the loftier rhythm of Moses, David, and Habakkuk. Terse conciseness marks the Hebrew original, notwithstanding Jeremiah's diffuseness in his other writings. The Elegies are grouped in stanzas as they arose in his mind, without any artificial system of arrangement as to the thoughts. The five Elegies are acrostic: each is divided into twenty-two stanzas or verses. In the first three Elegies the stanzas consist of triplets of lines (excepting Elegy 1. 7, and 2. 19, which contain each four lines) each beginning with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order (twenty-two in number). In three instances (Elegy 2. 16, 17; 3. 46-51; 4. 16, 17) two letters are transposed. In the third Elegy, each line of the three forming every stanza begins with the same letter. The stanzas in the fourth and fifth Elegies consist of two lines each. The fifth Elegy, though having twenty-two stanzas (the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet), just as the four first, yet is not alphabetical; and its lines are shorter than those of the others, which are longer than are found in other Hebrew poems, and contain twelve syllables, marked by a cæsura about the middle, dividing them into twosomewhat unequal parts. The alphabetical arrangement was adopted originally to assist the memory. GROTIUS thinks the reason for the inversion of two of the Hebrew letters in Elegy 2. 16, 17; 3. 46-51; 4. 16, 17, is, that the Chaldeans, like the Arabians, used a different order from the Hebrews; in the first Elegy, Jeremiah speaks as a Hebrew, in the following ones, as one subject to the Chaldeans. This is doubtful.

CHAPTER (ELEGY) I.

Ver. 1-22. Aleph, א. 1. how is she . . . widow! she that was great, &c.—English Version is according to the accents. But the members of each sentence are better balanced in antithesis, thus, "how is she that was great among the nations become as a widow! (how) she who was princess among the provinces (i. e., she who ruled over the surrounding provinces from the Nile to the Euphrates, Genesis 15. 18; 1 Kings 4. 21; 2 Chronicles 9. 26; Ezra 4. 20) become tributary!" [MAURER.] sit—on the ground; and the posture of mourners (ch. 2. 10; Ezra 9. 3). The coin struck on the taking of Jerusalem by Titus, representing Judea as a female sitting solitary under a palm tree, with the inscription, "Judæa Capta," singularly corresponds to the image here; the language therefore must be prophetic of her state subsequent to Titus, as well as referring retrospectively to her Babylonian captivity. Beh, ב. 2. in the night—even in the night, the period of rest and oblivion of griefs (Job 7. 3). lovers . . . friends—the heathen states allied to Judah, and their idols. The idols whom she "loved" (Jeremiah 2. 20-25) could not comfort her. Her former allies would not; nay, some "treacherously" joined her enemies against her (2 Kings 24. 2, 7; Psalm 137. 7). Gimel, ג. 3. (Jeremiah 52. 27.) because of great servitude—i. e., in a state "of great servitude," endured from the Chaldeans. "Because" is made by VATABLUS indicative of the cause of her captivity, viz., her having "afflicted" and unjustly brought into "servitude" the manumitted bond-servants (Jeremiah 34. 8-22). MAURER explains it, "Judah has left her land (not literally "gone into captivity") because of the yoke imposed on it by Nebuchadnezzar." no rest—(Deuteronomy 28. 64, 65.) overtook her between . . . straits—image from robbers, who in the East intercept travellers at the narrow passes in hilly regions. Daleth, ד. 4. feasts—the passover; pentecost, or the feast of weeks; and the feast of tabernacles. gates—once the place of concourse, He, ה. 5. the chief—rule her (Deuteronomy 28. 43, 44). adversaries . . . prosper; for the Lord, &c.—all the foe's attempts must have failed, had not God delivered His people into their hands (Jeremiah 30. 15). Vau, ו. 6. beauty . . . departed—her temple, throne, and priesthood. harts that find no pasture—an animal timid and fleet, especially when seeking and not able to "find pasture." Zain, ז. 7. remembered—rather, remembers, now, in her afflicted state. In the days of her prosperity she did not appreciate, as she ought, the favours of God to her. Now, awakening out of her past lethargy, she feels from what high privileges she has fallen. when her people fell, &c.—i. e., after which days of prosperity "her people fell." mock at her Sabbaths—the heathen used to mock at the Jews' Sabbath, as showing their idleness, and term them Sabbatarians (MARTIAL, 4. 4). Now, said they ironically, ye may keep a continuous Sabbath. So God appointed the length of the captivity (seventy years) to be exactly that of the sum of the Sabbaths in the 490 years in which the land was denied its Sabbaths (Leviticus 26. 33-35). MAURER translates it "ruin." But English Version better expresses the point of their "mocking," viz., their involuntary "Sabbaths," i. e., the cessation of all national movements. A fourth line is added in this stanza, whereas in all the others there are but three. So in Elegy 2. 19. Cheth, ח. 8. (1 Kings 8. 46.) is removed—as a woman separated from the congregation of God for legal impurity, which is a type of moral impurity. So v. 17; Leviticus 12. 2; 15. 19, &c. her nakedness—they have treated her as contumeliously as courtesans from whom their clothes are stripped. turneth backward—as modest women do from shame, i. e., she is cast down from all hope of restoration. [CALVIN.] Teth, ט. 9. Continuation of the image in v. 8. Her ignominy and misery cannot be concealed, but are apparent to all, as if a woman were suffering under such a flow as to reach the end of her skirts. remembereth not . . . last end—(Deuteronomy 32. 29; Isaiah 47. 7.) She forgot how fatal must be the end of her iniquity. Or, as the words following imply, She, in despair, cannot lift herself up to lay hold of God's promises as to her "latter end." [CALVIN.] wonderfully—Hebrew, wonders, i. e., with amazing dejection. O Lord, behold—Judah here breaks in, speaking for herself. for the enemy hath magnified himself—What might seem ground for despair, the elated insulting of the enemy, is rather ground for good hope. Jod, י. 10. for—surely she hath seen, &c. heathen . . . command . . . not enter . . . congregation—for instance, the Ammonites and Moabites (Deuteronomy 23. 3; Nehemiah 13. 1, 2). If the heathen, as such, were not allowed to enter the sanctuary for worship, much less were they allowed to enter in order to rob and destroy. Caph, 5. 11. (Jeremiah 37. 21; 38. 9; 52. 6.) given . . . pleasant things for meat—(2 Kings 6. 25; Job 2. 4.) relieve . . . soul—lit., to cause the soul or life to return. for I am become vile—Her sins and consequent sorrows are made the plea in craving God's mercy. Cf. the like plea in Psalm 25. 11. Lamed, 7. 12. The pathetic appeal of Jerusalem, not only to her neighbours, but even to the strangers "passing by," as her sorrow is such as should excite the compassion even of those unconnected with her. She here prefigures Christ, whom the language is prophetically made to suit, more than Jerusalem. Cf. Israel, i. e., Messiah, Isaiah 49. 3. Cf. with "pass by," Matthew 27. 39; Mark 15. 29. As to Jerusalem, Daniel 9. 12. MAURER, from the Arabic idiom, translates, "do not go off on your way," i. e., stop, whoever ye are that pass by. English Version is simpler. Mem, 13. bones—a fire which not only consumes the skin and flesh, but penetrates even to my "bones" (i. e., my vital powers). prevailth against—not as ROSENMULLER, "He (Jehovah) hath broken them;" a sense not in the Hebrew. net—(Ezekiel 12. 13.) Image from hunting wild beasts. He has so entangled me in His judgments that I cannot escape. turned me back—so that I cannot go forward, and get free from His meshes. Nun, 1. 14. yoke . . . is bound by his hand—(Deuteronomy 23. 48.) Metaphor from husbandmen, who, after they have bound the yoke to the neck of oxen, hold the rein firmly twisted round the hand. Thus the translation will be, "in His hand." Or else, "the yoke of my transgressions" (i. e., of punishment for my transgressions) is held so fast fixed on me "by" God, that there is no loosening of it; thus English Version, "by His hand." wreathed—my sins are like the withes entwined about the neck to fasten the yoke to. into their hands, from whom—into the hands of those, from whom, &c. MAURER translates, "before whom I am not able to stand." Samech, 15. trodden, &c.—MAURER, from Syriac root, translates, "cast away;" so 2 Kings 23. 27. But Psalm 119. 118, supports English Version. in . . . midst of me—They fell not on the battle-field, but in the heart of the city; a sign of the Divine wrath. assembly—the collected forces of Babylon; a very different "assembly" from the solemn ones which once met at Jerusalem on the great feasts. The Hebrew means, lit., such a solemn "assembly" or feast (cf. ch. 2. 22). trodden . . . virgin . . . in a wine-press—hath forced her blood to burst forth, as the red wine from the grapes trodden in the press (Isaiah 63. 3; Revelation 14. 19, 20; 19. 15.) Ain, 16. (Jeremiah 13. 17; 14. 17.) Jerusalem is the speaker. mine eye, mine eye—so ch. 4. 18, "our end . . . our end;" repetition for emphasis. Pe, 2. 17. Like a woman in labour throes (Jeremiah 4. 31). menstruous woman—held unclean, and shunned by all; separated from her husband and from the temple (cf. v. 8; Leviticus 14. 19, &c.) Tzaddi, 18. The sure sign of repentance; justifying God, condemning herself (Nehemiah 9. 33; Psalm 51. 4; Daniel 9. 7-14). his commandment—lit., mouth; His word in the mouth of the prophets. Koph, 19. lovers—(v. 2; Jeremiah 30. 14.) elders—in dignity, not merely age. sought . . . meat—their dignity did not exempt them from having to go and seek bread (v. 11). Resch, 7. bowels . . . troubled—(Job 30. 27; Isaiah 16. 11; Jeremiah 4. 19; 31. 20.) Extreme mental distress affects the bowels and the whole internal frame. heart . . . turned—(Hosea 11. 8.) Is agitated or fluttered. abroad . . . sword . . . at home . . . as death—(Deuteronomy 32. 25; Ezekiel 7. 15.) The "as" does not modify, but intensifies. "Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home as it were death itself" (personified), in the form of famine and pestilence (2 Kings 25. 3; Jeremiah 14. 18; 52. 6.) So Habakkuk 2. 5, "as death." [MICHAELIS.] Schin, 21. they are glad that thou hast done it—because they thought that therefore Judah is irretrievably ruined (Jeremiah 40. 3). the day . . . called—(but) thou wilt bring on them the day of calamity which thou hast announced, viz., by the prophets (Jeremiah 50; 48. 27). like . . . me—in calamities (Psalm 137. 8. 9; Jeremiah 51. 25, &c.) Tau, 11. 22. Such prayers against foes are lawful, if the foe be an enemy of God, and if our concern be not for our own personal feeling, but for the glory of God and the welfare of His people. come before thee—so Revelation 16. 19, "Babylon came in remembrance before God" (cf. Psalm 109. 15.)

CHAPTER (ELEGY) II.

Ver. 1-22. Aleph, 8. 1. How—The title of the collection repeated here, and Elegy 4. 1. covered . . . with a cloud—i. e., with the darkness of ignominy. cast down from heaven unto . . . earth—(Matthew 11. 23.) Dashed down from the highest prosperity to the lowest misery. beauty of Israel—the beautiful temple (Psalm 29. 2; 74. 7; 96. 9, Margin; Isaiah 60. 7; 64. 11). his footstool—the ark (cf. 1 Chronicles 28. 2, with Psalm 99. 5; 132. 7). They once had gloried more in the ark than in the God whose symbol it was; they now feel it was but His "footstool," yet that it had been a great glory to them that God deigned to use it as such. Beth, 3. 2. polluted—by delivering it into the hands of the profane foe. Cf. Psalm 89. 39, "profaned . . . crown." Gimel, 1. 3. horn—worn in the East as an ornament on the forehead, and an emblem of power and majesty (1 Samuel 2. 10; Psalm 132. 17; Jeremiah 48. 25, Note). drawn back . . . right hand—(Psalm 74. 11.) God has withdrawn the help which He before gave them. Not as HENDERSON, "He has turned back his (Israel's) right hand" (Psalm 89. 43). Dalet, 7. 4. (Isaiah 63. 10.) stood with . . . right hand—He took His stand so as to use His right hand as an adversary. HENDERSON makes the image to be that of an archer steadying his right hand to take aim. Not only did He withdraw His help, but also took arms against Israel. all . . . pleasant to . . . eye—(Ezekiel 24. 25.) All that were conspicuous for youth, beauty, and rank. in . . . tabernacle—the dwellings of Jerusalem. He, 7. 5. an enemy—(Jeremiah 30. 14.) mourning and lamentation—There is a play of similar sounds in the original, "sorrow and sadness," to heighten the effect (Job 30. 3, Hebrew; Ezekiel 35. 3, Margin). Vau, 1. 6. tabernacle—rather, "He hath violently taken away His hedge (the hedge of the place sacred to Him, Psalm 80. 12; 89. 40; Isaiah 5. 5), as that of a garden." [MAURER.] CALVIN supports English Version, "His tabernacle (i. e., temple) as (one would take away the temporary cottage or booth) of a garden." Isaiah 1. 8, accords with this (Job 27. 18). places of . . . assembly—the temple and synagogues (Psalm 74. 7, 8). solemn feasts—(Ch. 1. 4.) Zain, 1. 7. they . . . made a noise in . . . house of . . . Lord, as in . . . feast—The foe's shout of triumph in the captured temple bore a resemblance (but oh how sad a contrast as to the occasion of it!) to the joyous thanksgivings we used to offer in the same place at our "solemn feasts" (cf. v. 22). Cheth, 7. 8. stretched . . . a line—The Easterns used a measuring-line not merely in building, but in destroying edifices (2 Kings 21. 13; Isaiah 34. 11). Implying here the unsparing rigidity with which he would exact punishment. Teth, 11. 9. Her gates cannot oppose the entrance of the foe into the city, for they are sunk under a mass of rubbish and earth. broken . . . bars—(Jeremiah 51. 30.) her king . . . among . . . Gentiles—(Deuteronomy 28. 36.) law . . . no more—(2 Chronicles 15. 3.) The civil and religious laws were one under the theocracy. "All the legal ordinances (prophetic as well as priestly) of the theocracy, are no more" (Psalm 74. 9; Ezekiel 7. 26). Jod, 1. 10. (Job 2. 12, 13.) The "elders," by their example, would draw the others to violent grief. the virgins—who usually are so anxious to set off their personal appearances to advantage. Caph, 2. 11. liver is poured, &c.—i. e., as the liver was thought to be the seat of the passions, all my feelings are poured out and prostrated for, &c. The "liver," is here put for the bile (see Job 16. 13, "gall;" Psalm 22. 14) in a bladder on the surface of the liver, copiously discharged when the passions are agitated. swoon—through faintness from the effects of hunger. Lamed, 7. 12. as the wounded—Famine being as deadly as the sword (Jeremiah 52. 6). soul . . . poured . . . into . . . mother's bosom—Instinctively turning to their mother's bosom, but finding no milk there, they breathe out their life as it were "into her bosom." Mem. 13. What thing shall I take to witness—What can I bring forward as a witness, or instance, to prove that others have sustained as grievous ills as thou? I cannot console thee as mourners are often consoled by showing that thy lot is only what others, too, suffer. The "sea" affords the only suitable emblem of thy woes, by its boundless extent and depth (ch. l. 12; Daniel 9. 12). Nun. 1. Thy prophets—not God's (Jeremiah 23. 26.) vain . . . for thee—to gratify thy appetite, not for truth, but for false things. not discovered thine iniquity—in opposition to God's command to the true prophets (Isaiah 58. 1). Lit., They have not taken off the veil which was on thine iniquity, so as to set it before thee. burdens—Their prophecies were soothing and flattering; but the result of them was heavy calamities to the people, worse than even what the prophecies of Jeremiah, which they in derision called "burdens," threatened. Hence he terms their pretended prophecies "false burdens," which proved to the Jews "causes of their banishment;" [CALVIN.] Stamech. 15. clap . . . hands—in derision (Job 27. 23; 34. 37). wag . . . head—(2 Kings 19. 21; Psalm 44. 14). perfection of beauty . . . joy of . . . earth—(Psalm 43. 2; 50. 2) The Jews' enemies quote their very words in scorn. Pe. 5. 16, 17. For the transposition of Hebrew letters (Pe and Ain) in the order of verses, see Introduction. opened . . . mouth—as ravening, roaring wild beasts (Job 16. 9, 10; Psalm 22. 13). Herein Jerusalem was a type of Messiah. gnash . . . teeth—in vindictive malice. We have seen it—(Psalm 35. 21.) Ain. 17. Lord—Let not the foe exult as if it was their doing. It was "the Lord" who thus fulfilled the threats uttered by His prophets for the guilt of Judea (Leviticus 26. 16-25; Deuteronomy 28. 36-48, 53; Jeremiah 19. 9). Tzaddi. 18. wall—(v. 8.) Personified. "Their heart, i. e., the Jews'; whilst their heart is lifted up to the Lord in prayer, their speech is addressed to the "wall" (the part being put for the whole city). let tears, &c.—(Jeremiah 14. 17.) The wall is called on to weep for its own ruin and that of the city. Cf. the similar personification (ch. l. 4). apple—the pupil of the eye (Psalm 17. 8). Koph. 19. ery . . . in . . . night—(Psalm 119. 147.) beginning of . . . watches—i. e., the first of the three equal divisions (four hours each) into which the ancient Jews divided the night, viz., from sunset to ten o'clock. The second was called "the middle watch" (Judges 7. 19), from ten till two o'clock. The third "the morning watch," from two to sunrise (Exodus 14. 24; 1 Samuel 11. 11). Afterwards, under the Romans, they had four watches (Matthew 14. 25; Luke 12. 38). for . . . thy . . . children—that God, if He will not spare thee, may at least preserve "thy young children." top of . . . street—(Isaiah 51. 29; Nahum 3. 10). Resch. 20. women eat . . . fruit—as threatened (Leviticus 26. 29; Deuteronomy 28. 53, 56, 57; Jeremiah 19. 9). children . . . span long—or else, "children whom they carry in their arms." [MAURER.] Schin. 21. (2 Chronicles 36. 17.) 22. Thou hast called as in . . . solemn day . . . terrors—thou hast summoned my enemies against me from all quarters, just as multitudes used to be convened to Jerusalem, on the solemn feast-days. The objects for which the enemies and the festal multitude respectively met, formed a sad contrast. Cf. ch. l. 15; "called an assembly against me."

CHAPTER (ELEGY) III.

Ver. 1-66. Jeremiah proposes his own experience under afflictions, as an example how the Jews should behave under theirs, so as to have hope of a restoration; hence the change from singular to plural (v. 22, 40-47). The stanzas consist of three lines, each of which begins with the same Hebrew letter. Aleph. 1-3. seen affliction—his own in the dungeon of Malchiah (Jeremiah 38. 6); that of his countrymen also in the siege. Both were types of that of Christ. 2. darkness—calamity. light—prosperity. 3. turneth . . . hand—to inflict again and again new strokes. "His hand" which once used to protect me, "Turned . . . turneth" implies repeated inflictions. Beth. 4-6. (Job 16. 8.) 5. balded—mounds, as against a besieged city, so as to allow none to escape (so v. 7, 9). 6. set me—HENDER-

SON refers this to the custom of placing the dead in a sitting posture. dark places—sepulchres. As those "dead long since;" so Jeremiah and his people are consigned to oblivion (Psalm 88. 5, 6; 143. 3; Ezekiel 37. 13). Gimel. 7-9. hedged—(Job 3. 23; Hosea 2. 6.) chain—lit., chain of brass. 8. shutteth out—image from a door shutting out any entrance (Job 30. 20). So the antitype, Christ (Psalm 22. 2). 9. hewn stone—which coheres so closely as not to admit of being broken through. paths crooked—thwarted our plans and efforts so that none went right. Daleth. 7. 10-13. (Job 10. 16; Hosea 13. 7, 8). 11. turned aside—made me wander out of the right way, so as to become a prey to wild beasts. pulled . . . in pieces—(Hosea 6. 1.) as a "bear" or a "lion" (v. 10). 12. (Job 7. 20.) He. 7. 13-15. 13. arrows—lit., sons of His quiver (cf. Job 6. 4). 14. (Jeremiah 20. 7.) their song—(Psalm 69. 12.) Jeremiah herein was a type of Messiah. "All my people" (John 1. 11). 15. wormwood—(Jeremiah 9. 15.) There it is regarded as food, viz., the leaves; here as drink, viz., the juice. Vau. 1. 16-18. gravel—referring to the grit that often mixes with bread baked in ashes, as is the custom of baking in the East (Proverbs 20. 17). We fare as hardly as those who eat such bread. The same allusion is in "Covered me with ashes," viz., as bread. 17. Not only present, but all hope of future prosperity is removed; so much so, that I am as one who never was prosperous ("I forgot prosperity"). 18. from the Lord—i. e., my hope derived from Him (Psalm 31. 22). Zain. 1. 19-21. (Jeremiah 9. 15.) Remembering, &c.—This gives the reason why he gave way to the temptation to despair. The Margin, "Remember," does not suit the sense so well. 20. As often as my soul calls them to remembrance, it is humbled or bowed down in me. 21. This—viz., what follows; the view of the Divine character (v. 22, 23). CALVIN makes "this" refer to Jeremiah's infirmity. His very weakness (v. 19, 20) gives him hope of God interposing His strength for him (cf. Psalm 25. 11, 17; 42. 5, 8; 2 Corinthians 12. 9, 10). Cheth. 7. 22-24. (Malachi 3. 6.) 23. (Isaiah 33. 2.) 24. (Numbers 18. 20; Psalm 16. 5; 73. 26; 119. 57; Jeremiah 10. 16.) To have God for our portion is the one only foundation of hope. Teth. 15. 25-27. The repetition of "good" at the beginning of each of the three verses heightens the effect. wait—(Isaiah 30. 13.) 26. quietly wait—lit., be in silence. Cf. v. 28 and Psalm 39. 2, 9, i. e., to be patiently quiet under afflictions, resting in the will of God (Psalm 37. 7). So Aaron, Leviticus 10. 2, 3; and Job 40. 4, 5. 27. yoke—of the Lord's disciplinary teaching (Psalm 90. 12; 119. 71). CALVIN interprets it, The Lord's doctrine (Matthew 11. 29, 30), which is to be received in a docile spirit. The earlier the better; for the old are full of prejudices (Proverbs 8. 17; Ecclesiastes 12. 1). Jeremiah himself received the yoke, both of doctrine and chastisement in his youth (Jeremiah 1. 6, 7). Jod. 1. 28-30. The fruit of true docility and patience. He does not fight against the yoke (Jeremiah 31. 13; Acts 9. 5), but accommodates himself to it. alone—The heathen applauded magnanimity, but they looked to display, and the praise of men. The child of God, in the absence of any witness, "alone," silently submits to the will of God. borne it upon him—i. e., because he is used to bearing it on him. Rather, "Because He (the Lord, v. 26) hath laid it on him." [VATABLUS.] 29. (Job 42. 6.) The mouth in the dust is the attitude of suppliant and humble submission to God's dealings as righteous and loving in design (cf. Ezra 9. 6; 1 Corinthians 14. 25). if so be there may be hope—This does not express doubt as to whether God be willing to receive the penitent, but the penitent's doubt as to himself; he whispers to himself this consolation, "Perhaps there may be hope for me." 30. Messiah, the Antitype, fulfilled this; His practice agreeing with His precept (Isaiah 50. 6; Matthew 5. 39). Many take patiently afflictions from God, but when man wrongs them, they take it impatiently. The godly bear resignedly the latter, like the former, as sent by God (Psalm 17. 13.) Caph. 2. 31-33. 31. True repentance is never without hope (Psalm 94. 14). 32. The punishments of the godly are but for a time. 33. He doth not afflict any willingly (lit., from His heart, i. e., as if He had any pleasure in it (Ezekiel 33. 11), much less thæ godly (Hebrews 12. 10). Lamed, 7. 34-36. This triplet has an infinitive in the beginning of each verse, the governing finite verb being in the end of v. 36, "the Lord approacheth not," which is to be repeated in each verse. Jeremiah here anticipates and answers the objections which the Jews might start, that it was by His connivance they were "crushed under the feet" of those who "turned aside the right of a man." God approves (lit., seeth, Habakkuk 1. 13; so "behold," "look on," i. e., look on with approval) not of such unrighteous acts; and so the Jews may look for deliverance and the punishment of their foes. 35. before . . . face of . . . Most High—Any "turning aside" of justice in fact is done before the face of God, who is present, and "regardeth" though unseen (Ecclesiastes 5. 8). 36. subvert—to wrong. Mem, D. 37-39. Who is it that can (as God, Psalm 33. 9) effect by a word any thing, without the will of God? 38. evil . . . good—Calamity and prosperity alike proceed from God (Job 2. 10; Isaiah 45. 7; Amos 3. 6). 39. living—and so having a time yet given him by God for repentance. If sin were punished as it deserves, life itself would be forfeited by the sinner. "Complaining" (murmuring) ill becomes him who enjoys such a favour as life (Proverbs 19. 3). for the punishment of his sins—Instead of blaming God for His sufferings, he ought to recognize in them God's righteousness, and the just rewards of his own sin. Nun, J. 40-42. us—Jeremiah and his fellow-countrymen in their calamity. search—as opposed to the torpor wherewith men rest only on their outward sufferings, without attending to the cause of them, Psalm 139. 23, 24. 41. heart with . . . hands—the antidote to hypocrisy (Psalm 86. 4; 1 Timothy 2. 8). 42. not pardoned—The Babylonian captivity had not yet ended. Samech, D. 43-45. covered—viz., thyself (so v. 4), viz., so as not to see and pity our calamities, for even the most cruel in seeing a sad spectacle are moved to pity. Cf. as to God "hiding His face," Psalm 10. 11; 22. 25. 44. (Ver. 8.) The "cloud" is our sins, and God's wrath because of them (Isaiah 44. 22; 59. 2). 45. So the apostles were treated; but, instead of murmuring, rejoiced at it (1 Corinthians 4. 13). Pe, S. 46-48. Pe is put before Ain, as in Elegy 2. 16, 17; 4. 16, 17. 46. (Ch. 2. 16.) 47. Like animals fleeing in fear, we fall into the snare laid for us. 48. (Jeremiah 4. 19.) Ain, y. 49-51. without . . . intermission—or else, "because there is no intermission" [PISCATOR], viz., of my miseries. 50. Till—His prayer is not without hope, wherein it differs from the blind grief of unbelievers. look down, &c.—(Isaiah 63. 15.) 51. eye affecteth mine heart—i. e., causeth me grief with continual tears; or, "affecteth my life" (lit., "soul," Margin), i. e., my health. [GROTIUS.] daughters of . . . city—the towns around, dependencies of Jerusalem, taken by the foe. Tzaddi, y. 52-54. a bird—which is destitute of counsel and strength. The allusion seems to be to Proverbs 1. 17. [CALVIN.] without cause—(Psalm 69. 4; 109. 3, 4.) Type of Messiah (John 15. 25.) 53. in . . . dungeon—(Jeremiah 37. 16.) stone—usually put at the mouth of a dungeon to secure the prisoners (Joshua 10. 18; Daniel 6. 17; Matthew 27. 60). 54. waters—not literally, for there was "no water" (Jeremiah 38. 6) in the place of Jeremiah's confinement, but emblematical of overwhelming calamities (Psalm 69. 2; 124. 4, 5). cut off—(Isaiah 38. 10, 11.) I am abandoned by God. He speaks according to carnal sense. Koph, p. 55-57. I called . . . out of . . . dungeon—Thus the spirit resists the flesh, and faith spurns the temptation [CALVIN] (Psalm 130. 1; Jonah 2. 2). 56. Thou hast heard—viz., formerly (so in v. 57, 58). breathing . . . cry—two kinds of prayer; the sigh of a prayer silently breathed forth, and the loud, earnest cry (cf. Isaiah 26. 16, "Prayer," Margin, "secret speech," with Psalm 55. 17, "cry aloud"). 57. Thou drewest near—with thy help (James 4. 8). Resch, 7. 58-60. Jeremiah cites God's gracious answers to his prayers, as an encouragement to his fellow-countrymen, to trust in Him. pleaded—(Psalm 35. 1; Micah 7. 9.) 59. God's past deliverances, and His knowledge of Judah's wrongs, are made the grounds of prayer for relief. 60. imaginations—devices (Jeremiah 11. 19). "Their vengeance" means their malice. Jeremiah gives his conduct, when plotted against by his foes, as an example how the Jews should bring their wrongs at the hands of the Chaldeans before God. Shin, v. 61-63. their reproach—their reproachful language against me. 63. lips—speeches. 63. sitting down . . . rising up—whether they sit or rise, i. e., whether they be actively engaged or sedentary, and at rest, "all the day" (v. 62), I am the subject of their derisive songs (v. 14). Tau, n. 64-66. (Jeremiah 11. 20; 2 Timothy 4. 14). 65. sorrow—rather, blindness or hardness; lit., "a veil" covering their heart, so that they may rush on their own ruin (Isaiah 6. 10; 2 Corinthians 3. 14, 15). 66. from under . . . heavens of . . . Lord—destroy them so, that it may be seen everywhere under heaven that thou sittest above as Judge of the world.

CHAPTER (ELEGY) IV.

VER. 1-22. THE SAD CAPTURE OF JERUSALEM, THE HOPE OF RESTORATION, AND THE RETRIBUTION AWAITING IDUMEA FOR JOINING BABYLON AGAINST JUDEA. Alph, N. 1. gold—the splendid adornment of the temple [CALVIN] (ch. 1. 10; 1 Kings 6. 22; Jeremiah 52. 19); or, the principal men of Judea [GROTIUS] (v. 2). stones of . . . sanctuary—the gems on the breastplate of the high priest; or, metaphorically, the priests and Levites. Beh, j. 2. comparable to . . . gold—(Job 23. 16, 19.) earthen pitchers—(Isaiah 30. 14; Jeremiah 19. 11.) Gimel, j. 3. sea-monsters . . . breast—whales, and other cetaceous monsters, are mammalian. Even they suckle their young; but the Jewish women in the siege, so desperate was their misery, ate theirs (v. 10; ch. 2. 20). Others translate, "jackals." ostriches—see Note, Job 39. 14-16, on their forsaking their young. Daleth, 7. 4. thirst—The mothers have no milk to give through the famine. He, 7. 5. delicately—on dainties, are desolate—or, perish. in scarlet embrace dunghills—Instead of the scarlet couches on which the grandees were nursed, they must lie on dunghills. "Embrace;" they who once shrank sensitively from any soil, gladly cling close to heaps of filth as their only resting-place. Cf. "embrace the rock" (Job 24. 8). Vau, j. 6. greater than . . . Sodom—(Matthew 11. 23.) No prophets had been sent to Sodom, as there had been to Judea; therefore the punishment of the latter was heavier than that of the former. overthrown . . . in a moment—whereas the Jews had to endure the protracted and manifold hardships of a siege. no hands stayed on her—no hostile force, as the Chaldeans in the case of Jerusalem, continually pressed on her before her overthrow. Jeremiah thus shows the greater severity of Jerusalem's punishment than that of Sodom. Zain, j. 7. Nazarites—lit., separated ones (Numbers 6). They were held once in the highest estimation, but now they are degraded. God's blessing formerly caused their body not to be the less fair and ruddy for their abstinence from strong drink. Cf. the similar case of Daniel, &c. (Daniel 1. 8-15). Also David (1 Samuel 16. 12; 17. 42). Type of Messiah (Song of Solomon 5. 10). rubies—GESENIUS translates, "corals," from a Hebrew root, to divide into branches, from the branching form of corals. polishing—They were like exquisitely cut and polished sapphires. The "sapphires" may represent the blue veins of a healthy person. Cheth, 7. 8. blacker than . . . coal—or, "than blackness" itself (Joel 2. 6; Nahum 2. 10). like a stick—as withered as a dry stick. Teth, 7. 9. The speedy death by the sword is better than the lingering death by famine. pine away—lit., flow out; referring to the flow of blood. This expression, and "stricken through," are drawn from death by "the sword." want of . . . fruits—The words in italics have to be supplied in the original (Genesis 18. 25; Psalm 109. 24). Jod, v. 10. (Ch. 2. 20; Deuteronomy 28. 56, 57.) pitiſul—naturally at other times compassionate (Isaiah 49. 15). JOSEPHUS describes the unnatural act as it took place in the siege under Titus, sodden—boiled. Caph, j. 11. fire . . . devoured . . . foundations—(Deuteronomy 32. 22; Jeremiah 21. 14.) A most rare event. Fire usually consumes only the surface; but this reached even to the foundation, cutting off all hope of restoration. Lamed, 7. 12. Jerusalem was so fortified, that all thought it impregnable. It therefore could only have been the hand of God, not the force of man, which overthrew it. Mem. D. 13. prophets—the false prophets (Jeremiah 23. 11, 21). Supply the sense thus: "For the sins, &c., these calamities have befallen her." shed the blood of the just—(Matthew 23. 31, 37.) This received its full fulfilment in the slaying of Messiah and the Jews' consequent dispersion (James 5. 6). Nun. J. 14. blind—with mental aberration. polluted . . . with blood—both with blood of one another mutually shed (e. g., Jeremiah 2. 34), and with their blood shed by the enemy. [GLASSIUS.] not touch . . . garments—as being defiled with blood (Numbers 19. 16). Samech. D. 15. They . . . them—"They," i. e., "men" (v. 14), even the very Gentiles, regarded as unclean by the Jews, who were ordered most religiously to avoid all defilements, cried unto the latter, "depart!" as being unclean: so universal was the defilement of the city by blood. wandered—as the false prophets and their followers had "wandered" blind with infatuated and idolatrous crime in the city (v. 14), so they must now "wander" among the heathen in blind consternation with calamity. they said—i. e., the Gentiles said: it was said among the heathen, "The Jews shall no more sojourn in their own land" [GROTIUS]; or, where-soever they go in their wandering exile, "they shall not stay long" [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU] (Deuteronomy 28. 65). Pe. D. Ain and Pe are here transposed, as in ch. 2. 16, 17; 3. 46-51. 16. anger—lit., face; it is the countenance which, by its expression, manifests anger (Psalm 34. 16). GÆSENIVS translates, "the person of Jehovah;" Jehovah present; Jehovah himself (Exodus 33. 14; 2 Samuel 17. 11). divided—dispersed the Jews. they respected not . . . priests—This is the language of the Gentiles, "The Jews have no hope of a return: for they respected not even good priests" (2 Chronicles 24. 19-22). [GROTIUS.] MAURER explains it, "They (the victorious foe) regard not the (Jewish) priests when imploring their pity" (ch. 5. 12). The evident antithesis to "As for us" (v. 17), and the language of "the heathen" at the close of v. 15, of which v. 16 is the continuation, favour the former view. Ain. J. 17. As for us—This translation forms the best antithesis to the language of the heathen (v. 15, 16). CALVIN translates, "Whilst as yet we stood as a state, our eyes failed," &c. watched for a nation that could not save us—Egypt (2 Kings 24. 7; Isaiah 30. 7; Jeremiah 37. 5-11). Tzaddi. J. 18. They—The Chaldeans. cannot go—without danger. Koph. P. The last times just before the taking of the city. There was no place of escape; the foe intercepted those wishing to escape from the famine-stricken city, "on the mountains and in the wilderness." swifter . . . than eagles—the Chaldean cavalry (Jeremiah 4. 13). pursued—lit., to be hot; then, to pursue hotly (Genesis 31. 36). Thus they pursued and overtook Zedekiah (Jeremiah 52. 8, 9). Resch. J. 20. breath . . . anointed of . . . Lord—our king, with whose life ours was bound up. The original reference seems to have been to Josiah (2 Chronicles 35. 25), killed in battle with Pharaoh-necho; but the language is here applied to Zedekiah, who, though worthless, was still lineal representative of David, and type of Messiah the "Anointed." Viewed personally, the language is too favourable to apply to him. live among the heathen—under him we hoped to live securely, even in spite of the surrounding heathen nations. [GROTIUS.] Schin. V. 21. Rejoice—at our calamities (Psalm 137. 7). This is a prophecy that Edom should exult over the fall of Jerusalem. At the same time it is implied, Edom's joy shall be short-lived. Ironically she is told, Rejoice whilst thou mayest (Ecclesiastes 11. 9). cup—for this image of the confounding effects of God's wrath, see Jeremiah 13. 12; 25. 15, 16, 21; as to Edom, Jeremiah 49. 7-22. Tau. J. 22. (Isaiah 40. 2.) Thou hast been punished enough: the end of thy punishment is at hand. no more carry thee . . . into captivity—i. e., by the Chaldeans. The Romans carried them away subsequently. The full accomplishment of this prophecy must therefore refer to the Jews' final restoration. discover—by the severity of His punishments on thee, God shall let men see how great was thy sin (Jeremiah 49. 10). God "covers" sin when he forgives it (Psalm 32. 1, 5). He "discovers," or "reveals," it, when he punishes it (Job 20. 27). Jeremiah 49. 10 shows that Margin is wrong,

"carry captive" (this rendering is as in Nahum 2. 7, cf. Margin).

CHAPTER (ELEGY) V.

Ver. 1-22. EPIPHONEMA, OR A CLOSING RECAPITULATION OF THE CALAMITIES TREATED OF IN THE PREVIOUS ELEGIES. 1. (Psalm 89. 50, 51.) 2. Our inheritance—"Thine inheritance" (Psalm 79. 1). The land given of old to us by thy gift. 3. fatherless—Our whole land is full of orphans. [CALVIN.] Or, "we are fatherless," being abandoned by thee our "Father" (Jeremiah 8. 19). [GROTIUS.] 4. water for money—the Jews were compelled to pay the enemy for the water of their own cisterns after the overthrow of Jerusalem. Or rather, it refers to their sojourn in Babylon; they had to pay tax for access to the rivers and fountains. Thus, "our" means the water which we need, the commonest necessary of life. our wood—in Judea each one could get wood without pay; in Babylon, "our wood," the wood we need, must be paid for. 5. Lit., On our necks we are persecuted; i. e., Men tread on our necks (Psalm 66. 12; Isaiah 51. 23; cf. Joshua 10. 24). The extreme oppression. The foe not merely galled the Jews' face, back, and sides, but their neck. A just retribution, as they had been stiff in neck against the yoke of God (2 Chronicles 30. 8, Margin; Nehemiah 9. 29; Isaiah 48. 4). 6. given . . . hand to—in token of submission (Note, Jeremiah 50. 15). to . . . Egyptians—at the death of Josiah (2 Chronicles 36. 3, 4). Assyrians—i. e., the Chaldeans who occupied the empire which Assyria had held. So Jeremiah 2. 18. to be satisfied with bread—(Deuteronomy 28. 48.) 7. (Jeremiah 31. 29.) borne their iniquities—i. e., the punishment of them. The accumulated sins of our fathers from age to age, as well as our own, are visited on us. They say this as a plea why God should pity them (cf. Ezekiel 18, 2, &c.). 8. Servants . . . ruled . . . us—Servants under the Chaldean governors ruled the Jews (Nehemiah 5. 15). Israel, once a "kingdom of priests" (Exodus 19. 6), is become like Canaan "a servant of servants," according to the curse (Genesis 9. 25). The Chaldeans were designed to be "servants" of Schem, being descended from Ham (Genesis 9. 26). Now through the Jews' sin, their positions are reversed. 9. We gat our bread with . . . peril—i. e., those of us left in the city after its capture by the Chaldeans. because of . . . sword of . . . wilderness—because of the liability to attack by the robber-Arabs of the wilderness, through which the Jews had to pass to get "bread" from Egypt (cf. v. 6). 10. As an oven is scorched with too much fire, so our skin with the hot blast of famine (Margin, rightly, "storms," like the hot simoom). Hunger dries up the pores, so that the skin becomes like as if it were scorched by the sun (Job 30. 30; Psalm 119. 83). 11. So in just retribution Babylon itself should fare in the end. Jerusalem shall for the last time suffer these woes before her final restoration (Zechariah 14. 2). 12. hanged . . . by their hand—a piece of wanton cruelty invented by the Chaldeans. GROTIUS translates, "Princes were hung by the hand of the enemy;" hanging was a usual mode of execution (Genesis 40. 19). elders—officials (ch. 4. 16). 13. young men . . . grind—The work of the lowest female slave was laid on young men (Judges 16. 21; Job 31. 10). children fell under . . . wood—Mere children had to bear burdens of wood so heavy that they sank beneath them. 14. Aged men in the East meet in the open space round the gate to decide judicial trials, and to hold social converse (Job 29. 7, 8). 16. The crown—All our glory, the kingdom and the priesthood (Job 19. 9; Psalm 89. 39, 44). 17. (Ch. 1. 22; 2. 11.) 18. foxes—they frequent desolate places, where they can freely and fearlessly roam. 19. (Psalm 102. 12.) The perpetuity of God's rule over human affairs, however He may seem to let His people be oppressed for a time, is their ground of hope of restoration. 20. for ever—i. e., for "so long a time." 21. (Psalm 80. 3; Jeremiah 31. 18.) "Restore us to favour with thee, and so we shall be restored to our old position." [GROTIUS.] Jeremiah is not speaking of spiritual conversion, but of that outward turning whereby God receives men into His fatherly favour, manifested in bestowing prosperity. [CALVIN.]

Still, as Israel is a type of the Church, temporal goods typify spiritual blessings; and so the sinner may use this prayer for God to convert him. 23. Rather, "Unless haply thou hast utterly rejected us, and art beyond measure wroth against us," i. e., Unless thou art implacable, which is impossible, hear our prayer. [CALVIN.] Or, as Margin, "For wouldest thou utterly reject us?" &c. No; that cannot be. The Jews, in this book, and in Isaiah and Malachi, to avoid the ill-omen of a mournful closing sentence, repeat the second last verse. [CALVIN.]

EZEKIEL.

INTRODUCTION.

THE name means "(whom) God will strengthen" [GESENIUS]; or, "God will prevail." [ROSENMULLER.] His father was Buzi (ch. 1. 3), a priest, and he probably exercised the priestly office himself at Jerusalem, previous to his captivity, as appears from the matured priestly character to be seen in his prophecies, a circumstance which much increased his influence with his captive fellow-countrymen at Babylon. Tradition represents Sarera as the land of his nativity. His call to prophesy was in the fifth year from the date of his being carried away with Jehoiachin (see 2 Kings 24. 11-15) by Nebuchadnezzar, 599 B. C. The best portions of the people seem to have been among the first carried away (ch. 11. 16; Jeremiah 24. 2-7, 8, 10). The ungodly were willing to do anything to remain in their native land; whereas the godly believed the prophets and obeyed the first summons to surrender, as the only path of safety. These latter, as adhering to the theocratic principle, were among the earliest to be removed by the Chaldeans, who believed that, if they were out of the way, the nation would fall to pieces of itself. They were despised by their brethren in the Holy Land not yet captives, as having no share in the temple sacrifices. Thus Ezekiel's sphere of labour was one happier and less impeded by his countrymen than that of Jeremiah at home. The vicinity of the river Chebar, which flows into the Euphrates near Circesium, was the first scene of his prophecies (ch. 1. 1). Tel-abib there (now Thallaba) was his place of residence (ch. 3. 15), whither the elders used to come to inquire as to God's messages through him. They were eager to return to Jerusalem, but he taught them that they must first return to their God. He continued to prophesy for at least twenty-two years, i. e., to the twenty-seventh year of the captivity (ch. 29. 17), and probably remained with the captives by the Chebar the rest of his life. A treatise, falsely attributed to Epiphanius, states a tradition, that he was killed at Babylon by a prince of his people whom he had reproved for idolatry.

He was contemporary with Jeremiah and Daniel. The former had prophesied for thirty-four years before Ezekiel, and continued to do so for six or seven years after him. The call of Ezekiel followed the very next year after the communication of Jeremiah's predictions to Babylon (Jeremiah 51. 59), and was divinely intended as a sequel to them. Daniel's predictions are mostly later than Ezekiel's, but his piety and wisdom had become proverbial in the early part of Ezekiel's ministry (ch. 14. 14, 16; 23. 3). They much resemble one another, especially in the visions and grotesque images. It is a remarkable proof of genuineness that in Ezekiel no prophecies against Babylon occur among those directed against the enemies of the covenant people. Probably he desired not to give needless offence to the government under which he lived. The effect of his labours is to be seen in the improved character of the people towards the close of the captivity, and their general cessation from idolatry and return to the law. It was little more than thirty years after the close of his labours when the decree of the Jews' restoration was issued. His leading characteristic is realizing, determined energy; this admirably adapted him for opposing the "rebellious house" "of stubborn front and hard heart," and for maintaining the cause of God's Church among his countrymen in a foreign land, when the external framework had fallen to pieces. His style is plain and simple. His conceptions are definite, and the details even of the symbolical and enigmatical parts are given with life-like minuteness. The obscurity lies in the substance, not in the form, of his communications. The priestly element predominates in his prophecies, arising from his previous training as a priest. He delights to linger about the temple, and to find in its symbolical forms the imagery for conveying his instructions. This was divinely ordered to satisfy the spiritual want felt by the people in the absence of the outward temple and its sacrifices. In his images he is magnificent, though austere and somewhat harsh. He abounds in repetitions, not for ornament, but for force and weight. Poetical parallelism is not found except in a few portions, as chs. 7., 21., 27., 28., 29.-31. His great aim was to stimulate the dormant minds of the Jews. For this end nothing was better suited than the use of mysterious symbols expressed in the plainest words. The superficial, volatile, and wilfully unbelieving would thereby be left to judicial blindness (Isaiah 6. 10; Matthew 13. 11-13, &c.); whereas the better-disposed would be awakened to a deeper search into the things of God by the very obscurity of the symbols. Inattention to this Divine purpose has led the modern Jews so to magnify this obscurity as to ordain that no one shall read this book till he has passed his thirtieth year.

Rabbi Hananias is said to have satisfactorily solved the difficulties (Mischna) which were alleged against its canonicity. Ecclesiasticus 49. 8 refers to it, and JOSEPHUS, Antiquities 10. 5, sec. 1. It is mentioned as part of the canon in MELITO's catalogue (EUSEBIUS, H. E. 4. 26); also in ORIGEN, JEROME, and the Talmud. The oneness of tone throughout and the repetition of favourite expressions exclude the suspicion that separate portions are not genuine. The earlier portion, chs. 1.-32., which mainly treats of sin and judgment, is a key to interpret the latter portion, which is more hopeful and joyous, but remote in date. Thus a unity and an orderly progressive character are imparted to the whole. The destruction of Jerusalem is the central point. Previously to this he calls to repentance and warns against blind confidence in Egypt (ch. 17. 15-17; cf. Jeremiah 37. 7) or other human stay. After it he consoles the captives by promising them future deliverance and restoration. His prophecies against foreign nations stand between these two great divisions, and were uttered in the interval between the intimation that Nebuchadnezzar was besieging Jerusalem, and the arrival of the news that he had taken it (ch. 33. 21). HAVERNICK marks out nine sections:—(1.) Ezekiel's call to prophesy (ch. 1.-3. 15). (2.) Symbolical predictions of the destruction of Jerusalem (ch. 3. 16-7). (3.) A year and two months later a vision of the temple polluted by Tammuz or Adonis worship; God's consequent scattering of fire over the city and forsaking of the temple to reveal Himself to an inquiring people in exile; happier and purer times to follow (ch. 8.-11). (4.) Exposure of the particular sins prevalent in the several classes—priests, prophets, and princes (ch. 12.-19). (5.) A year later the warning of judgment for national guilt repeated with greater distinctness as the time drew nearer (ch. 20.-23). (6.) Two years and five months later—the very day on which Ezekiel speaks—is announced as the day of the beginning of the siege; Jerusalem shall be overthrown (ch. 24). (7.) Predictions against foreign nations during the interval of his silence towards his own people; if judgment begins at the house of God, much more will it visit the ungodly world (ch. 25.-32). Some of these were uttered much later than others, but they all began to be given after the fall of Jerusalem. (8.) In the twelfth year of the captivity, when the fugitives from Jerusalem (ch. 33. 21) had appeared in Chaldea, he foretells better times and the re-establishment of Israel and the triumph of God's kingdom on earth over its enemies, Seir, the heathen, and Gog (ch. 33.-39). (9.) After an interval of thirteen years the closing vision of the order and beauty of the restored kingdom (ch. 40.-48). The particularity of details as to the temple and its offerings rather discountenances the view of this vision being only symbolical, and not at all literal. The event alone can clear it up. At all events it has not yet been fulfilled; it must be future. Ezekiel was the only prophet (in the strict sense) among the Jews at Babylon. Daniel was rather a seer than a prophet, for the spirit of prophecy was given him to qualify him, not for a spiritual office, but for disclosing future events. His position in a heathen king's palace fitted him for revelations of the outward relations of God's kingdom to the kingdoms of the world, so that his book is ranked by the Jews among the Hagiographa or "Sacred Writings," not among the prophetic Scriptures. On the other hand, Ezekiel was distinctively a prophet, and one who had to do with the inward concerns of the Divine kingdom. As a priest, when sent into exile, his service was but transferred from the visible temple at Jerusalem to the spiritual temple in Chaldea.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-23. EZEKIEL'S VISION BY THE CHEBAR. FOUR CHERUBIM AND WHEELS. 1. Now it came to pass—Rather, And it came, &c. As this formula in Joshua 1. 1 has reference to the written history of previous times, so here, and in Ruth 1. 1, and Esther 1. 1, it refers to the unwritten history which was before the mind of the writer. The prophet by it, as it were, continues the history of the preceding times. In the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign (Jeremiah 51. 59), Jeremiah sent by Seraiah a message to the captives (Jeremiah 29.) to submit themselves to God, and lay aside their flattering hopes of a speedy restoration. This communication was in the next year, the fifth, and the fourth month of the same king (for Jehoiachin's captivity and Zedekiah's accession coincide in time, followed up by a prophet raised up among the captives themselves, the energetic Ezekiel. thirtieth year—i. e., counting from the beginning of the reign of Nabopolassar, father of Nebuchadnezzar, the era of the Babylonian empire, B. C. 625, which epoch coincides with the eighteenth year of Josiah, that in which the book of the law was found, and the consequent reformation began. [SCALIGER.] Or, the thirtieth year of Ezekiel's life. As the Lord was about to be a "little sanctuary" (ch. 11. 16) to the exiles on the Chebar, so Ezekiel was to be the ministering priest; therefore he marks his priestly relation to God and the people at the outset; the close, which describes the future temple, thus answering to the beginning. By designating himself expressly as "the priest" (v. 3), and as having reached his thirtieth year, the regular year of priests commencing their office, he marks his office as the priest among the prophets. Thus the opening vision follows naturally as the formal institution of that spiritual temple in which he was to minister. [FAIRBAIRN.] Chebar—the same as Chabor or Habor, whither the ten tribes had been transported by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17. 6; 1 Chronicles 5. 26). It flows into the Euphrates near Carchemish or Circesium, 200 miles north of Babylon. visions of God—Four expressions are used as to the revelation granted to Ezekiel, the three first having respect to what was presented from without, to assure him of its reality, the fourth to his being internally made fit to receive the revelation; "the heavens were opened" (so Matthew 3. 16; Acts 7. 56; 10. 11; Revelation 19. 11); "he saw visions of God;" "the word of Jehovah came verily (as the meaning is rather than 'expressly,' English Version, v. 3) unto him" (it was no unreal hallucination); and "the hand of Jehovah was upon him" (Isaiah 8. 11; Daniel 10. 10, 18; Revelation 1. 17; the Lord by his touch strengthening him for his high and arduous ministry, that he might be able to witness and report aright the revelations made to him). 2. Jehoiachin's captivity—In the third or fourth year of Jehoiakim, father of Jehoiachin, the

first carrying away of Jewish captives to Babylon took place, and among them was Daniel. The second was under Jehoiachin, when Ezekiel was carried away. The third and final one was at the taking of Jerusalem under Zedekiah. 4. whirlwind—emblematic of God's judgments (Jeremiah 23. 19; 25. 32). out of the north—i. e., from Chaldea, whose hostile forces would invade Judea from a northerly direction. The prophet conceives himself in the temple. fire infolding itself—laying hold on whatever surrounds it, drawing it to itself, and devouring it. Lit., catching itself, i. e., kindling itself. [FAIRBAIRN.] The same Hebrew occurs Exodus 9. 24, as to the "fire mingled with the hail." brightness . . . about it—i. e., about the cloud. out of the midst thereof—i. e., out of the midst of the fire. colour of amber—rather, "the glancing brightness (lit., the eye, and so the glancing appearance) of polished brass." The Hebrew, "Chasmal," is from two roots, smooth and brass (cf. v. 7; and Revelation 1. 15). [GESENIUS.] LXX. and Vulgate translate it, "electrum;" a brilliant metal compounded of gold and silver. 5. Ezekiel was himself of a "gigantic nature, and thereby suited to counteract the Babylonish spirit of the times, which loved to manifest itself in gigantic, grotesque forms." [HENGSTENBERG.] living creatures—so the Greek ought to have been translated in the parallel passage, Revelation 4. 6, not as English Version, "beasts;" for one of the "four" is a man, and man cannot be termed "beast." Ch. 10. 20 shows that it is the cherubim that are meant. likeness of a man—Man, the noblest of the four, is the ideal model after which they are fashioned (v. 10; ch. 10. 14). The point of comparison between him and them is the erect posture of their bodies, though doubtless including also the general mien. Also the hands (ch. 10. 21). 6. Not only were there four distinct living creatures, but each of the four had four faces, making sixteen in all. The four living creatures of the cherubim answer by contrast to the four world-monarchies represented by four beasts, Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome (Daniel 7). The fathers identified them with the four Gospels: Matthew the lion, Mark the ox, Luke the man, John the eagle. Two cherubim only stood over the ark in the temple; two more are now added, to imply that, whilst the law is retained as the basis, a new form is needed to be added to impart new life to it. The number four may have respect to the four quarters of the world, to imply that God's angels execute His commands everywhere. Each head in front had the face of a man as the primary and prominent one: on the right the face of a lion, on the left the face of an ox, above from behind the face of an eagle. The Mosaic cherubim were similar, only that the human faces were put looking towards each other, and towards the mercy-seat between, being formed out of the same mass of pure gold as the latter (Exodus 25. 19, 20). In Isaiah 6. 2 two wings are added to cover their countenances; because there they stand by the throne, here under the throne; there God deigns to consult them, and His condescension calls forth their humility, so that they veil their faces before Him; here they execute His commands. The face expresses their intelligence; the wings, their rapidity in fulfilling God's will. The Shekinah or flame, that signified God's presence, and the written name, JEHOVAH, occupied the intervening space between the cherubim. Genesis 4, 14, 26; and 3, 24 ("placed:" properly, "to place in a tabernacle"), imply that the cherubim were appointed at the fall as symbols of God's presence in a consecrated place, and that man was to worship there. In the patriarchal dispensation, when the flood had caused the removal of the cherubim from Eden, seraphim or teraphim (Chaldean dialect) were made as models of them for domestic use (Genesis 31, 19, Margin 30). The silence of Exodus 25, and 26, as to their configuration, whereas every thing else is minutely described, is because their form was so well known already to Bezaleel and all Israel by tradition as to need no detailed description. Hence Ezekiel (ch. 10, 20) at once knows them, for he had seen them repeatedly in the carved work of the outer sanctuary of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6, 23-29). He therefore consoles the exiles with the hope of having the same cherubim in the renovated temple which should be reared, and assures them that the same God who dwelt between the cherubim of the temple would be still with His people by the Chebar. But they were not in Zerubbabel's temple; therefore Ezekiel's foretold temple, if literal, is yet future. The ox is selected as chief of the tame animals, the lion among the wild, the eagle among birds, and man the head of all, in his ideal, realized by the Lord Jesus, combining all the excellencies of the animal kingdom. The cherubim probably represent the ruling powers by which God acts in the natural and moral world. Hence they sometimes answer to the ministering angels; elsewhere, to the redeemed saints (the elect Church) through whom, as by the angels, God shall hereafter rule the world and proclaim the manifold wisdom of God (Matthew 19, 28; 1 Corinthians 6, 2; Ephesians 3, 10; Revelation 3, 21; 4, 6-8). The "lions" and "oxen," amidst "palms" and "open flowers" carved in the temple, were the four-faced cherubim which, being traced on a flat surface, presented only one aspect of the four. The human-headed winged bulls and eagle-headed gods found in Nineveh, sculptured amidst palms and tulip-shaped flowers, were borrowed by corrupted tradition from the cherubim placed in Eden near its fruits and flowers. So the Aaronic calf (Exodus 32, 4, 5) and Jeroboam's calves at Dan and Bethel, a schismatic imitation of the sacred symbols in the temple at Jerusalem. So the ox figures of Apis on the sacred arks of Egypt. 7. straight feet—i. e., straight legs. Not protruding in any part as the legs of an ox, but straight like a man's. [GROTIUS.] Or, like solid pillars; not bending, as man's, at the knee. They glided along, rather than walked. Their movements were all sure, right, and without effort. [KITTO, Cyclopædia.] sole . . . calf's foot—HENDERSON hence supposes that "straight feet" implies that they did not project horizontally like men's feet, but vertically as calves' feet. The solid firmness of the round foot of a calf seems to be the point of comparison. colour—the glittering appearance, indicating God's purity. 8. The hands of each were the hands of a man. The hand is the symbol of active power, guided by "skilfulness" (Psalm 78, 72). under their wings—signifying their operations are hidden from our too curious prying; and as the "wings" signify something more than human, viz., the secret prompting of God, it is also implied that they are moved by it and not by their own power, so as that they do nothing at random, but all with Divine wisdom. they four had . . . faces and . . . wings—He returns to what he had stated already in v. 6; this gives a reason why they had hands on their four sides, viz., because they had faces and wings on the four sides. They moved whithersoever they would, not by active energy merely, but also by knowledge (expressed by their faces) and Divine guidance (expressed by their "wings"). 9. They—had no occasion to turn themselves round when changing their direction, for they had a face (v. 6) looking to each of the four quarters of heaven. They made no mistakes; and their work needed not to be gone over again. Their wings were joined above in pairs (see v. 11). 10. they . . . had the face of a man—viz., in front. The human face was the primary and prominent one, and the fundamental part of the composite whole. On its right was the lion's face; on the left, the ox (called "cherub," ch. 10, 14); at the back from above was the eagle's. 11. The tips of the two outstretched wings reached to one another, while the other two, in token of humble awe, formed a veil for the lower parts of the body. stretched upward—rather, "were parted from above" (cf. Margin, Isaiah 6, 2, Note.) The joining together of their wings above implies that, though the movements of Providence on earth may seem conflicting and confused, yet if one lift up his eyes to heaven, he will see that they admirably conspire towards the one end at last. 12. The same idea as v. 9. The repetition is because we men are so hard to be brought to acknowledge the wisdom of God's doings; they seem tortuous and confused to us, but they are all tending steadily to one aim. the spirit—the secret impulse whereby God moves His angels to the end designed. They do not turn back or aside till they have fulfilled the office assigned them. 13. likeness . . . appearance—not tautology. "Likeness" expresses the general form; "appearance," the particular aspect. coals of fire—denoting the intensely pure and burning justice wherewith God punishes by His angels those who, like Israel, have hardened themselves against His long-suffering. So in Isaiah 6, instead of cherubim, the name "seraphim," the burning ones, is applied, indicating God's consuming righteousness; whence their cry to Him is, "Holy! holy! holy!" and the burning coal is applied to his lips, for the message through his mouth was to be one of judicial severance of the godly from the ungodly, to the ruin of the latter. lamps—torches. The fire emitted sparks and flashes of light, as torches do. went up and down—expressing the marvellous vigour of God's Spirit, in all His movements never resting, never wearied. fire . . . bright—indicating the glory of God. out of the fire . . . lightning—God's righteousness will at last cause the bolt of His wrath to fall on the guilty; as now, on Jerusalem. 14. ran and returned—incessant, restless motion indicates the plentitude of life in these cherubim; so in Revelation 4, 8, "they rest not day or night" (Zechariah 4, 10). flash of lightning—rather, as distinct from "lightning" (v. 13), "the meteor-flash," or sheet lightning. [FAIRBAIRN.] 15. one wheel—the "dreadful height" of the wheel (v. 18) indicates the gigantic, terrible energy of the complicated revolutions of God's providence, bringing about His purposes with unerring certainty. One wheel appeared traversely within another, so that the movement might be without turning, whithersoever the living creatures might advance (v. 17). Thus each wheel was composed of two circles cutting one another at right angles, "one" only of which appeared to touch the ground ("upon the earth"), according to the direction the cherubim desired to move in. with his four faces—rather, "according to its four faces" or sides; as there was a side or direction to each of the four creatures, so there was a wheel for each of the sides. [FAIRBAIRN.] The four sides or semicircles of each composite wheel pointed, as the four faces of each of the living creatures, to the four quarters of heaven. HAVERNICK refers "his" or "its" to the wheels. The cherubim and their wings and wheels stood in contrast to the symbolical figures, somewhat similar, then existing in Chaldea, and found in the remains of Assyria. The latter, though derived from the original revelation by tradition, came by corruption to symbolize the astronomical zodiac, or the sun and celestial sphere, by a circle with wings or irradiations. But Ezekiel's cherubim rise above natural objects, the gods of the heathen, to the representation of the one true God, who made and continually upholds them. 16. appearance . . . work—their form and the material of their work. beryl—rather, "the glancing appearance of the Tarshish-stone;" the chrysolite or topaz, brought from Tarshish or Tartessus in Spain. It was one of the gems in the breastplate of the high priest (Exodus 28, 20; Song of Solomon 5, 14; Daniel 10, 6), four had one likeness—the similarity of the wheels to one another implies that there is no inequality in all God's works that all have a beautiful analogy and proportion. 17. went upon their four sides—Those faces or sides of the four wheels moved which answered to the direction in which the cherubim desired to move; whilst the transverse circles in each of the four composite wheels remained suspended from the ground, so as not to impede the movements of the others. 18. rings—i. e., felloes, or circumferences of the wheels. eyes—the multiplicity of eyes here in the wheels, and ch. 10, 12, in the cherubim themselves, symbolizes the plenitude of intelligent life, the eye being the window through which "the spirit of the living creatures" in the wheels (v. 20) looks forth (cf. Zechariah 4, 10). As the wheels signify the providence of God, so the eyes imply that He sees all the circumstances of each case, and does nothing by blind impulse. 19. went by them—went beside them. 20. the spirit was to go—i. e., their will was for going whithersoever the Spirit was for going. over against them—rather, beside or in conjunction with them. spirit of the living creature—put collectively for "the living creatures" the cherubim. Having first viewed them separately, he next views them in the aggregate as the composite living creature in which the Spirit resided. The life intended is that connected with God, holy, spiritual life, in the plenitude of its active power. 21. over against—rather, "along with" [HENDERSON]; or, "beside," [FAIRBAIRN.] 22. upon the heads—rather, "above the heads," [FAIRBAIRN.] colour—glitter, terrible crystal—dazzling the spectator by its brightness. 23. straight—erect. [FAIRBAIRN.] Expanded upright. two . . . two . . . covered . . . bodies—not, as it might seem, contradicting v. 11. The two wings expanded upwards, though chiefly used for flying, yet up to the summit of the figure where they were parted from each other, covered the upper part of the body, whilst the other two wings covered the lower parts. 24. voice of . . . Almighty—the thunder (Psalm 29, 3, 4). voice of speech—rather, "the voice" or "sound of tumult," as in Jeremiah 11, 16. From an Arabic root, meaning the impetuous rush of heavy rain. noise of . . . host—(Isaiah 13, 4; Daniel 10, 6.) 25. let down . . . wings—whilst the Almighty gave forth His voice, they reverently let their wings fall, to listen stilly to His communication. 26. The Godhead appears in the likeness of enthroned humanity, as in Exodus 24, 10. Besides the "paved work of a sapphire stone, as it were the body of heaven in clearness," there, we have here the "throne," and God "as a man," with the "appearance of fire round about." This last was a prelude of the incarnation of Messiah, but in His character as Saviour and as Judge (Revelation 19, 11-16). The azure sapphire answers to the colour of the sky. As others are called "sons of God," but He "the Son of God," so others are called "sons of man" (ch. 2, 1, 3), but He "the Son of man" (Matthew 16, 13), being the embodied representative of humanity and the whole human race; as, on the other hand, He is the representative of "the fulness of the Godhead" (Colossians 2, 9). Whilst the cherubim are movable, the throne above, and Jehovah who moves them, are firmly fixed. It is good news to man, that the throne above is filled by One who even there appears as "a man." 27. colour of amber—"the glitter of chasnal." [FAIRBAIRN.] See Note, v. 4; rather, "polished brass." [HENDERSON.] Messiah is described here as in Daniel 10, 5, 6; Revelation 1, 14, 15. 28. the bow . . . in . . . rain—the symbol of the sure covenant of mercy to God's children remembered amidst judgments on the wicked; as in the flood in Noah's days (Revelation 4, 3). "Like hanging out from the throne of the Eternal a flag of peace, assuring all that the purpose of Heaven was to preserve rather than to destroy. Even if the Divine work should require a deluge of wrath, still the faithfulness of God would only shine forth the more brightly at last to the children of promise, in consequence of the tribulations needed to prepare for the ultimate good" [FAIRBAIRN] (Isaiah 51, 8-10). I fell upon . . . face—the right attitude, spiritually, before we enter on any active work for God

(ch. 2, 2; 3, 23, 24; Revelation 1, 17). In this first chapter God gathered into one vision the substance of all that was to occupy the prophetic agency of Ezekiel; as was done afterwards in the opening vision of the Revelation of Saint John.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-10. EZEKIEL'S COMMISSION. 1. Son of man—often applied to Ezekiel; once only to Daniel (Daniel 8, 17), and not any other prophet. The phrase was no doubt taken from Chaldean usage during the sojourn of Daniel and Ezekiel in Chaldea. But the spirit who sanctioned the words of the prophet implied by it the lowliness and frailty of the prophet as man "lower than the angels," though now admitted to the vision of angels and of God Himself, "lest he should be exalted through the abundance of the revelations" (2 Corinthians 12, 7). He is appropriately so called as being type of the Divine "Son of man" here revealed as "man" (Note, ch. 1, 26). That title, as applied to Messiah, implies at once His lowliness and His exaltation, in His manifestations as the Representative man, at His first and second comings respectively (Psalm 8, 4-8; Matthew 16, 13; 20, 18; and on the other hand, Daniel 7, 13, 14; Matthew 26, 61; John 5, 27). 2. spirit entered . . . when he spake—the Divine word is ever accompanied by the Spirit (Genesis 1, 2, 3). set . . . upon . . . feet—he had been "upon his face" (ch. 1, 28). Humiliation on our part is followed by exaltation on God's (ch. 3, 23, 24; Job 22, 29; James 4, 6; 1 Peter 5, 5). "On the feet" was the fitting attitude when he was called on to walk and work for God (Ephesians 5, 8; 6, 15). that I heard—rather, "then I heard." 3. nation—rather, nations; the word usually applied to the heathen or Gentiles; here to the Jews, as being altogether heathenized with idolatries. So in Isaiah 1, 10, they are named "Sodom" and "Gomorrah." They were now become "Lo-ammi," not the people of God (Hosea 1, 9). 4. impudent—lit., hard-faced (ch. 3, 7, 9). children—resumptive of "they" (v. 3); the "children" walk in their "fathers'" steps. I . . . send thee—God opposes His command to all obstacles. Duties are ours; events are God's. Thus saith the Lord God—God opposes His name to the obstinacy of the people. 5. forbear—viz., to hear. yet shall know—even if they will not hear, at least they will not have ignorance to plead as the cause of their perversity (ch. 33, 33). 6. briars—not as Margin and GENEVIUS, "rebels," which would not correspond so well to "thorns." The Hebrew is from a root meaning "to sting" as netles do. The wicked are often so called (2 Samuel 23, 6; Song of Solomon 2, 2; Isaiah 9, 18). scorpions—a reptile about six inches long, with a deadly sting at the end of the tail. be not afraid—(Luke 12, 4; 1 Peter 3, 14). 7. most rebellious—lit., "rebellion" itself; very its essence. 8. eat—(Jeremiah 15, 16, Note; Revelation 10, 9, 10.) The idea is to possess himself fully of the message, and digest it in the mind: not literal eating, but such an appropriation of its unsavoury contents, that they should become, as it were, part of himself, so as to impart them the more vividly to his hearers. 9. roll—the form in which ancient books were made up. 10. within and without—on the face and the back. Usually the parchment was written only on its inside when rolled up; but so full was God's message of impending woes, it was written also on the back.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-27. EZEKIEL EATS THE ROLL: IS COMMISSIONED TO GO TO THEM OF THE CAPTIVITY, AND GOES TO TELABIB BY THE CHEBAR: AGAIN BEHOLDS THE SHEKINAH GLORY: IS DESIRED TO RETURN TO HIS HOUSE, AND ONLY SPEAK WHEN GOD OPENS HIS MOUTH. 1. eat . . . and . . . speak—God's messenger must first inwardly appropriate God's truth himself, before he "speaks" it to others (Note, ch. 2, 8). Symbolic actions were, when possible and proper, performed outwardly; otherwise, internally and in spiritual vision, the action so narrated making the naked statement more intuitive and impressive by presenting the subject in a concentrated, em-

bodied form. 3. honey for sweetness—Psalm 19. 10; 119. 103; Revelation 10. 9, where, as here, v. 14, the "sweetness" is followed by "bitterness." The former being due to the painful nature of the message; the latter because it was the Lord's service which he was engaged in; and his eating the roll, and finding it sweet, implied that, divesting himself of carnal feeling, he made God's will his will, however painful the message that God might require him to announce. The fact that God would be glorified was his greatest pleasure. 5. See Margin, Hebrew, "depp of lip and heavy of tongue," i. e., men speaking an obscure and unintelligible tongue. Even they would have listened to the prophet; but the Jews, though addressed in their own tongue, will not hear him. 6. many people—It would have increased the difficulty had he been sent, not merely to one, but to "many people" differing in tongues, so that the missionary would have needed to acquire a new tongue for addressing each. The after mission of the apostles to many peoples, and the gift of tongues for that end, are foreshadowed (cf. 1 Corinthians 14. 21 with Isaiah 28. 11). had I sent thee to them, they would have hearkened—(Matthew 11. 21, 23.) 7. will not hearken unto thee: for . . . not . . . me—(John 15. 20.) Take patiently their rejection of thee, for I thy Lord bear it along with thee. 8. Ezekiel means one "strengthened by God." Such he was in godly firmness, in spite of his people's opposition, according to the Divine command to the priest tribe to which he belonged (Deuteronomy 33. 9). 9. As . . . flint—So Messiah the antitype (Isaiah 50. 7; cf. Jeremiah 1. 8, 17). 10. receive in . . . heart . . . ears—The transposition from the natural order, viz., first receiving with the ears, then in the heart, is designed. The preparation of the heart for God's message should precede the reception of it with the ears (cf. Proverbs 16. 1; Psalm 10. 17). 11. thy people—who ought to be better disposed to hearken to thee, their fellow-countrymen, than hadst thou been a foreigner (v. 5, 6). 12. (Acts 8. 39.) Ezekiel's abode heretofore had not been the most suitable for his work. He, therefore, is guided by the Spirit to Tel-abib, the chief town of the Jewish colony of captives; there he sat on the ground, "the throne of the miserably" (Ezra 9. 3; Lamentations 1. 1-3), seven days, the usual period for manifesting deep grief (Job 2. 13; see Psalm 137. 1), thus winning their confidence by sympathy in their sorrow. He is accompanied by the cherubim which had been manifested at Chebar (ch. 1. 3, 4), after their departure from Jerusalem. They now are heard moving with the "voice of a great rushing" (cf. Acts 2. 2), saying, Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place," i. e., moving from the place in which it had been at Chebar, to accompany Ezekiel to his new destination (ch. 9. 3); or, "from his place" may rather mean, in His place and manifested "from" it. Though God may seem to have forsaken His temple, He is still in it, and will restore His people to it. His glory is "blessed," in opposition to those Jews who spoke evil of Him, as if He had been unjustly rigorous towards their nation. [CALVIN.] 13. touched—lit., kissed, i. e., closely embraced. noise of a great rushing—typical of great disasters impending over the Jews. 14. bitterness—sadness on account of the impending calamities of which I was required to be the unwelcome messenger. But the "hand," or powerful impulse of Jehovah, urged me forward. 15. Tel-abib—Tel means an "elevation." It is identified by MICHAELIS with Thal-laba on the Chabour. Perhaps the name expressed the Jews' hopes of restoration, or else the fertility of the region. Abib means the green ears of corn which appeared in the month Nisan, the pledge of the harvest. I sat, &c.—This is the Hebrew Margin reading. The text is rather, "I beheld them sitting there" [GESENIUS]; or, "And those that were settled there," viz., the older settlers, as distinguished from the more recent ones alluded to in the previous clause. The ten tribes had been long since settled on the Chabor or Habor (2 Kings 17. 6). [HAEVERNICK.] 17. watchman—Ezekiel alone, among the prophets, is called a "watchman," not merely to sympathize, but to give timely warning of danger to his people where none was suspected. Habakkuk

(2. 1) speaks of standing upon his "watch," but it was only in order to be on the look-out for the manifestation of God's power (so Isaiah 52. 8; 62. 6); not as Ezekiel, to act as a watchman to others. 18. warning . . . speak-est to warn—The repetition implies that it is not enough to warn once in passing, but that the warning is to be inculcated continually (2 Timothy 4. 2, "in season, out of season;" Acts 20. 31, "night and day with tears"). save—Ch. 2. 5, had seemingly taken away all hope of salvation; but the reference there was to the mass of the people whose case was hopeless; a few individuals, however, were reclaimable. die in . . . iniquity—(John 8. 21, 24.) Men are not to flatter themselves that their ignorance, owing to the negligence of their teachers, will save them (Romans 2. 12, "As many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law"). 19. wickedness . . . wicked way—internal wickedness of heart, and external of the life, respectively. delivered thy soul—(Isaiah 49. 4, 5; Acts 20. 26.) 20. righteous . . . turn from . . . righteousness—not one "righteous" as to the root and spirit of regeneration (Psalm 89. 33; 138. 8; Isaiah 26. 12; 27. 3; John 10. 28; Philippians 1. 6), but as to its outward appearance and performances. So the "righteous" (Proverbs 18. 17; Matthew 9. 13). As in v. 19, the minister is required to lead the wicked to good, so in v. 20, to confirm the well-disposed in their duty. commit iniquity—i. e., give himself up wholly to it (1 John 3. 8, 9), for even the best often fall, but not wilfully and habitually. I lay a stumbling-block—not that God tempts to sin (James 1. 13, 14), but God gives men over to judicial blindness, and to their own corruptions (Psalm 9. 16, 17; 94. 23), when they "like not to retain God in their knowledge" (Romans 1. 24, 26); just as, on the contrary, God makes "the way of the righteous plain" (Proverbs 4. 11, 12; 15. 19), so that they do "not stumble." CALVIN refers "stumbling-block" not to the guilt, but to its punishment; "I bring ruin on him." The former is best. Ahab, after a kind of righteousness (1 Kings 21. 27-29), relapsed, and consulted lying spirits in false prophets; so God permitted one of these to be his "stumbling-block," both to sin and its corresponding punishment (1 Kings 22. 21-23). his blood will I require—(Hebrews 13. 17.) 23. hand of the Lord—(Ch. 1. 3.) go . . . into the plain—in order that he might there, in a place secluded from unbelieving men, receive a fresh manifestation of the Divine glory, to inspire him for his trying work. 23. glory of the Lord—(Ch. 1. 28.) 24. set me upon my feet—having been previously prostrate and unable to rise until raised by the Divine power. shut thyself within . . . house—implying, that in the work he had to do, he must look for no sympathy from man, but must be often alone with God, and draw his strength from Him. [FAIRBAIRN.] "Do not go out of thy house till I reveal the future to thee by signs and words," which God does in the following chapters, down to the eleventh. Thus a representation was given of the city shut up by siege. [GROTIUS.] Thereby God proved the obedience of His servant, and Ezekiel showed the reality of His call by proceeding, not through rash impulse, but by the directions of God. [CALVIN.] 25. put bands upon thee—not literally, but spiritually, the binding, depressing influence which their rebellious conduct would exert on his spirit. Their perversity, like bands, would repress his freedom in preaching. As in 2 Corinthians 6. 12, Saint Paul calls himself "straitened," because his teaching did not find easy access to them. Or else, it is said to console the prophet for being shut up; if thou wert now at once to announce God's message, they would rush on thee and bind thee with "bands." [CALVIN.] 26. I will make my tongue . . . dumb—Israel had rejected the prophets; therefore God deprives Israel of the prophets and of His word—God's sorest judgment (1 Samuel 7. 2; Amos 8. 11, 12). 27. when I speak . . . I will open thy mouth—opposed to the silence imposed on the prophet, to punish the people (v. 26). After the interval of silence has awakened their attention to the cause of it, viz., their sins, they may then hearken to the prophecies which they would not do before. he that heareth, let him hear . . . forbear—i. e., thou hast done thy part, whether they hear or forbear. He who shall forbear to hear, it shall be at his own peril; he who hears, it shall be to his own eternal good (cf. Revelation 22. 11).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-17. SYMBOLICAL VISION OF THE SIEGE AND THE INIQUITY-BEARING. 1. tile—a sun-dried brick, such as are found in Babylon, covered with cuneiform inscriptions, often two feet long, one broad. 2. fort—rather, a watch-tower (Jeremiah 52. 4) wherein the besiegers could watch the movements of the besieged. [GESENIUS.] A wall of circumvallation. [LXX. and ROSENMULLER.] A kind of battering-ram. [MAURER.] The first view is best. a mount—wherewith the Chaldeans could be defended from missiles. battering-rams—lit., through-borers. In ch. 21. 22 the same Hebrew is translated, "captains." iron pan—the Divine decree as to the Chaldean army investing the city. 3. set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city—Ezekiel, in the person of God, represents the wall of separation between him and the people as one of iron; and the Chaldean investing army, His instrument of separating them from him, as one impossible to burst through. set . . . face against it—inexorably (Psalm 31. 10). The exiles envied their brethren remaining in Jerusalem, but exile is better than the straitness of a siege. 4. Another symbolical act performed at the same time as the former, in vision, not in external action, wherein it would have been only puerile: narrated as a thing ideally done, it would make a vivid impression. The second action is supplementary to the first, to bring out more fully the same prophetic idea. left side—referring to the position of the ten tribes, the northern Kingdom, as Judah, the southern, answers to "the right side" (v. 6). The Orientals, facing the east in their mode, had the north on their left, and the south on their right (ch. 16. 46). Also the right was more honourable than the left: so Judah, as being the seat of the temple, was more so than Israel. bear their iniquity—iniquity being regarded as a burden; so it means, "bear the punishment of their iniquity" (Numbers 14. 34). A type of Him who was the great sin-bearer, not in mimic show as Ezekiel, but in reality (Isaiah 53. 4, 6, 12). 5. three hundred and ninety days—the 390 years of punishment appointed for Israel, and forty for Judah, cannot refer to the siege of Jerusalem. That siege is referred to v. 1-3, not in a sense restricted to the literal siege, but comprehending the whole train of punishment to be inflicted for their sin; therefore we read here merely of its sore pressure, not of its result. The sum of 390 and 40 years is 430, a period famous in the history of the covenant people, being that of their sojourn in Egypt (Exodus 12. 40, 41; Galatians 3. 17). The forty alludes to the forty years in the wilderness. Elsewhere (Deuteronomy 28. 63; Hosea 9. 3), God threatened to bring them back to Egypt, which must mean, not Egypt literally, but a bondage as bad as that one in Egypt. So now God will reduce them to a kind of new Egyptian bondage to the world: Israel, the greater transgressor, for a longer period than Judah (cf. ch. 20. 35-38). Not the whole of the 430 years of the Egypt state is appointed to Israel; but this shortened by the forty years of the wilderness sojourn, to imply, that a way is open to their return to life by their having the Egypt state merged into that of the wilderness, i. e., by ceasing from idolatry, and seeking in their sifting and sore troubles, through God's covenant, a restoration to righteousness and peace. [FAIRBAIRN.] The 390, in reference to the sin of Israel, was also literally true, being the years from the setting up of the calves by Jeroboam (1 Kings 12. 20-33), i. e., from 875 to 585 B. C.; about the year of the Babylonian captivity; and perhaps the 40 of Judah refers to that part of Manasseh's fifty-five years' reign in which he had not repented, and which, we are expressly told, was the cause of God's removal of Judah, notwithstanding Josiah's reformation (1 Kings 21. 10-16; 23. 26, 27). 6. each day for a year—lit., a day for a year, a day for a year. Twice repeated, to mark more distinctly the reference to Numbers 14. 34. The picturing of the future under the image of the past, wherein the meaning was far from lying on the surface, was intended to arouse to a less superficial mode of thinking, just as the partial veiling of truth in Jesus' parables was designed to stimulate inquiry; also to remind men that God's dealings in the past are a key to the future, for He moves on the same everlasting principles, the forms alone being transitory. 7. arm . . . uncovered—to be ready for action, which the long Oriental garment usually covering it would prevent (Isaiah 52. 10). thou shalt prophesy against it—his gesture of thine will be a taunt prophecy against it. 8. bands—(Ch. 3. 25.) not turn from . . . side—to imply the impossibility of their being able to shake off their punishment. 9. wheat . . . barley, &c.—instead of simple flour used for delicate cakes (Genesis 18. 6), the Jews should have a coarse mixture of six different kinds of grain, such as the poorest alone would eat. fiches—spelt or dhourra. three hundred and ninety—the forty days are omitted, since these latter typify the wilderness period when Israel stood separate from the Gentiles and their pollutions, though partially chastened by stint of bread and water (v. 16), whereas the eating of the polluted bread in the 390 days implies a forced residence "among the Gentiles" who were polluted with idolatry (v. 13). This last is said of "Israel" primarily, as being the most debased (v. 9-15); they had spiritually sunk to a level with the heathen, therefore God will make their condition outwardly to correspond: Judah and Jerusalem fare less hardly, being less guilty: they are to "eat bread by weight and with care," i. e., have a stinted supply, and be chastened with the milder discipline of the wilderness period. But Judah also is secondarily referred to in the 390 days, as having fallen, like Israel, into Gentile defilements; if, then, the Jews are to escape from the exile among Gentiles, which is their just punishment, they must submit again to the wilderness-probation (v. 16). 10. twenty shekels—i. e., little more than ten ounces. A scant measure to sustain life (Jeremiah 52. 6). But it applies not only to the siege, but to their whole subsequent state. 11. sixth . . . of . . . hin—about a pint and a half. 12. dung—as fuel; so the Arabs use beasts' dung, wood-fuel being scarce. But to use human dung so implies the most cruel necessity. It was in violation of the law (Deuteronomy 14. 3; 23. 12-14); it must therefore have been done only in vision. 13. Implying that Israel's peculiar distinction was to be abolished, and that they were to be outwardly blended with the idolatrous heathen (Deuteronomy 28. 63; Hosea 9. 3). 14. Ezekiel, as a priest, had been accustomed to the strictest abstinence from everything legally impure. Peter felt the same scruple at a similar command (Acts 10. 14; cf. Isaiah 65. 4). Positive precepts, being dependent on a particular command can be set aside at the will of the Divine ruler; but moral precepts are everlasting in their obligation, because God cannot be inconsistent with His unchanging moral nature. abominable flesh—lit., flesh that stank from putridity. Flesh of animals three days killed was prohibited (Leviticus 7. 17, 18; 19. 6, 7). 15. cow's dung—a mitigation of the former order (v. 12); no longer "the dung of man;" still the bread so baked is "defiled," to imply that, whatever partial abatement there might be for the prophet's sake, the main decree of God, as to the pollution of Israel by exile among Gentiles, is unalterable. 16. staff of bread—bread by which life is supported, as a man's weight is by the staff he leans on (Leviticus 26. 26; Psalm 105. 16; Isaiah 3. 1). by weight, and with care—in scant measure (v. 10). 17. astonished one with another—mutually regard one another with astonishment: the stupefied look of despairing want.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-17. VISION OF CUTTING THE HAIRS, AND THE CALAMITIES FORESHADOWED THEREBY. 1. knife . . . razor—the sword of the foe (cf. Isaiah 7. 20). This vision implies even severer judgments than the Egyptian afflictions foreshadowed in the former, for their guilt was greater than that of their forefathers. thine head—as representative of the Jews. The whole hair being shaven off was significant of severe and humiliating (2 Samuel 10. 4, 5) treatment. Especially in the case of a priest; for priests (Leviticus 21. 5) were forbidden "to make baldness on their head," their hair being the token of consecration; hereby it was intimated that the ceremonial must give place to the moral. balances—implying the just discrimination with which Jehovah weighs out the portion of punishment "divided," i. e., allotted to each: the "hairs" are the Jews: the Divine scales do not allow even one hair to escape accurate weighing (cf. Matthew 10. 30). 3. Three classes are described. The sword was to destroy one third of the people; famine and plague another third ("fire" in v. 2 being explained in v. 12 to mean pestilence and famine"); that which remained was to be scattered among the nations. A few only of the last portion were to escape, symbolized by the hairs bound in Ezekiel's skirts (v. 3; Jeremiah 40. 6; 52. 16). Even of these some were to be thrown into the fiery ordeal again (v. 4; Jeremiah 41. 1, 2, &c.; 44. 14, &c.). The "skirts" being able to contain but few express that extreme limit to which God's goodness can reach. 5, 6. Explanation of the symbols. Jerusalem—not the mere city, but the people of Israel generally, of which it was the centre and representative. in . . . midst—Jerusalem is regarded in God's point of view as centre of the whole earth, designed to radiate the true light over the nations in all directions. Cf. Margin ("navel"), ch. 33. 12; Psalm 43. 2; Jeremiah 3. 17. No centre in the ancient heathen world could have been selected more fitted than Canaan to be a vantage-ground, whence the people of God might have acted with success upon the heathenism of the world. It lay midway between the oldest and most civilized states, Egypt and Ethiopia on one side, and Babylon, Nineveh, and India on the other, and afterwards Persia, Greece, and Rome. The Phœnician mariners were close by, through whom they might have transmitted the true religion to the remotest lands; and all around the Ishmaelites, the great inland traders in South Asia and North Africa. Israel was thus placed, not for its own selfish good, but to be the spiritual benefactor of the whole world. Cf. Psalm 67. throughout. Failing in this, and falling into idolatry, its guilt was far worse than that of the heathen; not that Israel literally went beyond the heathen in abominable idolatries. But "corruptio optimi pessima," the perversion of that which in itself is the best is worse than the perversion of that which is less perfect: is in fact the worst of all kinds of perversion. Therefore their punishment was the severest. So the position of the Christian professing Church now, if it be not a light to the heathen world, its condemnation will be sorer than theirs (Matthew 5. 13; 11. 21-24; Hebrews 10. 28, 29). 6. changed . . . into—rather, "hath resisted my judgments wickedly;" "hath rebelled against my ordinances for wickedness." [BUXFORD.] But see end of Note on v. 7. 7. multiplied—rather, "have been more abundantly outrageous;" lit., to tumultuate; to have an extravagant rage for idols. neither have done according to the judgments of the nations—have not been as tenacious of the true religion as the nations have been of the false. The heathen "changed" not their gods, but the Jews changed Jehovah for idols (see v. 6, "changed my judgments into wickedness," i. e., idolatry, Jeremiah 2. 11). The Chaldean version and the Masora support the negative. Others omit it, as it is omitted (ch. 11. 12), and translate, "but have done according to the judgments," &c. However, both ch. 11. 12 and also this verse are true. They in one sense "did according to the heathen," viz., in all that was bad; in another, viz., in that which was good, zeal for religion, they did not. Verse 9 also proves the negative to be genuine; because in changing their religion they have not done as the nations which have not changed theirs, "I (also) will do in thee that which I have not done." 8. I, even I—awfully emphatic. I, even I, whom thou thinkest to be asleep, but who am ever reigning as the Omnipotent Avenger of sin, will vindicate my righteous government before the nations by judgments on thee. 9. See Note, v. 7. that which I have not done—worse than any former judgments (Lamentations 4. 6; Daniel 9. 12). The prophecy includes the destruction of Jerusalem

by the Romans, and the final one by Antichrist (Zechariah 13. 8, 9; 14. 2), as well as that by Nebuchadnezzar. Their doom of evil was not exhausted by the Chaldean conquest. There was to be a germinating evil in their destiny, because there would be, as the Lord foresaw, a germinating evil in their character. As God connected Himself peculiarly with Israel, so there was to be a peculiar manifestation of God's wrath against sin in their case. [FAIRBAIRN.] The higher the privileges the greater the punishment in the case of abuse of them. When God's greatest favour, the gospel, was given, and was abused by them, then "the wrath was to come on them to the uttermost" (1 Thessalonians 2. 16). 10. fathers . . . eat . . . sons—alluding to Moses' words (Leviticus 26. 29; Deuteronomy 28. 53), with the additional sad feature, that "the sons should eat their fathers" (see 2 Kings 6. 28; Jeremiah 19. 9; Lamentations 2. 20; 4. 10). 11. as I live—the most solemn of oaths, pledging the self-existence of God for the certainty of the event. defiled my sanctuary—the climax of Jewish guilt; their defiling Jehovah's temple by introducing idols. diminish—lit., withdraw, viz., mine "eye" (which presently follows), i. e., my favours; Job 36. 7 uses the Hebrew verb in the same way. As the Jews had withdrawn from God's sanctuary its sacredness by "defiling" it, so God withdraws His countenance from them. The significance of the expression lies in the allusion to Deuteronomy 4. 2, "Ye shall not diminish aught from the word which I command you;" they had done so, therefore God diminishes them. The reading found in six MSS., "I will cut thee off," is not so good. 12. Statement in plain terms of what was intended by the symbols (v. 2; see ch. 6. 12; Jeremiah 15. 2; 21. 9). draw out . . . sword after them—(Leviticus 26. 33.) Skeptics object; no such thing happened under Zedekiah, as is here foretold, viz., that a third part of the nation should die by pestilence, a third part by the sword, and a third be scattered unto all winds, and a sword sent after them. But the prophecy is not restricted to Zedekiah's time. It includes all that Israel suffered, or was still to suffer, for their sins, especially those committed at that period (ch. 17. 21). It only received its primary fulfilment under Zedekiah: numbers then died by the pestilence and by the sword; and numbers were scattered in all quarters, and not carried to Babylonia alone, as the objectors assert (cf. Ezra 1. 4; Esther 3. 8; Obadiah 1.). pestilence . . . and famine—signified by the symbol "fire" (v. 2). Cf. Isaiah 13. 8; Lamentations 5. 10; plague and famine burning and withering the countenance, as fire does. 13. cause my fury to rest upon them—as on its proper and permanent resting-place (Isaiah 30. 32, Margin). I will be comforted—expressed in condescension to man's conceptions; signifying His satisfaction in the vindication of His justice by His righteous judgments (Deuteronomy 28. 63; Proverbs 1. 26; Isaiah 1. 24). they shall know—by bitter experience. 14. reproach among the nations—they whose idolatries Israel had adopted, instead of comforting, would only exult in their calamities brought on by those idolatries (cf. Luke 15. 15). 15. instruction—lit., a corrective chastisement, i. e., a striking example to warn all of the fatal consequences of sin. For "it shall be;" all ancient versions have "thou," which the connection favours. 16. arrows of famine—hail, rain, mice, locusts, mildew (see Deuteronomy 32. 23, 24). increase the famine—lit., congregate or collect. When ye think your harvest safe, because ye have escaped drought, mildew, &c., I will find other means [CALVIN], which I will congregate as the forces of an invading army, to bring famine on you. 17. beasts—perhaps meaning destructive conquerors (Daniel 7. 4). Rather, literal "beasts," which infest desolated regions such as Judea was to become (cf. ch. 34. 28; Exodus 23. 29; Deuteronomy 32. 24; 2 Kings 17. 25). The same threat is repeated in manifold forms, to awaken the careless. svord—civil war.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-14. CONTINUATION OF THE SAME SUBJECT. 3. mountains of Israel—i. e., of Palestine in general. The mountains are addressed by personification; implying that the Israelites themselves are incurable and unworthy of any more appeals; so the prophet sent to Jeroboam did not deign to address the king, but addressed the altar (1 Kings 13, 2). The mountains are specified as being the scene of Jewish idolatries on "the high places" (v. 3; Leviticus 26, 30). 3. rivers—lit., the channels of torrents. Rivers were often the scene and objects of idolatrous worship. 4. images—called so from a Hebrew root, to wax hot, implying the mad ardour of Israel after idolatry. [CALVIN.] Others translate it, sun-images; and so in v. 6 (see 2 Kings 23, 11; 2 Chronicles 34, 4; Isaiah 17, 8, Margin). cast your slain men before your idols—the foolish objects of their trust in the day of evil should witness their ruin. 5. carcasses . . . before . . . idols—polluting thus with the dead bones of you, the worshippers, the idols which seemed to you so sacrosanct. 6. your works—not gods, as you supposed, but the mere work of men's hands (Isaiah 40, 13-20). 7. ye shall know that I am the Lord—and not your idols, lords. Ye shall know me as the all-powerful Punisher of sin. 8. Mitigation of the extreme severity of their punishment; still their life shall be a wretched one, and linked with exile (ch. 5, 2, 12; 12, 16; 14, 22; Jeremiah 44, 28). 9. they that escape of you shall remember me—the object of God's chastisements shall at last be effected by working in them true contrition. This partially took place in the complete eradication of idolatry from the Jews ever since the Babylonian captivity. But they have yet to repent of their crowning sin, the crucifixion of Messiah; their full repentance is therefore future, after the ordeal of trials for many centuries, ending with that foretold in Zechariah 10, 9; 13, 8, 9; 14, 1-4, 11. "They shall remember me in far countries" (ch. 7, 16; Deuteronomy 30, 1-8). I am broken with their whorish heart—FAIRBAIRN translates, actively, "I will break" their whorish heart; English Version is better. In their exile they shall remember how long I bore with them, but was at last compelled to punish, after I was "broken" (my long-suffering wearied out) by their desperate (Numbers 15, 39) spiritual whorishness [CALVIN] (Psalm 73, 40; Isaiah 7, 13; 43, 24; 63, 10). loathe themselves—(Leviticus 26, 39-45; Job 42, 6.) They shall not wait for men to condemn them, but shall condemn themselves (ch. 20, 43; 36, 31; Job 42, 6; 1 Corinthians 11, 31). 11. Gesticulations vividly setting before the hearers the greatness of the calamity about to be inflicted. In indignation at the abominations of Israel extend thine hand towards Judea, as if about to "strike," and "stamp," shaking off the dust with thy foot, in token of how God shall "stretch out His hand upon them," and tread them down (v. 14; ch. 21, 14). 12. He that is far off—viz., from the foe; those who in a distant exile fear no evil. he that remaineth—he that is left in the city; not carried away into captivity, nor having escaped into the country. Distinct from "he that is near," viz., those outside the city who are within reach of "the sword" of the foe, and so fall by it; not by "famine," as those left in the city. 14. Diblath—Another form of Diblathaim, a city in Moab (Numbers 33, 46; Jeremiah 48, 22), near which, east and south of the Dead Sea, was the wilderness of Arabia Deserta.

CHAPTER VII.

VER. 1-27. LAMENTATION OVER THE COMING RUIN OF ISRAEL; THE PENITENT REFORMATION OF A REMNANT; THE CHAIN SYMBOLIZING THE CAPTIVITY. 2. An end, the end—The indefinite "an" expresses the general fact of God bringing His long-suffering towards the whole of Judea to an end; "the," following, marks it as more definitely fixed (Amos 8, 2). 4. thine abominations—the punishment of thine abominations, shall be in the midst of thee—shall be manifest to all. They and thou shall recognize the fact of thine abominations by thy punishment which shall everywhere befall thee, and that manifestly. 5. An evil, an only evil—A peculiar calamity such as was never before; unparalleled. The abruptness of the style and the repetitions express the agitation of the prophet's mind in foreseeing these calamities. 6.

watcheth for thee—Rather, "waketh for thee." It awakes up from its past slumber against thee (Psalm 78, 65, 66). 7. The morning—So Chaldean and Syriac versions (cf. Joel 2, 2). Ezekiel wishes to awaken them from their lethargy, whereby they were promising to themselves an uninterrupted night (1 Thessalonians 5, 5-7), as if they were never to be called to account. [CALVIN.] The expression, "morning," refers to the fact that this was the usual time for magistrates giving sentence against offenders (cf. v. 10, below; Psalm 101, 8; Jeremiah 21, 12). GESENIUS, less probably, translates, "the order of fate;" thy turn to be punished. not the sounding again—not an empty echo, such as is produced by the reverberation of sounds in "the mountains," but a real cry of tumult is coming. [CALVIN.] Perhaps it alludes to the joyous cries of the grape-gatherers at vintage on the hills [GROTIUS], or of the idolaters in their dances on their festivals in honour of their false gods. [TIRINUS.] HAVERNICK translates, "no brightness." 8, 9. Repetition of v. 3, 4; sadly expressive of accumulated woes by the monotonous sameness. 10. rod . . . blossomed, pride . . . budded—the "rod" is the Chaldean Nebuchadnezzar, the instrument of God's vengeance (Isaiah 10, 5; Jeremiah 51, 20). The rod sprouting (as the word ought to be translated), &c., implies that God does not move precipitately, but in successive steps. He as it were has planted the ministers of His vengeance, and leaves them to grow till all is ripe for executing His purpose. "Pride" refers to the insolence of the Babylonian conqueror (Jeremiah 50, 31, 32). The parallelism ("pride" answering to "rod") opposes JEROME'S view, that "pride" refers to the Jews who despised God's threats (also CALVIN'S, "though the rod grew in Chaldea, the root was with the Jews"). The "rod" cannot refer, as GROTIUS thought, to the tribe of Judah, for it evidently refers to the "smite" (v. 9) as the instrument of smiting. 11. Violence, i. e., the violent foe, is risen up as a rod of, i. e., to punish the Jews' wickedness (Zechariah 5, 8). theirs—their possessions, or all that belongs to them, whether children or goods. GROTIUS translates, from a different Hebrew root, "their nobles," lit., their tumultuous trains (Margin) which usually escorted the nobles. Thus "nobles" will form a contrast to the general "multitude." neither . . . wailing—(Jeremiah 16, 4-7; 25, 33.) GESENIUS translates, "nor shall there be left any beauty among them." English Version is supported by the old Jewish interpreters. So general shall be the slaughter, none shall be left to mourn the dead. 12. let not . . . buyer rejoice—because he has bought an estate at a bargain price. nor . . . seller mourn—because he has had to sell his land at a sacrifice through poverty. The Chaldeans will be masters of the land, so that neither shall the buyer have any good of his purchase, nor the seller any loss; nor shall the latter (v. 13) return to his inheritance at the jubilee year (see Leviticus 25, 13). Spiritually this holds good now, seeing that "the time is short," "they that rejoice should be as though they rejoiced not, and they that buy as though they possessed not;" Saint Paul (1 Corinthians 7, 30) seems to allude to Ezekiel here. Jeremiah 32, 15, 37, 43, seems to contradict Ezekiel here. But Ezekiel is speaking of the parents, and of the present; Jeremiah, of the children, and of the future. Jeremiah is addressing believers, that they should hope for a restoration; Ezekiel, the reprobate, who were excluded from hope of deliverance. 13. although they were yet alive—although they should live to the year of jubilee. multitude thereof—viz., of the Jews. which shall not return—answering to "the seller shall not return;" not only he, but the whole multitude, shall not return. CALVIN omits is and which: "the vision touching the whole multitude shall not return" void (Isaiah 55, 11). neither shall any strengthen himself in the iniquity of his life—no hardening of one's self in iniquity will avail against God's threat of punishment. FAIRBAIRN translates, "no one by his iniquity shall invigorate his life;" referring to the jubilee, which was regarded as a revivification of the whole commonwealth, when, its disorders being rectified, the body politic sprang up again into renewed life. What God thus provided for by the institution of the jubilee, and which is now to cease through the nation's iniquity, let none think to bring about by his iniquity. 14. they have blown—rather, "Blow the trumpet," or, "Let them blow the trumpet" to collect soldiers as they will, "to make all ready" for encountering the foe, it will be of no avail: none will have the courage to go to the battle (cf. Jeremiah 6. 1). [CALVIN.] 15. No security should anywhere be found (Deuteronomy 32. 25). Fulfilled (Lamentations 1. 20); also at the Roman invasion (Matthew 24. 16-18). 16. (Ch. 6. 6.) like doves—which, though usually frequenting the valleys, mount up to the mountains when fearing the bird-catcher (Psalm 11. 1). So Israel, once dwelling in his peaceful valleys, shall flee from the foe to the mountains, which, as being the scene of his idolatries, were justly to be made the scene of his flight and shame. The plaintive note of the dove (Isaiah 59. 11) represents the mournful repentance of Israel hereafter (Zechariah 12. 10-12). 17. shall be weak as water—lit., shall go (as) waters; incapable of resistance (Joshua 7. 5; Psalm 22. 14; Isaiah 13. 7). 18. cover them—as a garment, boldness—a sign of mourning (Isaiah 3. 24; Jeremiah 48. 37; Micah 1. 16). 19. cast . . . silver in . . . streets—just retribution; they had abused their silver and gold by converting them into idols, "the stumbling-block of their iniquity" (ch. 14. 3, 4, i. e., an occasion of sinning); so these silver and gold idols, so far from "being able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath" (see Proverbs 11. 4), shall, in despair, be cast by them into the streets as a prey to the foe, by whom they shall be "removed" (GROTIUS translates as Margin, "shall be despoiled as an unclean thing"); or rather, as suits the parallelism, "shall be put away from them" by the Jews. [CALVIN.] "They (the silver and gold) shall not satisfy their souls," i. e., their cravings of appetite and other needs. 20. beauty of his ornament—the temple of Jehovah, the especial glory of the Jews, as a bride glories in her ornaments (the very imagery used by God as to the temple, ch. 16. 10, 11). Cf. ch. 24. 21: "My sanctuary, the excellency of your strength, the desire of your eyes." images . . . therein—viz., in the temple (ch. 8. 3-17). set it far from them—God had "set" the temple (their "beauty of ornament") "for His majesty;" but they had set up "abominations therein;" therefore God, in just retribution, "set it far from them," (i. e., removed them far from it, or took it away from them. [VATABLUS.] Margin translates, "Made it unto them an unclean thing" (cf. Margin on v. 19, "removed"); what I designed for their glory they turned to their shame, therefore I will make it turn to their ignominy and ruin. 21. strangers—barbarous and savage nations. 22. pollute my secret place—just retribution for the Jews' pollution of the temple. "Robbers shall enter and defile" the holy of holies, the place of God's manifested presence, entrance into which was denied even to the Levites and priests, and was permitted to the high priest only once a year on the great day of atonement. 23. chain—symbol of the captivity (cf. Jeremiah 27. 2). As they enchained the land with violence, so they shall be chained themselves. It was customary to lead away captives in a row with a chain passed from the neck of one to the other. Therefore translate as the Hebrew requires, "the chain," viz., that usually employed on such occasions. CALVIN explains it, that the Jews should be dragged, whether they would or no, before God's tribunal to be tried as culprits in chains. The next words favour this: "bloody crimes," rather, "judgment of bloods," i. e., with blood-sheddings deserving the extreme judicial penalty. Cf. Jeremiah 51. 9: "Her judgment reacheth unto heaven." 24. worst of . . . heathen—lit., wicked of the nations; the giving up of Israel to their power will convince the Jews that this is a final overthrow. pomp of . . . strong—the pride wherewith men "stiff of forehead" despise the prophet. holy places—the sacred compartments of the temple (Psalm 68. 35; Jeremiah 51. 51). [CALVIN.] God calls it "their holy places," because they had so defiled it that He regarded it no longer as His. However, as the defilement of the temple has already been mentioned (v. 20, 22), and "their sacred places" are introduced as a new subject, it seems better to understand this of the places dedicated to their idols. As they defiled God's sanctuary, He will defile their self-constituted "sacred places." 25. peace, and . . . none—(1 Thessalonians 5. 3.) 26. Mischief upon . . . mischief—(Deuteronomy 32. 23; Jeremiah 4. 20.) This is said, because the Jews were apt to fancy at every abatement of suffering, that their calamities were about to cease; but God will accumulate woe on woe. rumour—of the advance of the foe, and of his cruelty (Matthew 24. 6). seek a vision—to find some way of escape from their difficulties (Isaiah 26. 9). So Zedekiah consulted Jeremiah (Jeremiah 37. 17; 38. 14). law shall perish—fulfilled (ch. 20. 1, 3; Psalm 74. 9; Lamentations 2. 9; cf. Amos 8. 11). God will thus set aside the idle boast, "The law shall not perish from the priest" (Jeremiah 18. 18). ancients—the ecclesiastical rulers of the people. 27. people of . . . land the general multitude, as distinguished from the "king" and the "prince." The consternation shall pervade all ranks. The king, whose duty it was to animate others, and find a remedy for existing evils, shall himself be in the utmost anxiety; a mark of the desperate state of affairs. clothed with desolation—Clothing is designed to keep off shame; but in this case shame shall be the clothing. after . . . way—because of their wicked ways. deserts—lit., judgments, i. e., what just judgment awards to them; used to imply the exact correspondence of God's judgment with the judicial penalties they had incurred: they oppressed the poor, and deprived them of liberty; therefore they shall be oppressed, and lose their own liberty.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-18. This eighth chapter begins a new stage of Ezekiel's prophecies, and continues to the end of the eleventh chapter. The connected visions from ch. 3. 12 to the end of ch. 7. comprehended Judah and Israel; but the visions (ch. 8.-11.) refer immediately to Jerusalem and the remnant of Judah under Zedekiah, as distinguished from the Babylonian exiles. 1. sixth year—viz., of the captivity of Jehoiachin, as in ch. 1. 2, the "fifth year" is specified. The lying on his sides 390 and 40 days (ch. 4. 5, 6) had by this time been completed, at least in vision. That event was naturally a memorable epoch to the exiles; and the computation of years from it was to humble the Jews, as well as to show their perversity in not having repented, though so long and severely chastised. elders—viz., those carried away with Jehoiachin, and now at the Chebar. sat before me—to hear the word of God from me, in the absence of the temple and other public places of sabbath worship, during the exile (ch. 33. 30, 31). It was so ordered they were present at the giving of the prophecy, and so left without excuse. hand of . . . Lord . . . fell . . . upon me—God's mighty operation fell, like a thunderbolt, upon me (in ch. 1. 3, it is less forcible, "was upon him"); whatever, therefore, he is to utter is not his own, for he has put off the mere man, whilst the power of God reigns in him. [CALVIN.] 2. likeness—understand, "of a man," i. e., of Messiah, the Angel of the covenant, in the person of whom alone God manifests Himself (ch. 1. 26; John 1. 18). The "fire," from "His loins downward," betokens the vengeance of God kindled against the wicked Jews, whilst searching and purifying the remnant to be spared. The "brightness" "upward" betokens His unapproachable majesty (1 Timothy 6. 16). For Hebrew, "eesh," fire, LXX., &c., read "ish," a man. colour of amber—the glitter of chasnal [FAIRBAIRN] (Note, ch. 1. 4, "polished brass"). 3. Instead of prompting him to address directly the elders before him, the Spirit carried him away in vision (not in person bodily) to the temple at Jerusalem; he proceeds to report to them what he witnessed; his message thus falls into two parts: (1.) The abominations reported in ch. 8. (2.) The dealings of judgment and mercy to be adopted towards the impenitent and penitent Israelites respectively (ch. 9.-11). The exiles looked hopefully towards Jerusalem, and, so far from believing things there to be on the verge of ruin, expected a return in peace; whilst those left in Jerusalem eyed the exiles with contempt, as if cast away from the Lord, whereas they themselves were near

God and ensured in the possessions of the land (ch. 11. 15). Hence the vision here of what affected those in Jerusalem immediately was a seasonable communication to the exiles away from It. door of . . . inner gate—facing the north, the direction in which he came from Chebar, called the "altar-gate" (v. 5); it opened into the inner court, wherein stood the altar of burnt offering; the inner court (1 Kings 6. 36) was that of the priests; the outer court (ch. 10. 5), that of the people, where they assembled. seat—the pedestal of the image. Image of jealousy—Astarte, or Asheera (as the Hebrew for "grove" ought to be translated, 2 Kings 21. 3, 7; 23. 4, 7), set up by Manasseh as a rival to Jehovah in His temple, and arresting the attention of all worshippers as they entered; it was the Syrian Venus, worshipped with licentious rites; the "queen of heaven," wife of Phœnician Baal. HAVERNICK thinks all the scenes of idolatry in the chapter are successive portions of the festival held in honour of Tammuz or Adonis (v. 14). Probably, however, the scenes are separate proofs of Jewish idolatry, rather than restricted to one idol. provoketh to jealousy—calleth for a visitation in wrath of the "jealous God," who will not give His honour to another (cf. the second commandment, Exodus 20. 5). JEROME refers this verse to a statue of Baal, which Josiah had overthrown, and his successors had replaced. 4. The Shekinah cloud of Jehovah's glory, notwithstanding the provocation of the idol, still remains in the temple, like that Ezekiel saw "in the plain" (ch. 3. 22, 23); not till ch. 10. 4, 18 did it leave the temple at Jerusalem; showing the long-suffering of God, which ought to move the Jews to repentance. 5. gate of . . . altar—the principal avenue to the altar of burnt offering; as to the northern position, see 2 Kings 16. 14. Ahaz had removed the brazen altar from the front of the Lord's house to the north of the altar which he had himself erected. The locality of the idol enhances the heinousness of the sin, before God's own altar. 6. that I should (be compelled by their sin to) go far off from my sanctuary—(Ch. 10. 18); the sure precursor of its destruction. 7. door of the court—i. e., of the inner court (v. 3); the court of the priests and Levites, into which now others were admitted in violation of the law. [GROTIUS.] hole in . . . wall—i. e., an aperture or window in the wall of the priests' chambers, through which he could see into the various apartments, wherein was the idolatrous shrine. 8. dig—for it had been blocked up during Josiah's reformation. Or rather, the vision is not of an actual scene, but an ideal pictorial representation of the Egyptian idolatries into which the covenant-people had relapsed, practising them in secret places where they shrank from the light of day [FAIRBANKS] (John 3. 20). But cf. as to the literal introduction of idolatries into the temple, ch. 5. 11; Jeremiah 7. 30; 32. 34. 10. creeping things . . . beasts—worshipped in Egypt; still found portrayed on their chamber walls; so among the troglodyte. round about—on every side they surrounded themselves with incentives to superstition. 11. seventy men—the seventy members composing the Sanhedrim, or great council of the nation, the origination of which we find in the seventy elders, representatives of the congregation, who went up with Moses to the mount to behold the glory of Jehovah, and to witness the secret transactions relating to the establishment of the covenant; also, in the seventy elders appointed to share the burden of the people with Moses. How awfully it aggravates the national sin, that the seventy, once admitted to the Lord's secret council (Psalm 25. 14), should now, "In the dark," enter "the secret" of the wicked (Genesis 49. 6), whose judicially bound to suppress idolatry being the ringleaders of it! Jaananiah—perhaps chief of the seventy: son of Shaphan, the scribe who read to Josiah the book of the law; the spiritual privileges of the son (2 Kings 22. 10-14) increased his guilt. The very name means, "Jehovah hears," giving the lie to the unbelief which virtually said (ch. 9. 9), "The Lord seeth us not," &c. (cf. Psalm 10. 11, 14; 50. 21; 94. 7, 9). The offering of incense belonged not to the elders, but to the priests; this usurpation added to the guilt of the former. cloud of incense—they spared no expense for their idols. Oh that there were the same liberality in the cause of God! 12. every man in . . . chambers of . . . imagery—the elders ("ancients") are here the representatives of the people, rather than to be regarded literally. Mostly, the leaders of heathen superstitions laughed at them secretly, whilst publicly professing them in order to keep the people in subjection. Here what is meant is, that the people generally addicted themselves to secret idolatry, led on by their elders; there is no doubt, also, allusion to the mysteries, as in the worship of Isis in Egypt, the Eleusinian in Greece, &c., to which the initiated alone were admitted. "The chambers of imagery" are their own perverse imaginations, answering to the priests' chambers in the vision, whereon the pictures were portrayed (v. 10.). Lord . . . forsaken . . . earth—they infer this because God has left them to their miseries, without succouring them, so that they seek help from other gods. Instead of repenting, as they ought, they bite the curb. [CALVIN.] 14. From the secret abominations of the chambers of imagery, the prophet's eye is turned to the outer court at the north door; within the outer court women were not admitted, but only to the door. sat—the attitude of mourners (Job 2. 13; Isaiah 3. 26). Tammuz—from a Hebrew root, "to melt down." Instead of weeping for the national sins, they wept for the idol. Tammuz (the Syrian for Adonis), the paramour of Venus, and of the same name as the river flowing from Lebanon; killed by a wild boar, and, according to the fable, permitted to spend half the year on earth, and obliged to spend the other half in the lower world. An annual feast was celebrated to him in June (hence called Tammuz in the Jewish calendar) at Byblos, when the Syrian women, in wild grief, tore off their hair and yielded their persons to prostitution, consecrating the hire of their infamy to Venus; next followed days of rejoicing for his return to the earth; the former feast being called "the disappearance of Adonis," the latter, "the finding of Adonis." This Phœnician feast answered to the similar Egyptian one in honour of Osiris. The idea thus fabled was that of the waters of the river and the beauties of spring destroyed by the summer heat. Or else, the earth being clothed with beauty, during the half year when the sun is in the upper hemisphere, and losing it when he departs to the lower. The name Adonis is not here used, as Adon is the appropriated title of Jehovah. 15, 16. The next are "greater abominations," not in respect to the idolatry, but in respect to the place and persons committing it. In "the inner court," immediately before the door of the temple of Jehovah, between the porch and the altar, where the priests advanced only on extraordinary occasions (Joel 2. 17), twenty-five men (the leaders of the twenty-four courses or orders of the priests, 1 Chronicles 21. 18, 19, with the high priest, "the princes of the sanctuary," Isaiah 43. 28), representing the whole priesthood, as the seventy elders represented the people, stood with their backs turned on the temple, and their faces towards the east, making obeisance to the rising sun (contrast 1 Kings 8. 41.) Sun-worship came from the Persians, who made the sun the eye of their god Ormuzd. It existed as early as Job (Job 31. 26; cf. Deuteronomy 4. 19). Josiah could only suspend it for the time of his reign (2 Kings 23. 5, 11); it revived under his successors. worshipped—in the Hebrew a corrupt form is used to express Ezekiel's sense of the foul corruption of such worship. 17. put . . . branch to . . . nose—proverbial, for "they turn up the nose in scorn," expressing their insolent security. [LXX.] Not content with outraging "with their violence" the second table of the law, viz., that of duty towards one's neighbour, "they have returned" (i. e., they turn back afresh) to provoke me by violations of the first table. [CALVIN.] Rather, they held up a branch or bundle of tamarisk (called barsom) to their nose at daybreak, whilst singing hymns to the rising sun. [STRABO, l. 15, p. 733.] Sacred trees were frequent symbols in idol-worship. CALVIN translates, "to their own ruin," lit., "to their nose," i. e., with the effect of rousing my anger (of which the Hebrew is "nose") to their ruin. 18. though they cry . . . yet will I not hear—(Proverbs 1. 28; Isaiah 1. 15.)

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-11. CONTINUATION OF THE PRECEDING VISION: THE SEALING OF THE FAITHFUL. 1. cried—contrasted with their “cry” for mercy (ch. 8. 18) is the “cry” here for vengeance, showing how vain was the former, them that have charge—lit., officers; so officers (Isaiah 60. 17), having the city in charge, not to guard, but to punish it. The angels who as “watchers” fulfil God’s judgments (Daniel 4. 13, 17, 23; 10. 20, 21); the “princes” (Jeremiah 39. 3) of Nebuchadnezzar’s army were under their guidance. draw near—in the Hebrew intensive, “to draw near quickly.” 2. clothed with linen—(Daniel 10. 5; 12. 6, 7.) His clothing marked his office as distinct from that of the six officers of vengeance; “linen” characterized the high priest (Leviticus 16. 4); emblematic of purity. The same garment is assigned to the angel of the Lord (for which Michael is but another name) in the contemporary prophet Daniel (Daniel 10. 5; 12. 6, 7.) Therefore the Intercessory High Priest in heaven must be meant (Zechariah 1. 12). The six with Him are His subordinates; therefore He is said to be “among them,” lit., “in the midst of them,” as their recognized Lord (Hebrews 1. 6). He appears as a “man,” implying His incarnation; as “one” (cf. 1 Timothy 2. 5). Salvation is peculiarly assigned to Him, and so He bears the “inkhorn” in order to “mark” His elect (v. 4; cf. Exodus 12. 7; Revelation 7. 3; 9. 4; 13. 16, 17; 20. 4), and to write their names in His book of life (Revelation 13. 8). As Oriental scribes suspend their inkhorn at their side in the present day, and as a “scribe of the host is found in Assyrian inscriptions accompanying the host” to number the heads of the slain, so He stands ready for the work before Him. “The higher gate” was probably where now the gate of Damascus is. The six with Him make up the sacred and perfect number, seven (Zechariah 3. 9; Revelation 5. 6). The executors of judgment on the wicked, in Scripture teaching, are good, not bad, angels; the bad have permitted to them the trial of the pious (Job 1. 12; 2 Corinthians 12. 7). The judgment is executed by Him (ch. 10. 2, 7; John 5. 22, 27) through the six (Matthew 13. 41; 25. 31); so beautifully does the Old Testament harmonize with the New Testament. The seven come “from the way of the north;” for it was there the idolatries were seen, and from the same quarter must proceed the judgment (Babylon lying north-east of Judea). So Matthew 24. 28, stood—the attitude of waiting reverently for Jehovah’s commands. brazen altar—the altar of burnt offerings, not the altar of incense, which was of gold. They “stood” there to imply reverent obedience; for there God gave His answers to prayer [CALVIN]; also as being about to slay victims to God’s justice, they stand where sacrifices are usually slain [GROTIUS] (ch. 39. 17; Isaiah 34. 6; Jeremiah 12. 3; 46. 10). 3. glory of . . . God—which had heretofore, as a bright cloud, rested on the mercy-seat between the cherubim in the holy of holies (2 Samuel 6. 2; Psalm 80. 1); its departure was the presage of the temple being given up to ruin; its going from the inner sanctuary to the threshold without, towards the officers standing at the altar outside, was in order to give them the commission of vengeance. 4. midst of . . . city . . . midst of Jerusalem—This twofold designation marks more emphatically the scene of the Divine judgments. a mark—lit., the Hebrew letter Tau, the last in the alphabet, used as a mark (Job 31. 35, Margin, “my sign”); lit., Tau; originally written in the form of a cross, which TERTULLIAN explains as referring to the badge and only means of salvation, the cross of Christ. But nowhere in Scripture are the words which are now employed as names of letters used to denote the letters themselves or their figures. [VITRINGA.] The noun here is cognate to the verb, “mark a mark.” So in Revelation 7. 3 no particular mark is specified. We seal what we wish to guard securely. When all things else on earth are confounded, God will secure His people from the common ruin. God gives the first charge as to their safety before He orders the punishment of the rest (Psalm 31. 20; Isaiah 26. 20, 21). So in the case of Lot and Sodom (Genesis 19. 22); also the Egyptian first-born were not slain till Israel had time to sprinkle the blood-mark, ensuring their safety (cf. Revelation 7. 3; Amos 9. 9). So the early Christians had Pella provided as a refuge for them, before the destruction of Jerusalem. upon the foreheads—the most conspicuous part of the person, to imply how that their safety would be manifested to all (cf. Jeremiah 15. 11; 39. 11-18). It was customary thus to mark worshippers (Revelation 13. 16; 14. 1, 9) and servants. So the Church of England marks the forehead with the sign of the cross in baptizing. At the exodus the mark was on the houses, for then it was families; here, it is on the foreheads, for it is individuals whose safety is guaranteed. sign and . . . cry—similarly-sounding verbs in Hebrew, as in English Version, expressing the prolonged sound of their grief. “Sign” implies their inward grief (“groanings which cannot be uttered,” Romans 8. 26); “cry,” the outward expression of it. So Lot (2 Peter 2. 7, 8). Tenderness should characterize the man of God, not harsh sternness in opposing the ungodly (Psalm 119. 53, 136; Jeremiah 13. 17; 2 Corinthians 12. 21); at the same time zeal for the honour of God (Psalm 69. 9, 10; 1 John 5. 19). 5. the others—the six officers of judgment (v. 2). 6. come not near any . . . upon whom . . . mark—(Revelation 9. 4.) It may be objected that Daniel, Jeremiah, and others were carried away, whereas many of the vilest were left in the land. But God does not promise believers exemption from all suffering, but only from what will prove really and lastingly hurtful to them. His sparing the ungodly turns to their destruction, and leaves them without excuse. [CALVIN.] However the prophecy waits a fuller and final fulfilment, for Revelation 7. 3-8, in ages long after Babylon, foretells, as still future, the same sealing of a remnant (144,000) of Israel previous to the final outpouring of wrath on the rest of the nation; the correspondence is exact; the same pouring of fire from the altar follows the marking of the remnant in both (cf. Revelation 8. 5, with ch. 10. 2); so Zechariah 13. 9; 14. 2, distinguishes the remnant from the rest of Israel. begn at . . . sanctuary—for in it the greatest abominations had been committed; it had lost the reality of consecration by the blood of victims sacrificed to idols; it must, therefore, lose its semblance by the dead bodies of the slain idolaters (v. 7). God’s heaviest wrath falls on those who have sinned against the highest privileges; these are made to feel it first (1 Peter 4. 17, 18). He hates sin most in those nearest to him; e. g., the priests, &c. ancient men—the seventy elders. 8. I was left—lit., “there was left I.” So universal seemed the slaughter that Ezekiel thought himself the only one left. [CALVIN.] He was the only one left of the priests “in the sanctuary.” fell upon my face—to intercede for his countrymen (so Numbers 16. 22). all the residue—a plea drawn from God’s covenant promise to save the elect remnant. 9. exceeding—lit., very, very; doubled. perverseness—“apostasy” [GROTIUS]; or, “wresting aside of justice.” Lord . . . forsaken . . . earth . . . seeth not—the order is reversed from ch. 8. 12. There they speak of His neglect of His people in their misery; here they go farther and deny His providence (Psalm 10. 11), so that they may sin fearlessly. God, in answer to Ezekiel’s question (v. 8), leaves the difficulty unsolved; He merely vindicates His justice by showing it did not exceed their sin: He would have us humbly acquiesce in His judgments, and wait and trust. 10. mine eye—to show them their mistake in saying, “The Lord seeth not.” recompense their way upon their head—(Proverbs 1. 31.) Retribution in kind. 11. I have done as thou hast commanded—The characteristic of Messiah (John 17. 4). So the angels (Psalm 103. 21); and the apostles report their fulfilment of their orders (Mark 6. 30).

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-22. VISION OF COALS OF FIRE SCATTERED OVER THE CITY: REPETITION OF THE VISION OF THE CHERUBIM. 1. The throne of Jehovah appearing in the midst of the judgments implies that, whatever intermediate agencies be employed, He controls them, and that the whole flows as a necessary consequence from His essential holiness (ch. 1. 22, 26). cherubim—in ch. 1. 5, called “living creatures." The repetition of the vision implies that the judgments are approaching nearer and nearer. These two visions of Deity were granted in the beginning of Ezekiel's career, to qualify him for witnessing to God's glory amidst his God-forgetting people, and to stamp truth on his announcements; also to signify the removal of God's manifestation from the visible temple (v. 18) for a long period (ch. 43, 2). The feature (v. 12) mentioned as to the cherubim that they were "full of eyes," though omitted in the former vision, is not a difference, but a more specific detail observed by Ezekiel now on closer inspection. Also, here, there is no rainbow (the symbol of mercy after the flood or wrath) as in the former; for here judgment is the prominent thought, though the marking of the remnant in ch. 9, 4, 6 shows that there was mercy in the background. The cherubim, perhaps, represent redeemed humanity combining in and with itself the highest forms of subordinate creaturely life (cf. Romans 8, 20). Therefore they are associated with the twenty-four elders, and distinguished from the angels (Revelation 5). They stand on the mercy-seat of the ark, and on that ground become the habitation of God from which His glory is to shine upon the world. The different forms symbolize the different phases of the Church. So the quadriform Gospel, in which the incarnate Saviour has lodged the revelation of Himself in a fourfold aspect, and from which His glory shines on the Christian world, answers to the emblematic throne from which He shone on the Jewish Church. 2. he—Jehovah; He who sat on the "throne." the man—the Messenger of mercy becoming the Messenger of judgment (Note, ch. 9, 2). Human agents of destruction shall fulfil the will of "the Man," who is Lord of men. wheels—Hebrew, galgal, implying quick revolution; so the impetuous onset of the foe (cf. ch. 23, 24; 26, 10); whereas "Ophan," in ch. 1, 15, 16 implies mere revolution. coals of fire—the wrath of God about to burn the city, as His sword had previously slain its guilty inhabitants. This "fire," how different from the fire on the altar never going out (Leviticus 6, 12, 13), whereby, in type, peace was made with God! Cf. Isaiah 33, 12, 14. It is therefore not taken from the altar of reconciliation, but from between the wheels of the cherubim, representing the providence of God, whereby, and not by chance, judgment is to fall. 3. right . . . of . . . house—the scene of the locality whence judgment emanates is the temple, to mark God's vindication of His holiness injured there. The cherubim here are not those in the holy of holies, for the latter had not "wheels." They stood on "the right of the house," i. e., the south, for the Chaldean power, guided by them, had already advanced from the north (the direction of Babylon), and had destroyed the men in the temple, and were now proceeding to destroy the city, which lay south and west. the cherubim . . . the man—There was perfect concert of action between the cherubic representative of the angels and "the Man," to minister to whom they "stood" there (v. 7). cloud—emblem of God's displeasure; as the "glory" or "brightness" (v. 4) typifies His majesty and clearness in judgment. 4. The court outside was full of the Lord's brightness, whilst it was only the cloud that filled the house inside, the scene of idolatries, and therefore of God's displeasure. God's throne was on the threshold. The temple, once filled with brightness, is now darkened with cloud. 5. sound of . . . wings—prognostic of great and awful changes. voice of . . . God—the thunder (Psalm 29, 3, &c.). 6. went in—set into the temple, but between the cherubim. Ezekiel sets aside the Jews' boast of the presence of God with them. The cherubim, once the ministers of grace, are now the ministers of vengeance. When "commanded" He without delay obeys (Psalm 40, 8; Hebrews 10, 7). 7. See v. 3, Note. one cherub—one of the four cherubim. his hand—(Ch. 1, 8.) went out—to burn the city. 8. "wings" denote alacrity, the "hands" efficacy and aptness, in executing the functions assigned to them. 9. wheels—(Note, ch. 1, 15, 16.) The things which, from v. 8 to the end of the chapter, are repeated from ch. 1, are expressed more decidedly, now that he gets a nearer view: the words "as it were," and "as if," so often occurring in ch. 1, are therefore mostly omitted. The "wheels"

express the manifold changes and revolutions in the world; also that in the chariot of His providence God transports the Church from one place to another, and everywhere can preserve it; a truth calculated to alarm the people in Jerusalem, and to console the exiles. [POLANUS.] 10. four had one likeness—in the wonderful variety of God's works there is the greatest harmony:—

"In human works, though laboured on with pain,
One thousand movements scarce one purpose gain;
In God's one single doth its end produce,
Yet serves to second, too, some other use."

(See note, ch. 1, 16.) wheel . . . in . . . a wheel—cutting one another at right angles, so as that the whole might move in any of the four directions or quarters of the world. God's doings, however involved they seem to us, cohere, so that lower causes subserve the higher. 11. (Note, ch. 1, 17.) turned out—without accomplishing their course (Isaiah 55, 11). [GROTIUS.] Rather, "they moved straight on without turning" (so ch. 1, 9). Having a face towards each of the four quarters, they needed not to turn round when changing their direction. whither . . . head looked—i. e., "whither the head" of the animal cherub-form, belonging to and directing each wheel, "looked," thither the wheel "followed." The wheels were not guided by some external adventitious impetus, but by some secret Divine impulse of the cherubim themselves. 12. body—lit., flesh; because a body consists of flesh. wheels . . . full of eyes—The description (ch. 1, 18) attributes eyes to the "wheels" alone; here there is added, on closer observation, that the cherubim themselves had them. The "eyes" imply that God, by His wisdom, beautifully reconciles seeming contraries (cf. 2 Chronicles 16, 9; Proverbs 15, 3; Zechariah 4, 10). 13. O wheel—rather, "they were called, whirling," i. e., they were most rapid in their revolutions [MAURER]; or, better, "It was cried unto them, The whirling." [FAIRBAIRN.] Galgal here used for "wheel," is different from Ophan, the simple word for "wheel." Galgal is the whole wheelwork machinery with its whirlwind-like rotation. Their being so addressed is in order to call them immediately to put themselves in rapid motion. 14. cherub—but in ch. 1, 10 it is an ox. The chief of the four cherubic forms was not the ox, but man. Therefore "cherub" cannot be synonymous with "ox." Probably Ezekiel, standing in front of one of the cherubim (viz., that which handed the coals to the man in linen), saw of him, not merely the ox-form, but the whole fourfold form, and therefore calls him simply "cherub;" whereas of the other three, having only a side view, he specifies the form of each which met his eye. [FAIRBAIRN.] As to the likelihood of the lower animals sharing in "the restoration of all things," see Isaiah 11, 6; 65, 25; Romans 8, 20, 21; this accords with the animal forms combined with the human to typify redeemed man. 15. The repeated declaration of the identity of the vision with that at the Chebar is to arouse attention to it (so v. 22; ch. 3, 23). the living creature—used collectively, as in v. 17, 20; ch. 1, 20. 16. (Note, v. 11; ch. 1, 19.) lifted up . . . wings—to depart, following "the glory of the Lord" which was on the point of departing (v. 18). 17. (Ch. 1, 12, 20, 21.) stood—God never stands still (John 5, 17), therefore neither do the angels; but to human perceptions He seems to do so. 18. The departure of the symbol of God's presence from the temple preparatory to the destruction of the city. Foretold, Deuteronomy 31, 17. Woe be to those from whom God departs (Hosea 9, 12)! Cf. 1 Samuel 28, 15, 16; 4, 21: "I-chabod, Thy glory is departed." Successive steps are marked in His departure; so slowly and reluctantly does the merciful God leave His house. First He leaves the sanctuary (ch. 9, 3); He elevates His throne above the threshold of the house (v. 1); leaving the cherubim He sits on the throne (v. 4); He and the cherubim, after standing for a time at the door of the east gate (where was the exit to the lower court of the people), leave the house altogether (v. 18, 19), not to return till ch. 43, 2. 20. I knew . . . cherubim—by the second sight of the cherubim he learnt to identify them with the angelic forms situated above the ark of the covenant in the temple, which as a priest, he "knew" about from the high priest. 21. The repetition is in order that the people about to live without the temple might have, instead, the knowledge of the temple mysteries, thus preparing them for a future restoration of the covenant. So perverse were they that they would say, Ezekiel fancies he saw what has no existence. He, therefore, repeats it over and over again. 22. straight forward—intent upon the object they aimed at, not deviating from the way nor losing sight of the end (Luke 9. 52).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-25. PROPHECY OF THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CORRUPT "PRINCES OF THE PEOPLE;" PELATIAH DIES; PROMISE OF GRACE TO THE BELIEVING REMNANT; DEPARTURE OF THE GLORY OF GOD FROM THE CITY; EZEKIEL'S RETURN TO THE CAPTIVES. 1. east gate—to which the glory of God had moved itself (ch. 10. 19), the chief entrance of the sanctuary; the portico or porch of Solomon. The Spirit moves the prophet thither, to witness, in the presence of the Divine glory, a new scene of destruction. five and twenty men—The same as the twenty-five (i. e., twenty-four heads of courses, and the high-priest) sun-worshippers seen in ch. 8. 16. The leading priests were usually called "princes of the sanctuary" (Isaiah 48. 28), and "chiefs of the priests" (2 Chronicles 36. 14); but here two of them are called "princes of the people," with irony, as using their priestly influence to be ringleaders of the people in sin (v. 2). Already the wrath of God had visited the people represented by the elders (ch. 9. 6); also the glory of the Lord had left its place in the holy of holies, and, like the cherubim and flaming sword in Eden, had occupied the gate into the deserted sanctuary. The judgment on the representatives of the priesthood naturally follows here, just as the sin of the priests had followed in the description (ch. 8. 12, 16) after the sin of the elders. Jaazaniah—signifying "God hears." son of Azur—different from Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan (ch. 8. 11). Azur means "help." He and Pelatiah ("God delivers"), son of Benaiah ("God builds"), are singled out as Jaazaniah, son of Shaphan, in the case of the seventy elders (ch. 8. 11, 12), because their names ought to have reminded them that "God" would have "heard" had they sought His "help" to deliver and "build" them up. But, neglecting this, they incurred the heavier judgment by the very relation in which they stood to God. [FAIRBAIRN.] 2. he—the Lord sitting on the cherubim (ch. 10. 2). wicked counsel—in opposition to the prophets of God (v. 3). 3. It is not near—viz., the destruction of the city; therefore "let us build houses," as if there was no fear. But the Hebrew opposes English Version, which would require the infinitive absolute. Rather, "Not at hand is the building of houses." They sneer at Jeremiah's letter to the captives, among whom Ezekiel lived (Jeremiah 29. 5). "Build ye houses, and dwell in them," i. e., do not fancy, as many persuade you, that your sojourn in Babylon is to be short, it will be for seventy years (Jeremiah 25. 11, 12; 29. 10); therefore build houses and settle quietly there. The scorners in Jerusalem reply, Those far off in exile may build if they please, but it is too remote a concern for us to trouble ourselves about [FAIRBAIRN.] (cf. ch. 12. 22, 27; 2 Peter 3. 4). this city . . . caldron . . . we . . . flesh—sneering at Jeremiah 1. 13, where he compared the city to a caldron with its mouth towards the north. "Let Jerusalem be so if you will, and we the flesh, exposed to the raging foe from the north, still its fortifications will secure us from the flame of war outside; the city must stand for our sakes, just as the pot exists for the safety of the flesh in it." In opposition to this God saith (v. 11), "This city shall not be your caldron, to defend you in it from the foe outside: nay, ye shall be driven out of your imaginary sanctuary, and slain in the border of the land." "But," saith God, in v. 7, "your slain are the flesh, and this city the caldron; but (not as you fancy shall ye be kept safe inside) I will bring you forth out of the midst of it," and again, in ch. 24. 3, "Though not a caldron in your sense, Jerusalem shall be so in the sense of its being exposed to a consuming foe, and yourselves in it and with it." 4. prophesy . . . prophesy—the repetition marks emphatic earnestness. 5. Spirit . . . fell upon me—stronger than "entered into me" (ch. 2. 2; 3. 24), implying the zeal of the Spirit of God roused to immediate indignation at the contempt of God shown by the scorners. I know—(Psalm 139. 1-4.) Your scornful jests at my word escape not my notice. 6. your slain—those on whom you have brought ruin, by your wicked counsels. Bloody crimes within the city brought on it a bloody foe from without (ch. 7. 23, 24). They had made it a caldron in which to boil the flesh of God's people (Micah 3. 1-3), and eat it by unrighteous oppression; therefore God will make it a caldron in a different sense, one not wherein they may be safe in their guilt, but "out of the midst of" which they shall be "brought forth" (Jeremiah 34. 4, 5). 7. The city is a caldron to them, but it shall not be so to you. Ye shall meet your doom on the frontier. 8. The Chaldean sword, to escape which ye abandoned your God, shall be brought on you by God because of that very abandonment of Him. 9. out of the midst thereof—i. e., of the city, as captives led into the open plain for judgment. 10. in the border of Israel—on the frontier: at Riblah, in the land of Hamath (cf. 2 Kings 25. 19-21, with 1 Kings 8. 65). ye shall know that I am the Lord—by the judgments I inflict (Psalm 9. 16). 11. (Note, v. 3.) 12. (Deuteronomy 12. 30, 31.) 13. Pelatiah—probably the ringleader of the scorners (v. 1); his being stricken dead (like Ananias, Acts 5. 5) was an earnest of the destruction of the rest of the twenty-five, as Ezekiel had foretold, as also of the general ruin. fell . . . upon . . . face—(Note, ch. 9. 8.) wilt thou make a full end of the remnant—is Pelatiah's destruction to be the token of the destruction of all, even of the remnant? The people regarded Pelatiah as a mainstay of the city. His name (derived from a Hebrew root, "a remnant," or else "God delivers") suggested hope. Is that hope, asks Ezekiel, to be disappointed? 15. thy brethren . . . brethren—the repetition implies, "Thy real brethren" are no longer the priests at Jerusalem with whom thou art connected by the natural ties of blood and common temple service; but thy fellow-exiles on the Chebar, and the house of Israel whosoever of them belong to the remnant to be spared. men of thy kindred—lit., of thy redemption, i. e., the nearest relatives, whose duty it was to do the part of Goel, or vindicator and redeemer of a forfeited inheritance (Leviticus 25. 25). Ezekiel, seeing the priesthood doomed to destruction, as a priest, felt anxious to vindicate their cause, as if they were his nearest kinsmen and he their Goel. But he is told to look for his true kinsmen in those, his fellow-exiles, whom his natural kinsmen at Jerusalem despised, and to be their vindicator. Spiritual ties, as in the case of Levi (Deuteronomy 33. 9), the type of Messiah (Matthew 12. 47-50), are to supersede natural ones where the two clash. The hope of better days was to rise from the despised exiles. The gospel principle is shadowed forth here, that the despised of men are often the chosen of God, and the highly esteemed among men are an abomination before Him (Luke 16. 15; 1 Corinthians 1. 26-28). "No door of hope but in the valley of Achor" ("trouble," Hosea 2. 15). [FAIRBAIRN.] Get you far . . . unto us is this land—The contemptuous words of those left still in the city at the carrying away of Jeconiah to the exiles, "However far ye be outcasts from the Lord and His temple, we are secure in our possession of the land." 16. Although—anticipating the objection of the priests at Jerusalem, that the exiles were "cast far off." Though this be so, and they are far from the outer temple at Jerusalem, I will be their asylum or sanctuary instead (Psalm 90. 1; 91. 9; Isaiah 8. 14). My shrine is the humble heart: a preparation for gospel catholicity when the local and material temple should give place to the spiritual (Isaiah 57. 15; 66. 1; Malachi 1. 11; John 4. 21-24; Acts 7. 48, 49). The trying discipline of the exile was to chasten the outcasts so as to be meet recipients of God's grace, which the carnal confidence of the priests disqualified them for. The dispersion served the end of spiritualizing and enlarging the views even of the better Jews, so as to be able to worship God every- where without a material temple; and, at the same time, it diffused some knowledge of God amongst the greatest Gentile nations, thus providing materials for the gathering in of the Christian Church among the Gentiles; so marvellously did God overrule a present evil for an ultimate good. Still more does all this hold good in the present much longer dispersion which is preparing for a more perfect and universal restoration (Isalah 2. 2-4; Jeremiah 3. 16-18). Their long privation of the temple will prepare them for appreciating the more, but without Jewish narrowness, the temple that is to be (chs. 40.-44). a little—rather, “for a little season;” how long soever the captivity be, yet the seventy years will be but as a little season, compared with their long subsequent settlement in their land. This holds true only partially in the case of the first restoration; but as in a few centuries they were dispersed again, the full and permanent restoration is yet future (Jeremiah 24. 6). 17. (Ch. 28. 25; 31. 13; 36. 24.) 18. They have eschewed every vestige of idolatry ever since their return from Babylon. But still the Shekinah glory had departed, the ark was not restored, nor was the second temple strictly inhabited by God until He came who made it more glorious than the first temple (Haggai 2. 9); even then His stay was short, and ended in His being rejected; so that the full realization of the promise must still be future. 19. I will give them—lest they should claim to themselves the praise given them in v. 18, God declares it is to be the free gift of His Spirit. one heart—not singleness, i. e., uprightness, but oneness of heart in all, unanimously seeking Him in contrast to their state at that time, when only single scattered individuals sought God (Jeremiah 32. 39; Zephaniah 3. 9). [HENGSTENBERG.] Or, “content with one God,” not distracted with “the many detestable things” (v. 18; 1 Kings 18. 21; Hosea 10. 2). [CALVIN.] new spirit—(Psalm 51. 10; Jeremiah 31. 33.) Realized fully in the “new creature” of the New Testament (2 Corinthians 5. 17). Having new motives, new rules, new aims. stony heart—like “adamant” (Zechariah 7. 12); the natural heart of every man. heart of flesh—impressible to what is good, tender. 20. walk in my statutes—regeneration shows itself by its fruits (Galatians 5. 22, 25). they . . . my people . . . I . . . their God—(Ch. 14. 11; 36. 28; 37. 27; Jeremiah 24. 7.) In its fullest sense still future (Zechariah 13. 9). 21. whose heart . . . after . . . heart of . . . detestable things—The repetition of “heart” is emphatic, signifying that the heart of those who so obstinately cling to idols, impelled itself to fresh superstitions in one continuous tenor. [CALVIN.] Perhaps it is implied that they and their idols are much alike in character (Psalm 115. 8). The heart walks astray first, the feet follow. recompense . . . way upon . . . heads—They have abandoned me, so will I abandon them; they profaned my temple, so will I profane it by the Chaldeans (ch. 9. 10). 23. The Shekinah glory now moves from the east gate (ch. 10. 4, 19) to the Mount of Olives, altogether abandoning the temple. That mount was chosen as being the height whence the missiles of the foe were about to descend on the city. So it was from it that Jesus ascended to heaven when about to send His judgments on the Jews; and from it He predicted its overthrow before His crucifixion (Matthew 24. 3). It is also to be the scene of His return in person to deliver His people (Zechariah 14. 4), when He shall come by the same way as He went, “the way of the east” (ch. 43. 2). 24. brought me in . . . vision—not in actual fact, but in ecstatic vision. He had been as to the outward world all the time before the elders (ch. 8. 3) in Chaldea; he now reports what he had witnessed with the inner eye. 25. things . . . showed me—lit., words; an appropriate expression; for the word communicated to him was not simply a word, but one clothed with outward symbols “shown” to him as in the sacrament, which Augustine terms “the visible word.” [CALVIN.]

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-28. EZEKIEL'S TYPICAL MOVING TO EXILE: PROPHECY OF ZEDEKIAH'S CAPTIVITY AND PRIVATION OF SIGHT: THE JEWS' UNBELIEVING SURMISE AS TO THE

DISTANCE OF THE EVENT REPROVED. 1, 2. eyes to see, and see not . . . ears to hear, and hear not—fulfilling the prophecy of Deuteronomy 29. 4, here quoted by Ezekiel (cf. Isalah 6. 9; Jeremiah 5. 21). Ezekiel needed often to be reminded of the people's perversity, lest he should be discouraged by the little effect produced by his prophecies. Their “not seeing” is the result of perversity, not incapacity. They are wilfully blind. The persons most interested in this prophecy were those dwelling at Jerusalem; and it is among them that Ezekiel was transported in spirit, and performed in vision, not outwardly, the typical acts. At the same time, the symbolical prophecy was designed to warn the exiles at Chebar against cherishing hopes, as many did in opposition to God's revealed word, of returning to Jerusalem, as if that city was to stand; externally living afar off, their hearts dwelt in that corrupt and doomed capital. 3. stuff for removing—rather, “an exile's outfit,” the articles proper to a person going as an exile, a staff and knapsack, with a supply of food and clothing; so in Jeremiah 46. 19, Margin, “instruments of captivity;” i. e., the needful equipments for it. His simple announcements having failed, he is symbolically to give them an ocular demonstration conveyed by a word-painting of actions performed in vision. consider—(Deuteronomy 32. 29.) 4. by day—in broad daylight, when all can see thee. at even—not contradicting the words “by day.” The baggage was to be sent before by day, and Ezekiel was to follow at nightfall. [GROTIUS.] Or, the preparations were to be made by day, the actual departure was to be effected at night. [HENDERSON.] as they that go forth into captivity—lit., as the goings forth of the captivity, i. e., of the captive band of exiles, viz., amid the silent darkness: typifying Zedekiah's flight by night on the taking of the city (Jeremiah 39. 4; 52. 7). 5. Dig—As Zedekiah was to escape like one digging through a wall, furtively to effect an escape (v. 12). carry out—viz., “thy stuff” (v. 4). thereby—by the opening in the wall. Zedekiah escaped “by the gate betwixt the two walls” (Jeremiah 39. 4). 6. in . . . twilight—rather, “in the dark.” So in Genesis 15. 17, “it” refers to “thy stuff.” cover thy face—as one who muffles his face, afraid of being known by any one meeting him. So the Jews and Zedekiah should make their exit stealthily and afraid to look around, so hurried should be their flight. [CALVIN.] sign—rather, a portent, viz., for evil. 9. What doest thou?—They ask not in a docile spirit, but making a jest of his proceedings. 10. burden—i. e., weighty oracle. the prince—the very man Zedekiah, in whom they trust for safety, is to be the chief sufferer. JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 10. 7) reports that Ezekiel sent a copy of this prophecy to Zedekiah. As Jeremiah had sent a letter to the captives at the Chebar, which was the means of calling forth at first the agency of Ezekiel, so it was natural for Ezekiel to send a message to Jerusalem confirming the warnings of Jeremiah. The prince, however, fancying a contradiction between ch. 12. 13, “he shall not see Babylon,” and Jeremiah 24. 8, 9, declaring he should be carried to Babylon, believed neither. Seeming discrepancies in Scripture on deeper search prove to be hidden harmonies. 11. sign—portent of evil to come (ch. 24. 27; Zechariah 3. 8, Margin). Fulfilled (2 Kings 25. 1-7; Jeremiah 52. 1-11). 12. prince . . . among them—lit., that is in the midst of them, i. e., on whom the eyes of all are cast, and “under whose shadow” they hope to live (Lamentations 4. 20). shall bear—viz., his “stuff for removing;” his equipments for his journey. cover his face, that he see not the ground—Note, v. 6; the symbol in v. 6 is explained in this verse. He shall muffle his face so as not to be recognized: a humiliation for a king! 13. My net—The Chaldean army He shall be inextricably entangled in it, as in the meshes of a net. It is God's net (Job 19. 6). Babylon was God's instrument (Isalah 10. 5). Called “a net” (Habakkuk 1. 14-16). bring him to Babylon . . . yet shall he not see it—because he should be deprived of sight before he arrived there (Jeremiah 52. 11). 14. all . . . about him—his satellites: his body-guard. bands—lit., the wings of an army (Isalah 8. 8). drawn out . . . sword after them—(Note, ch. 5. 2, 12.) 16. I will leave a few . . . that they may declare . . . abominations—God's purpose in scattering a remnant of Jews among the Gentiles; viz., not only that they themselves should be weaned from idolatry (see v. 15), but that by their own word, as also by their whole state as exiles, they should make God's righteousness manifest among the Gentiles, as vindicated in their punishment for their sins (cf. Isaiah 43. 10; Zechariah 8. 13). 18. Symbolical representation of the famine and fear with which they should eat their scanty morsel, in their exile, and especially at the siege. 19. people of the land—the Jews "in the land" of Chaldea who thought themselves miserable as being exiles, and envied the Jews left in Jerusalem as fortunate. land of Israel—contrasted with "the people in the land" of Chaldea. So far from being fortunate, as the exiles in Chaldea regarded them, the Jews in Jerusalem are truly miserable, for the worst is before them, whereas the exiles have desolated the miseries of the coming siege. land . . . desolate from all that is therein—lit., "that the land (viz., Judea) may be despoiled of the fulness thereof;" emptied of the inhabitants and abundance of flocks and corn with which it was filled. because of . . . violence—(Psalm 107. 34.) 20. the cities—left in Judea, after the destruction of Jerusalem. 21. proverb—the infidel scoff, that the threatened judgment was so long in coming, it would not come at all, had by frequent repetition come to be a "proverb" with them. This skeptical habit contemporary prophets testify to (Jeremiah 17. 15; 20. 7; Zephaniah 1. 12). Ezekiel, at the Chebar, thus sympathizes with Jeremiah, and strengthens his testimony at Jerusalem. The tendency to the same scoff showed itself in earlier times, but not then developed into a settled "proverb" (Isaiah 5. 19; Amos 5. 18). It shall again be the characteristic of the last times, when "faith" shall be regarded as an antiquated thing (Luke 18. 8), seeing that it remains stationary, whereas worldly arts and sciences progress, and when the "continuance of all things from creation" will be the argument against the possibility of their being suddenly brought to a stand still by the coming of the Lord (Isaiah 66. 5; 2 Peter 3. 3, 4). The very long-suffering of God, which ought to lead men to repentance, is made an argument against His word (Ecclesiastes 8. 11; Amos 6. 3). days . . . prolonged . . . vision falleth—their twofold argument: (1) The predictions shall not come to pass till long after our time. (2) They shall fail and prove vain shadows. God answers both in v. 23, 25. 23. effect—lit., the word, viz., fulfilled; i. e., the effective fulfilment of whatever the prophets have spoken is at hand. 24. no more . . . vain vision . . . flattering divination—All those false prophets (Lamentations 2. 14), who "flattered" the people with promises of peace and safety, shall be detected and confounded by the event itself. 25. word . . . shall come to pass—in opposition to their scoff "the vision falleth" (v. 22). The repetition, "I will speak . . . speak," &c. (or as FAIRBAIRN, "For I, Jehovah, will speak whatever word I shall speak, and it shall be done") implies, that whenever God speaks, the effect must follow; for God, who speaks, is not divided in Himself (v. 28; Isaiah 55. 11; Daniel 9. 12; Luke 21. 33). no more prolonged—in opposition to the scoff (v. 22), "The days are prolonged." in your days—whilst you are living (cf. Matthew 24. 31). 27. Not a mere repetition of the scoff (v. 22); there the scoffers asserted that the evil was so often threatened and postponed, it must have no reality; here formalists do not go so far as to deny that a day of evil is coming, but assert it is far off yet (Amos 6. 3). The transition is easy from this carnal security to the gross infidelity of the former class.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-23. DENUNCIATION OF FALSE PROPHETS AND PROPHETESSES; THEIR FALSE TEACHINGS, AND GOD'S CONSEQUENT JUDGMENTS. 1. As ch. 12. denounced the false expectations of the people, so this denounces the false leaders who fed those expectations. As an independent witness, Ezekiel confirms at the Chebar the testimony of Jeremiah (ch. 29. 21, 31) in his letter from Jerusalem to the captive exiles, against the false prophets; of these some were conscious knaves, others fanatical dupes of their own frauds; e. g., Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah, Hananiah must have believed his own lie, else he would not have specified so circumstantial details (Jeremiah 28. 2-4); the conscious knaves gave only general assurances of peace (Jeremiah 5. 31; 6. 14; 14. 13). The language of Ezekiel has plain references to the similar language of Jeremiah (e. g., Jeremiah 23. 9-33); the bane of false prophecy, which had its stronghold in Jerusalem, having in some degree extended to the Chebar; this chapter, therefore, is, primarily, intended as a message to those still in the Jewish metropolis; and, secondarily, for the good of the exiles at the Chebar. 2. that prophesy—viz., a speedy return to Jerusalem. out of . . . own hearts—alluding to the words of Jeremiah (Jeremiah 23. 16, 26); i. e., what they prophesied was what they and the people wished; the wish was father to the thought. The people wished to be deceived, and so were deceived. They were inexcusable, for they had among them true prophets (who spake not their own thoughts, but as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, 2 Peter 1. 21), whom they might have known to be such, but they did not wish to know (John 3. 19). 3. foolish—though vaunting as though exclusively possessing "wisdom" (1 Corinthians 1. 19-21); the fear of God being the only beginning of wisdom (Psalm 111. 10). their own spirit—instead of the Spirit of God. A threefold distinction lay between the false and the true prophets: (1) The source of their messages respectively; of the false, "their own hearts;" of the true, an object presented to the spiritual sense (named from the noblest of the senses, a seeing) by the Spirit of God as from without, not produced by their own natural powers of reflection. The word, the body of the thought, presented itself not audibly to the natural sense, but directly to the spirit of the prophet; and so the perception of it is properly called a seeing, he perceiving that which thereafter forms itself in his soul as the cover of the external word [DELITSZCH]; hence the peculiar expression, seeing the word of God (Isaiah 2. 1; 13. 1; Amos 1. 1; Micah 1. 1). (2) The point aimed at; the false "walking after their own spirit;" the true, after the Spirit of God. (3) The result: the false saw nothing, but spake as if they had seen; the true had a vision, not subjective, but objectively real. [FAIRBAIRN.] A refutation of those who set the inward word above the objective, and represent the Bible as flowing subjectively from the inner light of its writers, not from the revelation of the Holy Ghost from without. "They are impatient to get possession of the kernel without its fostering shell—they would have Christ without the Bible." [BENGEL.] 4. foxes—which cunningly "spoil the vines" (Song of Solomon 2. 15), Israel being the vineyard (Psalm 80. 8-15; Isaiah 5. 1-7; 27. 2; Jeremiah 2. 21); their duty was to have guarded it from being spoiled, whereas they themselves spoiled it by corruptions. in . . . deserts—where there is nothing to eat; whence the foxes become so ravenous and crafty in their devices to get food. So the prophets wander in Israel, a moral desert, unrestrained, greedy of gain which they get by craft. 5. not gone up into . . . gaps—metaphor from breaches made in a wall, to which the defenders ought to betake themselves in order to repel the entrance of the foe. The breach is that made in the theocracy through the nation's sin; and, unless it be made up, the vengeance of God will break in through it. Those who would advise the people to repentance are the restorers of the breach (ch. 22. 30; Psalm 106. 23, 30). hedge—the law of God (Psalm 80. 12; Isaiah 5. 2, 5); by violating it, the people stripped themselves of the fence of God's protection, and lay exposed to the foe. The false prophets did not try to repair the evil by bringing back the people to the law with good counsels, or by checking the bad with reproofs. These two duties answer to the double office of defenders in case of a breach made in a wall: (1) To repair the breach from within. (2) To oppose the foe from without. to stand—i. e., that the city may "stand." in . . . day of . . . Lord—in the day of the battle which God wages against Israel for their sins, ye do not try to stay God's vengeance by prayers, and by leading the nation to repentance. 6. made others to hope, &c.—

rather, "they hoped" to confirm (i. e., make good) their word, by the event corresponding to their prophecy. The Hebrew requires this. [HAVERNICK.] Also the parallel clause, "they have seen vanity," implies that they believed their own lie (2 Thessalonians 2. 11). Subjective revelation is false, unless it rests on the objective. 8. I am against you—rather, understand, "I come against you," to punish your wicked profanation of my name (cf. Revelation 2. 5, 16). 9. mine hand—my power in vengeance. not . . . in . . . assembly—rather, the council; "they shall not occupy the honourable office of councillors in the senate of elders after the return from Babylon" (Ezra 2. 1, 2). neither . . . written in . . . Israel—they shall not even have a place in the register kept of all citizens' names; they shall be erased from it, just as the names of those who died in the year, or had been deprived of citizenship for their crimes, were at the annual revisal erased. Cf. Jeremiah 17. 13; Luke 10. 20; Revelation 3. 5, as to those spiritually Israelites; John 1. 47, and those not so. Literally fulfilled (Ezra 2. 59, 62; cf. Nehemiah 7. 5; Psalm 69. 28). neither . . . enter . . . land—they shall not so much as be allowed to come back at all to their country. 10. Because, even because—The repetition heightens the emphasis. Peace—Safety to the nation. Ezekiel confirms Jeremiah 6. 14; 8. 11. one—lit., this one; said contemptuously, as in 2 Chronicles 28. 22. a wall—rather, a loose wall. Ezekiel had said, that the false prophets did not "go up into the gaps, or make up the breaches" (v. 5), as good architects do; now he adds that they make a bustling show of anxiety about repairing the wall; but it is without right mortar, and therefore of no use. one . . . others—besides individual effort, they jointly co-operated to delude the people. daubed . . . with untempered mortar—as sand without lime, mud without straw. [GROTIUS.] FAIRBAIRN translates, "plaster it with whitewash." But besides the hypocrisy of merely outwardly "daubing" to make the wall look fair (Matthew 23. 27, 29; Acts 23. 3), there is implied the unsoundness of the wall from the absence of true uniting cement; the "untempered cement" answering to the lie of the prophets, who say, in support of their prophecies, "Thus saith the Lord, when the Lord hath not spoken" (ch. 22. 28). 11. overflowing—inundating; such as will at once wash away the mere clay mortar. The three most destructive agents shall co-operate against the wall—wind, rain, and hailstones. These last in the East are more out of the regular course of nature, and are therefore often particularly specified as the instruments of God's displeasure against His foes (Exodus 9. 18; Joshua 10. 11; Job 38. 22; Psalm 18. 12, 13; Isaiah 28. 2; 30. 30; Revelation 16. 21). The Hebrew there is, lit., stones of ice. They fall in Palestine at times an inch thick with a destructive velocity. The personification heightens the vivid effect, "O ye hailstones," The Chaldeans will be the violent agency whereby God will unmask and refute them, overthrowing their edifice of lies. 12. shall it not be said—Your vanity and folly shall be so manifested, that it shall pass into a proverb, "Where is the daubing?" &c. 13. God repeats, in His own name, as the Source of the coming calamity, what had been expressed generally in v. 11. 14. The repetition of the same threat is to awaken the people out of their dream of safety by the certainty of the event. foundation—As the "wall" represents the security of the nation, so the "foundation" is Jerusalem, on the fortifications of which they rested their confidence. GROTIUS makes the "foundation" refer to the false principles on which they rested; v. 16 supports the former view. 16. prophesy concerning Jerusalem—with all their "seeing visions of peace for her," they cannot ensure peace or safety to themselves. 17. set thy face—put on a bold countenance, fearlessly to denounce them (ch. 3. 8, 9; Isaiah 50. 7). daughters—the false prophetesses; alluded to only here; elsewhere the gullt specified in the women is the active share they took in maintaining idolatry (ch. 8. 14). It was only in extraordinary emergencies that God bestowed prophecy on women, e. g. on Miriam, Deborah, Huldah (Exodus 15. 20; Judges 4. 4; 2 Kings 22. 14); so in the last days to come (Joel 2. 28). The rareness of such instances enhanced their guilt in pretending inspiration.

18. sew pillows . . . to arm-holes—rather, elbows and wrists, for which the false prophetesses made cushions to lean on, as a symbolical act, typifying the perfect tranquillity which they foretold to those consulting them. Perhaps they made their dupes rest on these cushions in a fancied state of ecstasy; after they had made them at first stand (whence the expression, "every stature" is used for "men of every age"). As the men are said to have built a wall (v. 10), so the women are said to sew pillows, &c., both alike typifying the "peace" they promised the impenitent. make kerchiefs—magical veils, which they put over the heads of those consulting them, as if to fit them for receiving a response, that they might be rapt in spiritual trance above the world. head of every stature—men of every age, old and young, great and small, if only these had pay to offer them. hunt souls—eagerly trying to allure them to the love of yourselves (Proverbs 6. 26; 2 Peter 2. 14), so as unwarily to become your prey. will ye save . . . souls . . . that come unto you—will ye haul after souls, and when they are yours ("come unto you"), will ye promise them life? "Save" is explained (v. 22), "promising life." [GROTIUS.] CALVIN explains, "Will ye hunt my people's souls, and yet will ye save your own souls;" I, the Lord God, will not allow it. But "save" is used (v. 19) of the false prophetesses promising life to the impenitent, so that English Version and GROTIUS explain it best. 19. handfolds—expressing the paltry gain for which they bartered immortal souls (cf. Micah 3. 5, 11; Hebrews 12. 16). They "polluted" God by making His name the cloak under which they uttered falsehoods. among my people—an aggravation of their sin, that they committed it "among the people" whom God had chosen as peculiarly His own, and among whom He had His temple. It would have been a sin to have done so even among the Gentiles, who knew not God; much more so among the people of God (cf. Proverbs 28. 21). slay . . . souls that should not die, &c.—to predict the slaying or perdition of the godly whom I will save. As true ministers are said to save and slay their hearers, according to the spirit respectively in which these receive their message (2 Corinthians 2. 15, 16); so false ministers imitate them; but promise safety to those on the broad way to ruin, and predict ruin to those on the narrow way of God. my people that hear your lies—who are therefore wilfully deceived, so that their guilt lies at their own door (John 3. 19.) 20. I am against your pillows—i. e., against your lying ceremonial tricks by which ye cheat the people. to make them fly—viz., into their snares, as fowlers disturb birds so as to be suddenly caught in the net spread for them. "Fly" is peculiarly appropriate as to those lofty spiritual flights to which they pretended to raise their dupes, when they veiled their heads with kerchiefs and made them rest on luxurious arm-cushions (v. 18). let . . . souls go—"ye make them fly" in order to destroy them; "I will let them go" in order to save them (Psalm 91. 3; Proverbs 6. 5; Hosea 9. 8). 21. in your hand—in your power. "My people" are the elect remnant of Israel to be saved. ye shall know—by the judgments which ye shall suffer. 22. ye have made . . . the righteous sad—by lying predictions of calamities impending over the godly. strengthened . . . wicked—(Jeremiah 23. 14) heart of . . . righteous . . . hands of . . . wicked—heart is applied to the righteous, because the terrors foretold penetrated to their inmost feelings; hands, to the wicked, because they were so hardened as not only to despise God in their minds, but also to manifest it in their whole acts, as if avowedly waging war with Him. 23. ye shall see no more vanity—the event shall confute your lies, involving yourselves in destruction (v. 9; ch. 14. 8; 15. 7; Micah 3. 6).

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-23. HYPOCRITICAL INQUIRERS ARE ANSWERED ACCORDING TO THEIR HYPOCRISY. THE CALAMITIES COMING ON THE PEOPLE; BUT A REMNANT IS TO ESCAPE. 1. elders—persons holding that dignity among the exiles at the Chebar. GROTIUS refers this to Seraiah and those sent with him from Judea (Jeremiah 51. 59). The prophet's reply, first, reflecting on the character of the inquirers, and, secondly, foretelling the calamities coming on Judea, may furnish an idea of the subject of their inquiry. sat before me—not at once able to find a beginning of their speech; indicative of anxiety and despondency. 3. heart . . . face—the heart is first corrupted, and then the outward manifestation of idol-worship follows; they set their idols before their eyes. With all their pretence of consulting God now, they have not even put away their idols outwardly; implying gross contempt of God. "Set up," lit., raised aloft; implying that their idols had gained the supreme ascendancy over them. stumbling-block of . . . iniquity—See Proverbs 3. 21, 23, "Let not them (God's laws) depart from thine eyes, then . . . thy foot shall not stumble." Instead of God's law, which, by being kept before their eyes, would have saved them from stumbling, they set up their idols before their eyes, which proved a stumbling-block, causing them to stumble (ch. 7. 19). inquired of at all—lit., should I with inquiry be inquired of by such hypocrites as they are? (Psalm 66. 18; Proverbs 15. 29; 28. 9.) 4. and cometh—and yet cometh, feigning himself to be a true worshipper of Jehovah. him that cometh—so the Margin Hebrew reads. But the text Hebrew reading is, "according to it, according to the multitude of his idols;" the anticipative clause with the pronoun not being pleonastic, but increasing the emphasis of the following clause with the noun. "I will answer," lit., reflexively, "I will myself (or for myself) answer him." according to . . . idols—thus, "answering a fool according to his folly;" making the sinner's sin his punishment; retributive justice (Proverbs 1. 31; 26. 5). 5. That I may take—i. e., unveil and overtake with punishment the dissimulation and impiety of Israel hid in their own heart. Or, rather, "That I may punish them by answering them after their own hearts;" corresponding to "according to the multitude of his idols" (Note, v. 4); an instance is given, v. 9; Romans 1. 28; 2 Thessalonians 2. 11, God giving them up in wrath to their own lie. idols—though pretending to "inquire" of me, "in their hearts" they are "estranged from me," and love "idols." 6. Though God so threatened the people for their idolatry (v. 5), yet He would rather they should avert the calamity by "repentance." turn yourselves—CALVIN translates, "turn others" (viz., the stranger proselytes in the land). As ye have been the advisers of others (see v. 7, "the stranger that sojourneth in Israel") to idolatry, so bestow at least as much pains in turning them to the truth: the surest proof of repentance. But the parallelism to v. 3, 4 favours English Version; their sin was twofold: (1.) "In their heart" or inner man. (2.) "Put before their face," i. e., exhibited outwardly. So their repentance is generally expressed by "repent," and is then divided into: (1.) "Turn yourselves (inwardly) from your idols." (2.) "Turn away your faces (outwardly) from all your abominations." It is not likely that an exhortation to convert others should come between the two affecting themselves. 7. stranger—the proselyte, tolerated in Israel only on condition of worshipping no God but Jehovah (Leviticus 17. 8, 9). inquire of him concerning me—i. e., concerning my will. by myself—not by word, but by deed, i. e., by judgments, marking my hand and direct agency; instead of answering him through the prophet he consults. FAIRBAIN translates, as it is the same Hebrew as in the previous clause, "concerning me," it is natural that God should use the same expression in His reply as was used in the consultation of Him. But the sense, I think, is the same. The hypocrite inquires of the prophet concerning God; and God, instead of replying through the prophet, replies for Himself concerning Himself. 8. make him a sign—*lit., "I will destroy him so as to become a sign;" it will be no ordinary destruction, but such as will make him be an object pointed at with wonder by all, as Korah, &c. (Numbers 26. 10; Deuteronomy 28. 37). 9. I the Lord have deceived that prophet—not directly, but through Satan and his ministers; not merely permissively, but by overruling their evil to serve the purposes of His righteous judgment, to be a touchstone to separate the precious from the vile, and to "prove" His people (Deuteronomy 18. 3; 1 Kings 22. 23; Jeremiah 4. 10; 2 Thessalonians 2. 11, 12). Evil comes not from God, though God overrules it to serve His will (Job 12. 16; James 1. 13). This declaration of God is intended to answer their objection, "Jeremiah and Ezekiel are but two opposed to the many prophets who announce 'peace' to us." "Nay, deceive not yourselves, those prophets of yours are deluding you, and I permit them to do so as a righteous judgment on your wilful blindness." 10. As they dealt deceitfully with God by seeking answers of peace without repentance, so God would let them be dealt deceitfully with by the prophets whom they consulted. God would chastise their sin with a corresponding sin; as they rejected the safe directions of the true light, he would send the pernicious delusions of a false one; prophets would be given them who should re-echo the deceitfulness that already wrought in their own bosom, to their ruin. [FAIRBAIN.] The people had themselves alone to blame, for they were long ago forewarned how to discern and to treat a false prophet (Deuteronomy 13. 3); the very existence of such deceivers among them was a sign of God's judicial displeasure (cf. in Saul's case, 1 Samuel 16. 14; 23. 6, 7). They and the prophet, being dupes of a common delusion, should be involved in a common ruin. 11. Love was the spring of God's very judgments on His people, who were incurable by any other process (ch. 11. 20; 37. 27). 12. The second part of the chapter: the effect which the presence of a few righteous persons was to have on the purposes of God (cf. Genesis 18. 24–32). God had told Jeremiah that the guilt of Judah was too great to be pardoned even for the intercession of Moses and Samuel (Psalm 99. 6; Jeremiah 14. 2; 15. 1), which had prevailed formerly (Exodus 32. 11–14; Numbers 14. 13–20; 1 Samuel 7. 8–12), implying the extraordinary heinousness of their guilt, since in ordinary cases "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man (for others) availeth much" (James 5. 16). Ezekiel supplements Jeremiah by adding that not only those two once successful intercessors, but not even the three pre-eminently righteous men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, could stay God's judgments by their righteousness. 13. staff of . . . bread—on which man's existence is supported as on a staff (ch. 4. 16; 5. 16; Leviticus 26. 26; Psalm 104. 15; Isaiah 3. 1). I will send a famine. 14. Noah, Daniel . . . Job—specified in particular as having been saved from overwhelming calamities for their personal righteousness. Noah had the members of his family alone given to him, amidst the general wreck. Daniel saved from the fury of the king of Babylon the three youths (Daniel 2. 17, 18, 48, 49). Though his prophecies mostly were later than those of Ezekiel, his fame for piety and wisdom was already established, and the events recorded (Daniel 1. 2) had transpired. The Jews would naturally, in their fallen condition, pride themselves on one who reflected such glory on his nation at the heathen capital, and would build vain hopes (here set aside) on his influence in averting ruin from them. Thus the objection to the authenticity of Daniel from this passage vanishes. "Job" forms the climax (and is therefore put out of chronological order), having not even been left a son or a daughter, and having had himself to pass through an ordeal of suffering before his final deliverance, and therefore forming the most simple instance of the righteousness of God, which would save the righteous themselves alone in the nation, and that after an ordeal of suffering, but not spare even a son or daughter for their sake (v. 16, 18, 20; cf. Jeremiah 7. 16; 11. 14; 14. 11). deliver . . . souls by . . . righteousness—(Proverbs 11. 4); not the righteousness of works, but that of grace, a truth less clearly understood under the law (Romans 4. 3). 15–21. The argument is cumulative. He first puts the case of the land sinning so as to fall under the judgment of a famine (v. 13); then (v. 15) "noisome beasts" (Leviticus 26. 22); then "the sword;" then, worst of all, "pestilence;" the three most righteous of men should deliver only themselves, in these several four cases. In v. 21 he concentrates the whole in one mass of condemnation. If Noah, Daniel, Job, could not deliver the land, when deserving only one judgment, "how much more" when all four judgments combined are justly to visit the land for sin, shall these three righteous men not deliver it. 19. in blood—not literally. In Hebrew, "blood" expresses every premature kind of death. 21. How much more—*lit., "Surely shall it be so now, when I send," &c. If none could avert the one only judgment incurred, surely now, when all four are incurred by sin, much more impossible it will be to deliver the land. 22. Yet . . . a remnant—not of righteous persons, but some of the guilty who should "come forth" from the destruction of Jerusalem to Babylon, to lead a life of hopeless exile there. The reference here is to judgment, not mercy, as v. 23 shows. ye shall see their . . . doings; and . . . be comforted—ye, the exiles at the Chebar, who now murmur at God's judgment about to be inflicted on Jerusalem as harsh, when ye shall see the wicked "ways" and character of the escaped remnant, shall acknowledge that both Jerusalem and its inhabitants deserved their fate; his recognition of the righteousness of the judgment will reconcile you to it, and so ye shall be "comforted" under it. [CALVIN.] Then would follow mercy to the elect remnant, though that is not referred to here, but in ch. 20. 43. 23. they shall comfort you—not in words, but by your recognizing in their manifest guilt, that God had not been unjustly severe to them and the city.

CHAPTER XV.

*Vcr. 1-8. THE WORTHLESSNESS OF THE VINE AS WOOD, ESPECIALLY WHEN BURNT, IS THE IMAGE OF THE WORTHLESSNESS AND GUILT OF THE JEWS, WHO SHALL PASS FROM ONE FIRE TO ANOTHER. This chapter represents, in the way of a brief introduction, what ch. 16 details minutely.* 2, 3. What has the vine-wood to make it pre-eminent above other forest-wood? Nothing. Nay, the reverse. Other trees yield useful timber, but vine-wood is soft, brittle, crooked, and seldom large; not so much as a "pin" (the large wooden peg used inside houses in the East to hang household articles on, Isalah 22. 23-25) can be made of it. Its sole excellency is that it should bear fruit; when it does not bear fruit it is not only not better, but inferior to other trees; so if God's people lose their distinctive excellency by not bearing fruits of righteousness, they are more unprofitable than the worldly (Deuteronomy 32. 32), for they are the vine; the sole end of their being is to bear fruit to His glory (Psalms 80. 8, 9; Isalah 5. 1, &c.; Jeremiah 2. 21; Hosea 10. 1; Matthew 21. 33). In all respects, except in their being planted by God, the Jews were inferior to other nations, as Egypt, Babylon, &c., e. g., in antiquity, extent of territory, resources, military power, attainments in arts and sciences. or than a branch—rather, in apposition with "the vine tree." Omit or than. What superiority has the vine if it be but a branch among the trees of the forest, i. e., if, as having no fruit, it lies cut down among other woods of trees? 4. cast into . . . fire—(John 15. 6) both the ends—the north kingdom having been already overturned by Assyria under Tiglath-pileser; the south being pressed on by Egypt (2 Kings 23. 29-35). midst of it is burned—rather, "is on flame;" viz., Jerusalem, which had now caught the flame by the attack of Nebuchadnezzar. Is it meet for any work—"It," i. e., the scorched part still remaining. 5. If useless before, much more so when almost wholly burnt. 6. So will I give the inhabitants of Jerusalem, as being utterly unprofitable (Matthew 21. 33-41; 25. 30; Mark 11. 12-14; Luke 13. 6-9) in answering God's design that they should be witnesses for Jehovah before the heathen (Matthew 3. 10; 5. 13). 7. from one fire . . . another—(Cf. Isalah 24. 18). "Fire" means here every kind of calamity (Psalms 66. 12). The Jewish fugitives shall escape from the ruin of Jerusalem, only to fall into some other calamity. 8. trespass—rather, "they have perversely fallen into perverse rebellion." The Jews were not merely sinners as the other nations, but revolters and apostates. It is one thing to neglect what we know not, but quite another thing to despise what we profess to worship [JEROME], as the Jews did towards God and the law.

CHAPTER XVI.

Vcr. 1-63. DETAILED APPLICATION OF THE PARABOLICAL DELINEATION OF CHAP. 15, TO JERUSALEM PERSONIFIED AS A DAUGHTER. 1. Taken up by God's gratuitous favour from infancy (v. 1-7); 2. and, when grown up, joined to Him in spiritual marriage (v. 8-14); 3. her unfaithfulness, her sin (v. 15-31); 4. the judgment (v. 35-52); 5. her unlooked-for restoration (v. 53 to the close). 2. cause Jerusalem to know—Men often are so blind as not to perceive their guilt which is patent to all. "Jerusalem" represents the whole kingdom of Judah. 3. birth . . . nativity—thy origin and birth; lit., thy diggings (cf. Isalah 51. 1) and thy bringings forth. of . . . Canaan—in which Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, sojourned before going to Egypt, and from which thou didst derive far more of thy innate characteristics than from the virtues of those thy progenitors (ch. 21. 30). an Amorite . . . an Hittite—these being the most powerful tribes stand for the whole of the Canaanite nations (cf. Joshua 1. 4; Amos 2. 9), which were so abominably corrupt as to have been doomed to utter extermination by God (Leviticus 18. 24, 25, 28; Deuteronomy 18. 12). Translate rather, "the Amorite . . . the Canaanite," i. e., these two tribes personified; their wicked characteristics, respectively, were concentrated in the parentage of Israel (Genesis 15. 16). "The Hittite" is made their "mother," alluding to Esau's wives, daughters of Heth, whose ways vexed Rebekah (Genesis 26. 34, 35; 27. 46), but pleased the degenerate descendants of Jacob, so that these are called, in respect of morals, children of the Hittite (cf. v. 45). 4. Israel's helplessness in her first struggling into national existence, under the image of an infant (Hosea 2. 3) cast forth without receiving the commonest acts of parental regard. Its very life was a miracle (Exodus 1. 15-22). navel . . . not cut—without proper attention to the navel string, the infant just born is liable to die. neither . . . washed in water to supple thee—i. e., to make the skin soft. Rather, "for purification," from an Arabic root. [MAURER.] GESENIUS translates as Margin, "that thou mightest (be presented to thy parents to) be looked upon," as is customary on the birth of a child. salted—anciently they rubbed infants with salt to make the skin dense and firm. 5. cast . . . in . . . open field—the exposure of infants was common in ancient times. to the loathing of thy person—referring to the unsightly aspect of the exposed infant. FAIRBAIRN translates, "With contempt (or disdainful indifference) of thy life." 6. when I passed by—as if a traveller. polluted in . . . blood—but PISCATOR, "ready to be trodden on." I said—in contrast to Israel's helplessness stands God's omnipotent word of grace which bid the outcast little one "live," in thy blood—though thou wast foul with blood, I said "Live" [GROTUS.] "Live in thy blood," i. e., Live, but live a life exposed to many deaths, as was the case in the beginnings of Israel's national existence, in order to magnify the grace of God. [CALVIN.] The former view is preferable. Spiritually, till the sinner is made sensible of his abject helplessness, he will not appreciate the provisions of God's grace. 7. caused . . . to multiply—lit., I . . . made thee a myriad. but . . . of field—the produce of the field. In 250 years they increased from seventy-five persons to eight hundred thousand (Acts 7. 14). [CALVIN.] But see Exodus 12. 37, 38, excellent ornaments—lit., "ornament of ornaments." naked . . . bare—(Hosea 2. 3). Lit., "nakedness . . . bareness" itself; more emphatic. 8. thy time . . . of love—lit., loves (cf. Song of Solomon 2. 10-13). Thou wast of marriageable age, but none was willing to marry thee, naked as thou wast. I then regarded thee with a look of grace when the full time of thy deliverance was come (Genesis 15. 13, 14; Acts 7. 6, 7). It is not she that makes the advance to God, but God to her; she has nothing to entitle her to such notice, yet He regards her not with mere benevolence, but with love, such as one cherishes to the person of his wife (Song of Solomon 1. 3-6; Jeremiah 31. 3; Malachi 1. 2). 8. spread my skirt over thee—the mode of espousals (Ruth 3. 9). I betrothed thee (Deuteronomy 4. 37; 10. 15; Hosea 11. 1). The cloak is often used as a bed coverlet in the East. God explains what He means, "I entered into . . . covenant with thee," i. e., at Sinai. So Israel became "the wife of God's covenant" (Isaiah 54. 5; Jeremiah 3. 14; Hosea 2. 19, 20; Malachi 2. 14), thou . . . mine—(Exodus 19. 5; Jeremiah 2. 2.) 9. washed I thee—as brides used to pass through a preparatory purification (Esther 2. 12). So Israel, before the giving of the law at Sinai (Exodus 19. 14), "Moses sanctified the people, and they washed their clothes." So believers (1 Corinthians 6. 11). oil—emblem of the Levitical priesthood, the type of Messiah (Psalm 45. 7). 10. Psalm 45. 13, 14, similarly describes the Church (Israel, the appointed mother of Christendom) adorned as a bride (so Isaiah 61. 10). It is Messiah who provides the wedding garment (Revelation 3. 18; 19. 8). badger's skin—lahash; others translate, seal skins. They formed the overcovering of the tabernacle, which was as it were the nuptial tent of God and Israel (Exodus 26. 14), and were the material of the shoes worn by the Hebrews on festival days. fine linen—used by the priests (Leviticus 6. 10); emblem of purity. 11. The marriage gifts to Rebekah (Genesis 24. 22, 47). 12. jewel on thy forehead—rather, "a ring in thy nose" (Isaiah 3. 21). a crown—at once the badge of a bride, and of her being made a queen, as being consort of the King; the very name Israel meaning "a prince of God." So they are called "a kingdom of priests" (Exodus 19. 6; cf. Revelation 1. 6). Though the external blessings bestowed on Israel were great, yet not these, but the internal and spiritual, form the main reference in the kingly marriage to which Israel was advanced. 13. flour . . . honey . . . oil—these three mixed form the sweetest cakes; not dry bread and leeks as in Egypt. From raiment He passes to food (Deuteronomy 32. 13, 14). exceeding beautiful—Psalm 48. 2, the city; also, Psalm 29. 2, the temple. prosper into a kingdom—exercising empire over surrounding nations. 14. thy renown . . . among . . . heathen—The theocracy reached its highest point under Solomon, when distant potentates heard of his "fame" (1 Kings 10. 1, &c.), e. g., the queen of Sheba, Hiram, &c. (Lamentations 2. 15). my comeliness—it was not thine own, but imparted by me. 15. Instead of attributing the glory of her privileges and gifts to God, Israel prided herself on them as her own (Deuteronomy 32. 15; Jeremiah 7. 4; Micah 3. 11), and then wantonly devoted them to her idols (Hosea 2. 8; cf. Luke 15. 12, 13). playedst . . . harlot because of thy renown—"didst play the wanton upon thy name" [FAIRBAIRN], viz., by allowing thy renown to lead thee into idolatry and leagues with idolaters (Isaiah 1. 21; 57. 8; Jeremiah 3. 2, 6). English Version is better, "because of thy renown," i. e., relying on it; answering to "thou didst trust in thine own beauty." his it was—thy beauty was yielded up to every passer by. Israel's zest for the worship of foul idols was but an anxiety to have the approbation of heaven for their carnal lusts, of which the idols were the personification; hence, too, their tendency to wander from Jehovah, who was a restraint on corrupt nature. 16. deckedst . . . with divers colours—or, "didst make . . . of divers colours" [FAIRBAIRN]; the metaphor and the literal are here mixed. The high places, whereon they sacrificed to Astarte are here compared to tents of divers colours, which an impudent harlot would spread to show her house was open to all. [CALVIN.] Cf. as to "woven hangings for Astarte" (the right translation for "grove") 2 Kings 23. 7. the like . . . shall not come, neither shall . . . be—rather, "have not come, nor shall be." These thy doings are unparalleled in the past, and shall be so in the future. 17. my gold . . . my silver—(Haggai 2. 8.) images of men—rather, "of the phallus," the Hindoo lingam, or membrum virile [HAVERNICK], deified as the emblem of fecundity; man making his lust his god. English Version, however, is appropriate; Israel being represented as a woman playing the harlot with "male images," i. e., images of male gods, as distinguished from female deities. 18. tookest thy . . . garments . . . coveredst them—i. e., the idols, as if an adulteress were to cover her paramours with garments which she had received from the liberality of her husband. my oil—the holy anointing oil sacred to God (Exodus 30. 22-25). Also that used in sacrifices (Leviticus 2. 1, 2). 19. My meat . . . I gave—(Hosea 2. 8.) set it before them—as a minchah or "meat offering" (Leviticus 2. 1). a sweet savour—lil, "a savour of rest," i. e., whereby they might be propitiated, and be at peace ("rest") with you; how ridiculous to seek to propitiate gods of wood! thus it was—The fact cannot be denied, for I saw it, and say it was so, saith Jehovah. 20, 21. children . . . born unto me—Though "thy children," yet they belong "unto me," rather than to thee, for they were born under the immutable covenant with Israel, which even Israel's sin could not set aside, and have received the sign of adoption as mine, viz., circumcision. This aggravates the guilt of sacrificing them to Molech. to be devoured—not merely to pass through the fire, as sometimes children were made to do (Leviticus 18. 21) without hurt, but to pass through so as to be made the food of the flame in honour of idols (Isaiah 57. 5; Jeremiah 7. 31; 19. 5; 32. 35, Notes). Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter, that thou hast slain my children—rather, "Were thy whoredoms a small matter (i. e., not enough, but) that thou hast slain (i. e., must also slay)," &c. As if thy unchastity was not enough, thou hast added this unnatural and sacrilegious cruelty (Micah 6. 7). 22. not remembered . . . youth—forgetfulness of God's love is the source of all sins. Israel forgot her deliverance by God in the infancy of her national life. See v. 43, to which v. 60 forms a lovely contrast (Jeremiah 2. 2; Hosea 11. 1). 23. woe, woe unto thee, &c.—This parenthetical exclamation has an awful effect coming like a lightning flash of judgment amidst the black clouds of Israel's guilt. 24. eminent place—rather, "a fornication-chamber," often connected with the impure rites of idolatry; spiritual fornication, on "an eminent place," answering to "fornication-chamber," is mainly meant, with an allusion also to the literal fornication associated with it (Jeremiah 2. 20; 3. 2). 25. at every head of the way—in the most frequented places (Proverbs 9. 14). thy beauty . . . abhorred . . . opened . . . feet to every one—The wanton advances were all on Israel's part, the idolatrous nations yielded to her nothing in return. She had yielded so much that, like a worn-out prostitute, her tempters became weary of her. When the Church lowers her testimony for God to the carnal tastes of the world, with a view to conciliation, she loses everything and gains nothing. 26. fornication with . . . Egyptians—alliances with Egypt, cemented by sharing their idolatries. great of flesh—of powerful virile parts; fig. for the gross and lustful religion of Egypt (e. g., Isis, &c.), which alone could satisfy the abominable lust of Israel (ch. 20. 7, 8; 23. 19, 20, 21). to provoke me—wantonly and purposely. 27. The consequent judgments, which, however, proved of no avail in reforming the people (Isaiah 9. 13; Jeremiah 5. 3). delivered thee unto . . . Philistines—(2 Kings 16. 6; 2 Chronicles 28. 18, 19.) ashamed of thy lewd way—The Philistines were less wanton in idolatry, in that they did not, like Israel, adopt the idols of every foreign country, but were content with their own (v. 57; Jeremiah 2. 11). 28. unsatiable—not satisfied with whoredoms with neighbours, thou hast gone off to the distant Assyrians, i. e., hast sought a league with them, and with it adopted their idolatries. 29. multiplied . . . fornication in . . . Canaan unto Chaldea—Thou hast multiplied thy idolatries "in Canaan" by sending "unto Chaldea" to borrow from thence the Chaldean rites, to add to the abominations already practised "in Canaan," before the carrying away of Jehoiachin to Chaldea. The name "Canaan" is used to imply that they had made Judæa as much the scene of abominations as it was in the days of the corrupt Canaanites. The land had become utterly Canaanitish (ch. 23. 14, &c.). 30. weak . . . heart—Sin weakens the intellect ("heart"), as, on the contrary, "the way of the Lord is strength to the upright" (Proverbs 10. 29). 31. Repetition of v. 24. not . . . as . . . harlot . . . thou scornest hire—unlike an ordinary harlot thou dost prostitute thy person gratis, merely to satisfy thy lust. JEROME translates "Thou hast not been as a harlot in scornful (i. e., who ordinarily scorns) a hire offered," in order to get a larger one.

nay, thou hast offered hire thyself to thy lovers (v. 33, 34). But these verses show English Version to be preferable, for they state that Israel prostituted herself, not merely for any small reward without demanding more, but for "no reward." 33. instead of her husband—referring to Numbers 5, 19, 20, 29. FAIRBAIRN translates, "whilst under her husband." 33, 34. Israel hired her paramours, instead of being, like other harlots, hired by them; she also followed them without their following her. 35. Here begins the threat of wrath to be poured out on her. 36. filthiness—lit., brass; metaphor for the lowest part of the person. [CALVIN.] English Version is better; thy filthy lewdness is poured out without restraint (cf. Jeremiah 13, 27). As silver is an emblem of purity, brass typifies "filthiness," because it easily contracts rust. HENDERSON explains it, "Because thy money was lavished on thy lovers" (v. 31, 33, 34). blood of thy children—(v. 20; Jeremiah 2, 34.) thy lovers—the Chaldeans and the Assyrians. The law of retribution is the more signally exemplified by God employing, as His instruments of judgment on Israel, those very nations whose alliance and idols Israel had so eagerly sought, besides giving her up to those who had been always her enemies. "God will make him, who leaves God for the world, disgraced even in the eyes of the world, and indeed the more so the nearer he formerly stood to Himself." [HENGSTENBERG.] (Isaiah 47, 3; Jeremiah 13, 26; Hosea 2, 12; Nahum 3, 5.) all . . . thou hast hated—the Edomites and Philistines; also Moab and Ammon especially (Deuteronomy 23, 3). I . . . will discover thy nakedness—punishment in kind, as she had "discovered her nakedness through whoredoms" (v. 36); the sin and its penalty corresponded. I will expose thee to public infamy. 38-40. Judge thee, as women that break wedlock—(Leviticus 20, 10; cf. v. 2.) In the case of individual adulteresses, stoning was the penalty (John 8, 4, 5). In the case of communities, the sword. Also apostasy (Deuteronomy 13, 10) and sacrificing children to Molech (Leviticus 20, 1-5) incurred stoning. Thus the penalty was doubly due to Israel; so the other which was decreed against an apostate city (Deuteronomy 13, 15, 16) is added, "they shall stone thee with stones and thrust thee through with . . . swords." The Chaldeans hurled stones on Jerusalem at the siege, and slew with the sword on its capture. shed blood . . . judged—(Genesis 9, 6.) jealousy—image taken from the fury of a husband in jealousy shedding the blood of an unfaithful wife, such as Israel had been towards God, her husband spiritually. Lit., "I will make thee (to become) blood of fury and jealousy." 39. thine embait place—lit., "fornication-chamber" (Note, v. 24), the temple which Israel had converted into a place of spiritual fornication with idols, to please the Chaldeans (ch. 23, 14-17). strip thee of . . . clothes—(Ch. 23, 26; Hosea 2, 3.) They shall dismantle thy city of its walls. fair jewels—lit., vessels of thy fairness or beauty; the vessels of the temple. [GROTIUS.] All the gifts wherewith God hath adorned thee. [CALVIN.] 40. (Ch. 23, 10, 47.) Cf. as to the destruction under Titus, Luke 19, 43, 44. 41. The result of the awful judgment shall be, when Divine vengeance has run its course it shall cease. burn—(Deuteronomy 13, 16; 2 Kings 25, 9.) women—the surrounding Gentile nations to whom thou shalt be an object of mocking (Psalm 137, 7). I will cause thee to cease . . . harlot—(Ch. 23, 27.) Thou shalt no longer be able to play the harlot through my judgments. thou . . . shalt give . . . no hire . . . more—thou shalt have none to give. 42. my fury . . . rest—when my justice has exacted the full penalty commensurate with thy awful guilt (Note, ch. 5, 13). It is not a mitigation of the penalty that is here foretold, but such an utter destruction of all the guilty that, there shall be no need of further punishment. [CALVIN.] 43. (Ver. 22; Psalm 78, 42.) In gratitude for God's favours to her in her early history. fretted me—(Isaiah 63, 10; Ephesians 4, 30.) thou shalt not commit this lewdness above all thine abominations—i. e., this the wickedness (cf. Zechariah 5, 8), peculiarly hateful to God, viz., spiritual unchastity or idolatry, over and "above" (i. e., besides) all thine other abominations. I will put it out of thy power to commit it by cutting thee off. FAIRBAIRN translates, "I will not do what is scandalous (viz., encouraging thee in thy sin by letting it pass with impunity) upon all thine abominations;" referring to Leviticus 19, 29, the conduct of a father who encouraged his daughter in harlotry. English Version is much better. 44. As . . . mother . . . her daughter—Is, and so is, are not in the original; the ellipsis gives the proverb (but two words in the Hebrew) epigrammatic brevity. Jerusalem proved herself a true daughter of the Hittite mother in sin (v. 3). 45. mother's . . . that loatheth her husband—i. e., God ("haters of God," Romans 1, 30); therefore the knowledge of the true God had originally been in Canaan, handed down from Noah (hence we find Melchizedek, king of Salem, in Canaan, "priest of the most high God," Genesis 14, 18), but Canaan apostatized from it this was what constituted the blackness of the Canaanites' guilt. loatheth . . . children—whom she put to death in honour of Saturn; a practice common among the Phœnicians. sister of thy sisters—thou art akin in guilt to Samaria and Sodom, to which thou art akin by birth. Moab and Ammon, the incestuous children of Lot, nephew of Abraham, Israel's progenitor, had their origin from Sodom; so Sodom might be called Judah's sister. Samaria, answering to the ten tribes of Israel, is, of course, sister to Judah. 46. elder sister . . . Samaria . . . older than Sodom, to whom Judah was less nearly related by kindred than she was to Samaria. Sodom is therefore called her younger sister; Samaria, her "elder sister." [GROTIUS.] Samaria is called the "elder," because in a moral respect more nearly related to Judah. [FAIRBAIRN.] Samaria had made the calves at Dan and Bethel in imitation of the cherubim. her daughters—the inferior towns subject to Samaria (cf. Numbers 21, 25, Margin). left—The Orientals faced the east in marking the directions of the sky; thus the north was "left," the south "right." Sodom . . . daughters—Ammon and Moab, offshoots from Sodom; also the towns subject to it. 47. thy abominations—Milcom and Chemosh, the "abominations of Ammon and Moab" (1 Kings 11, 5, 7). corrupted more than they—so it is expressly recorded of Manasseh (2 Kings 21, 9). 48. Sodom—(Matthew 11, 24.) Judah's guilt was not positively, but relatively, greater than Sodom's; because it was in the midst of such higher privileges and such solemn warnings; a fortiori, the guilt of unbelievers in the midst of the highest of all lights, viz., the gospel, is the greatest. 49. pride—inherited by Moab, her offspring (Isaiah 16, 6; Jeremiah 48, 26), and by Ammon (Jeremiah 49, 4). God, the heart-searcher, here specifies as Sodom's sin, not merely her notorious lusts, but the secret spring of them, "pride" flowing from "fulness of bread," caused by the fertility of the soil (Genesis 13, 10), and producing "idleness." abundance of idleness—lit., the secure carelessness of ease or idleness. neither did she strengthen . . . the poor—Pride is always cruel; it arrogates to itself all things, and despises brethren, for whose needs it therefore has no feeling; as Moab had not for the outcast Jews (Isaiah 16, 3, 4; Jeremiah 48, 27; Luke 16, 19-21; James 5, 1-5). 50. haughty—puffed up with prosperity. abomination before me—"sinners before the Lord" (Genesis 13, 13); said of those whose sin is so heinous as to cry out to God for immediate judgments; presumptuous sins, daring God to the face (Genesis 18, 20; 19, 5). I took them away—(Genesis 19, 24), as I saw good—rather, "according to what I saw;" referring to Genesis, 18, 21, where God says, "I will go down, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it which is come unto me." 51. Samaria—the kingdom of the ten tribes of Israel less guilty than Judah; for Judah betrayed greater ingratitude, having greater privileges, viz., the temple, the priesthood, and the regular order of kings. justified thy sisters—made them appear almost innocent by comparison with thy guilt (Jeremiah 3, 11; Matthew 12, 41, 42). 52. Thou . . . which hast judged . . . bear thine own—(Matthew 7, 1, 2; Romans 2, 1, 17-23.) Judah had judged Sodom (representing the heathen nations) and Samaria (Israel), saying they were justly punished, as if she herself was innocent (Luke 13, 2). thy shame—ignominious punishment. 53. Here follows a promise of restoration. Even the sore chastisements coming on Judah would fail to reform its people; God's returning goodness alone would effect this, to show how entirely of grace was to be their restoration. The restoration of her erring sisters is mentioned before hers, even as their punishment preceded her punishment; so all self-boasting is excluded. [FAIRBAIRN.] "Ye shall, indeed, at some time or other return, but Moab and Ammon shall return with you, and some of the ten tribes." [GROTIUS.] bring again . . . captivity—i. e., change the affliction into prosperity (so Job 42. 10). Sodom itself was not so restored (Jeremiah 20. 16), but Ammon and Moab (her representatives, as sprung from Lot who dwelt in Sodom) were (Jeremiah 48. 47; 49. 6); probably most of the ten tribes and the adjoining nations, Ammon and Moab, &c., were in part restored under Cyrus; but the full realization of the restoration is yet future; the heathen nations to be brought to Christ being typified by "Sodom," whose sins they now reproduce (Deuteronomy 32. 32). captivity of thy captives—lit., "of thy captivities." However, the gracious promise rather begins with the "nevertheless" (v. 60), not here; for v. 59 is a threat, not a promise. The sense here thus is, Thou shalt be restored when Sodom and Samaria are, but not till then (v. 55), i. e., never. This applies to the guilty who should be utterly destroyed (v. 41, 42); but it does not contradict the subsequent promise of restoration to their posterity (Numbers 14. 29-33), and to the elect remnant of grace. [CALVIN.] 54. bear thine own shame—by being put on a level with those whom thou hast so much despised. thou art a comfort unto them—since they see thee as miserable as themselves. It is a kind of melancholy "comfort" to those chastised to see others as sorely punished as themselves (ch. 14. 22, 23). 55. (Note, v. 53.) 56. Sodom was not mentioned—lit., was not for a report. Thou didst not deign to mention her name as if her case could possibly apply as a warning to thee, but it did apply (2 Peter 2. 6). 57. Before thy wickedness was discovered—manifested to all, viz., by the punishment inflicted on thee. thy reproach of . . . Syria and . . . Philistines—the indignity and injuries done thee by Syria and the Philistines (2 Kings 16. 5; 2 Chronicles 28. 13; Isaiah 9. 11, 12). 58. borne thy lewdness—i. e., the punishment of it (ch. 23. 49). I do not treat thee with excessive rigour. Thy sin and punishment are exactly commensurate. 59. the oath—the covenant between God and Israel (Deuteronomy 20. 12, 14). As thou hast despised it, so will I despise thee. No covenant is one-sided; where Israel broke faith, God's promise of favour ceased. 60. The promise here bursts forth unexpectedly like the sun from the dark clouds. With all her forgetfulness of God, God still remembers her; showing that her redemption is altogether of grace. Contrast "I will remember," with "thou hast not remembered" (v. 22, 43); also "my covenant," with "thy covenant" (v. 61; Psalm 106. 45); then the effect produced on her is (v. 63), "that thou mayest remember." God's promise was one of promise and of grace. The law, in its letter, was Israel's ("thy") covenant, and in this restricted view was long subsequent (Galatians 3. 17). Israel interpreted it as a covenant of works, which she, whilst boasting of, failed to fulfil, and so fell under its condemnation (2 Corinthians 3. 3, 6). The law, in its spirit, contains the germ of the gospel; the New Testament is the full development of the Old, the husk of the outer form being laid aside when the inner spirit was fulfilled in Messiah. God's covenant with Israel, in the person of Abraham, was the reason why, notwithstanding all her guilt, mercy was, and is, in store for her. Therefore the heathen or Gentile nations must come to her for blessings, not she to them. everlasting covenant—(ch. 37. 26; 2 Samuel 23. 5; Isaiah 55. 3). The temporary forms of the law were to be laid aside, that in its permanent and "everlasting" spirit it might be established (Jeremiah 31. 31-37; 32. 40; 50. 4, 5; Hebrews 8. 8-13). 61. thou shalt remember—It is God who first remembers her before she remembers Him and her own ways before Him (v. 60; ch. 20. 43; 36. 31). ashamed—the fruit of repentance (2 Corinthians 7. 10, 11); none please God unless those who displease themselves; a foretaste of the gospel (Luke 18. 9-14). I will give them unto thee for daughters—(Isaiah 54. 1; 60. 3, 4; Galatians 4. 26, &c.) All the heathen nations, not merely Sodom and Samaria, are meant by "thy sisters, elder and younger." In Jerusalem, first individual believers were gathered into the elect Church. From Jerusalem the gospel went forth to gather in individuals of the Gentiles; and Jerusalem and Judah shall also be the first nation which, as such, shall be converted to Christ; and to her the other nations shall attach themselves as believers in Messiah, Jerusalem's King (Psalm 110. 2; Isaiah 2. 2, 3). "The king's daughter" in Psalm 45. 12-14 is Judah; her "companions," as "the daughter of Tyre," are the nations given to her as converts, here called "daughters." not by thy covenant—This does not set aside the Old Testament in its spirit, but in its mere letter on which the Jews had rested, whilst they broke it; the latter ("thy covenant") was to give place to God's covenant of grace and promise in Christ who "fulfilled" the law. God means, "not that thou on thy part hast stood to the covenant, but that 'I am the Lord, I change not' (Malachi 3. 6) from my original love to thee in thy youth" (see Romans 3. 3). 62. (Hosea 2. 19, 20.) thou shalt know that I am the Lord—not, as elsewhere, by the judgments falling on thee, but by my so marvellously restoring thee through grace. 63. never open thy mouth—in vindication, or even palliation, of thyself, or expostulation with God for His dealings (Romans 3. 19), when thou seest thine own exceeding unworthiness, and my superabounding grace which has so wonderfully overcome with love thy sin (Romans 5. 20). "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged" (1 Corinthians 11. 31). all that thou hast done—enhancing the grace of God which has pardoned so many and so great sins. Nothing so melts into love and humility as the sense of the riches of God's pardoning grace (Luke 7. 47).

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-24. PARABLE OF THE TWO GREAT EAGLES, AND THE CROPPING OF THE CEDAR OF LEBANON. JUDAH IS TO BE JUDGED FOR REVOLTING FROM BABYLON, WHICH HAD SET UP ZEDEKIAH INSTEAD OF JEHOIACHIN, TO EGYPT; GOD HIMSELF, AS THE RIVAL OF THE BABYLONIAN KING, IS TO PLANT THE GOSPEL CEDAR OF MESSIAH. The date of the prophecy is between the sixth month of Zedekiah's sixth year of reign and the fifth month of the seventh year after the carrying away of Jehoiachin, i. e., five years before the destruction of Jerusalem. [HENDERSON.] 2. riddle—a continued allegory, expressed enigmatically, requiring more than common acumen and serious thought. The Hebrew is derived from a root, "sharp," i. e., calculated to stimulate attention and whet the intellect. Distinct from "fable," in that it teaches not fiction, but fact. Not like the ordinary riddle, designed to puzzle, but to instruct. The "riddle" is here identical with the "parable," only that the former refers to the obscurity, the latter to the likeness of the figure to the thing compared. 3. eagle—the king of birds. The literal Hebrew is, "the great eagle." The symbol of the Assyrian supreme god, Nisroch; so applied to "the great king" of Babylon, his vicerger on earth (Jeremiah 48. 40; 49. 22). His "wings" are his great forces. Such symbols were familiar to the Jews, who saw them portrayed on the great buildings of Babylon; such as are now seen in the Assyrian remains. long-winged—implying the wide extent of his empire. full of feathers—when they have been renewed after moulting; and so in the full freshness of renovated youth (Psalm 103. 5; Isaiah 40. 31). Answering to the many peoples which, as tributaries, constituted the strength of Babylon. divers colours—the golden eagle, marked with starlike spots, supposed to be the largest of eagles. [BOCHART.] Answering to the variety of languages, habits, and costumes of the peoples subject to Babylon. came unto Lebanon—continuing the metaphor; as the eagle frequents mountains, not cities. The temple at Jerusalem was called "Lebanon" by the Jews [EUSEBIUS], because its woodwork was wholly of cedars of Lebanon. "The mountain of the Lord's house" (Isaiah 2. 2). Jerusalem, however, is chiefly meant, the chief seat of civil honour, as Lebanon

was of external elevation. took the highest branch—King Jeconiah, then but eighteen years old, and many of the chiefs and people with him (2 Kings 24. 8, 12-16). The Hebrew for "highest branch" is, properly, the fleece-like tuft at the top of the tree. So in ch. 31. 3-14. The cedar, as a tall tree, is the symbol of kingly elevation (cf. Daniel 4. 10-12). 4. land of traffic . . . merchants—Babylon (2 Kings 24. 15, 16), famous for its transport traffic on the Tigris and Euphrates; also, by its connection with the Persian Gulf, it carried on much commerce with India. 5. seed of the land—not a foreign production, but one native in the region; a son of the soil, not a foreigner; Zedekiah, uncle of Jehoiachin, of David's family. in a fruitful field—lit., a field of seed; i. e., fit for propagating and continuing the seed of the royal family. as a willow—derived from a Hebrew root, "to overflow," from its fondness for water (Isaiah 41. 4). Judea was "a land of brooks of water and fountains" (Deuteronomy 8. 7-9; cf. John 3. 23). 6. vine of low stature—not now, as before, a stately "cedar;" the kingdom of Judah was to be prosperous, but not elevated. branches turned toward him—expressing the fealty of Zedekiah as a vassal looking up to Nebuchadnezzar, to whom Judah owed its peace and very existence as a separate state. The "branches" mean his sons, and the other princes and nobles. The "roots under him" imply that the stability of Judah depended on Babylon. The repetition "branches" and "sprigs" is in order to mark the ingratitude of Zedekiah, who, not content with moderate prosperity, revolted from him to whom he had sworn allegiance. 7. another . . . eagle—the king of Egypt (v. 15). The "long-winged" of v. 3 is omitted, as Egypt had not such a wide empire and large armies as Babylon. vine . . . bend . . . roots towards him—lit., "thirsted after him with its roots;" happily expressing the longings after Egypt in the Jewish heart. Zedekiah sought the alliance of Egypt, as though by it he could throw off his dependence on Babylon (2 Kings 24. 7, 20; 2 Chronicles 36. 13; Jeremiah 37. 5, 7). water it by . . . furrows of . . . plantation—i. e., in the garden beds (Judea) wherein (the vine) it was planted. Rather, "by" or "out of the furrows," &c. It refers to the waters of Egypt, the Nile being made to water the fields by means of small canals or "furrows;" these waters are the figure of the auxiliary forces wherewith Egypt tried to help Judah. See the same figure, Isaiah 8. 7. But see Note, v. 10, "furrows where it grew." 8. It was planted in a good soil—It was not want of the necessities of life, nor oppression on the part of Nebuchadnezzar, which caused Zedekiah to revolt; it was gratuitous ambition, pride, and ingratitude. 9. Shall it prosper?—Could it be that gratuitous treason should prosper? God will not allow it. "It," i. e., the vine. he . . . pull up—i. e., the first eagle, or Nebuchadnezzar. in all . . . leaves of her spring—i. e., all its springing (sprouting) leaves. without great power or many—it shall not need the whole forces of Babylon to destroy it; a small division of the army will suffice, because God will deliver it into Nebuchadnezzar's hand (Jeremiah 37. 10). 10. being planted—i. e., though planted. east wind—the east wind was noxious to vegetation in Palestine; a fit emblem of Babylon, which came from the north-east. with in . . . furrows where it grew—Zedekiah was taken of Jericho, in Jewish soil (Jeremiah 52. 8). "It shall wither, although it has furrows from which it expects continual waterings" [CALVIN], (ch. 19. 12; Hosea 13. 15). 12. Know ye not—He upbraided them with moral, leading to intellectual, stupidity. hath taken the king—Jeconiah or Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24. 11, 12-16). 13. the king's seed—Zedekiah, Jeconiah's uncle. taken . . . oath of him—swearing fealty as a vassal to Nebuchadnezzar (2 Chronicles 36. 13). also taken the mighty—as hostages for the fulfilment of the covenant; whom, therefore, Zedekiah exposed to death by his treason. 14. That the kingdom might be base—i. e., low as to national elevation by being Nebuchadnezzar's dependant; but, at the same time, safe and prosperous, if faithful to the "oath." Nebuchadnezzar dealt sincerely and openly in proposing conditions, and these moderate ones; therefore Zedekiah's treachery was the baser, and was a counterpart to their treachery towards God. 15. he rebelled—God permitted this because of His wrath against Jerusalem (2 Kings 24. 20). horses—in which Egypt abounded, and which were forbidden to Israel to seek from Egypt, or indeed to "multiply" at all (Deuteronomy 17. 16; Isaiah 31. 1, 3; cf. Isaiah 36. 9). DIDORUS SICULUS (1. 45) says that the whole region from Thebes to Memphis was filled with royal stalls, so that 20,000 chariots with two horses in each could be furnished for war. Shall he prosper?—The third time this question is asked, with an indignant denial understood (v. 9, 10). Even the heathen believed that breakers of an oath would not "escape" punishment. 16. in the place where the king dwelleth—righteous retribution. He brought on himself in the worst form the evil which, in a mild form, he had sought to deliver himself from by perjured treachery, viz., vassalage (ch. 12. 13; Jeremiah 32. 5; 34. 3; 52. 11). 17. Pharaoh—Pharaoh-hophra (Jeremiah 37. 7; 44. 30), the successor of Necho (2 Kings 23. 29). Neither . . . make for him—lit., "effect (anything) with him," i. e., be of any avail to Zedekiah. Pharaoh did not act in concert with him, for he was himself compelled to retire to Egypt. by casting up mounds, &c.—So far from Pharaoh doing so for Jerusalem, this was what Nebuchadnezzar did against it (Jeremiah 52. 4). CALVIN, MAURER, &c., refer it to Nebuchadnezzar, "when Nebuchadnezzar shall cast up mounds." 18. given his hand—in ratification of the oath (2 Kings 10. 15; Ezra 10. 19), and also in token of subjection to Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chronicles 29. 24, Margin; 2 Chronicles 30, 8, Margin; Lamentations 5. 6). 19. mine oath—the "covenant" being sworn in God's name was really His covenant; a new instance in relation to man of the treacherous spirit which had been so often betrayed in relation to God. God Himself must therefore avenge the violation of His covenant "on the head" of the perjurer (cf. Psalm 7. 16). 20. my net—(Ch. 12. 13; 32. 3) God entraps him, as he had tried to entrap others (Psalm 7. 15). This was spoken at least upwards of three years before the fall of Jerusalem (cf. ch. 8. 1, with ch. 20. 1). 21. all his fugitives—the soldiers that accompany him in his flight. plead with him—by judgments on him (ch. 20. 36). 22. When the state of Israel shall seem past recovery, Messiah, Jehovah Himself, will unexpectedly appear on the scene as Redeemer of His people (Isaiah 63. 5). I . . . also—God opposes Himself to Nebuchadnezzar: "He took of the seed of the land and planted it (v. 3, 5), so will I, but with better success than he had. The branch he plucked (Zedekiah) and planted, flourished but for a time to perish at last; I will plant a scion of the same tree, the house of David, to whom the kingdom belongs by an everlasting covenant, and it shall be the shelter of the whole world, and shall be for ever." branch—the peculiar title of Messiah (Zechariah 3. 8; 6. 12; Isaiah 11. 1, 4; 2; Jeremiah 23. 5; 33. 15). a tender one—Zerubbabel never reigned as a universal (v. 23) king, nor could the great things mentioned here be said of him, except as a type of Messiah. Messiah alone can be meant: originally "a tender plant and root out of a dry ground" (Isaiah 53. 2); the beginning of His kingdom being humble, His reputed parents in lowly rank, though King David's lineal representatives; yet, even then, God here calls Him, in respect to His everlasting purpose, "the highest . . . of the high" (Psalm 89. 27). I will plant it upon an high mountain—Zion; destined to be the moral centre and eminence of grace and glory shining forth to the world, outtopping all mundane elevation. The kingdom, typically begun at the return from Babylon, and rebuilding of the temple, fully began with Christ's appearing, and shall have its highest manifestation at His reappearing to reign on Zion, and thence over the whole earth (Psalm 2. 6, 8; Isaiah 2. 2, 3; Jeremiah 3. 17). 23. under it . . . all fowl—the gospel "mustard tree," small at first, but at length receiving all under its covert (Matthew 13. 32); the antithesis to Antichrist, symbolized by Assyria, of which the same is said (ch. 31. 6), and Babylon (Daniel 4. 12). Antichrist assumes in mimicry the universal power really belonging to Christ. 24. I . . . brought down the high—the very attribute given to God by the virgin mother of Him, under whom this was to be accomplished. high . . . low tree—i. e., princes elevated . . . depressed. All the empires of the world, represented by Babylon, once flourishing ("green"), shall be brought low before the once depressed ("dry"), but then exalted, kingdom of Messiah and His people, the head of whom shall be Israel (Daniel 2. 44).

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 1-32. THE PARABLE OF THE SOUR GRAPES REPROVED. Vindication of God's moral government as to His retributive righteousness from the Jewish imputation of injustice, as if they were suffering, not for their own sin, but for that of their fathers. As in ch. 17. he foretold Messiah's happy reign in Jerusalem, so now he warns them that its blessings can be theirs only upon their individually turning to righteousness. 2. fathers . . . eaten sour grapes . . . children's teeth . . . set on edge—their unbelieving calumnies on God's justice had become so common as to have assumed a proverbial form. The sin of Adam in eating the forbidden fruit, visited on his posterity, seems to have suggested the peculiar form; noticed also by Jeremiah 31. 29; and explained in Lamentations 5. 7, "Our fathers have sinned, and are not; and we have borne their iniquities." They mean by "the children" themselves, as though they were innocent, whereas they were far from being so. The partial reformation effected since Manasseh's wicked reign, especially among the exiles at Chebar, was their ground for thinking so; but the improvement was only superficial, and only fostered their self-righteous spirit, which sought anywhere but in themselves the cause of their calamities; just as the modern Jews attribute their present dispersion, not to their own sins, but to those of their forefathers. It is an universal mark of corrupt nature to lay the blame on others which belongs to ourselves, and to arraign the justice of God. Cf. Genesis 3. 12, where Adam transfers the blame of his sin to Eve, and even to God, "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." 3. ye shall not have occasion . . . to use this proverb any more—because I will let it be seen by the whole world in the very fact that you are not righteous, as ye fancy yourselves, but wicked, and that you suffer only the just penalty of your guilt; whilst the elect righteous remnant alone escape. 4. all souls are mine—therefore I can deal with all, being my own creation, as I please (Jeremiah 18. 6). As the Creator of all alike I can have no reason, but the principle of equity, according to men's works, to make any difference, so as to punish some, and to save others (Genesis 18. 25). "The soul that sinneth it shall die." The curse descending from father to son assumes guilt shared in by the son; there is a natural tendency in the child to follow the sin of his father, and so he shares in the father's punishment: hence the principles of God's government involved in Exodus 20. 5; Jeremiah 15. 4, are justified. The sons, therefore (as the Jews here), cannot complain of being unjustly afflicted by God (Lamentations 5. 7); for they filled up the guilt of their fathers (Matthew 23. 32, 34-36). The same God who "recompenses the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children," is immediately after set forth as "giving to every man according to his ways" (Jeremiah 32. 18, 19). In the same law (Exodus 20. 5) which "visited the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation" (where the explanation is added, "of them that hate me," i. e., the children hating God, as well as their fathers; the former being too likely to follow their parents, sin going down with cumulative force from parent to child), we find (Deuteronomy 24. 16), "the fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither the children for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin." The inherited guilt of sin in infants (Romans 5. 14) is an awful fact, but one met by the atonement of Christ; but it is of adults that he speaks here. Whatever penalties fall on communities for connection with sins of their fathers, individual adults who repent shall escape (2 Kings 23. 25, 26). This was no new thing, as some misinterpret

the passage here; it had been always God's principle to punish only the guilty, and not also the innocent, for the sins of their fathers. God does not here change the principle of His administration, but is merely about to manifest it so personally to each that the Jews should no longer throw on God and on their fathers the blame which was their own. soul that sinneth, it shall die—and it alone (Romans 6. 23); not also the innocent. 5. Here begins the illustration of God's impartiality in a series of supposed cases: (1.) from v. 5-9, the just man; the excellencies are selected in reference to the prevailing sins of the age, from which such a one stood aloof; hence arises the omission of some features of righteousness, which, under different circumstances, would have been desirable to be enumerated. Each age has its own besetting temptations, and the just man will be distinguished by his guarding against the peculiar defilements, inward and outward, of his age. just . . . lawful . . . right—the duties of the second table of the law, which flow from the fear of God. Piety is the root of all charity; to render to each his own, as well to our neighbour as to God. 6. not eaten upon . . . mountains—the high places, where altars were reared. A double sin: sacrificing elsewhere than at the temple, where only God sanctioned sacrifice (Deuteronomy 12. 13, 14); and this to idols instead of to Jehovah. "Eaten" refers to the feasts which were connected with the sacrifices (see Exodus 32. 6; Deuteronomy 32. 38; Judges 9. 27; 1 Corinthians 8. 4, 10; 10. 7). lifted . . . eyes to—viz., in adoration (Psalm 121. 1). The superstitious are compared to harlots; their eyes go eagerly after spiritual lusts. The righteous man not merely refrains from the act, but from the glance of spiritual lust (Job 31. 1; Matthew 5. 28). idols of . . . Israel—not merely those of the Gentiles, but even those of Israel. The fashions of his countrymen could not lead him astray. defiled . . . neighbour's wife—not only does he shrink from spiritual, but also from carnal adultery (cf. 1 Corinthians 6. 18). neither . . . menstruous woman—Leprosy and elephantiasis were said to be the fruit of such a connection. [JEROME.] Chastity is to be observed even towards one's own wife (Leviticus 18. 19; 20. 18). 7. restored . . . pledge—that which the poor debtor absolutely needed; as his raiment, which the creditor was bound to restore before sunset (Exodus 22. 26, 27), and his millstone, which was needed for preparing his food (Deuteronomy 24. 6, 10-13). bread to . . . hungry . . . covered . . . naked—(Isaiah 58. 7; Matthew 25. 35, 36). After duties of justice come those of benevolence. It is not enough to refrain from doing a wrong to our neighbour, we must also do him good. The bread owned by a man, though "his," is given to him, not to keep to himself, but to impart to the needy. 8. usury—lit., biting. The law forbade the Jew to take interest from brethren, but permitted him to do so from a foreigner (Exodus 22. 25; Deuteronomy 23. 19, 20; Nehemiah 5. 7; Psalm 15. 5). The letter of the law was restricted to the Jewish polity, and is not binding now; and indeed the principle of taking interest was even then sanctioned, by its being allowed in the case of a foreigner. The spirit of the law still binds us, that we are not to take advantage of our neighbour's necessities to enrich ourselves, but be satisfied with moderate, or even no interest, in the case of the needy. increase—in the case of other kinds of wealth; as "usury" refers to money (Leviticus 25. 36). withdrawn . . . hand, &c.—where he has the opportunity, and might find a plausible plea for promoting his own gain at the cost of a wrong to his neighbour, keeps back his hand from what selfishness prompts. judgment—justice. 9. truly—with integrity. surely live—lit., live in life. Prosper in this life, but still more in the life to come (Proverbs 3. 1, 2; Amos 5. 4). 10-13. The second case is that of an impious son of a pious father. His pious parentage, so far from excusing, aggravates his guilt. robber—or lit., "a breaker," viz., through all constraints of right. doeth the like to any one—the Hebrew and the parallel (v. 18) require us to translate rather, "doeth to his brother any of these things," viz., the things which follow in v. 11, &c. [MAURER.] 11. those duties—which his father did (v. 5, 9). 12. oppressed the poor—an aggravation to his op-

prissions, that they were practised against the poor; whereas in v. 7 the expression is simply, "oppressed any." abomination—singular number referring to the particular one mentioned in the end of v. 6. 13. shall he . . . live!—because of the merits of his father; answering, by contrast, to "die for the iniquity of his father" (v. 17). his blood shall be upon him—the cause of his bloody death shall rest with himself; God is not to blame, but is vindicated as just in punishing him. 14-18. The third case: a son who walks not in the steps of an unrighteous father, but in the ways of God; e. g., Josiah, the pious son of guilty Amon; Hezekiah, of Ahaz (2 Kings 16, 18, 21, 22). seeth . . . and considereth—the same Hebrew stands for both verbs, "seeth . . . yca, seeth." The repetition implies the attentive observation needed, in order that the son may not be led astray by his father's bad example; as sons generally are blind to parents' sins, and even imitate them as if virtues. 17. taken off his hand from the poor—i. e., abstained from oppressing the poor, when he had the opportunity of doing so with impunity. The different sense of the phrase in ch. 16, 49, in reference to relieving the poor, seems to have suggested the reading followed by FAIRBAIRN, but not sanctioned by the Hebrew, "hath not turned his hand from," &c. But ch. 20, 22 uses the phrase in a somewhat similar sense to English Version here, abstained from hurting. 19. Here the Jews object to the prophet's word, and in their objection seem to seek a continuance of that very thing which they had originally made a matter of complaint. Therefore translate, "Wherefore doth not the son bear the iniquity of his father?" It now would seem a consolation to them to think the son might suffer for his father's misdeeds; for it would soothe their self-love to regard themselves as innocent sufferers for the guilt of others, and would justify them in their present course of life, which they did not choose to abandon for a better. In reply, Ezekiel reiterates the truth of each being dealt with according to his own merits. [FAIRBAIRN.] But GROTIUS supports English Version, wherein the Jews contradict the prophet, "Why (sayest thou so) doth not the son (often, as in our case, though innocent) bear (i. e., suffer for) the iniquity of their father?" Ezekiel replies, It is not as you say, but as I in the name of God say: "When the son hath done," &c. English Version is simpler than that of FAIRBAIRN. 20. son shall not bear . . . iniquity of . . . father—(Deuteronomy 24, 16; 2 Kings 14, 6.) righteousness . . . wickedness—i. e., the reward for righteousness . . . the punishment of wickedness. "Righteousness" is not used as if any were absolutely righteous; but, of such as have it imputed to them for Christ's sake, though not under the Old Testament themselves understanding the ground or which they were regarded as righteous, but sincerely seeking after it in the way of God's appointment, so far as they then understood this way. 21-24. Two last cases, showing the equity of God: (1.) The penitent sinner is dealt with according to his new obedience, not according to his former sins. (2.) The righteous man who turns from righteousness to sin shall be punished for the latter, and his former righteousness will be of no avail to him. he shall surely live—Despair drives men into hardened recklessness; God therefore allures men to repentance by holding out hope. [CALVIN.]

"To threats the stubborn sinner oft is hard,
Wrapt in his crimes, against the storm prepared,
But when the milder beams of mercy play,
He melts, and throws the cumbrous cloak away."

Hitherto the cases had been of a change from bad to good, or vice versa, in one generation compared with another. Here it is such a change in one and the same individual. This, as practically affecting the persons here addressed, is properly put last. So far from God laying on men the penalty of others' sins, He will not even punish them for their own, if they turn from sin to righteousness; but if they turn from righteousness to sin, they must expect in justice that their former goodness will not atone for subsequent sin (Heb. vi 10, 33, 39; 2 Peter 2, 20-22). The exile in Babylon for a season for repentance of those sins which would have brought death on the perpetrator in Judea whilst the law could be enforced; so it prepared the way for the gospel. [GROTIUS.] 22. in his righteousness . . . he shall live—in it, not for it, as if that atoned for his former sins; but "in his righteousness" he shall live, as the evidence of his being already in favour with God through the merit of Messiah, who was to come. The gospel clears up for us many such passages (1 Peter 1, 12), which were dimly understood at the time, whilst men, however, had light enough for salvation. 23. (1 Timothy 2, 4; 2 Peter 3, 9.) If men perish, it is because they will not confesse to the Lord for salvation; not that the Lord is not willing to save them (John 5, 40). They trample on not merely justice, but mercy; what farther hope can there be for them, when even mercy is against them? (Hebrews 10, 26-29.) 24. righteous—one apparently such; as in Matthew 9, 13, "I came not to call the righteous," &c., i. e., those who fancy themselves righteous. Those alone are true saints who by the grace of God persevere (Matthew 24, 13; 1 Corinthians 10, 12; John 10, 28, 29). turneth away from . . . righteousness—an utter apostasy; not like the exceptional offences of the godly through infirmity or heedlessness, which they afterwards mourn over and repent of, not be mentioned—not be taken into account, so as to save them; his trespass—utter apostasy. 25. Their plea for saying, "The way of the Lord is not equal," was that God treated different classes in a different way. But it was really their way that was unequal, since living in sin they expected to be dealt with as if they were righteous. God's way was invariably to deal with different men according to their deserts. 26-28. The two last instances repeated in inverse order. God's emphatic statement of His principle of government needs no farther proof than the simple statement of it. in them—in the actual sins, which are the manifestations of the principle of "iniquity," mentioned just before. 27. he shall save his soul—i. e., he shall have it saved upon his repentance. 28. considereth—the first step to repentance; for the ungodly do not consider either God or themselves (Deuteronomy 32, 29; Psalm 119, 59, 60; Luke 15, 17, 18). 29. Though God's justice is so plainly manifested, sinners still object to it, because they do not wish to see it (Micah 2, 7; Matthew 11, 18, 19). 30-32. As God is to judge them "according to their ways" (Proverbs 1, 31), their only hopes to "repent;" and this is a sure hope, for God takes no delight in judging them in wrath, but graciously desires their salvation on repentance. I will judge you—Though ye cavil, it is a sufficient answer that I, your Judge, declare it so, and will judge you according to my will; and then your cavils must end. Repent—inward conversion (Revelation 2, 5). In the Hebrew there is a play of like sounds, "Turn ye and return," turn yourselves, &c.—the outward fruits of repentance. Not as Margin, "turn others;" for the parallel clause (v. 31) is, "cast away from you all your transgressions." Perhaps, however, the omission of the object after the verb in the Hebrew implies that both are included: Turn alike yourselves and all whom you can influence. from all . . . transgressions—not as if believers are perfect; but they sincerely aim at perfection, so as to be habitually and wilfully on terms with no sin (1 John 3, 6-9). your ruin—lit., your snare, entangling you in ruin. 31. Cast away from you—for the cause of your evil rests with yourselves; your sole way of escape is to be reconciled to God (Ephesians 4, 22, 23). make you a new heart—This shows, not what man can do, but what he ought to do; what God requires of us. God alone can make us a new heart (ch. 11, 19; 36, 26, 27). The command to do what men cannot themselves do is designed to drive them (instead of laying the blame, as the Jews did, elsewhere rather than on themselves) to feel their own helplessness, and to seek God's Holy Spirit (Psalm 51, 11, 12). Thus the outward exhortation is, as it were, the organ or instrument which God uses for conferring grace. So we may say with AUGUSTINE, "Give what thou requirest, and (then) require what thou wilt." Our strength (which is weakness in itself) shall suffice for whatever He exacts, if only He give the supply. [CALVIN.] spirit—the understanding: as the "heart" means the will and affections. The root must be changed, before the fruit can be good. why wilt ye die—bring on your own selves your ruin. God's deceys are secret to us; it is enough for us, that He invites all, and will reject none that seek Him. 32. (Lamentations

 3. 33; 2 Peter 3. 9.) God is "slow to anger;" punishment is "His strange work" (Isaiah 23. 21).

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-14. ELEGY OVER THE FALL OF DAVID'S HOUSE.
 There is a tact antithesis between this lamentation and that of the Jews for their own miseries, the causes of which, however, they did not inquire. 1. princes of Israel—i. e., Judah, whose "princes" alone were recognized by prophecy; those of the ten tribes were, in respect to the theocracy, usurpers. thy mother—the mother of Jehoiachin, the representative of David's line in exile with Ezekiel. The "mother" is Judea: "a lioness," as being fierce in catching prey (v. 3), referring to her heathenish practices. Jerusalem was called Ariel (the lion of God) in a good sense (Isaiah 29. 1); and Judah "a lion's whelp . . . a lion . . . an old lion" (Genesis 49. 9), to which, as also to Numbers 23. 24; 24. 9, this passage alludes.
nourished . . . among young lions—she herself had "lain" among lions, i. e., had intercourse with the corrup-
 tions of the surrounding heathen, and had brought up the royal young ones similarly: utterly degenerate from the stock of Abraham. "Lay down," or "couched," is appropriate to the lion, the Arab name of which means
 "the coucher." 3. young lion—Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, carried captive from Riblah to Egypt by Pharaoh-necho (2 Kings 23. 33). 4. The nations—Egypt, in the case of Jehoahaz, who probably provoked Pharaoh by trying to avenge the death of his father by assailing the bordering cities of Egypt (2 Kings 23. 29, 30). in their pit—image from the pitfalls used for catching wild beasts (Jeremiah 22. 11, 12). chains—or hooks, which were fastened in the noses of wild beasts (see Note, v. 9). 5. saw that she had waited, and her hope was lost—i. e., that her long-waited for hope was disappointed, Jehoahaz not being restored to her from Egypt. she took another of her whelps—Jehoiakim, brother of Jehoahaz, who was placed on the throne by Pharaoh (2 Kings 23. 34), according to the wish of Judah. 6. went up and down among the lions
 —imitated the recklessness and tyranny of the surrounding kings (Jeremiah 22. 13-17). catch . . . prey—to do evil, gratifying his lusts by oppression (2 Kings 23. 37). 7. knew
 . . . desolate palaces—i. e., claimed as his own their palaces, which he then proceeded to "desolate." The Hebrew lit. means widows; hence widowed palaces (Isaiah 13.
 22). VATABLUS (whom FAIRBAIRN follows) explains it,
 "He knew (carnally) the widows of those whom he devoured" (v. 6). But thus the metaphor and the literal reality would be blended: the lion being represented as knowing widows. The reality, however, often elsewhere thus breaks through the veil. fulness thereof—all that it contained; its inhabitants. 8. the nations—the Chal-deans, Syrians, Moab, and Ammon (2 Kings 24. 2). 9. in chains—(2 Chronicles 36. 6; Jeremiah 22. 13). Margin,
 "Hooks;" perhaps referring to the hook often passed through the nose of beasts; so, too, through that of captives, as seen in the Assyrian sculptures (see Note, v. 4).
voice—i. e., his roaring, no more be heard upon the mountains—carrying on the metaphor of the lion, whose roaring on the mountains frightens all the other beasts.
 The insolence of the prince, not at all abated though his kingdom was impaired, was now to cease. 10. A new metaphor, taken from the vine, the chief of the fruit-bearing trees, as the lion is of the beasts of prey (see ch. 17. 6).
in thy blood—"planted when thou wast in thy blood,"
i. e., in thy very infancy; as in ch. 16. 6, when thou hadst
 just come from the womb, and hadst not yet the blood washed from thee. The Jews from the first were planted in Canaan to take root there. [CALVIN.] GROTIUS trans- lates as Margin, "in thy quietness," i. e., in the period when Judah had not yet fallen into her present troubles.
English Version is better. GLASSIUS explains it well, retaining the metaphor, which CALVIN's explanation breaks, "in the blood of thy grapes," i. e., in her full strength, as the red wine is the strength of the grape:

 Genesis 49. 11 is evidently alluded to. many waters—
 the well-watered land of Canaan (Deuteronomy 8. 7-9).
 11. strong rods—princes of the royal house of David.
 The vine shot forth her branches like so many sceptres, not creeping lowly on the ground like many vines, but trained aloft on a tree or wall. The mention of their former royal dignity, contrasting sadly with her present sunken state, would remind the Jews of their sins whereby they had incurred such judgments. stature—(Daniel
 4. 11.) among the thick branches—i. e., the central stock or trunk of the tree shot up highest "among its own branches" or offshoots, surrounding it. Emblematic of the numbers and resources of the people. HENGSTENBERG translates, "among the clouds." But ch. 31. 3, 10, 14, supports English Version. 12. plucked up—not gradually withered. The sudden upturning of the state was designed to awaken the Jews out of their torpor to see the hand of God in the national judgment. east wind—(Note, ch. 17. 10.) 13. planted—i. e., transplanted. Though already "dried up" in regard to the nation generally, the vine is said to be "transplanted" as regards God's mercy to the remnant in Babylon. dry . . . ground—Chaldea was well watered and fertile; but it is the condition of the captive people, not that of the land, which is referred to.
 14. fire . . . out of a rod of her branches—The Jews' disaster was to be ascribed, not so much to the Chaldeans as to themselves; the "fire out of the rod" is God's wrath kindled by the perjury of Zedekiah (ch. 17. 13). "The anger of the Lord" against Judah is specified as the cause why Zedekiah was permitted to rebel against Babylon (2 Kings 24. 20; cf. Judges 9. 15), thus bringing Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem. no strong rod . . . sceptre to rule— no more kings of David's stock are now to rule the nation.
 Not at least until "the Lord shall send the rod of His strength (Messiah, Psalm 110. 2; Isaiah 11. 1) out of Zion," to reign first as a spiritual, then hereafter as a literal king. is . . . and shall be for a lamentation—part of the lamentation (that as to Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim) was matter of history as already accomplished; part (as to Zedekiah) was yet to be fulfilled; or, this prophecy both is a subject for lamentation, and shall be so to distant posterity.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-49. REJECTION OF THE ELDERS' APPLICATION TO THE PROPHET: EXPOSURE OF ISRAEL'S PROTRACTED REB-ELLIONS, NOTWITHSTANDING GOD'S LONG-SUFFERING GOODNESS: YET WILL GOD RESTORE HIS PEOPLE AT LAST. 1. seventh year, &c.—viz., from the carrying away of Jeconiah (ch. 1. 2; 8. 1). This computation was calculated to make them cherish the more ardently the hope of the restoration promised them in seventy years, for,
 when prospects are hopeless, years are not computed.
 [CALVIN.] elders . . . came to inquire—The object of their inquiry, as in ch. 14. 1, is not stated; probably it was to ascertain the cause of the national calamities, and the time of their termination, as their false prophets assured them of a speedy restoration. 3. The chapter falls into two great parts: v. 1-32, the recital of the people's rebellions during five distinct periods: in Egypt, the wilderness, on the borders of Canaan when a new generation arose, in Canaan, and in the time of the prophet. I will not be inquired of by you—because their moral state precluded them from capability of knowing the will of God (Psalm 66. 13; Proverbs 28. 9; John 7. 17). 4. Wilt thou judge? . . . judge—the emphatical repetition expresses, "Wilt thou not judge? yes, judge them. There is a loud call for immediate judgment." The Hebrew interrogative here is a command, not a prohibition. [MAURER.]
 Instead of spending time in teaching them, tell them of the abomination of their fathers, of which their own are the complement and counterpart, and which call for judg- ment. 5, 6. The thrice lifting up of God's hand (the sign of His oath, Revelation 10. 5, 6; Exodus 6. 8, Margin; Numbers 14. 30; to which passages the form of words here alludes) implies the solemn earnestness of God's purpose of grace to them. made myself known unto them—proving myself faithful and true by the actual fulfilment of my promises (Exodus 4. 31; 6. 3); revealing myself as “Jehovah,” i. e., not that the name was unknown before, but that then first the force of that name was manifested in the promises of God then being realized in performances. 6. espied for them—as though God had spied out all other lands, and chose Canaan as the best of all lands (Deuteronomy 8. 7, 8). See Daniel 8. 9; 11. 16, 41, “the glorious land;” see Margin, “land of delight or ornament;” Zechariah 7. 14, “the pleasant land,” or land of desire. glory of all lands—i. e., Canaan was “the beauty of all lands;” the most lovely and delightful land; “milk and honey” are not the antecedents to “which.” 7. Moses gives no formal statement of idolatry practised by Israel in Egypt. But it is implied in their readiness to worship the golden calf (resembling the Egyptian ox, Apis) (Exodus 32.), which makes it likely they had worshipped such idols in Egypt. Also, in Leviticus 17. 7, “They shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils (lit., Scirim, ‘he-goats,’ the symbol of the false god, Pan), after whom they have gone a-whoring.” The call of God by Moses was as much to them to separate from idols and follow Jehovah, as it was to Pharaoh to let them go forth. Exodus 6. 6, 7; Joshua 24. 14, expressly mentions their idolatry “in Egypt.” Hence the need of their being removed out of the contagion of Egyptian idolatry by the exodus. every one—so universal was the evil. of his eyes—It was not fear of their Egyptian masters, but their own lust of the eye that drew them to idols (ch. 6. 9; 18. 6). 8, 9. then I said, I will . . . But, &c.—i. e. (God speaking in condescension to human modes of conception) their spiritual degradation deserved I should destroy them, “but I wrought (viz., the deliverance ‘out of . . . Egypt’) for my name’s sake;” not for their merits (a rebuke to their national pride). God’s “name” means the sum-total of His perfections; to manifest these, His gratuitous mercy abounding above their sins, yet without wrong to His justice, and so to set forth His glory, was and is the ultimate end of His dealings (v. 14, 22; 2 Samuel 7. 23; Isaiah 63. 12; Romans 9. 17). 11. which if a man do, he shall . . . live in them—not “by them,” as though they could justify a man, seeing that man cannot render the faultless obedience required (Leviticus 18. 5; Galatians 3. 12). “By them” is the expression indeed in Romans 10. 5; but there the design is to show that, if man could obey all God’s laws, he would be justified “by them” (Galatians 3. 21); but he cannot; he therefore needs to have justification by “the Lord our righteousness” (Jeremiah 23. 6); then, having thus received life, he “lives,” i. e., maintains, enjoys, and exercises this life only in so far as he walks “in” the laws of God. So Deuteronomy 30. 15, 16. The Israelites, as a nation, had life already freely given to them by God’s covenant of promise; the laws of God were designed to be the means of the outward expression of their spiritual life. As the natural life has its healthy manifestation in the full exercise of its powers, so their spiritual being as a nation was to be developed in vigour, or else decay, according as they did, or did not, walk in God’s laws. 12. Sabbaths . . . a sign between me and them—a kind of sacramental pledge of the covenant of adoption between God and His people. The Sabbath is specified as a sample of the whole law, to show that the law is not merely precepts, but privileges, of which the Sabbath is one of the highest. Not that the Sabbath was first instituted at Sinai, as if it were an exclusively Jewish ordinance (Genesis 2. 2, 3), but it was then more formally enacted, when, owing to the apostasy of the world from the original revelation, one people was called out (Deuteronomy 5. 15) to be the covenant people of God. sanctify them—The observance of the Sabbath contemplated by God was not a mere outward rest, but a spiritual dedication of the day to the glory of God and the good of man. Otherwise it would not be, as it is made, the pledge of universal sanctification (Exodus 31. 13-17; Isaiah 58. 13, 14). Virtually it is said, all sanctity will flourish or decay, according as this ordinance is observed in its full spirituality or not. 13. in the wilderness—

they “rebelled” in the very place where death and terror were on every side, and where they depended on my miraculous bounty every moment! 15. I swore against them (Psalm 95. 11; 106. 26) that I would not permit the generation that came out of Egypt to enter Canaan. 16. The special reason is stated by Moses (Numbers 13., 14.) to be that they, through fear arising from the false report of the spies, wished to return to Egypt; the general reasons are stated here which lay at the root of their rejection of God’s grace, viz., contempt of God and His laws, and love of idols. their heart—the fault lay in it (Psalm 78. 37). 17. Nevertheless—How marvellous that God should spare such sinners! His everlasting covenant explains it; His long-suffering standing out in striking contrast to their rebellions (Psalm 78. 38; Jeremiah 30. 11). 18. I said unto their children—Being unwilling to speak any more to the fathers as being incorrigible. walk ye not in . . . statutes of . . . fathers—The traditions of the fathers are to be carefully weighed, not indiscriminately followed. He forbids the imitation of not only their gross sins, but even their plausible statutes. [CALVIN.] 19. It is an indirect denial of God, and a robbing Him of His due, to add man’s inventions to His precepts. 20. (Jeremiah 17. 22.) 21. Though warned by the judgment on their fathers, the next generation also rebelled against God. The “kindness of Israel’s youth and love of her espousals in the wilderness” (Jeremiah 2. 2, 3) were only comparative (the corruption in later times being more general), and confined to the minority; as a whole, Israel at no time fully served God. The “children” it was that fell into the fearful apostasy on the plains of Moab at the close of the wilderness sojourn (Numbers 25. 1, 2; Deuteronomy 31. 27). 23. It was to that generation the threat of dispersion was proclaimed (Deuteronomy 28. 64; cf. ch. 29. 4). 25. I gave them . . . statutes . . . not good—since they would not follow my statutes that were good, “I gave them” their own (v. 18) and their fathers’ “which were not good;” statutes spiritually corrupting, and, finally, as the consequence, destroying them. Righteous retribution (Psalm 81. 12; Hosea 8. 11; Romans 1. 24; 2 Thessalonians 2. 11). Verse 39 proves this view to be correct (cf. Isaiah 63. 17). Thus on the plains of Moab (Numbers 25.), in chastisement for the secret unfaithfulness to God in their hearts, He permitted Baal’s worshippers to tempt them to idolatry (the ready success of the tempters, moreover, proving the inward unsoundness of the tempted); and this again ended necessarily in punitive judgments. 26. I polluted them—not directly; “but I judicially gave them up to pollute themselves.” A just retribution for their “polluting my Sabbaths” (v. 24). This v. 26 is explanatory of v. 25. Their own sin I made their punishment. caused to pass through the fire—FAIRBARN translates, “In their presenting (lit., the causing to pass over) all their first-born,” viz., to the Lord; referring to the command (Exodus 13. 12, Margin, where the very same expression is used). The lustration of children by passing through the fire was a later abomination (v. 31). The evil here spoken of was the admixture of heathenish practices with Jehovah’s worship, which made Him regard all as “polluted.” Here, “to the Lord” is omitted purposely, to imply, “They kept up the outward service indeed, but I did not own it as done unto me, since it was mingled with such pollutions.” But English Version is supported by the similar phraseology in v. 31, where see my note. They made all their children pass through the fire; but he names the first-born, in aggravation of their guilt; i. e., “I had willed that the first-born should be redeemed as being mine, but they imposed on themselves the cruel rites of offering them to Molech” (Deuteronomy 18. 10). might know . . . the Lord—that they may be compelled to know me as a powerful Judge, since they were unwilling to know me as a gracious Father. 27-29. The next period, viz., that which followed the settlement in Canaan; the fathers of the generation existing in Ezekiel’s time walked in the same steps of apostasy as the generation in the wilderness. Yet in this—Not content with past rebellions, and not moved with gratitude for God’s goodness, “yet in this”

still further they rebelled. blasphemed—"have insulted me." [CALVIN.] Even those who did not sacrifice to heathen gods have offered "their sacrifices" (v. 28) in forbidden places. 28. provocation of their offering—an offering as it were purposely made to provoke God. sweet savour—what ought to have been sweet became offensive by their corruptions. He specifies the various kinds of offerings, to show that in all alike they violated the law. 29. What is the high place whereunto ye go? What is the meaning of this name? For my altar is not so called. What excellence do ye see in it, that ye go there, rather than to my temple, the only lawful place of sacrificing? The very name, "high place," convicts you of sinning, not from ignorance but perverse rebellion. is called . . . unto this day—whereas this name ought to have been long since laid aside, along with the custom of sacrificing on high places which it represents, being borrowed from the heathen, who so called their places of sacrifice (the Greeks, for instance, called them by a cognate term, Bomoi), whereas I call mine Mizbeach, "altar." The very name implies the place is not that sanctioned by me, and therefore your sacrifices even to me there (much more those you offer to idols) are only a "provocation" to me (v. 28; Deuteronomy 12. 1-5). David and others, it is true, sacrificed to God on high places, but it was under exceptional circumstances, and before the altar was set up on Mount Moriah. 30. The interrogation implies a strong affirmation, as in v. 4, "Are ye not polluted? &c. Do ye not commit?" &c. Or, connecting this verse with v. 31, "Are ye thus polluted, &c., and yet (do ye expect that) I shall be inquired of by you?" 31. through the fire—As "the fire" is omitted in v. 26, FAIRBAIN represents the generation here referred to (viz., that of Ezekiel's day) as attaining the climax of guilt (see Note, v. 26), in making their children pass through the fire, which that former generation did not. The reason, however, for the omission of "the fire" in v. 26 is, perhaps, that there it is implied the children only "passed through the fire" for purification, whereas here they are actually burnt to death before the idol; and therefore "the fire" is specified in the latter, not in the former case (cf. 2 Kings 3. 27). 32. We will be as the heathen—and so escape the odium to which we are exposed, of having a peculiar God and law of our own. "We shall live on better terms with them by having a similar worship. Besides, we get from God nothing but threats and calamities, whereas the heathen, Chaldeans, &c., get riches and power from their idols." How literally God's words here ("that . . . shall not be at all") are fulfilled in the modern Jews! Though the Jews seemed so likely (had Ezekiel spoken as an unspired man) to have blended with the rest of mankind and laid aside their distinctive peculiarities, as was their wish at that time, yet they have remained for eighteen centuries dispersed among all nations and without a home, but still distinct: a standing witness for the truth of the prophecy given so long ago. 33. Here begins the second division of the prophecy. Lest the covenant people should abandon their distinctive hopes, and amalgamate with the surrounding heathen, he tells them that, as the wilderness journey from Egypt was made subservient to discipline, and also to the taking from among them the rebellious, so a severe discipline (such as the Jews are now for long actually undergoing) should be administered to them during the next exodus for the same purpose (v. 33), and so to prepare them for the restored possession of their land (Hosea 2. 14, 15). This was only partially fulfilled before and at the return from Babylon: its full and final accomplishment is future. with a mighty hand . . . will I rule over you—I will assert my right over you in spite of your resistance (v. 32), as a master would in the case of his slave, and I will not let you be wrested from me, because of my regard to my covenant. 34. The Jews in exile might think themselves set free from the "rule" of God (v. 33); therefore, He intimates, He will reassert His right over them by chastening judgments, and these, with an ultimate view, not to destroy, but to restore them. people—rather, peoples. 35. wilderness of the people—rather, peoples, the various peoples among whom they were to be scattered, and from whom God saith (v. 34), "I will bring you out." In contrast to the literal "wilderness of Egypt" (v. 36), "the wilderness of the peoples" is their spiritual wilderness period of trial, discipline and purification whilst exiled among the nations. As the state when they are "brought into the wilderness of the peoples," and that when they were among the peoples "from" which God was to "bring them out" (v. 34) are distinguished, the wilderness state probably answers partially to the transition period of discipline from the first decree for their restoration by Cyrus to the time of their complete settlement in their land, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple. But the full and final fulfilment is future; the wilderness state will comprise not only the transition period of their restoration, but the beginning of their occupancy of Palestine, a time in which they shall endure the sorest of all their chastisements, to "purge out the rebels" (v. 33; Daniel 12. 1), and then the remnant (Zechariah 13. 8, 9; 14. 2, 3) shall "all serve God in the land" (v. 40). Thus the wilderness period does not denote locality, but their state intervening between their rejection and future restoration. plead—bring the matter in debate between us to an issue. Image from a plaintiff in a law court meeting the defendant "face to face." Appropriate, as God in His dealings acts not arbitrarily, but in most righteous justice (Jeremiah 2. 9; Micah 6. 2). 36. (Numbers 14. 21-29.) Though God saved them out of Egypt, He afterwards destroyed in the wilderness them that believed not (Jude 5); so, though He brought the exiles out of Babylon, yet their wilderness state of chastening discipline continued even after they were again in Canaan. 37. pass under the rod—metaphor from a shepherd who makes his sheep pass under his rod in counting them (Leviticus 27. 32; Jeremiah 33. 13). Whether you will or not, ye shall be counted as mine, and so shall be subjected to my chastening discipline (Micah 7. 14), with a view to my ultimate saving of the chosen remnant (cf. John 10. 27-29). bond of . . . covenant—I will constrain you by sore chastisements to submit yourselves to the covenant to which ye are lastingly bound, though now you have cast away God's bond from you. Fulfilled in part, Nehemiah 9. 8, 26, 32-38; 10. 1-39; fully hereafter, Isaiah 54. 10-13; 52. 1, 2. 38. (Zechariah 13. 9; 14. 2.) purge out—or, "separate." Hebrew, "Barothi," forming a designed alliteration with "Berith," the covenant. Not a promise of grace, but a threat against those Jews who thought they could in exile escape the observation and "rule" of God. land of Israel—though brought out of the country of their sojourn or exile (Babylon formerly, and the various lands of their exile hereafter) into the literal land of Palestine, even it shall be to them an exile state, "they shall not enter into the land of Israel," i. e., the spiritual state of restored favour of God to His covenant people, which shall only be given to the remnant to be saved (Zechariah 13. 8, 9). 39. Equivalent to, "I would rather have you open idolaters than hypocrites, fancying you can worship me and yet at the same time serve idols" (Amos 5. 21, 22, 25, 26; cf. 1 Kings 18. 21; 2 Kings 17. 41; Matthew 6. 24; Revelation 3. 15, 16). "Go ye, serve," &c., is not a command to serve idols, but a judicial declaration of God's giving up of the half-idol, half-Jehovah worshippers to utter idolatry, if they will not serve Jehovah alone (Psalm 81. 12; Revelation 22. 11). hereafter also—God anticipates the same apostasy afterwards, as now. 40. For—Though ye, the rebellious portion, withdraw from my worship, others, even the believing remnant, will succeed after you perish, and will serve me purely. in mine holy mountain—(Isaiah 2. 2, 3.) Zion, or Moriah, "the height of Israel" (pre-eminent above all mountains because of the manifested presence of God there with Israel), as opposed to their "high places," the worship on which was an abomination to God. all—not merely individuals, such as constitute the elect Church now; but the whole nation, to be followed by the conversion of the Gentile nations (Isaiah 2. 2, "all nations;" Romans 11. 26; Revelation 11. 15). with—rather, "in all your holy things." [MAURER.] 41. with—i. e., in respect to your sweet savour (lit., savour of rest, Note, ch. 16. 19).

Or, I will accept you (your worship) "as a sweet savour" [MAURER] (Ephesians 5. 2; Philippians 4. 13). God first accepts the person in Messiah, then the offering (v. 40; Genesis 4. 4). bring . . . out from . . . people, &c.—the same words as in v. 34; but there applied to the bringing forth of the hypocrites, as well as the elect; here restricted to the saved remnant, who alone shall be at last restored literally and spiritually in the fullest sense. sanctified in you before . . . heathen—(Jeremiah 33. 9). All the nations will acknowledge my power displayed in restoring you, and so shall be led to seek me (Isaiah 66. 18; Zechariah 14. 16-19). there—not merely in exile when suffering punishment, which makes even reprobates be sorry for sin, but when received into favour in your own land. remember—(Ch. 16. 61, 63.) The humiliation of Judah (Nehemiah 9.) is a type of the future penitence of the whole nation (Hosea 5. 15; 6. 1; Zechariah 12. 10-14). God's goodness realized by the sinner is the only thing that leads to true repentance (Hosea 3. 5; Luke 7. 37, 38). 41. The English Version chapter ought to have ended here, and ch. 21. begun with "Moreover," &c., as in the Hebrew Bible. for my name's sake—(Ch. 36. 22.) Gratuitously; according to my compassion, not your merits. After having commented on this verse, CALVIN was laid on his deathbed, and his commentary ended. 45-49. An introductory brief description in enigma of the destruction by fire and sword, detailed more explicitly in ch. 21. 46. south . . . south . . . south—three different Hebrew words, to express the certainty of the Divine displeasure resting on the region specified. The third term is from a root meaning dry, referring to the sun's heat in the south; representing the burning judgments of God on the southern parts of Judea, of which Jerusalem was the capital. set thy face—determinately. The prophets used to turn themselves towards those who were to be the subjects of their prophecies. drop—as the rain, which flows in a continuous stream, sometimes gently (Deuteronomy 32. 2), sometimes violently (Amos 7. 16; Micah 2. 6, Margin), as here. forest—the densely populated country of Judea; trees representing people. 47. fire—every kind of judgment (ch. 19. 12; 21. 3, "my sword;" Jeremiah 21. 14). green tree . . . dry—fit and unfit materials for fuel alike; "the righteous and the wicked," as explained in ch. 21. 3, 4; Luke 23. 31. Unsparring universality of the judgment! flaming flame—one continued and unextinguished flame. "The glowing flame." [FAIRBAIRN.] faces—persons; here the metaphor is merged in the reality. 49. Ezekiel complains that by this parabolic form of prophecy he only makes himself and it a jest to his countrymen. God therefore in ch. 21. permits him to express the same prophecy more plainly.

CHAPTER XXI.

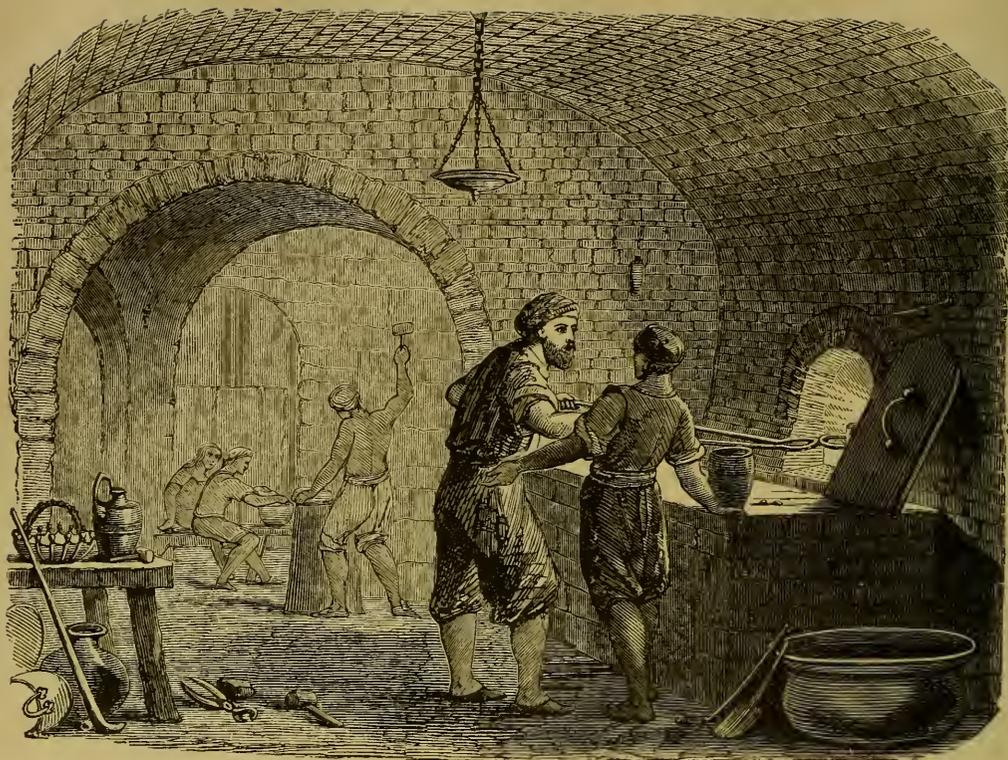

Ver. 1-32. PROPHECY AGAINST ISRAEL AND JERUSALEM, AND AGAINST AMMON. 2. the holy places—the three parts of the temple; the courts, the holy place, and the holiest. If "synagogues" existed before the Babylonian captivity, as Psalm 74. 8 seems to imply, they and the proseuche, or oratories, may be included in the "holy places" here. 3. righteous . . . wicked—not contradictory of ch. 18. 4, 9; and Genesis 18. 23. Ezekiel here views the mere outward aspect of the indiscriminate universality of the national calamity. But really the same captivity to the "righteous" would prove a blessing as a wholesome discipline, which to the "wicked" would be an unmitigated punishment. The godly were sealed with a mark (ch. 9. 4), not for outward exemption from the common calamity, but as marked for the secret interpositions of Providence overruling even evil to their good. The godly were by comparison so few, that their salvation is not brought into view here, but the universality of the judgment. 4. The "sword" did not, literally, slay all; but the judgments of God by the foe swept through the land "from the south to the north." 6. with the breaking of thy loins—as one afflicted with pleurisy; or as a woman, in labour-throes, clasps her loins in pain, and heaves and sighs till the girdle of the loins is broken by the violent action of the body (Jeremiah 30. 6). 7. The abrupt sentences and mournful repetitions imply violent emotions. 9. sword—viz., of God (Deuteronomy 32. 41). The Chaldeans are his instrument. 10. to make a sore slaughter—lit., "that killing it may kill." glitter—lit., glitter as the lightning-flash: flashing terror into the foe. should we . . . make mirth—it is no time for levity when such a calamity is impending (Isaiah 22. 12, 13). it contemneth the rod of my son, &c.—The sword has no more respect to the trivial "rod" or sceptre of Judah (Genesis 49. 10), than if it were any common "tree." "Tree" is the image retained from ch. 20. 47; explained ch. 21. 2, 3. God calls Judah "my son" (cf. Exodus 4. 22; Hosea 11. 1). FAIRBAIRN arbitrarily translates, "Perchance the sceptre of my son rejoiceth; it (the sword) despiseth every tree." 11. the slayer—the Babylonian king in this case; in general, all the instruments of God's wrath (Revelation 19. 15). 12. errors by reason of the sword, &c.—rather, "they (the princes of Israel) are delivered up to the sword together with my people." [GLASSIUS.] smite . . . upon . . . thigh—a mark of grief (Jeremiah 31. 19). 13. it is a trial—rather, "There is a trial" being made; the sword of the Lord will subject all to the ordeal. "What, then, if it contemn even the rod" (sceptre) of Judah? Cf. as to a similar scourge of unsparring trial, Job 9. 23. it shall be no more—the sceptre, i. e., the state, must necessarily then come to an end. Fulfilled in part at the overthrow of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar, but fully at the time of "Shiloh's" (Messiah's) coming (Genesis 49. 10), when Judea became a Roman province. 14. smite . . . hands together—(Numbers 24. 10), indicative of the indignant fury with which God will "smite" the people. sword . . . doubled the third time—referring to the threefold calamity:—1. The taking of Zedekiah (to whom the "rod," or sceptre, may refer); 2. the taking of the city; 3. the removal of all those who remained with Gedaliah. "Doubled" means "multiplied" or "repeated." The stroke shall be doubled and even trebled. of the slain—i. e., by which many are slain. As the Hebrew is singular, FAIRBAIRN makes it refer to the king, "the sword of the great one that is slain," or "pierced through." entereth . . . privy chambers—(Jeremiah 9. 21) The sword shall overtake them, not merely in the open battle-field, but in the chambers whither they flee to hide themselves (1 Kings 20. 30; 22. 25). MAURER translates, "which besieged them;" FAIRBAIRN, "which penetrates to them." English Version is more literal. 15. point—"the whirling glance of the sword." [FAIRBAIRN.] "The naked (bared) sword." [HENDERSON.] ruins—lit., stumbling-blocks. Their own houses and walls shall be stumbling-blocks in their way, whether they wish to fight or flee. made bright—made to glitter. wrapped, &c.—viz., in the hand of him who holds the hilt, or in its scabbard, that the edge may not be blunt when it is presently drawn forth to strike. GESENIUS, as Margin, translates, "sharpened," &c. 16. Apostrophe to the sword. Go . . . one way—or, "Concentrate thyself;" "Unite thy forces on the right hand." [GROTIUS.] The sword is commanded to take the nearest route for Jerusalem, "whither their face was set," whether south or north ("right hand or left"), according to where the several parts of the Chaldean host may be, or other . . . on the left—rather, "set thyself on the left." The verbs are well chosen. The main "concentration" of forces was to be on "the right hand," or south, the part of Judea in which Jerusalem was, and which lay south in marching from Babylon, whereas the Chaldean forces advancing on Jerusalem from Egypt, of which Jerusalem was north, were fewer, and therefore "set thyself" is the verb used. 17. Jehovah Himself smites His hands together, doing what he had commanded Ezekiel to do (Note, v. 14), in token of his smiting Jerusalem; cf. the similar symbolical action (2 Kings 13. 18, 19). cause . . . fury to rest—give it full vent, and so satisfy it (ch. 5. 13). 19. two ways—The king coming from Babylon is represented in the graphic style of Ezekiel as reaching the point where the road branched off in two ways, one leading by the south, by Tadmor or Palmyra, to Rabbath of Ammon, east of Jordan; the other by the north, by Riblah in Syria, to Jerusalem, and nestitating which way to take. Ezekiel is told to "appoint the two ways" (as in ch. 4. 1), for Nebuchadnezzar, though knowing no other control but his own will and superstition, had really this path "appointed" for him by the all-ruling God. out of one land—viz., Babylon. choose . . . a place—lit., a hand. So it is translated by FAIRBAIRN, "make a finger-post," viz., at the head of the two ways, the hand-post pointing Nebuchadnezzar to the way to Jerusalem as the way he should select. But MAURER rightly supports English Version. Ezekiel is told to "choose the place" where Nebuchadnezzar should do as is described in v. 20, 21; so entirely does God order by the prophet every particular of place and time in the movements of the invader. 20. Rabbath of the Ammonites—distinct from Rabbah in Judah (2 Samuel 12, 26). Rabbath is put first, as it was from her that Jerusalem, that doomed city, had borrowed many of her idols. to Judah in Jerusalem—instead of simply putting "Jerusalem," to imply the sword was to come not merely to Judah, but to its people within Jerusalem, "defenced" though it was, its defences on which the Jews relied so much would not keep the foe out. 21. parting—lit., "mother of the way." As "head of the two ways" follows, which seems tautology after "parting of the way," HAVERNICK translates, according to Arabic idiom, the highway, or principal road. English Version is not tautology, "head of the two ways" defining more accurately "parting of the way." made . . . bright—rather, "shook," from an Arabic root, arrows—Divination by arrows is here referred to; they were put into a quiver marked with the names of particular places to be attacked, and then shaken together; whichever came forth first intimated the one selected as the first to be attacked. [JEROME.] The same usage existed among the Arabs, and is mentioned in the Koran. In the Nineveh sculptures the king is represented with a cup in his right hand, his left resting on a bow; also with two arrows in the right, and the bow in the left, probably practising divination. images—Hebrew, teraphim: household gods, worshipped as a family talisman, to obtain direction as to the future and other blessings. First mentioned in Mesopotamia, whence Rachel brought them (Genesis 31. 19, 34); put away by Jacob (Genesis 35. 4); set up by Micah as his household gods (Judges 17. 5); stigmatized as idolatry (1 Samuel 15, 23, Hebrew; cf. Zechariah 10, 2, Margin). liver—they judged of the success, or failure, of an undertaking by the healthy, or unhealthy, state of the liver and entrails of a sacrifice. 22. Rather, "In his right hand was (is) the divination," i. e., he holds up in his right hand the arrow marked with "Jerusalem," to encourage his army to march for it. captains—the Margin, "battering-rams," adopted by FAIRBAIRN, is less appropriate, for "battering-rams" follow presently after. [GROTIUS.] open the mouth in . . . slaughter—i. e., commanding slaughter: raising the war-cry of death. Not as GESENIUS, "to open the mouth with the war-shout." 23. Unto the Jews, though credulous of divinations when in their favour, Nebuchadnezzar's divination "shall be (seen) as false." to them, &c.—This gives the reason which makes the Jews fancy themselves safe from the Chaldeans, viz., that they "have sworn" to the latter "oaths" of allegiance, forgetting that they had violated them (ch. 17. 13, 15, 16, 18). But he—Nebuchadnezzar will remember in consulting his idols that he swore to Zedekiah by them, but that Zedekiah broke the league. [GROTIUS.] Rather, God will remember against them (Revelation 16. 19) their violating their oath sworn by the true God, whereas Nebuchadnezzar kept his oath sworn by a false god; v. 24 confirms this. 24. Their unfaithfulness to Nebuchadnezzar was a type of their general unfaithfulness to their covenant God. with the hand—viz., of the king of Babylon. 25. profane—as having desecrated by idolatry and perjury his office as the Lord's anointed. HAVERNICK translates, as in v. 14, "slain," i. e., not literally, but virtually; to Ezekiel's idealizing view Zedekiah was the grand victim "pierced through" by God's sword of judgment, as his sons were slain before his eyes, which were then put out, and he was led a captive in chains to Babylon. *Eng- lish Version is better: so GESENIUS (2 Chronicles 36. 13; Jeremiah 52. 2). when iniquity shall have an end—(v. 29). When thine iniquity, having reached its last stage of guilt, shall be put an end to by judgment (ch. 35. 5). 26. diadem—rather, "the mitre" of the holy priest (Exodus 28. 4; Zechariah 3. 5). His priestly emblem as representative of the priestly people. This, as well as "the crown," the emblem of the kingdom were to be removed, until they should be restored and united in the Mediator, Messiah (Psalm 110, 2, 4; Zechariah 6. 13). [FAIRBAIRN.] As, however, the King Zedekiah alone, not the high priest also, is referred to in the context, English Version is supported by GESENIUS. this shall not be the same—the diadem shall not be as it was. [ROSENMULLER.] Nothing shall remain what it was. [FAIRBAIRN.] exalt . . . low . . . abase . . . high—not the general truth expressed (Proverbs 3. 34; Luke 1. 52; James 4. 6; 1 Peter 5. 5); but specially referring to Messiah and Zedekiah contrasted together. The "tender plant . . . out of the dry ground" (Isaiah 53. 2) is to be "exalted" in the end (v. 27); the now "high" representative on David's throne, Zedekiah, is to be "abased." The outward relations of things shall be made to change places in just retaliation on the people for having so perverted the moral relations of things. [HENGSTENBERG.] 27. Lit., "An overturning, overturning, overturning, will I make it." The three-fold repetition denotes the awful certainty of the event; not as ROSENMULLER explains, the overthrow of the three, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah; for Zedekiah alone is referred to. it shall be no more, until he comes whose right it is—strikingly parallel to Genesis 49. 10. Nowhere shall there be rest or permanence; all things shall be in fluctuation until He comes who, as the rightful Heir, shall restore the throne of David that fell with Zedekiah. The Hebrew for "right" is "judgment;" it perhaps includes, besides the right to rule, the idea of His rule being one in righteousness (Psalm 72. 2; Isaiah 9. 6, 7; 11. 4; Revelation 19. 11). Others (Nebuchadnezzar, &c.), who held the rule of the earth delegated to them by God, abused it by unrighteousness, and so forfeited the "right." He both has the truest "right" to the rule, and exercises it in "right." It is true the tribal "sceptre" continued with Judah "till Shiloh came" (Genesis 49. 10); but there was no kingly sceptre till Messiah came, as the spiritual King then (John 13. 36, 37); this spiritual kingdom being about to pass into the literal, personal kingdom over Israel at His second coming, when, and not before, this prophecy shall not have its exhaustive fulfilment (Luke 1. 32, 33; Jeremiah 3. 17; 10. 7; "To thee doth it appertain"). 28. Lest Ammon should think to escape because Nebuchadnezzar had taken the route to Jerusalem, Ezekiel denounces judgment against Ammon, without the prospect of a restoration such as awaited Israel. Jeremiah 49. 6, it is true, speaks of a "bringing again of its captivity," but this probably refers to its spiritual restoration under Messiah; or, if referring to it politically, must refer to but a partial restoration at the downfall of Babylon under Cyrus. their reproach—This constituted a leading feature in their guilt; they treated with proud contumely the covenant people after the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 25. 3, 6; Zephaniah 2. 9, 10), and appropriated Israel's territory (Jeremiah 49. 1; Amos 1. 13-15). furnished, to consume—MAURER punctuates thus, "Drawn for the slaughter, it is furnished to devour ('consume'), to glitter." English Version, "to consume because of the glittering," means, "to consume by reason of the lightning flashlike rapidity with which it falls." Five years after the fall of Jerusalem, Ammon was destroyed for aiding Ishmael in usurping the government of Judea against the will of the king of Babylon (2 Kings 25. 25; Jeremiah 41. 15). [GROTIUS.] 29. see vanity . . . divine a lie—Ammon, too, had false diviners who flattered them with assurances of safety; the only result of which will be to "bring Ammon upon the necks," &c., i. e., to add the Ammonites to the headless trunks of the slain of Judah, whose bad example Ammon followed, and "whose day" of visitation for their guilt "is come." when their iniquity shall have an end—see Note, v. 25. 30. Shall I cause it to return into his sheath—viz., without first destroying Ammon. Certainly not (Jeremiah 47. 6, 7). Others, as Margin, less suitably read it imperatively, "Cause it to return," i. e., after it has done the work appointed to it. in the land of thy nativity—Ammon was not to be carried away captive as Judah, but to perish in his own land. 31. blow against thee in, &c.—rather, "blow upon thee with the fire," &c. Image from smelting metals (ch. 22. 20, 21). brutish—ferocious. skillful to destroy—lit., artificers of destruction; alluding to Isaiah 54. 16. 32. thy blood shall be—i. e., shall flow. be no more remembered—be consigned as a nation to oblivion.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1-31. GOD'S JUDGMENT ON THE SINFULNESS OF JERUSALEM. Repetition of the charges in ch. 20.; only that there they were stated in an historical review of the past and present; here the present sins of the nation exclusively are brought forward. 2. See ch. 20. 4. i. e., "Wilt thou not judge?" &c. (cf. ch. 23. 36). the bloody city—lit., the city of bloods; so called on account of murders perpetrated in her, and sacrifices of children to Molech (v. 3, 4, 6, 9; ch. 24. 6, 9). 3. sheddeth blood . . . that her time may come—Instead of deriving advantage from her bloody sacrifices to idols, she only thereby brought on herself "the time" of her punishment. against herself—(Proverbs 8. 36.) 4. thy days—the shorter period, viz., that of the siege. thy years—the longer period of the captivity. The "days" and "years" express that she is ripe for punishment. 5. infamous—they mockingly call thee, "Thou polluted one in name (Margin), and full of confusion" [FAIRBAIRN] (referring to the tumultuous violence prevalent in it). Thus the nations "far and near" mocked her as at once sullied in character and in actual fact lawless. What a sad contrast to the Jerusalem once designated "the holy city!" 6. Rather, "The princes . . . each according to his power, were in thee, to shed blood" (as if this was the only object of their existence). "Power," lit., arm; they, who ought to have been patterns of justice, made their own arm of might their only law. 7. set light by—children have made light of, disrespected, father, &c. (Deuteronomy 27. 16). From v. 7 to v. 12 are enumerated the sins committed in violation of Moses' law. 9. men that carry tales—informers, who by misrepresentations cause innocent blood to be shed (Leviticus 19. 16). Lit., "One who goes to and fro as a merchant." 10. set apart for pollution—i. e., set apart as unclean (Leviticus 13. 19). 12. forgotten me—the root of all sin (Deuteronomy 32. 18; Jeremiah 2. 32; 3. 21). 13. smitten mine hand—in token of the indignant vengeance which I will execute on thee (note, ch. 21. 17). 14. (Ch. 21. 7.) 15. consumeth filthiness out of thee—the object of God in scattering the Jews. 16. take thine inheritance in thyself—formerly thou wast mine inheritance; but now, full of guilt, thou art no longer mine, but thine own inheritance to thyself; "in the sight of the heathen," i. e., even they shall see that, now that thou hast become a captive, thou art no longer owned as mine. [VATABLUS.] FAIRBAIRN, &c., needlessly take the Hebrew from a different root, "thou shalt be polluted by" ("in" [HENDERSON]) thyself," &c.; the heathen shall regard thee as a polluted thing, who hast brought thine own reproach on thyself. 18. dross . . . brass—Israel has become a worthless compound of the dross of silver (implying not merely corruption, but degeneracy from good to bad, Isaiah 1. 22, especially offensive) and of the baser metals. Hence the people must be thrown into the furnace of judgment, that the bad may be consumed, and the good separated (Jeremiah 6. 29, 30). 23. From this verse to the end he shows the general corruption of all ranks. 24. land . . . not cleansed—not cleared or cultivated; all a scene of desolation; a fit emblem of the moral wilderness state of the people. nor rained upon—a mark of Divine "indignation;" as the early and latter rain, on which the productivity of the land depended, was one of the great covenant blessings. Joel (2. 23) promises the return of the former and latter rain, with the restoration of God's favour. 25. conspiracy—the false prophets have conspired both to propagate error and to oppose the messages of God's servants. They are mentioned first, as their bad influence extended the widest. prey—their aim was greed of gain, "treasure, and precious things" (Hosea 6. 9; Zephaniah 3. 3, 4; Matthew 23. 14). made . . . many widows—by occasioning, through false prophecies, the war with the Chaldeans in which the husbands fell. 26. Her priests—whose "lips should have kept knowledge" (Malachi 2. 7). violated—not simply transgressed; but, have done violence to the law, by wresting it to wrong ends, and putting wrong constructions on it. put no difference between the holy and profane, &c.—made no distinction between the clean and unclean (Leviticus 10. 10), the Sabbath and other days, sanctioning violations of that holy day. "Holy" means, what is dedicated to God; "profane," what is in common use; "unclean," what is forbidden to be eaten; "clean," what is lawful to be eaten. I am profaned among them—they abuse my name to false or unjust purposes. 27. princes—who should have employed the influence of their position for the people's welfare, made "gain" their sole aim. wolves—notorious for fierce and ravening cruelty (Micah 3. 2, 3, 9-11; John 10. 12). 28. Referring to the false assurances of peace with which the prophets flattered the people, that they should not submit to the king of Babylon (note, ch. 13. 10; 21. 29; Jeremiah 6. 14; 23. 16, 17; 27. 9, 10). 29. The people—put last, after the mention of those in office. Corruption had spread downwards through the whole community. wrongfully—i. e., without cause, gratuitously, without the stranger proselyte giving any just provocation; nay, he of all others being one who ought to have been won to the worship of Jehovah by kindness, instead of being alienated by oppression; especially as the Israelites were commanded to remember that they themselves had been "strangers in Egypt" (Exodus 22. 21; 23. 9). 30. the hedge—the wall (note, ch. 13. 5). Image for leading the people to repentance. the gap—the breach (Psalm 106. 23). Image for interceding between the people and God (Genesis 20. 7; Exodus 32. 11; Numbers 16. 48). I found none—(Jeremiah 5. 1.) Not that literally there was not a righteous man in the city. For Jeremiah, Baruch, &c., were still there; but Jeremiah had been forbidden to pray for the people (Jeremiah 11. 14), as being doomed to wrath. None now, of the godly, knowing the desperate state of the people, and God's purpose as to them, was willing longer to interpose between God's wrath and them. 'And none "among them," i. e., among those just enumerated as guilty of such sins (v. 25-29), was morally able for such an office. 31. their own way . . . recompensed upon their heads—(Ch. 9. 10; 11. 21; 16. 43; Proverbs 1. 31; Isaiah 3. 11; Jeremiah 6. 19.)

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1-49. ISRAEL'S AND JUDAH'S SIN AND PUNISHMENT ARE PARABOLICALLY PORTRAYED UNDER THE NAMES AHOLAH AND AHOLIBAH. The imagery is similar to that in ch. 16.; but here the reference is not as there so much to the breach of the spiritual marriage covenant with God by the people's idolatries, as by their worldly spirit, and their trusting to alliances with the heathen for safety, rather than to God. 2. two . . . of one mother—Israel and Judah, one nation by birth from the same ancestress, Sarah. 3. Even so early in their history as their Egyptian sojourn, they committed idolatries (Notes, ch. 20. 6-8; Joshua 24. 14). in their youth—an aggravation of their sin. It was at the very time of their receiving extraordinary favours from God (ch. 16. 6, 22). they bruised—viz., the Egyptians. 4. Aholah—i. e., "Her tent" (put for worship, as the first worship of God in Israel was in a tent or tabernacle), as contrasted with Aholibah, i. e., "My tent in her." The Bethel worship of Samaria was of her own devising, not of God's appointment; the temple-worship of Jerusalem was expressly appointed by Jehovah, who "dwelt" there, "settling up His tabernacle among the people as His" (Exodus 25. 8; Leviticus 26. 11, 12; Joshua 22. 19; Psalm 76. 2). the elder—Samaria is called "the elder," because she preceded Judah in her apostasy and its punishment. they were mine—previous to apostasy under Jeroboam, Samaria (Israel, or the ten tribes), equally with Judah, worshipped the true God. God therefore never renounced the right over Israel, but sent prophets, as Elijah and Elisha, to declare His will to them. 5. when . . . mine—lit., "under me," i. e., subject to me as her lawful husband. neighbours—on the north-east the kingdom of Israel bordered on that of Assyria; for the latter had occupied much of Syria. Their neighbourhood in locality was emblematical of their being near in corruption of morals and worship. The alliances of Israel with Assyria, which are the chief subject of reprobation here, tended to this (2 Kings 15, 19; 16, 7, 9; 17, 3; Hosea 8, 9). 6. blue—rather, "purple." [FAIRBAIRN.] As a lustful woman's passions are fired by showy dress and youthful appearance in men, so Israel was seduced by the pomp and power of Assyria (cf. Isaiah 10, 8). horsemen—cavaliers. 7. all their idols—there was nothing that she refused to her lovers. 8. whoredoms brought from Egypt—the calves set up in Dan and Bethel by Jeroboam, answering to the Egyptian bull-formed idol Apis. Her alliances with Egypt politically are also meant (Isaiah 30, 2, 3; 31, 1). The ten tribes probably resumed the Egyptian rites, in order to enlist the Egyptians against Judah (2 Chronicles 12, 2-4). 9. God, in righteous retribution, turned their objects of trust into the instruments of their punishment; Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Esar-haddon, and Shalmaneser (2 Kings 15, 19, 20; 17, 3, 6, 24; Ezra 4, 2, 10). "It was their sin to have sought after such lovers, and it was to be their punishment that these lovers should become their destroyers." [FAIRBAIRN.] 10. became famous—lit., "she became a name," i. e., as notorious by her punishment as she had been by her sins, so as to be quoted as a warning to others. women—i. e., neighbouring peoples. 11. Judah, the southern kingdom, though having the "warning" (Note, v. 10) of the northern kingdom before her eyes, instead of profiting by it, went to even greater lengths in corruption than Israel. Her greater spiritual privileges made her guilt the greater (ch. 16, 47, 51; Jeremiah 3, 11). 12. (Ver. 6, 23.) most gorgeously—lit., to perfection. GROTIUS translates, "wearing a crown," or "chapellet," such as lovers wore in visiting their mistresses. 13. one way—both alike forsaking God for heathen confidences. 14. vermilion—the peculiar colour of the Chaldeans, as purple was of the Assyrians. In striking agreement with this verse is the fact that the Assyrian sculptures lately discovered have painted and coloured bas-reliefs, red, blue, and black. The Jews (for instance Jehoiakim, Jeremiah 22, 14) copied these (cf. ch. 8, 10). 15. exceeding in dyed attire—rather, "in ample dyed turbans;" lit., "redundant with dyed turbans." The Assyrians delighted in ample, flowing, and richly-coloured tunics, scarfs, girdles, and head-dresses or turbans, varying in ornaments according to the rank. Chaldea . . . land of their nativity—between the Black and Caspian Seas (Note, Isaiah 23, 13). "Princes;" lit., a first-rate military class that fought by threes in the chariots, one guiding the horses, the other two fighting. 16. sent messengers . . . into Chaldea—(Ch. 16, 29.) It was she that solicited the Chaldeans, not they her. Probably the occasion was when Judah sought to strengthen herself by a Chaldean alliance against a menaced attack by Egypt (cf. 2 Kings 23, 29-35; 24, 1-7). God made the object of their sinful desire the instrument of their punishment. Jehoiakim, probably by a stipulation of tribute, enlisted Nebuchadnezzar against Pharaoh, whose tributary he previously had been; failing to keep his stipulation, he brought on himself Nebuchadnezzar's vengeance. 17. alienated from them—viz., from the Chaldeans; turning again to the Egyptians (v. 19), trying by their help to throw off her solemn engagements to Babylon (cf. Jeremiah 37, 5, 7; 2 Kings 24, 7). 18. my mind was alienated from her—lit., was broken off from her. Just retribution for "her mind being alienated (broken off) from the Chaldeans" (v. 17), to whom she had sworn fealty (ch. 17, 12-19). "Discovered" implies the open shamelessness of her apostasy. 19. Israel first "called" her lusts, practised when in Egypt, "to her (fond) remembrance," and then actually returned to them. Mark the danger of suffering the memory to dwell on the pleasure felt in past sins. 20. their paramours—i. e., her paramours among them (the Egyptians); she doted upon their persons as her paramours (v. 5, 12, 16). flesh—the membrum virile (very large in the ass), as Leviticus 15, 2, Margin; Ezekiel 16, 26. issue of horses—the seminal issue. The horse was made by the Egyptians the hieroglyphic for a lustful person. 21. calledst to remembrance—didst repeat. [MAURER.] in bruising—in suffering . . . to be bruised. 22. lovers . . . alienated—(v. 17.) Illicit love, soon or late, ends in open hatred (2 Samuel 13, 15). The Babylonians, the objects formerly of their God-forgetting love, but now, with characteristic fickleness, objects of their hatred, shall be made by God the instruments of their punishment. 23. Pekod, &c.—(Jeremiah 50, 21.) Not a geographical name, but descriptive of Babylon. "Visitation," peculiarly the land of "judgment;" in a double sense: actively, the inflicter of judgment on Judah; passively, as about to be afterwards herself the object of judgment. Shoa . . . Koa—"rich . . . noble;" descriptive of Babylon in her prosperity . . . having all the world's wealth and dignity at her disposal. MAURER suggests that as descriptive appellatives are subjoined to the proper name, "all the Assyrians" in the second hemistich of the verse (as the verse ought to be divided at "Koa"), so Pekod, Shoa, and Koa must be appellatives descriptive of "The Babylonians and . . . Chaldeans" in the first hemistich; "Pekod" meaning Prefects; Shoa . . . Koa, "rich . . . princely." desirable young men—strong irony; alluding to v. 12, these "desirable young men" whom thou didst so "dote upon" for their manly vigour of appearance, shall by that very vigour be the better able to chastise thee. 24. with chariots—or, "with armaments;" so LXX.; "axes" [MAURER]; or, joining it with "wagons," translate, "with scythe-armed wagons," or "chariots." [GROTIUS.] wheels—the unusual height of these increased their formidable appearance (ch. 1, 16-20). their judgments—which awarded barbarously severe punishments (Jeremiah 52, 9; 29, 22). 25. take away thy nose . . . cars—adulteresses were punished so among the Egyptians and Chaldeans. Oriental beauties were ornaments in the ear and nose. How just the retribution, that the features most bejewelled should be mutilated! So, allegorically as to Judah, the spiritual adulteress. 26. strip . . . of . . . clothes—whereby she attracted her paramours (ch. 16, 39). 27. Thus . . . make . . . lewdness to cease—The captivity has made the Jews ever since abhor idolatry, not only on their return from Babylon, but for the last eighteen centuries of their dispersion, as foretold (Hosea 3, 4). 28. (Ver. 17, 18; ch. 16, 37.) 29. take away . . . thy labour—i. e., the fruits of thy labour. leave thee naked—as captive females are treated. 31. her cup—of punishment (Psalm 11, 6; 75, 8; Jeremiah 25, 15, &c.). Thy guilt and that of Israel being alike, your punishment shall be alike. 34. break . . . sherds—so greedily shalt thou suck out every drop like one drinking to madness (the effect invariably ascribed to drinking God's cup of wrath, Jeremiah 51, 7; Habakkuk 2, 16) that thou shalt crunch the very shreds of it, i. e., there shall be no evil left which thou shalt not taste. pluck off thine own breasts—enraged against them as the ministers to thine adultery. 35. forgotten me—(Jeremiah 2, 32; 13, 25.) cast me behind thy back—(1 Kings 14, 9; Nehemiah 9, 26.) bear . . . thy lewdness—i. e., its penal consequences (Proverbs 1, 31). 36-44. A summing up of the sins of the two sisters, especially those of Judah. 36. Wilt thou (not) judge (Note, ch. 20, 4). 38. the same day—on the very day that they had burned their children to Molech in the valley of Gehenna, they shamelessly and hypocritically presented themselves as worshippers in Jehovah's temple (Jeremiah 7, 9, 10). 40. messenger was sent—viz., by Judah (v. 16; Isaiah 57, 9). paintedst . . . eyes—(2 Kings 9, 30, Margin; Jeremiah 4, 30). Black paint was spread on the eyelids of beauties to make the white of the eye more attractive by the contrast, so Judah left no seductive art untried. 41. bed—divan. Whilst men reclined at table, women sat, as it seemed indelicate for them to lie down. (Amos 6, 4.) [GROTIUS.] table—i. e., the idolatrous altar.

mine incense—which I had given thee, and which thou oughtest to have offered to me (ch. 16, 18, 19; Hosca 2, 8; cf. Proverbs 7, 17). 42. Sabeans—Not content with the princely, handsome Assyrians, the sisters brought to themselves the rude robber hordes of Sabeans (Job 1, 15). The Kerl, or Margin, reads “drunkards.” upon their hands—upon the hands of the sisters, i. e., they allured Samaria and Judah to worship their gods. 43. Will they, &c.—Is it possible that paramours will desire any longer to commit whoredoms with so worn-out an old adulteress? 45. the righteous men—the Chaldeans; the executioners of God's righteous vengeance (ch. 16, 33), not that they were “righteous” in themselves (Habakkuk 1, 3, 12, 13). 46. a company—properly, a council of judges passing sentence on a criminal. [GROTIUS.] The “removal” and “spolling” by the Chaldean army is the execution of the judicial sentence of God. 47. stones—the legal penalty of the adulteress (ch. 16, 40, 41; John 8, 5). Answering to the stones hurled by the Babylonians from engines in besieging Jerusalem. houses . . . fire—fulfilled (2 Chronicles 36, 17, 19). 48. (Ver. 27.) that all . . . may be taught not to do, &c.—(Deuteronomy 13, 11.) 49. bear the sins of your idols—i. e., the punishment of your idolatry. know that I am the Lord God—i. e., know it to your cost . . . by bitter suffering.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 1-27. VISION OF THE BOILING CALDRON, AND OF THE DEATH OF EZEKIEL'S WIFE. 1, 2. Ezekiel proves his Divine mission by announcing the very day (“this same day”) of the beginning of the investment of the city by Nebuchadnezzar; “the ninth year,” viz., of Jehoiachin's captivity, “the tenth day of the tenth month,” though he was 300 miles away from Jerusalem among the captives at the Chebar (2 Kings 25, 1; Jeremiah 39, 1). set himself—laid siege; “lay against.” pot—caldron. Alluding to the self-confident proverb used among the people, ch. 11, 3 (see my Note), “This city is the caldron and we be the flesh;” your proverb shall prove awfully true, but in a different sense from what you intend. So far from the city proving an iron caldron-like defence from the fire, it shall be as a caldron set on the fire, and the people as so many pieces of meat subjected to boiling heat. See Jeremiah 1, 13. 4. pieces thereof—those which properly belong to it, as its own. every good piece . . . choice bones—i. e., the most distinguished of the people. The “choice bones” in the pot have flesh adhering to them. The “bones” under the pot (v. 5) are those having no flesh and used as fuel, answering to the poorest who suffer first, and are put out of pain sooner than the rich who endure what answers to the slower process of boiling. 5. burn . . . bones—rather, “pile the bones.” Lit., “Let there be a round pile of the bones.” herein—lit., “in the midst of it.” 6. scum—not ordinary, but poisonous scum, i. e., the people's all-pervading wickedness. bring it out piece by piece—“it,” the contents of the pot; its flesh, i. e., “I will destroy the people of the city, not all at the same time, but by a series of successive attacks.” Not as FAIRBAIRN, “on its every piece let it (the poisonous scum) go forth.” let no lot fall on it—i. e., no lot, such as is sometimes cast, to decide who are to be destroyed and who saved (2 Samuel 8, 2; Joel 3, 3; Obadiah 11; Nahum 3, 10). In former carryings away of captives, lots were cast to settle who were to go, and who to stay, but now all alike are to be cast out without distinction of rank, age, or sex. 7. upon the top of a rock—or, “the dry, bare, exposed rock,” so as to be conspicuous to all. Blood poured on a rock is not so soon absorbed as blood poured on the earth. The law ordered the blood even of a beast or fowl to be “covered with the dust” (Leviticus 17, 13); but she was so shameless as to be at no pains to cover up the blood of innocent men slain in her. Blood, as the consumption of all sin, presupposes every other form of guilt. 8. that it might cause—God purposely let her so shamelessly pour the blood on the bare rock, “that it might” flie more loudly and openly cry for vengeance from on high; and that the connection between the guilt and the punishment might be the more palpable. The blood of Abel, though the ground received it, still cries to heaven for vengeance (Genesis 4, 10, 11), much more blood shamelessly exposed on the bare rock. set her blood—she shall be paid back in kind (Matthew 7, 2). She openly shed blood, and her blood shall openly be shed. 9. the pile for fire—the hostile materials for the city's destruction. 10. spice it well—that the meat may be the more palatable, i. e., I will make the foe delight in its destruction as much as one delights in well-seasoned, savoury meat. GROTIUS, needlessly departing from the obvious sense, translates, “Let it be boiled down to a compound.” 11. set it empty . . . that . . . brass . . . may burn . . . that . . . scum . . . may be consumed—even the consumption of the contents is not enough; the caldron itself which is infected by the poisonous scum must be destroyed, i. e., the city itself must be destroyed, not merely the inhabitants, just as the very house infected with leprosy was to be destroyed (Leviticus 14, 34-45). 12. herself—rather, “she hath wearied me out with lies;” or rather “with vain labours” on my part to purify her without being obliged to have recourse to judgments (cf. Isaiah 43, 24; Malachi 2, 17). [MAURER.] However, English Version gives a good sense (cf. Isaiah 47, 13; 57, 10). 13. lewdness—determined, deliberate wickedness; from a Hebrew root, “to purpose.” I have purged thee—i. e., I have left nothing untried which would tend towards purging thee, by sending prophets to invite thee to repentance, by giving thee the law with all its promises, privileges, and threats. thou shalt not be purged . . . any more—i. e., by my gracious interpositions; thou shalt be left to thine own course, and to take its fatal consequences. 14. go back—desist; relax. [FAIRBAIRN.] 15. Second part of the vision; announcement of the death of Ezekiel's wife, and prohibition of the usual signs of mourning. 16. desire of . . . eyes—his wife; representing the sanctuary (v. 21) in which the Jews so much gloried. The energy and subordination of Ezekiel's whole life to his prophetic office is strikingly displayed in this narrative of his wife's death. It is the only memorable event of his personal history which he records, and this only in reference to his soul-absorbing work. His natural tenderness is shown by that graphic touch, “the desire of thine eyes.” What amazing subjection, then, of his individual feeling to his prophetic duty is manifested in the simple statement (v. 18), “So I spake . . . in the morning; and at even my wife died; and I did in the morning as I was commanded.” stroke—a sudden visitation. The suddenness of it enhances the self-control of Ezekiel in so entirely merging individual feeling, which must have been especially acute under such trying circumstances, in the higher claims of duty to God. 17. Forbear to cry—“Lament in silence;” not forbidding sorrow, but the loud expression of it. [GROTIUS.] no mourning—typical of the universality of the ruin of Jerusalem, which would preclude mourning, such as is usual where calamity is but partial. “The dead” is purposely put in the plural, as referring ultimately to the dead who should perish at the taking of Jerusalem; though the singular might have been expected, as Ezekiel's wife was the immediate subject referred to: “make no mourning” such as is usual “for the dead, and such as shall be hereafter in Jerusalem” (Jeremiah 16, 5-7). tire of thine head—thy head-dress. [FAIRBAIRN.] JEROME explains, “Thou shalt retain the hair which is usually cut in mourning.” The fillet, binding the hair about the temples like a chaplet, was laid aside at such times. Uncovering the head was an ordinary sign of mourning in priests; whereas others covered their heads in mourning (2 Samuel 15, 30). The reason was, the priests had their head-dress of fine twined linen given them for ornament, and as a badge of office. The high priest, as having on his head the holy anointing oil, was forbidden in any case to lay aside his head-dress. But the priests might do so in the case of the death of the nearest relatives (Leviticus 21, 2, 3, 10); they then put on inferior attire, sprinkling also on their heads dust and ashes (cf. Leviticus 10, 6, 7). shoes upon thy feet—whereas mourners went “barefoot” (2 Samuel 15, 30) cover not . . . lips—rather, the upper lip, with the mou-

tache (Leviticus 13. 45; Micah 3. 7). bread of men—the bread usually brought to mourners by friends in token of sympathy. So the "cup of consolation" brought (Jeremiah 16. 7). "Of men" means such as is usually furnished by men. So Isaiah 8. 1, "a man's pen;" Revelation 21. 17, "the measure of a man." 19. what these things are to us—The people perceive that Ezekiel's strange conduct has a symbolical meaning as to themselves; they ask what is that meaning? 21. excellency of your strength—(Cf. Amos 6. 8.) The object of your pride and confidence (Jeremiah 7. 4, 10, 14). desire of . . . eyes—(Psalm 27. 4.) The antitype to Ezekiel's wife (v. 16). pitieth—loveth, as pity is akin to love; yearned over. "Profane" is an appropriate word. They had profaned the temple with idolatry; God, in just retribution, will profane it with the Chaldean sword, i. e., lay it in the dust, as Ezekiel's wife. sons . . . daughters . . . left—the children left behind in Judea, when the parents were carried away. 22. (Jeremiah 16. 6, 7.) So general shall be the calamity, that all ordinary usages of mourning shall be suspended. 23. ye shall not mourn . . . but . . . pine away for your iniquities—The Jews' not mourning was to be not the result of insensibility, any more than Ezekiel's not mourning for his wife was not from want of feeling. They could not in their exile manifest publicly their lamentation, but they would privately "mourn one to another." Their "iniquities" would then be their chief sorrow ("pining away"), as feeling that these were the cause of their sufferings (cf. Leviticus 26. 39; Lamentations 3. 39). The fullest fulfilment is still future (Zechariah 12. 10-14). 24. sign—a typical representative in his own person of what was to befall them (Isaiah 20. 3). when this cometh—alluding probably to their taunt, as if God's word spoken by His prophets would never come to pass. "Where is the word of the Lord? Let it come now" (Jeremiah 17. 15). When the prophecy is fulfilled, "ye shall know (to your cost) that I am the Lord," who thereby show my power and fulfil my word spoken by my prophet (John 13. 19; 14. 29). 25, 26. "The day" referred to in these verses is the day of the overthrow of the temple, when the fugitive "escapes." But "that day," in v. 27, is the day on which the fugitive brings the sad news to Ezekiel, at the Chebar. In the interval the prophet suspended his prophecies as to the Jews, as was foretold. Afterwards his mouth was "opened," and no more "dumb" (ch. 3. 26, 27; cf. v. 27 here in sh. 24; and ch. 33. 21, 22).

CHAPTER XXV.

VER. 1-17. APPROPRIATELY IN THE INTERVAL OF SILENCE AS TO THE JEWS IN THE EIGHT CHAPTERS, 25-32, EZEKIEL DENOUNCES JUDGMENTS ON THE HEATHEN WORLD-KINGDOMS. If Israel was not spared, much less the heathen utterly corrupt, and having no mixture of truth, such as Israel in its worst state possessed (1 Peter 4. 17, 18). Their ruin was to be utter: Israel's but temporary (Jeremiah 46. 28). The nations denounced are seven, the perfect number; implying that God's judgments would visit, not merely these, but the whole round of the heathen foes of God. Babylon is excepted, because she is now for the present viewed as the rod of God's retributive justice, a view too much then lost sight of by those who fretted against her universal supremacy. 3. (Jeremiah 49. 1). when . . . profaned . . . when . . . desolate . . . when . . . captivity—rather, for . . . for . . . for: the cause of the insolent exultation of Ammon over Jerusalem. They triumphed especially over the fall of the "sanctuary," as the triumph of heathenism over the rival claims of Jehovah. In Jehoshaphat's time, when Psalm 83. was written (Psalm 83. 4, 7, 8, 12, "Ammon . . . holpen the children of Lot," who were, therefore, the leaders of the unholy conspiracy, "Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession"), we see the same profane spirit. Now at last their wicked wish seems accomplished in the fall of Jerusalem. Ammon, descended from Lot, held the region east of Jordan, separated from the Amorites on the north by the river Jabbok, and from Moab on the south by the Arnon. They were auxiliaries to Babylon in the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 24. 2). 4. men of . . . East—lit., children of the East, the nomad tribes of Arabia Deserta, east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. palaces—their nomadic encampments or folds, surrounded with mud-walls, are so-called in irony. Where thy "palaces" once stood, there shall their very different "palaces" stand. Fulfilled after the ravaging of their region by Nebuchadnezzar, shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem (cf. ch. 21. 22; Jeremiah 49. 1-28). 5. Rabbah—meaning the Great Ammon's metropolis. Under the Ptolemies it was rebuilt under the name Philadelphia; the ruins are called Amman now, but there is no dwelling inhabited. Ammonites—i. e., the Ammonite region is to be a "couching-place for flocks," viz., of the Arabs. The "camels," being the chief beast of burden of the Chaldeans, is put first, as their invasion was to prepare the Ammonite land for the Arab "flocks." Instead of busy men, there shall be "still and couching flocks." 6, 7. "Because thou hast clapped thine hands," exulting over the downfall of Jerusalem, "I also will stretch out mine hand upon thee" (to which ch. 21. 17 also may refer, "I will smite mine hands together"). hands . . . feet . . . heart—with the whole inward feeling, and with every outward indication. Stamping with the foot means dancing for joy. 7. a spoil—so Hebrew Margin or Kerî, for the text or Chetib, "meat" (so ch. 26. 5; 34. 28). Their goods were to be a "spoil to the foe;" their state was to be "cut off," so as to be no more a "people;" and they were as individuals, for the most part, to be "destroyed." 8. Moab, Seir, and Ammon were contiguous countries, stretching in one line from Gilead on the north to the Red Sea. They therefore naturally acted in concert, and in joint hostility to Judea. Judah is like . . . all . . . heathen—The Jews fare no better than others: it is of no use to them to serve Jehovah, who, they say, is the only true God. 9, 10. open . . . from the cities—I will open up the side, or border of Moab (metaphor from a man whose side is open to blows), from the direction of the cities on his north-west border beyond the Arnon, once assigned to Reuben (Joshua 13. 15-21), but now in the hands of their original owners; and the "men of the East," the wandering Bedonin hordes, shall enter through these cities into Moab and waste it. Moab accordingly was so wasted by them, that long before the time of Christ it had melted away among the hordes of the desert. For "cities," GROTIUS translates the Hebrew as proper names, the Ar and Arœr, on the Arnon. Hence the Hebrew for cities, "Ar" is repeated twice (Numbers 21. 28; Deuteronomy 2. 36; Isaiah 15. 1). glory of the country—The region of Moab was richer than that of Ammon; it answers to the modern Belka, the richest district in South Syria, and the scene in consequence of many a contest among the Bedouins. Hence it is called here a glorious land (lit., a glory, or ornament of a land). [FAIRBAIRN.] Rather, "the glory of the country" is in apposition with "cities" which immediately precede, and the names of which presently follow. Beth-jeshimoth—meaning "the city of desolations;" perhaps so named from some siege it sustained; it was towards the west. Baal-meon—called also Beth-meon (Jeremiah 48. 23), and Beth-baal-meon (Joshua 13. 17, called so from the worship of Baal), and Bajith, simply (Isaiah 15. 2). Kiriathaim—the double city. The strength of these cities engendered "the pride" of Moab (Isaiah 16. 6). 10. with the Ammonites—FAIRBAIRN explains and translates, "upon the children of Ammon" (elliptically for "I will open Moab to the men of the East, who, having overrun the children of Ammon, shall then fall on Moab"). MAURER, as English Version, "with the Ammonites," i. e., Moab, "together with the land of Ammon," is to be thrown "open to the men of the East," to enter and take possession (Jeremiah 49). 12. taking vengeance—lit., revenging with revenge, i. e., the most unrelenting vengeance. It was not simple hatred, but deep-brooding, implacable revenge. The grudge of Edom or Esau was originally for Jacob's robbing him of Isaac's blessing (Genesis 25. 23; 27. 27-41). This purpose of revenge yielded to the extraordinary kindness of Jacob, through the blessing of Him with whom Jacob wrestled in prayer; but it was revived as an hereditary grudge in the posterity of Esau, when they saw the younger branch rising to the pre-eminence which they thought of right belonged to themselves. More recently, for David's subjugation of Edom to Israel (2 Samuel 8. 14). They therefore gave vent to their spite by joining the Chaldeans in destroying Jerusalem (Psalm 137. 7; Lamentations 4. 22; Obadiah 10-14), and then intercepting and killing the fugitive Jews (Amos 1. 11), and occupying part of the Jewish land as far as to Hebron. 13. Teman . . . they of Dedan—rather, "I will make it desolate from Teman (in the south) even to Dedan" (in the north-west) [GROTIUS], (Jeremiah 49. 8), i. e., the whole country from north to south, stretching from the south of the Dead Sea to the Elanitic gulf of the Red Sea. 14. by . . . my people Israel—viz., by Judas Maccabeus. The Idumeans were finally, by compulsory circumcision, incorporated with the Jewish state by John Hyrcanus (see Isaiah 34. 5; 63. 1, &c.; 1 Maccabees 5. 3). So complete was the amalgamation in Christ's time, that the Herods of Idumean origin, as Jews, ruled over the two races as one people. Thus the ancient prophecy was fulfilled (Genesis 25. 23), "The elder shall serve the younger." 15. (1 Samuel 13. 14; 2 Chronicles 28. 18.) The "old hatred" refers to their continual enmity to the covenant people. They lay along Judea on the sea-coast at the opposite side from Ammon and Moab. They were overthrown by Uzziah (2 Chronicles 26. 6), and by Hezekiah (2 Kings 18. 8). Nebuchadnezzar overran the cities on the sea-coast on his way to Egypt after besieging Tyre (Jeremiah 47). God will take vengeance on those who take the avenging of themselves out of His hands into their own (Romans 12. 19-21; James 2. 13). 16. out off the Cherethims—There is a play on similar sounds in the Hebrew, "Hichratti Cherethim," I will slay the slayers. The name may have been given to a section of the Philistines from their warlike disposition (1 Samuel 30. 14; 31. 3). They excelled in archery, whence David enrolled a body-guard from them (2 Samuel 8. 18; 15. 18; 20. 7.) They sprang from Capthor, identified by many with Crete, which was famed for archery, and to which the name Cherethim seems akin. Though in emigration, which mostly tended westwards, Crete seems more likely to be colonized from Philistia than Philistia from Crete, a section of Cretans may have settled at Cherethim in South Philistia, whilst the Philistines, as a nation, may have come originally from the East (cf. Deuteronomy 2. 23; Jeremiah 47. 4; Amos 9. 7; Zephaniah 2. 5). In Genesis 10. 14 the Philistines are made distinct from the Capthorim, and are said to come from the Casluhim; so that the Cherethim were but a part of the Philistines, which 1 Samuel 30. 14 confirms. remnant of—i. e., "on the sea-coast" of the Mediterranean: those left remaining after the former overthrows inflicted by Samuel, David, Hezekiah, and Psammethichus of Egypt, father of Pharaoh-necho (Jeremiah 25. 20). 17. know . . . vengeance—they shall know me, not in mercy, but by my vengeance on them (Psalm 9. 16).

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 1-21. THE JUDGMENT ON TYRE THROUGH NEBUCHADNEZZAR (CHS. 26.-28). In ch. 26., Ezekiel sets forth:—1. Tyre's sin; 2. its doom; 3. the instruments of executing it; 4. the effects produced on other nations by her downfall. In ch. 27., a lamentation over the fall of such earthly splendour. In ch. 28., an elegy addressed to the king, on the humiliation of his sacrilegious pride. Ezekiel, in his prophecies as to the heathen, exhibits the dark side only; because he views them simply in their hostility to the people of God, which shall outlive them all. Isaiah (Isaiah 23.), on the other hand, at the close of judgments, holds out the prospect of blessing, when Tyre should turn to the Lord. 1. The specification of the date, which had been omitted in the case of the four preceding objects of judgment, marks the greater weight attached to the fall of Tyre. eleventh year—viz., after the carrying away of Jehoiachin, the year of the fall of Jerusalem. The number of the month is, however, omitted, and the day only given. As the month of the taking of Jerusalem was regarded as one of particular note, viz., the fourth month, also the fifth, on which it was actually destroyed (Jeremiah 52. 6, 12, 13), RABBI-DAVID reasonably supposes that Tyre uttered her taunt at the close of the fourth month, as her nearness to Jerusalem enabled her to hear of its fall very soon, and that Ezekiel met it with his threat against herself on "the first day" of the fifth month. 2. Tyre—(Joshua 19. 29; 2 Samuel 24. 7), lit., meaning "the rock-city," Zor; a name applying to the island Tyre, called New Tyre, rather than Old Tyre on the mainland. They were half a mile apart. New Tyre, a century and a half before the fall of Jerusalem, had successfully resisted Shalmaneser of Assyria, for five years besieging it (MÉNANDER, from the Tyrian archives, quoted by JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 9. 14. 2). It was the stronger and more important of the two cities, and is the one chiefly, though not exclusively, here meant. Tyre was originally a colony of Zidon. Nebuchadnezzar's siege of it lasted thirteen years (ch. 29. 18; Isaiah 23). Though no profane author mentions his having succeeded in the siege, JEROME states he read the fact in Assyrian histories. Aha!—exultation over a fallen rival (Psalm 35. 21, 25). she . . . that was the gates—i. e., the single gate composed of two folding doors. Hence the verb is singular. "Gates" were the place of resort for traffic and public business: so here it expresses a mart of commerce frequented by merchants. Tyre regards Jerusalem not as an open enemy, for her territory being the narrow, long strip of land north of Philistia, between Mount Lebanon and the sea, her interest was to cultivate friendly relations with the Jews, on whom she was dependent for corn (ch. 27. 17; 1 Kings 5. 9; Acts 12. 20). But Jerusalem had intercepted some of the inland traffic which she wished to monopolize to herself; so, in her intensely selfish worldly-mindedness, she exulted heartlessly over the fall of Jerusalem as her own gain. Hence she incurred the wrath of God as pre-eminently the world's representative in its ambition, selfishness and pride, in defiance of the will of God (Isaiah 23. 9). she is turned unto me—i. e., the mart of corn, wine, oil, balsam, &c., which she once was, is transferred to me. The caravans from Palmyra, Petra, and the East will no longer be intercepted by the market ("the gates") of Jerusalem, but will come to me. 3, 4. nations . . . as the sea . . . waves—In striking contrast to the boasting of Tyre, God threatens to bring against her Babylon's army levied from "many nations," even as the Mediterranean waves that dashed against her rock-founded city on all sides. scrape her dust . . . make her . . . top of . . . rock—or, "a bare rock." [GROTIUS.] The soil which the Tyrians had brought together upon the rock on which they built their city, I will scrape so clean away as to leave no dust, but only the bare rock as it was. An awful contrast to her expectation of filling herself with all the wealth of the East now that Jerusalem has fallen. 5. in the midst of the sea—plainly referring to New Tyre (ch. 27. 32). 6. her daughters . . . in the field—i. e., the surrounding villages dependent on her in the open country, shall share the fate of the mother-city. 7. from the north—the original locality of the Chaldeans; also, the direction by which they entered Palestine, taking the route of Riblah and Hamath on the Orontes, in preference to that across the desert between Babylon and Judea. king of kings—so called because of the many kings who owned allegiance to him (2 Kings 18. 28). God had delegated to him the universal earth-empire which is His (Daniel 2. 47). The Son of God alone has the right and title inherently, and shall assume it when the world-kings shall have been fully proved as abusers of the trust (1 Timothy 6. 15; Revelation 17. 12-14; 19. 15, 16). Ezekiel's prophecy was not based on conjecture from the past, for Shalmaneser, with all the might of the Assyrian empire, had failed in his siege of Tyre. Yet Nebuchadnezzar was to succeed. JOSEPHUS tells us that Nebuchadnezzar began the siege in the seventh year of Ithobal's reign, king of Tyre. 9. engines of war—lit., "an apparatus for striking." "He shall apply the stroke of the battering-ram against thy walls." HAVERNICK translates, "His enginery of destruction," lit., the destruction (not merely the stroke) of his enginery." axes—lit., swords.

10. dust—so thick shall be the "dust" stirred up by the immense numbers of "horses," that it shall "cover" the whole city as a cloud. horses . . . chariots—As in v. 3-5, New Tyre on the insular rock in the sea (cf. Isaiah 23, 2, 4, 6) is referred to; so here, in v. 9-11, Old Tyre on the mainland. Both are included in the prophecies under one name. wheels—FAIRBAIRN thinks that here, and in ch. 23, 24, as "the wheels" are distinct from the "chariots," some wheelwork for riding on, or for the operations of the siege, are meant. 11. thy strong garrisons—lit., the statues of thy strength: so the forts which are "monuments of thy strength." MAURER understands, in stricter agreement with the lit. meaning, "the statues" or "obelisks erected in honour of the idols, the tutelary gods of Tyre," as Melecarte, answering to the Grecian Hercules, whose temple stood in Old Tyre (cf. Jeremiah 43, 13, Margin). 12. lay thy stones . . . timber . . . in . . . midst of . . . water—referring to the insular New Tyre (v. 3, 5; ch. 27, 4, 25, 26). When its lofty buildings and towers fall, surrounded as it was with the sea which entered its double harbour and washed its ramparts, the "stones . . . timbers . . . and dust" appropriately are described as thrown down "in the midst of the water." Though Ezekiel attributes the capture of Tyre to Nebuchadnezzar (Note, ch. 20, 18), yet it does not follow that the final destruction of it described is attributed by him to the same monarch. The overthrow of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar was the first link in the long chain of evil—the first deadly blow which prepared for, and was the earnest of, the final doom. The change in this verse from the individual conqueror "he," to the general "they," marks that what he did was not the whole, but only paved the way for others to complete the work begun by him. It was to be a progressive work until she was utterly destroyed. Thus the words here answer exactly to what Alexander did. With the "stones, timber," and rubbish of Old Tyre, he built a causeway in seven months to New Tyre on the island and so took it [QUINT, CURT., 4, 2], 322 B. C. 13. Instead of the joyousness of thy prosperity, a death-like silence shall reign (Isaiah 24, 8; Jeremiah 7, 34). 14. He concludes in nearly the same words as he began (v. 4, 5). built no more—fulfilled as to the mainland Tyre, under Nebuchadnezzar. The insular Tyre recovered partly, after seventy years (Isaiah 23, 17, 18), but again suffered under Alexander, then under Antigonus, then under the Saracens at the beginning of the fourteenth century. Now its harbours are choked with sand, precluding all hope of future restoration, "not one entire house is left, and only a few fishermen take shelter in the vaults." [MAUNDRELL.] So accurately has God's word come to pass. 15-21. The impression which the overthrow of Tyre produced on other maritime nations and upon her own colonies, e. g., Utica, Carthage, and Tartessus or Tarshish in Spain. isles—maritime lands. Even mighty Carthage used to send a yearly offering to the temple of Hercules at Tyre: and the mother-city gave high priests to her colonies. Hence the consternation at her fall felt in the widely-scattered dependencies with which she was so closely connected by the ties of religion, as well as commercial intercourse. shake—metaphorically: be agitated (Jeremiah 49, 21). 16. come down from their thrones . . . upon the ground—"The throne of the mourners" (Job 2, 13; Jonah 3, 6). "Princes of the sea" are the merchant rulers of Carthage and other colonies of Tyre, who had made themselves rich and powerful by trading on the sea (Isaiah 23, 8). clothe . . . with trembling—Hebrew, "tremblings." Cf. ch. 7, 27, "Clothed with desolation;" Psalm 132, 18. In a public calamity the garment was changed for a mourning garb. 17. inhabited of seafaring men—i. e., which was frequented by merchants of various sea-bordering lands. [GROTIUS.] FAIRBAIRN translates with Peschito, "Thou inhabitant of the seas" (as the Hebrew lit. means). Tyre rose as it were out of the seas as if she got thence her inhabitants, being peopled so closely down to the waters. So Venice was called "the bride of the sea." strong in the sea—through her insular position. cause their terror to be on all that haunt it—viz., the sea. The Hebrew is rather, "they put their terror upon all her (the city's) inhabitants," i. e. they make the name of every Tyrian to be feared. [FAIRBAIRN.] 18. thy departure—Isaiah 23, 6, 12 predicts that the Tyrians, in consequence of the siege, should pass over the Mediterranean to the lands bordering on it ("Chittim," "Tarshish," &c.). So Ezekiel here. Accordingly JEROME says that he read in Assyrian histories that, "when the Tyrians saw no hope of escaping, they fled to Carthage or some islands of the Ionian and Ægean Seas." [BISHOP NEWTON.] (See my Note on ch. 29, 18.) GROTIUS explains "departure," i. e., "in the day when hostages shall be carried away from thee to Babylon." The parallelism to "thy fall" makes me think "departure" must mean "thy end" in general, but with an included allusion to the "departure" of most of her people to her colonies at the fall of the city. 19. great waters—appropriate metaphor of the Babylonian hosts, which literally, by breaking down insular Tyre's ramparts, caused the sea to "cover" part of her. 20. the pit—Tyre's disappearance is compared to that of the dead placed in their sepulchres and no more seen among the living (cf. ch. 32, 18, 23; Isaiah 14, 11, 15, 19). I shall set glory in the land—In contrast to Tyre consigned to the "pit" of death, I shall set glory (i. e., my presence symbolized by the Shelkinah cloud, the antitype to which shall be Messiah, "the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father," John 1, 14; Isaiah 4, 2, 5; Zechariah 6, 13) in Judah. of the living—as opposed to Tyre consigned to the "pit" of death. Judea is to be the land of national and spiritual life, being restored after its captivity (ch. 47, 9). FAIRBAIRN loses the antithesis by applying the negative to both clauses, "and that thou be not set as a glory in the land of the living." 21. terror—an example of judgment calculated to terrify all evil-doers. thou shalt be no more—not that there was to be no more a Tyre, but she was no more to be the Tyre that once was: her glory and name were to be no more. As to Old Tyre, the prophecy was literally fulfilled, not a vestige of it being left.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-36. TYRE'S FORMER GREATNESS, SUGGESTING A LAMENTATION OVER HER SAD DOWNFALL. 2. lamentation—a funeral dirge, eulogizing her great attributes, to make the contrast the greater between her former and her latter state. 3. situate at the entry of the sea—lit., plural, "entrances," i. e., ports or havens; referring to the double port of Tyre, at which vessels entered round the north and south ends of the island, so that ships could find a ready entrance from whatever point the wind might blow (cf. ch. 28, 2). merchant of . . . people for many isles—i. e., a mercantile emporium of the peoples of many sea-coasts, both from the east and from the west, Isaiah 23, 3, "A mart of nations," of perfect beauty—(Ch. 28, 12). 4. Tyre, in consonance with her sea-girt position, separated by a strait of half a mile from the mainland, is described as a ship built of the best material, and manned with the best mariners and skilful pilots, but at last in tempestuous seas wrecked (v. 26). 5. Senir—the Amorite name of Hermon, or the southern height of Anti-libanus (Deuteronomy 3, 9); the Sidonian name was Strion. "All thy . . . boards:" dual in Hebrew, "double-boards," viz., placed in a double order on the two sides of which the ship consisted. [VATABLUS.] Or, referring to the two sides or the two ends, the prow and the stern, which every ship has. [MUNSTER.] cedars—most suited for "masts," from their height and durability. 6. Bashan—celebrated for its oaks, as Lebanon was for its cedars. the company of . . . Assurites—the most skilful workmen summoned from Assyria. Rather, as the Hebrew orthography requires, "They have made thy (rowing) benches of ivory inlaid in the daughter of cedars" [MAURER], or the best boxwood. FAIRBAIRN, with BOCHART, reads the Hebrew two words as one: "Thy plankwork (deck: instead of 'benches,' as the Hebrew is singular) they made ivory with boxes." English Version, with MAUREA's correction, is simpler. Chittim—Cyprus and Macedonia, from which, PLINY tells us, the best boxwood came. [GROTIUS.] 7. broidered . . . sail—The ancients embroidered their sails often at great expense, especially the Egyptians, whose linen, still preserved in mummies, is of the finest texture. Elkshah—Greece; so called from Elis, a large and ancient division of Peloponnesus. Pausanias says, that the best of linen was produced in it, and in no other part of Greece; called by Homer "Alisium," that which covered thee—thy awning. 8. Arvad—a small island and city near Phœnicia, now Road: its inhabitants are still noted for sea-faring habits. thy wise men, O Tyrus . . . thy pilots—Whilst the men of Arvad once thy equals (Genesis 10, 18), and the Sidonians once thy superiors, were employed by thee in subordinate positions as "mariners," thou madest thine own skilled men alone to be commanders and pilots. Implying the political and mercantile superiority of Tyre. 9. Gebal—a Phœnician city and region between Beirut and Tripolis, famed for skilled workmen (Margin, 1 Kings 5, 18; Psalm 83, 7). callers—stoppers of chinks in a vessel: carrying on the metaphor as to Tyre, occupy thy merchandise—i. e., to exchange merchandise with thee. 10. Persia . . . Phut—warriors from the extreme east and west. Lud—the Lydians of Asia Minor, near the Meander, famed for archery (Isaiah 66, 19); rather than those of Ethiopia, as the Lydians of Asia Minor form a kind of intermediate step between Persia and Phut (the Libyans about Cyrene, shielded warriors, Jeremiah 46, 9, descended from Phut, son of Ham). hauged . . . shield . . . comeliness—warriors hanged their accoutrements on the walls for ornament. Divested of the metaphor it means, it was an honour to thee to have so many nations supplying thee with hired soldiers. 11. Gammadims—rather, as the Tyrians were Syro-Phœnicians, from a Syriac root, meaning daring, "men of daring." [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] It is not likely the keeping of watch "in the towers" would have been entrusted to foreigners. Others take it from a Hebrew root, "a dagger," or short sword (Judges 3, 16), "short-swordsmen." 12. Tarshish—Tartessus in Spain, a country famed for various metals, which were exported to Tyre. Much of the "tin" probably was conveyed by the Phœnicians from Cornwall to Tarshish. traded in thy fairs—"did barter with thee" [FAIRBAIRN]; from a root, "to leave," something left in barter for something else. 13. Javan—the Ionians or Greeks: for the Ionians of Asia Minor were the first Greeks whom the Asiatics came in contact with. Tubal . . . Meshech—the Tibareni and Moschi, in the mountain-region between the Black and Caspian Seas. persons of men—i. e., as slaves. So the Turkish harems are supplied with female slaves from Circassia and Georgia. vessels—all kinds of articles. Superior weapons are still manufactured in the Caucasus region. 14. Togarmah—Armenia: descended from Gomer (Genesis 10, 3). Their mountainous region south of the Caucasus was celebrated for horses. horsemen—rather, "riding-horses," as distinct from "horses" for chariots. [FAIRBAIRN.] 15. Dedan—near the Persian Sea: thus an avenue to the commerce of India. Not the Dedan in Arabia (v. 20), as the names in the context here prove, but the Dedan sprung from Cush [BOCHART], (Genesis 10, 7). merchandise of thine hand—i. e., were dependent on thee for trade [FAIRBAIRN]; came to buy the produce of thy hands. [GROTIUS.] horns of ivory—ivory is so termed from its resemblance to horns. The Hebrew word for "ivory" means tooth; so that they cannot have mistaken ivory as if coming from the horns of certain animals, instead of from the tusks of the elephant. a present—lit., a reward in return: a price paid for merchandise. 16. "Syria" was thy mart for the multitude," &c. For Syria the LXX. read Edom. But the Syrians were famed as merchants. occupied—old English for "traded;" so in Luke 19, 13. agate—others translate, "ruby," "chalcedony," or "pearls." 17. Minnith . . . Pannag—names of places in Israel famed for good wheat, wherewith Tyre was supplied (1 Kings 5, 9, 11; Ezra 3, 7; Acts 12, 20); Minnith was formerly an Ammonite city (Judges 11, 33). "Pannag" is identified by GROTIUS with "Phenice," the Greek name for Canaan. "They traded . . . wheat," i. e., they supplied thy market with wheat. balm—or, "balsam." 18. Helbon—or Chalybon, in Syria, now Aleppo; famed for its wines; the Persian monarchs would drink no other. 19. Dan also—None of the other places enumerated commence with the copula (also; Hebrew, "ve"). Moreover, the products specified, "cassia, calamus," apply rather to places in Arabia. Therefore, FAIRBAIRN translates, "Vedan;" perhaps the modern Aden, near the straits of Bab-el-mandeb. GROTIUS refers it to Dana, mentioned by Ptolemy. Javan—not the Greeks of Europe or Asia Minor, but of a Greek settlement in Arabia. going to and fro—rather, as Hebrew admits, "from Uzal." This is added to "Javan," to mark which Javan is meant (Genesis 10, 27). The metropolis of Arabia Felix, or Yemen; called also Sanaa. [BOCHART.] English Version gives a good sense, thus, All peoples, whether near as the Israelite "Dan," or far as the Greeks or "Javan," who were wont to "go to and fro" from their love of traffic, frequented thy marts, bringing bright iron, &c., these products not being necessarily represented as those of Dan or Javan. bright iron—Yemen is still famed for its sword blades. calamus—aromatic cane. 20. Dedan—in Arabia; distinct from the Dedan in v. 15 (see note). Descended from Abraham and Keturah (Genesis 25, 3). [BOCHART.] precious clothes—splendid coverlets. 21. Arabia—the nomadic tribes of Arabia, among which Kedar was pre-eminent. occupied with thee—lit., "of thy hand," i. e., they traded with thee for wares, the product of thy hand (notes, see v. 15, 16). 22. Sheba . . . Ramah—in Arabia. spices, &c.—obtained from India and conveyed in caravans to Tyre. chief of . . . spices—i. e., best spices (Deuteronomy 33, 15). 23. Haran—the dwelling-place of Abraham in Mesopotamia, after he moved from Ur (Genesis 11, 31). Caneh—Caneh, an Assyrian city on the Tigris; the Ctesiphon of the Greeks (Genesis 10, 10). Eden—probably a region in Babylonia (see Genesis 2, 8). Chilud—a compound; the place designated by Ptolemy Gaala of Media. The Chaldee version interprets it of Media. HENDERSON refers it to Carmanda, which Xenophon describes as a large city beyond the Euphrates. 24. all sorts of things—Hebrew, "perfections;" exquisite articles of finery. [GROTIUS.] clothes—rather, "mantles" or "cloaks;" lit., wrappings. For "blue," HENDERSON translates, "purple." chests of rich apparel, bound with cords—treasures or repositories of damask stuffs, consisting of variegated threads woven together in figures. [HENDERSON.] cedar—The "chests" were made of cedar, in order to last the longer; and also it keeps off decay, and has a sweet odour. 25. sing of thee—personification; thy great merchant ships were palpable proofs of thy greatness. Others translate from a different Hebrew root, "were thy (mercantile) travellers." FAIRBAIRN translates, "Were thy walls." But the parallelism to "thou wast glorious" favours English Version, "sing of thee." 26. In contrast to her previous greatness, her downfall is here, by a sudden transition, depicted under the image of a vessel foundering at sea. east wind—blowing from Lebanon, the most violent wind in the Mediterranean (Psalm 48, 7). A Levanter, as it is called. Nebuchadnezzar is meant. The "sea" is the war with him which the "rowers," or rulers of the state vessel, had "brought" it into, to its ruin. 27. The detailed enumeration implies the utter completeness of the ruin. and in all thy company—"even with all thy collected multitude." [HENDERSON.] 28. The suburbs—The buildings of Tyre on the adjoining continent. 29. So on the downfall of spiritual Babylon (Revelation 18, 17, &c.). shall stand upon . . . land—being cast out of their ships in which heretofore they prided themselves. 30. against thee—rather, "concerning thee." 31. utterly bald—lit., bald with baldness. The Phœnician custom in mourning; which, as being connected with heathenish superstitions, was forbidden to Israel (Deuteronomy 14, 1). 32. take up—lift up, the destroyed—a destroyed one. Lit. (as opposed to its previous bustle of thronging merchants and mariners, v. 27), "one brought to death's stillness." In . . . midst of . . . sea—insular Tyre. 33. out of the seas—brought on shore out of the ships. filledst—didst supply plentifully with wares. enrich . . . kings—with the custom dues levied on the wares. 34. In the time when . . . shalt . . . shall—Now that thou art broken (wrecked), &c., thy merchandise, &c., are fallen. [MAURER.] 35. isles—sea-coasts. 36. hiss—with astonishment; as in 1 Kings 9. 8.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-26. PROPHETICAL DIRGE ON THE KING OF TYRE, AS THE CULMINATION AND EMBODIMENT OF THE SPIRIT OF CARNAL PRIDE AND SELF-SUFFICIENCY OF THE WHOLE STATE. THE FALL OF ZIDON, THE MOTHER-CITY. THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL IN CONTRAST WITH TYRE AND ZIDON. 2. Because, &c.—Repeated resumptively in v. 6; the apodosis begins at v. 7. "The prince of Tyrus" at the time was Ithobal, or Ithbaal II.; the name implying his close connection with Baal, the Phœnician supreme god, whose representative he was. I am . . . god, I sit in . . . seat of God . . . the seas—As God sits enthroned in His heavenly citadel exempt from all injury, so I sit secure in my impregnable stronghold amidst the stormiest elements, able to control them at will, and make them subserve my interests. The language, though primarily here applied to the king of Tyre, as similar language is to the king of Babylon (Isaiah 14. 13, 14), yet has an ulterior and fuller accomplishment in Satan and his embodiment in Antichrist (Daniel 7. 25; 11. 36, 37; 2 Thessalonians 2. 4; Revelation 13. 6). This feeling of superhuman elevation in the king of Tyre was fostered by the fact that the island on which Tyre stood was called "the holy island" [SANCTIFICATION], being sacred to Hercules, so much so that the colonies looked up to Tyre as the mother-city of their religion, as well as of their political existence. The Hebrew for "God" is El, i. e., the Mighty One. yet, &c.—keen irony. set thine heart as . . . heart of God—Thou thinkest of thyself as if thou wert God. 3. Ezekiel ironically alludes to Ithbaal's overweening opinion of the wisdom of himself and the Tyrians, as though superior to that of Daniel, whose fame had reached even Tyre as eclipsing the Chaldean sages. "Thou art wiser," viz., in thy own opinion (Zechariah 9. 2). no secret—viz., forgetting riches (v. 4). that they can hide—i. e., that can be hidden. 5. (Psalm 62. 10.) 6. Because, &c.—resumptive of v. 2. 7. therefore—apodosis. strangers . . . terrible of the nations—the Chaldean foreigners noted for their ferocity (ch. 30. 11; 31. 12). against the beauty of thy wisdom—i. e., against thy beautiful possessions acquired by thy wisdom on which thou so pridest thyself (v. 3-5). defile thy brightness—obscure the brightness of thy kingdom. 8. the pit i. e., the bottom of the sea; the image being that of one conquered in a sea-fight. the deaths—plural, as various kinds of deaths are meant (Jeremiah 16. 4). of them . . . slain—lit., pierced through. Such deaths as those pierced with many wounds die. 9. yet say—i. e., still say; referring to v. 2. but, &c.—but thy blasphemous boastings shall be falsified, and thou shalt be shown to be but man, and not God, in the hand (at the mercy) of Him, &c. 10. deaths of . . . uncircumcised—i. e., such a death as the uncircumcised or godless heathen deserve; and perhaps, also, such as the uncircumcised inflict, a great ignominy in the eyes of a Jew (1 Samuel 31. 4); a fit retribution on him who had scoffed at the circumcised Jews. 12. sealest up the sum—lit., "Thou art the one sealing the sum of perfection." A thing is sealed when completed (Daniel 9. 24). "The sum" implies the full measure of beauty, from a Hebrew root, "to measure." The normal man—one formed after accurate rule. 13. in Eden—the king of Tyre is represented in his former high state (contrasted with his subsequent downfall), under images drawn from the primeval man in Eden, the type of humanity in its most God-like form. garden of God—the model of ideal loveliness (ch. 31. 8, 9; 36. 35). In the person of the king of Tyre a new trial was made of humanity with the greatest earthly advantages. But as in the case of Adam the good gifts of God were only turned into ministers to pride and self. every precious stone—so in Eden (Genesis 2. 12), "gold, bdellium, and the onyx stone." So the king of Tyre was arrayed in jewel-be-spangled robes after the fashion of Oriental monarchs.

The nine precious stones here mentioned answer to nine of the twelve (representing the twelve tribes) in the high priest's breastplate (Exodus 39. 10-13; Revelation 21. 14, 19-21). Of the four rows of three in each, the third is omitted in the Hebrew, but is supplied in the LXX. In this, too, there is an ulterior reference to Antichrist, who is blasphemously to arrogate the office of our Divine High Priest (Zechariah 6. 13). tabrets—tambourines. pipes—lit., holes in musical pipes or flutes. created—i. e., in the day of thine accession to the throne. Tambourines and all the marks of joy were ready prepared for thee ("in thee," i. e. with and for thee). Thou hadst not, like others, to work thy way to the throne through arduous struggles. No sooner created than, like Adam, thou wast surrounded with the gratifications of Eden. FAIRBAIRN, for "pipes," translates, "females" (having reference to Genesis 1. 27), i. e., musician-women. MAURER explains the Hebrew not as to music, but as to the setting and mounting of the gems previously mentioned. 14. anointed cherub—GESENIUS translates from an Aramaic root, "extended cherub." English Version, from a Hebrew root, is better. "The cherub consecrated to the Lord by the anointing oil." [FAIRBAIRN.] covereth—The imagery employed by Ezekiel as a priest is from the Jewish temple, wherein the cherubim overshadowed the mercy-seat, as the king of Tyre, a demi-god in his own esteem, extended his protection over the interests of Tyre. The cherub—an ideal compound of the highest kinds of animal existence, and the type of redeemed man in his ultimate state of perfection—is made the image of the king of Tyre, as if the beau ideal of humanity. The pretensions of Antichrist are the ulterior reference, of whom the king of Tyre is a type. Cf. "As God . . . in the temple of God" (2 Thessalonians 2. 4). I have set thee—not thou set thyself (Proverbs 8. 16; Romans 13. 1). upon the holy mountain of God—Zion; following up the image. in . . . midst of stones of fire—in ambitious imagination he stood in the place of God, "under whose feet was as it were a pavement of sapphire," whilst His glory was like "devouring fire" (Exodus 24. 10, 17). 15. perfect—prosperous [GROTIUS], and having no defect. So Hiram was a sample of the Tyrian monarch in his early days of wisdom and prosperity (1 Kings 5. 7, &c.). till iniquity . . . in thee—like the primeval man thou hast fallen by abusing God's gifts, and so hast provoked God's wrath. 16. filled the midst of thee—i. e., they have filled the midst of the city; he as the head of the state being involved in the guilt of the state, which he did not check, but fostered. cast thee as profane—no longer treated as sacred, but driven out of the place of sanctity (see v. 14) which thou hast occupied (cf. Psalm 89. 39). 17. brightness—thy splendour. lay thee before kings—as an example of God's wrath against presumptuous pride. 18. thy sanctuaries—i. e., the holy places, attributed to the king of Tyre in v. 14, as his ideal position. As he "profaned" it, so God will "profane" him (v. 16). fire . . . devour—as he abused his supposed elevation amidst "the stones of fire" (v. 16), so God will make His "fire" to "devour" him. 21. Zidon—famous for its fishery (from a root, Zud, "to fish"); and afterwards for its wide-extended commerce; its artistic elegance was proverbial. Founded by Canaan's first-born (Genesis 10. 15). Tyre was an offshoot from it, so that it was involved in the same overthrow by the Chaldeans as Tyre. It is mentioned separately, because its idolatry (Ashtaroth, Tammuz or Adonis) infected Israel more than that of Tyre did (ch. 8; Judges 10. 6; 1 Kings 11. 33). The notorious Jezebel was a daughter of the Zidonian king. shall be sanctified in her—when all nations shall see that I am the Holy Judge in the vengeance that I will inflict on her for sin. 24. no more . . . brier . . . unto . . . Israel—as the idolatrous nations left in Canaan (among which Zidon is expressly specified in the limits of Asher, Judges 1. 31) had been (Numbers 33. 55; Joshua 23. 13). "A brier," first ensnaring the Israelites in sin, and then being made the instrument of punishing them. pricking—lit., "causing bitterness." The same Hebrew is translated, "fretting" (Leviticus 13. 51, 52). The wicked are often called "thorns" (2 Samuel 23. 6). 25, 26. Fulfilled in part at the restoration from Babylon, when Judaism, so far from being merged in heathenism, made inroads by conversions on the idolatry of surrounding nations. The full accomplishment is yet future, when Israel, under Christ, shall be the centre of Christendom; of which an earnest was given in the woman from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon who sought the Saviour (Matthew 15, 21, 24, 26-28; cf. Isaiah 11, 12). dwelt safely—(Jeremiah 23, 6.)

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1-21. THE JUDGMENT ON EGYPT BY NEBUCHADNEZZAR; THOUGH ABOUT TO BE RESTORED AFTER FORTY YEARS, IT WAS STILL TO BE IN A STATE OF DEGRADATION. This is the last of the world-kingdoms against which Ezekiel's prophecies are directed, and occupies the largest space in them, viz., the next four chapters. Though farther off than Tyre, it exercised a more powerful influence on Israel. 2. Pharaoh—a common name of all the kings of Egypt, meaning the sun; or, as others say, a crocodile, which was worshipped in parts of Egypt (cf. v. 3). Hophra or Apries was on the throne at this time. His reign began prosperously. He took Gaza (Jeremiah 47, 1) and Zidon, and made himself master of Phœnicia and Palestine, recovering much that was lost to Egypt by the victory of Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish (2 Kings 24, 7; Jeremiah 46, 2), in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. [WILKINSON'S Ancient Egypt, 1, 169.] So proudly secure because of his successes for twenty-five years did he feel, that he said not even a god could deprive him of his kingdom. [HERODOTUS, 2, 169.] Hence the appropriateness of the description of him in v. 3. No mere human sagacity could have enabled Ezekiel to foresee Egypt's downfall in the height of its prosperity. There are four divisions of these prophecies; the first in the tenth year of Ezekiel's captivity; the last in the twelfth. Between the first and second comes one of much later date, not having been given till the twenty-seventh year (ch. 29, 17; 30, 19), but placed there as appropriate to the subject-matter. Pharaoh-hophra or Apries was dethroned and strangled, and Amasis substituted as king, by Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Jeremiah 44, 30). The Egyptian priests, from national vanity, made no mention to HERODOTUS of the Egyptian loss of territory in Syria through Nebuchadnezzar, of which JOSEPHUS tells us, but attributed the change in the succession from Apries to Amasis solely to the Egyptian soldiery. The civil war between the two rivals no doubt lasted several years, affording an opportunity to Nebuchadnezzar of interfering and of elevating the usurper Amasis, on condition of his becoming tributary to Babylon. [WILKINSON.] Cf. Jeremiah 43, 10-12, and my note, v. 13, for another view of the grounds of interference of Nebuchadnezzar. 3. dragon—Hebrew, tanim, any large aquatic animal, here the crocodile, which on Roman coins is the emblem of Egypt. lieth—rested proudly secure, his rivers—the mouths, branches, and canals of the Nile, to which Egypt owed its fertility. 3. hooks in thy jaws—(Isalah 37, 29; cf. Job 41, 1, 2.) Amasis was the "hook." In the Assyrian sculptures prisoners are represented with a hook in the under lip, and a cord from it held by the king. cause . . . fish . . . stick unto . . . scales—Pharaoh, presuming on his power as if he were God (v. 3, "I have made it"), wished to stand in the stead of God as defender of the covenant people, his motive being, not love to them, but rivalry with Babylon. He raised the siege of Jerusalem, but it was only for a time (cf. v. 6; Jeremiah 37, 5, 7-10); ruin overtook not only them, but himself. As the fish that clung to the horny scales of the crocodile, the lord of the Nile, when he was caught, shared his fate, so the adherents of Pharaoh, lord of Egypt, when he was overthrown by Amasis, should share his fate. 5. wilderness—captivity beyond thy kingdom. The expression is used perhaps to imply retribution in kind. As Egypt pursued after Israel saying, "The wilderness hath shut them in" (Exodus 14, 3), so herself shall be brought into a wilderness state, open fields—lit., "face of the field," not be brought together—as the crocodile is not, when caught, restored to the river, so no remnant

of thy routed army shall be brought together, and rallied, after its defeat in the wilderness. Pharaoh led an army against Cyrene in Africa, in support of Aricranes, who had been stripped of his kingdom by the Cyrenians. The army perished and Egypt rebelled against him. [JUNIUS.] But the reference is mainly to the defeat by Nebuchadnezzar. beasts . . . fowls—hostile and savage men. 6. staff of reed to . . . Israel—alluding to the reeds on the banks of the Nile, on which if one leaned they broke (Note, v. 4; Isalah 36, 6). All Israel's dependence on Egypt proved hurtful instead of beneficial (Isalah 30, 1-5). 7. hand—or handle of the reed. rend . . . shoulder—by the splinters on which the shoulder or arm would fall, on the support failing the hand. madest . . . loins . . . at a stand—i. e., made them to be disabled. MAURER somewhat similarly (referring to a kindred Arabic form), "Thou hast stricken both their loins." FAIRBAIRN, not so well, "Thou lettest all their loins stand," i. e., by themselves, be left of the support which they looked for from thee. 8. a sword—Nebuchadnezzar's army (v. 19). Also Amasis and the Egyptian revolters who after Pharaoh-hophra's discomfiture in Cyrene dethroned and strangled him, having defeated him in a battle fought at Memphis. [JUNIUS.] 9. I am the Lord—in antithesis to the blasphemous boast repeated here from v. 3, "The river is mine, and I have made it." 10. from the tower of Syene—GROTIUS translates, "from Migdol (a fortress near Pelusium on the north of Suez) to Syene" (in the farthest south); i. e., from one end of Egypt to the other. So in ch. 30, 6, Margin. However, English Version rightly refers Syene to Seveneh, i. e., Sebennytus, in the eastern delta of the Nile, the capital of the Lower Egyptian kings. The Sebennyte Pharaohs, with the help of the Canaanites, who, as shepherds or merchants, ranged the desert of Suez, extended their borders beyond the narrow province east of the delta, to which they had been confined by the Pharaohs of Upper Egypt. The defeated party, in derision, named the Sebennyte or Lower Egyptians foreigners and shepherd kings (a shepherd being an abomination in Egypt, Genesis 46, 34). They were really a native dynasty. Thus, in English Version, "Ethiopia" in the extreme south is rightly contrasted with Sebennytus or Syene in the north. 11. forty years—answering to the forty years in which the Israelites, their former bondsmen, wandered in "the wilderness" (cf. Note, v. 5). JEROME remarks the number forty is one often connected with affliction and judgment. The rains of the flood in forty days brought destruction on the world. Moses, Elias and the Saviour fasted forty days. The interval between Egypt's overthrow by Nebuchadnezzar, and the deliverance by Cyrus, was about forty years. The ideal forty years' wilderness state of social and political degradation, rather than a literal non-passing of man or beast for that term, is mainly intended (so ch. 4, 6; Isalah 19, 2, 11). 12. As Israel passed through a term of wilderness discipline (cf. ch. 20, 35, &c.), which was in its essential features to be repeated again, so it was to be with Egypt. [FAIRBAIRN.] Some Egyptians were to be carried to Babylon, also many "scattered" in Arabia and Ethiopia through fear; but mainly the "scattering" was to be the dissipation of their power, even though the people still remained in their own land. 13. (Jeremiah 46, 26.) 14. Pathros—the Thebaid, or Upper Egypt, which had been especially harassed by Nebuchadnezzar (Nahum 3, 8, 10). The oldest part of Egypt as to civilization and art. The Thebaid was anciently called "Egypt" [ARISTOTLE]. Therefore it is called the "land of the Egyptians' birth" (Margin, for "habitation"). base kingdom—under Amasis it was made dependent on Babylon; humbled still more under Cambyses; and though somewhat raised under the Ptolemies, never has it regained its ancient pre-eminence. 16. Egypt, when restored, shall be so circumscribed in power that it shall be no longer an object of confidence to Israel, as formerly; e. g., as when, relying on it, Israel broke faith with Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 17, 13, 15, 16). which bringeth their iniquity to remembrance, when they shall look after them—rather, "while they (the Israelites) look to (or, turn after) them." [HENDERSON.] Israel's looking to Egypt, rather than to

God, causeth their iniquity (unfaithfulness to the covenant) to be remembered by God. 17. The departure from the chronological order occurs here only, among the prophecies as to foreign nations, in order to secure greater unity of subject. 18. no wages . . . for the service—i. e., in proportion to it and the time and labour which he expended on the siege of Tyre. Not that he actually failed in the siege (JEROME expressly states, from Assyrian histories, that Nebuchadnezzar succeeded); but, so much of the Tyrian resources had been exhausted, or transported to her colonies in ships, that little was left to compensate Nebuchadnezzar for his thirteen years' siege. every head . . . bald . . . shoulder . . . peeled—with carrying baskets of earth and stones for the siege-works. 19. multitude—not as FAIRBAIRN, "store;" but, he shall take away a multitude of captives out of Egypt. The success of Nebuchadnezzar is implied in Tyre's receiving a king from Babylon, probably one of her captives there, Merbal. take her soul . . . prey—lit., "spoil her spoil, prey her prey," i. e., as she spoiled other nations, so shall she herself be a spoil to Babylon. 20. because they wrought for me—the Chaldeans, fulfilling my will as to Tyre (cf. Jeremiah 25. 9). 21. In the evil only, not in the good, was Egypt to be parallel to Israel. The very downfall of Egypt will be the signal for the rise of Israel, because of God's covenant with the latter. I cause the horn of . . . Israel to bud—(Psalm 132. 17.) I will cause its ancient glory to revive: an earnest of Israel's full glory under Messiah, the son of David (Luke 1. 69). Even in Babylon an earnest was given of this in Daniel (Daniel 6. 2) and Jecooniah (Jeremiah 52. 31). I will give thee . . . opening of . . . mouth—When thy predictions shall have come to pass, thy words henceforth shall be more heeded (cf. ch. 24. 27).

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 1-26. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECIES AGAINST EGYPT. Two distinct messages: (1.) From v. 1 to 19, a repetition of ch. 29. 1-16, with fuller details of lifelike distinctness. The date is probably not long after that mentioned in ch. 29. 17; on the eve of Nebuchadnezzar's march against Egypt after subjugating Tyre. (2.) A vision relating directly to Pharaoh and the overthrow of his kingdom; communicated at an earlier date, the seventh of the first month of the eleventh year. Not a year after the date in ch. 29. 1, and three months before the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. 2. Woe worth the day!—i. e., Alas for the day! 3. the time of the heathen—viz., for taking vengeance on them. The judgment on Egypt is the beginning of a world-wide judgment on all the heathen enemies of God (Joel 1. 15; 2. 1, 2, 3; Obadiah 15). 4. pain—lit., pangs with trembling as of a woman in childbirth. 5. the mingled people—the mercenary troops of Egypt from various lands, mostly from the interior of Africa (cf. ch. 27. 10; Jeremiah 25. 20, 24; 46. 9, 21). Chub—the people named Kufa on the monuments [HAVERNICK], a people considerably north of Palestine [WILKINSON]; Coba or Chobat, a city of Mauritania. [MAURER.] men of the land that is in league—too definite an expression to mean merely, men in league with Egypt; rather, "sons of the land of the covenant," i. e., the Jews who migrated to Egypt and carried Jeremiah with them (Jeremiah 42.-44). Even they shall not escape (Jeremiah 42. 22; 44. 14). 6. from the tower of Syene—(see Note, ch. 29. 10). 7. in the midst of . . . countries . . . desolate—Egypt shall fare no better than they (ch. 29. 10). 9. messengers . . . in ships to . . . Ethiopians (Isaiah 18. 1, 2) The cataracts interposing between them and Egypt should not save them. Egyptians "feeling from before me" in my execution of judgment, as "messengers" in "skiffs" ("vessels of bulrushes," Isaiah 18. 2) shall go up the Nile as far as navigable, to announce the advance of the Chaldeans, as in the day of Egypt—The day of Ethiopia's "pain" shall come shortly, as Egypt's day came. 10. the multitude—the large population. 12. rivers—the artificial canals made from the Nile for irrigation. The drying up of these would cause scarcity of grain, and so prepare the way for the invaders (Isaiah 19. 5-10). 13. Noph—Memphis, the capital of Middle Egypt, and the stronghold of "idols." Though no record exists of Nebuchadnezzar's "destroying" these, we know from HERODOTUS, &c., that Cambyses took Pelusium, the key of Egypt, by placing before his army dogs, cats, &c., all held sacred in Egypt, so that no Egyptian would use any weapon against them. He slew Apis, the sacred ox, and burnt other idols of Egypt. no more a prince—referring to the anarchy that prevailed in the civil wars between Apries and Amasis at the time of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion. There shall no more be a prince of the land of Egypt, ruling the whole country; or, no independent prince. 14. Pathros—Upper Egypt, with "No" or Thebes its capital (famed for its stupendous buildings, of which grand ruins remain), in antithesis to Zoan or Tanis, a chief city in Lower Egypt, within the Delta. 15. Sin—i. e., Pelusium, the frontier fortress on the north-east, therefore called "the strength (i. e., the key) of Egypt." It stands in antithesis to No or Thebes at the opposite end of Egypt; i. e., I will afflict Egypt from one end to the other. 16. distresses daily—MAURER translates, "enemies during the day," i. e., open enemies who do not wait for the covert of night to make their attacks (cf. Jeremiah 6. 4; 15. 8). However, the Hebrew, though rarely, is sometimes rendered (see Psalm 13. 2) as in English Version. 17. Aven—meaning vanity or iniquity; applied, by a slight change of the Hebrew name, to On or Heliopolis, in allusion to its idolatry. Here stood the temple of the sun, whence it was called in Hebrew, Beth-shemesh (Jeremiah 43. 13). The Egyptian hieroglyphics call it "Rē Athom," the sun, the father of the gods, being impersonation in Athom or Adam, the father of mankind. Pi-beseth—i. e., Bubastis, in Lower Egypt, near the Pelusiac branch of the Nile: notorious for the worship of the goddess of the same name (Coptic, Pashu), the granite stones of whose temple still attest its former magnificence. these cities—rather, as LXX., the women," viz., of Aven and Pi-beseth, in antithesis to "the young men." So in v. 18, "daughters shall go into captivity." [MAURER.] 18. Tehaphnehes—called from the queen of Egypt mentioned in 1 Kings 11. 19. The same as Daphne, near Pelusium, a royal residence of the Pharaohs (Jeremiah 43. 7, 9). Called Hanes (Isaiah 30. 4). break . . . the yokes of Egypt—i. e., the tyrannical supremacy which she exercised over other nations. Cf. "bands of their yoke" (ch. 34. 7). a cloud—viz., of calamity. 20. Here begins the earlier vision, not long after that in ch. 29., about three months before the taking of Jerusalem, as to Pharaoh and his kingdom. 21. broken . . . arm of Pharaoh—(Psalm 37. 17; Jeremiah 48. 25.) Referring to the defeat which Pharaoh-hophra sustained from the Chaldeans, when trying to raise the siege of Jerusalem (Jeremiah 37. 5, 7); and previously to the deprivation of Pharaoh-necho of all his conquests from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates (2 Kings 24. 7; Jeremiah 46. 2); also to the Egyptian disaster in Cyrene. 22. arms—not only the "one arm" broken already (v. 21) was not to be healed, but the other two should be broken. Not a corporal wound, but a breaking of the power of Pharaoh is intended. cause . . . sword to fall out of . . . hand—deprive him of the resources of making war.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1-18. THE OVERTHROW OF EGYPT ILLUSTRATED BY THAT OF ASSYRIA. Not that Egypt was, like Assyria, utterly to cease to be, but it was, like Assyria, to lose its prominence in the empire of the world. 1. third month—two months later than the prophecy delivered in ch. 30. 2. Whom art thou like—the answer is, Thou art like the haughty king of Assyria; as he was overthrown by the Chaldeans, so shalt thou be by the same. 3. He illustrates the pride and the consequent overthrow of the Assyrian, that Egypt may the better know what she must expect. cedar in Lebanon—often eighty feet high, and the diameter of the space covered by its boughs still greater: the symmetry perfect. Cf. the similar image (ch. 17. 3; Daniel 4. 20-22), with a shadowing shroud—with an overshadowing thicket. top . . . among . . . thick boughs—rather [HENGSTENBERG], "among the clouds."

But English Version agrees better with the Hebrew. The top, or topmost shoot, represents the king; the thick boughs, the large resources of the empire. 4. waters . . . little rivers—the Tigris with its branches and rivulets, or conduits for irrigation, the source of Assyria's fertility. "The deep" is the ever-flowing water, never dry. Metaphorically, for Assyria's resources, as the "conduits" are her colonies. 5. when he shot forth—because of the abundant moisture which nourished him in shooting forth. But see Margin. 6. fowls . . . made . . . nests in . . . boughs—so ch. 17. 23; Daniel 4. 12. The gospel-kingdom shall gather all under its covert, for their good and for the glory of God, which the world-kingdoms did for evil and for self-aggrandizement (Matthew 13. 32). 8. cedars . . . could not hide him—could not out-top him. No other king eclipsed him. garden of God—as in the case of Tyre (ch. 23. 13), the imagery, that is applied to the Assyrian king, is taken from Eden; peculiarly appropriate, as Eden was watered by rivers that afterwards watered Assyria (Genesis 2. 10-14). This cedar seemed to revive in itself all the glories of paradise, so that no tree there out-topped it. were not like—were not comparable to. 9. I made him—It was all due to my free grace. 10. thou . . . he—the change of persons is because the language refers partly to the cedar, partly to the person signified by the cedar. 11. Here the literal supersedes the figurative. shall surely deal with him—according to his own pleasure, and according to the Assyrian's (Sardanapalus) desert. Nebuchadnezzar is called "The mighty one" (El, a name of God), because he was God's representative and instrument of judgment (Daniel 2. 37, 38). 12. from his shadow—under which they had formerly dwelt as their covert (v. 6). 13. Birds and beasts shall insult over his fallen trunk. 14. trees by the waters—i. e., that are plentifully supplied by the waters: nations abounding in resources. stand up in their height—i. e., trust in their height: stand upon it as their ground of confidence. FAIRBAIRN points the Hebrew differently, so as for "their trees," to translate, "(And that none that drink water may stand) on themselves, (because of their greatness)."
But the usual reading is better, as Assyria and the confederate states throughout are compared to strong trees. The clause, "All that drink water," marks the ground of the trees' confidence "in their height," viz., that they have ample sources of supply. MAURER, retaining the same Hebrew, translates, "that neither their terebinth trees may stand up in their height, nor all (the other trees) that drink water." to . . . nether . . . earth . . . pit—(Ch. 32. 13; Psalm 82. 7.) 15. covered the deep—as mourners cover their heads in token of mourning, "I made the deep that watered the cedar" to wrap itself in mourning for him. The waters of the deep are the tributary peoples of Assyria (Revelation 17. 15). fainted—lit., were faintness (itself); more forcible than the verb. 16. hell—Sheol or Hades, the unseen world: equivalent to, "I cast him into oblivion" (cf. Isaiah 14. 9-11). shall be comforted—because so great a king as the Assyrian is brought down to a level with them. It is a kind of consolation to the wretched to have companions in misery. 17. his arm, that dwelt under his shadow—those who were the helpers or tool of his tyranny, and therefore enjoyed his protection (e. g., Syria and her neighbours). These were sure to share her fate. Cf. the same phrase as to the Jews living under the protection of their king (Lamentations 4. 20); both alike "making flesh their arm, and in heart departing from the Lord" (Jeremiah 17. 5). 18. Application of the parabolic description of Assyria to the parallel case of Egypt. "All that has been said of the Assyrian consider as said to thyself. To whom art thou so like, as thou art to the Assyrian? To none." The lesson on a gigantic scale of Eden-like privileges abused to pride and sin by the Assyrian, as in the case of the first man in Eden, ending in ruin, was to be repeated in Egypt's case. For the unchangeable God governs the world on the same unchangeable principles. thou shalt lie in . . . uncircumcised—As circumcision was an object of mocking to thee, thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised, slain by their sword. [GROTUS.] Retribution in kind (ch. 23. 10). This is

Pharaoh—Pharaoh's end shall be the same humiliating one as I have depicted the Assyrian's to have been. "This" is demonstrative, as if he were pointing with the finger to Pharaoh lying prostrate, a spectacle to all, as on the shore of the Red Sea (Exodus 14. 30, 31).

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 1-32. TWO ELEGIES OVER PHARAOH, ONE DELIVERED ON THE FIRST DAY (v. 1), THE OTHER ON THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF THE SAME MONTH, THE TWELFTH OF THE TWELFTH YEAR. 1. The twelfth year from the carrying away of Jehoiachin; Jerusalem was by this time overthrown, and Amasis was beginning his revolt against Pharaoh-hopra. 2. Pharaoh—Phra in Burmah, signifies the king, high priest, and idol. whale—rather, any monster of the waters; here, the crocodile of the Niles. Pharaoh is as a lion on dry land, a crocodile in the waters; i. e., an object of terror everywhere. camest forth with thy rivers—"brestest forth," [FAIRBAIRN.] The antithesis of "seas" and "rivers" favours GROTIVS' rendering, "Thou camest forth from the sea into the rivers;" i. e., from thy own empire into other states. However, English Version is favoured by the "thy;" thou camest forth with thy rivers (i. e., with thy forces) and with thy feet didst fall irrevocably; so Israel, once desolate, trouble the waters (i. e., neighbouring states). 3. with a company of many people—viz., the Chaldeans (ch. 23. 3, 4; Hosea 7. 12). my net—for they are my instrument. 4. leave thee upon the land—as a fish drawn out of the water loses all its strength, so Pharaoh (in v. 3, compared to a water monster) shall be (ch. 29. 5). 5. thy height—thy hugeness. [FAIRBAIRN.] The great heap of corpses of thy forces, on which thou pridest thyself. "Height" may refer to mental elevation, as well as bodily. [VATABLUS.] 6. land wherein thou swimmest—Egypt: the land watered by the Nile, the source of its fertility, wherein thou swimmest (carrying on the image of the crocodile, i. e., wherein thou dost exercise thy wanton power at will). Irony. The land shall still afford seas to swim in, but they shall be seas of blood. Alluding to the plague (Exodus 7. 19; Revelation 8. 8). HAVERNICK translates, "I will water the land with what flows from thee, even thy blood, reaching to the mountains;" "with thy blood overflowing even to the mountains." Perhaps this is better. 7. put thee out—extinguish thy light (Job 18. 5). Pharaoh is represented as a bright star, at the extinguishing of whose light in the political sky the whole heavenly host are shrouded in sympathetic darkness. Here, too, as in v. 6, there is an allusion to the supernatural darkness sent formerly (Exodus 10. 21-23). The heavenly bodies are often made images of earthly dynasties (Isalah 13. 10; Matthew 24. 29). 9. thy destruction—i. e., tidings of thy destruction (lit., thy breakage) carried by captive and dispersed Egyptians "among the nations" [GROTIVS]; or, thy broken people, resembling one great fracture, the ruins of what they had been. [FAIRBAIRN.] 10. brandish . . . sword before them—lit., in their faces, or sight. 13. (See Note on ch. 29. 11.) The picture is ideally true, not to be interpreted by the letter. The political ascendancy of Egypt was to cease with the Chaldean conquest. [FAIRBAIRN.] Henceforth Pharaoh must figuratively no longer trouble the waters by man or beast, i. e., no longer was he to flood other peoples with his overwhelming forces. 14. make their waters deep—rather, "make . . . to subside," lit., sink. [FAIRBAIRN.] like oil—emblem of quietness. No longer shall they descend violently as the overflowing Nile on other countries, but shall be still and sluggish in political action. 16. As in ch. 19. 14. This is a prophetic lamentation; yet so it shall come to pass. [GROTIVS.] 17. The second lamentation for Pharaoh. This funeral dirge in imagination accompanies him to the unseen world. Egypt personified in its political head is ideally represented as undergoing the change by death to which man is liable. Expressing that Egypt's supremacy is no more, a thing of the past, never to be again. the month—the twelfth month (v. 1); fourteen days after the former vision. 18. cast them down—i. e., predict that they shall be cast down (so Jeremiah 1. 10). The

prophet's word was God's, and carried with it its own fulfilment. daughters of . . . nations—i. e., the nations with their peoples. Egypt is to share the fate of other ancient nations once famous, now consigned to oblivion: Elam (v. 24), Meshech, &c. (v. 26), Edom (v. 29), Zidon (v. 30). 19. Whom dost thou pass in beauty?—Beautiful as thou art, thou art not more so than other nations, which nevertheless have perished. go down, &c.—to the nether world, where all "beauty" is speedily marred. 20. she is delivered to the sword—viz., by God. draw her—as if addressing her executioners: drag her forth to death. 21. (Ch. 31. 16.) Ezekiel has before his eyes Isaiah 14. 9, &c. shall speak to him—with "him" join, "with them that help him;" shall speak to him and his helpers with a taunting welcome, as now one of themselves. 22. her . . . his—the abrupt change of gender is, because Ezekiel has in view at one time the kingdom (feminine), at another the monarch "Asshur," or Assyria, is placed first in punishment, as being first in guilt. 23. in the sides of the pit—Sepulchres in the East were caves hollowed out of the rock, and the bodies were laid in niches formed at the sides. MAURER needlessly departs from the ordinary meaning, and translates, "extremities" (cf. Isaiah 14. 13, 15). which caused terror—they who alive were a terror to others, are now, in the nether world, themselves a terrible object to behold. 24. Elam—placed next, as having been an auxiliary to Assyria. Its territory lay in Persia. In Abraham's time an independent kingdom (Genesis 14. 1). Famous for its bowmen (Isaiah 22. 6). borne their shame—the just retribution of their lawless pride. Destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (Jeremiah 49. 34-38). 25. a bed—a sepulchral niche. all . . . slain by . . . sword, &c.—(v. 21, 23, 24). The very monotony of the phraseology gives to the dirge an awe-inspiring effect. 26. Meshech, Tubal—northern nations: the Moschi and Tibareni, between the Black and Caspian Seas. HERODOTUS, 3. 94, mentions them as a subjugated people, tributaries to Darius Hystaspes (see ch. 27. 13). 27. they shall not lie with the mighty—i. e., they shall not have separate tombs such as mighty conquerors have: but shall all be heaped together in one pit, as is the case with the vanquished. [GROTIUS.] HAVERNICK reads it interrogatively, "Shall they not lie with the mighty that are fallen?" But English Version is supported by the parallel (Isaiah 14. 18, 19), to which Ezekiel refers, and which represents them as not lying as mighty kings lie in a grave, but cast out of one, as a carcass trodden under foot. with . . . weapons of war—alluding to the custom of burying warriors with their arms (1 Maccabees 13. 29). Though honoured by the laying of "their swords under their heads," yet the punishment of "their iniquities shall be upon their bones." Their swords shall thus attest their shame, not their glory (Matthew 26. 52), being the instruments of their violence, the penalty of which they are paying. 28. Yea, thou—Thou, too, Egypt, like them, shalt lie as one vanquished. 29. princes—Edom was not only governed by kings, but by subordinate "princes" or "dukes" (Genesis 36. 40). with their might—notwithstanding their might, they shall be brought down (Isaiah 34. 5, 10-17; Jeremiah 49. 7, 13-18). lie with the uncircumcised—though Edom was circumcised, being descended from Isaac, he shall lie with the uncircumcised, much more shall Egypt, who had no hereditary right to circumcision. 30. princes of the north—Syria, which is still called by the Arabs the north; or the Tyrrians, north of Palestine, conquered by Nebuchadnezzar (chs. 26., 27., 28). [GROTIUS.] Zidonians—who shared the fate of Tyre (ch. 28. 21). with their terror they are ashamed of their might—i. e., notwithstanding the terror which they inspired in their contemporaries. "Might" is connected by MAURER thus, "Notwithstanding the terror which resulted from their might." 31. comforted—with the melancholy satisfaction of not being alone, but of having other kingdoms companions in his downfall. This shall be his only comfort—a very poor one! 32. my terror—the reading of the Margin or Kerl. The Hebrew text or Chetib is "his terror," which gives good sense (v. 23, 30). "My terror" implies that God puts His terror on Pharaoh's multitude, as they put "their terror" on others,

e. g., under Pharaoh-necho on Judea. As "the land of the living" was the scene of "their terror," so it shall be God's; especially in Judea He will display His glory to the terror of Israel's foes (ch. 26. 20). In Israel's case the judgment is temporary, ending in their future restoration under Messiah. In the case of the world-kingsdoms which flourished for a time, they fall to rise no more.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 1-33. RENEWAL OF EZEKIEL'S COMMISSION, NOW THAT HE IS AGAIN TO ADDRESS HIS COUNTRYMEN, AND IN A NEW TONE. Heretofore his functions had been chiefly threatening; from this point, after the evil had got to its worst in the overthrow of Jerusalem, the consolatory element preponderates. 2. to the children of thy people—whom he had been forbidden to address from ch. 24. 26, 27, till Jerusalem was overthrown, and the "escaped" came with tidings of the judgment being completed. So now, in v. 21, the tidings of the fact having arrived, he opens his heretofore closed lips to the Jews. In the interval he had prophesied as to foreign nations. The former part of the chapter, from v. 2 to 20, seems to have been imparted to Ezekiel on the evening previous (v. 22), being a preparation for the latter part (v. 23-33) imparted after the tidings had come. This accounts for the first part standing without intimation of the date, which was properly reserved for the latter part, to which the former was the anticipatory introduction. [FAIRBAIRN.] watchman—the first nine verses exhibit Ezekiel's office as a spiritual watchman; so in ch. 3. 16-21; only here the duties of the earthly watchman (cf. 2 Samuel 18. 24, 25; 2 Kings 9. 17) are detailed first, and then the application is made to the spiritual watchman's duty (cf. Isaiah 21. 6-10; Hosea 9. 8; Habakkuk 2. 1). "A man of their coasts" is a man specially chosen for the office out of their whole number. So Judges 18. 2, "five men from their coasts;" also the Hebrew of Genesis 47. 2; implying the care needed in the choice of the watchman, the spiritual as well as the temporal (Acts 1. 21, 22, 24-26; 1 Timothy 5. 22). 3. the sword—invaders. An appropriate illustration at the time of the invasion of Judea by Nebuchadnezzar. 4. blood . . . upon his own head—metaphor from sacrificial victims, on the heads of which they used to lay their hands, praying that their guilt should be upon the victims. 6. his iniquity—his negligence in not maintaining constant watchfulness, as they ought to do who are in warfare. The thing signified here appears from under the image. 7. I have set thee a watchman—application of the image. Ezekiel's appointment to be a watchman spiritually is far more solemn, as it is derived from God, not from the people. 8. thou shalt surely die—by a violent death, the earnest of everlasting death; the qualification being supposed, "if thou dost not repent." 9. Blood had by this time been shed (v. 21), but Ezekiel was clear. 10. be upon us—i. e., their guilt remain on us. pine away in them—if we suffer the penalty threatened for them in ch. 24. 23, according to the law (Leviticus 26. 39). how should we . . . live?—as thou dost promise in v. 5 (cf. ch. 37. 11; Isaiah 49. 14). 11. To meet the Jews' cry of despair in v. 10, Ezekiel here cheers them by the assurance that God has no pleasure in their death, but that they should repent and live (2 Peter 3. 9). A yearning tenderness manifests itself here, notwithstanding all their past sins; yet with it a holiness that abates nothing of its demands for the honour of God's authority. God's righteousness is vindicated as in ch. 3. 18-21; and 18., by the statement that each should be treated with the closest adaptation of God's justice to his particular case. 12. not fall . . . in the day that he turneth—(2 Chronicles 7. 14; see ch. 3. 20; 18. 24). 15. give again that he had robbed—(Luke 19. 8). statutes of life—in the obeying of which life is promised (Leviticus 18. 5). If the law has failed to give life to man, it has not been the fault of the law, but of man's sinful inability to keep it (Romans 7. 10, 12; Galatians 3. 21). It becomes life-giving through Christ's righteous obedience to it (2 Corinthians 3. 6). 17. The way of the Lord—The Lord's way of dealing in His moral government. 21. twelfth year . . . tenth month—a year and a half after the capture of the city (Jeremiah 39. 2; 52, 5, 6), in the eleventh year and fourth month. The one who escaped (as foretold, ch. 24. 26) may have been so long on the road through fear of entering the enemy's country [HENDERSON]; or, the singular is used for the plural in a collective sense, "the escaped remnant." Cf. similar phrases, "the escaped of Moab," Isaiah 15. 9; "He that escapeth of them," Amos 9. 1. Naturally the reopening of the prophet's mouth for consolation would be deferred till the number of the escaped remnant was complete: the removal of such a large number would easily have occupied seventeen or eighteen months. 22. In the evening—(see Note, v. 2.) Thus the capture of Jerusalem was known to Ezekiel by revelation, before the messenger came. my mouth . . . no more dumb—viz., to my countrymen; as foretold (ch. 24. 27), He spake (v. 2-20) in the evening before the tidings came. 24. they that inhabit . . . wastes of . . . Israel—marking the blindness of the fraction of Jews under Gedaliah who, though dwelling amidst regions laid waste by the foe, still cherished hopes of deliverance, and this without repentance. Abraham was one . . . but we are many—If God gave the land for an inheritance to Abraham, who was but one (Isaiah 51. 2), much more it is given to us, who, though reduced, are still many. If he, with 318 servants, was able to defend himself amidst so many foes, much more shall we, so much more numerous, retain our own. The grant of the land was not for his sole use, but for his numerous posterity. Inherited the land—not actually possessed it (Acts 7. 5), but had the right of dwelling and pasturing his flocks in it. [GROTIUS.] The Jews boasted similarly of their Abrahamic descent in Matthew 3. 9; John 8. 39. 25. eat with the blood—in opposition to the law (Leviticus 19. 26; cf. Genesis 9. 4). They did so as an idolatrous rite. 26. Ye stand upon your sword—Your dependence is, not on right and equity, but on force and arms. every one—scarcely any one refrains from adultery. 27. shall fall by the sword—the very object of their confidence should be the instrument of their destruction. Thinking to "stand" by it, by it they shall "fall." Just retribution! Some fell by the sword of Ishmael; others by the Chaldeans in revenge for the murder of Gedaliah (Jeremiah 40. 44). caves—(Judges 6. 2; 1 Samuel 13. 6.) In the hilly parts of Judea there were caves almost inaccessible, as having only crooked and extremely narrow paths of ascent, with rock in front stretching down into the valleys beneath perpendicularly (JOSEPHUS, Jew. War, 1. 16. 4). 28. most desolate—(Jeremiah 4. 27; 12. 11.) none . . . pass through—from fear of wild beasts and pestilence. [GROTIUS.] 30. Not only the remnant in Judea, but those at the Chebar, though less flagrantly, betrayed the same unbelieving spirit. talking against thee—though going to the prophet to hear the word of the Lord, they criticised, in an unfriendly spirit, his peculiarities of manner and his enigmatical style (ch. 20. 49); making these the excuse for their impotence. Their talking was not directly "against" Ezekiel, for they professed to like his ministrations; but God's word speaks of things as they really are, not as they appear. by the walls—in the public haunts. In the East groups assemble under the walls of their houses in winter for conversation. in the doors—privately. what is the word—their motive was curiosity, seeking pastime and gratification of the ear (2 Timothy 4. 3); not reformation of the heart. Cf. Johanan's consultation of Jeremiah, to hear the word of the Lord without desiring to do it (Jeremiah 42. 43). 31. as the people cometh—i. e., in crowds, as disciples flock to their teacher. sit before thee—on lower seats at thy feet, according to the Jewish custom of pupils (Deuteronomy 33. 3; 2 Kings 4. 33; Luke 10. 39; Acts 22. 3). as my people—though they are not. hear . . . not do—(Matthew 13. 20, 21; James 1. 23, 24). they show much love—lit., make loves, i. e., act the part of lovers. Profess love to the Lord (Matthew 7. 21). GESENIUS translates, according to Arabic idiom, "They do the delights of God," i. e., all that is agreeable to God. Vulgate translates, "They turn thy words into a song of their mouths." heart goeth after . . . covetousness—the grand rival to the love of God; therefore called

"idolatry," and therefore associated with impure carnal love, as both alike transfer the heart's affection from the Creator to the creature (Matthew 13. 22; Ephesians 5. 5; 1 Timothy 6. 10). 32. very lovely song—lit., a "song of loves;" a lover's song. They praise thy eloquence, but care not for the subject of it as a real and personal thing; just as many do in the modern Church. [JEROME.] play well on an instrument—Hebrew singers accompanied the "voice" with the harp. 33. when this cometh to pass—when my predictions are verified. lo, it will come—rather, "lo it is come" (see v. 22). know—experimentally, and to their cost.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 1-31. REPROOF OF THE FALSE SHEPHERDS; PROMISE OF THE TRUE AND GOOD SHEPHERD. Having in ch. 33. laid down repentance as the necessary preliminary to happier times for the people, he now promises the removal of the false shepherds as preparatory to the raising up of the Good Shepherd. 2. Jeremiah 23. 1, and Zechariah 11. 17, similarly make the removal of the false shepherds the preliminary to the interposition of Messiah the Good Shepherd in behalf of His people Israel. The "shepherds" are not prophets or priests, but rulers who sought in their government their own selfish ends, not the good of the people ruled. The term was appropriate, as David the first king, and the type of the true David (v. 23, 24), was taken from being a shepherd (2 Samuel 5. 2; Psalm 78. 70, 71), and the office, like that of a shepherd for his flock, is to guard and provide for his people. The choice of a shepherd for the first king was therefore designed to suggest this thought, just as Jesus' selection of fishermen for apostles was designed to remind them of their spiritual office of catching men (cf. Isaiah 44. 28; Jeremiah 2. 8; 3. 15; 10. 21; 23. 1, 2). 3. fat—or, by differently pointing the Hebrew, "milk." [LXX.] Thus the repetition "fat" and "fed" is avoided: also the eating of "fat" would not probably be put before the "killing" of the sheep. The eating of sheep or goats' milk as food (Deuteronomy 32. 14; Proverbs 27. 27) was unobjectionable, had not these shepherds milked them too often, and that without duly "feeding" them. [BOCHART.] (Isaiah 56. 11). The rulers levied exorbitant tributes. kill . . . fed—kill the rich by false accusation so as to get possession of their property. feed not . . . flock—take no care of the people (John 10. 12). 4. The diseased—rather, those weak from the effects of "disease," as "strengthened" (i. e., with due nourishment) requires. [GROTIUS.] broken—i. e., fractures from wounds inflicted by the wolf. brought again . . . driven away—(Exodus 23. 4) Those "driven away" by the enemy into foreign lands through God's judgments are meant (Jeremiah 23. 3). A spiritual reformation of the state by the rulers would have turned away God's wrath, and "brought again" the exiles. The rulers are censured as chiefly guilty (though the people, too, were guilty), because they, who ought to have been foremost in checking the evil, promoted it. neither . . . sought . . . lost—contrast the Good Shepherd's love (Luke 15. 4). with force . . . ruled—(Exodus 1. 13, 14.) With an Egyptian bondage. The very thing forbidden by the law they did (Leviticus 25. 43; cf. 1 Peter 5. 3). 5. scattered, because . . . no shepherd—i. e., none worthy of the name, though there were some called shepherds (1 Kings 22. 17; Matthew 9. 36). Cf. Matthew 26. 31, where the sheep were scattered on the true Shepherd being smitten. God calls them "my sheep;" for they were not, as the shepherds treated them, their patrimony whereby to "feed themselves." meat to all . . . beasts—they became a prey to the Syrians, Ammon, Moab, and Assyria. 6. every high hill—the scene of their idolatres sanctioned by the rulers. search . . . seek—rather, seek . . . search. The former is the part of the superior rulers to inquire after: to search out is the duty of the subordinate rulers. [JUNIUS.] 10. I will require my flock—(Hebrews 13. 17), rather, "I require," &c., for God already had begun to do so, punishing Zedekiah and the other princes severely (Jeremiah 52. 10). I . . . will . . . search—doing that which the so-called shepherds had failed to do, I being the rightful owner of the flock. 12. in the day that he is among—in the midst of (Hebrew) his sheep that had been scattered. Referring to Messiah's second advent, when He shall be "the glory in the midst of Israel" (Zechariah 2, 5). in the cloudy . . . day—the day of the nation's calamity (Joel 2, 2). 13. (Ch. 28, 25; 33, 24; 37, 21, 22; Isaiah 65, 9, 10; Jeremiah 23, 3.) 14. good pasture—(Psalm 23, 2.) high mountains of Israel—In chs. 17, 23; 20, 40, the phrase is "the mountain of the height of Israel" in the singular number. The reason of the difference is, there Ezekiel spoke of the central seat of the kingdom, where the people met for the worship of Jehovah, Mount Zion; here, he speaks of the kingdom of Israel at large, all the parts of which are regarded as possessing a moral elevation. 15. In contrast to the unfaithful shepherds (v. 4). The several duties neglected by them I will faithfully discharge. fat . . . strong—i. e., those rendered wanton by prosperity (Deuteronomy 32, 15; Jeremiah 5, 28), who use their strength to oppress the weak. Cf. v. 20, "the fat cattle" (Isaiah 10, 16). The image is from fat cattle that wax refractory. with judgment—i. e., justice and equity, as contrasted with the "force" and "cruelty" with which the unfaithful shepherds ruled the flock (v. 4). 17. you . . . my flock—passing from the rulers to the people. cattle and cattle—rather, sheep and sheep; Margin, small cattle, or flocks of lambs and kids, i. e., I judge between one class of citizens and another, so as to award what is right to each. He then defines the class about to be punitively "judged," viz., "the rams and he-goats," or great he-goats (cf. Isaiah 14, 9, Margin; Zechariah 10, 3; Matthew 25, 32, 33). They answer to "the fat and strong," as opposed to the "sick" (v. 16). The rich and ungodly of the people are meant, who imitated the bad rulers in oppressing their poorer brethren, as if it enhanced their own joys to trample on others' rights (v. 18). 18, 19. Not content with appropriating to their own use the goods of others, they from mere wantonness spoiled what they did not use, so as to be of no use to the owners. deep waters—i. e., limpid, as deep waters are generally clear. GROTIUS explains the image as referring to the usuries with which the rich ground the poor (ch. 22, 12; Isaiah 24, 2). they eat—scantily. they drink—sorrowfully. 20. fat . . . lean—the rich oppressors . . . the humble poor. 21. scattered them abroad—down to the time of the carrying away to Babylon. [GROTIUS.] 22. After the restoration from Babylon the Jews were delivered in some degree from the oppression, not only of foreigners, but also of their own great people (Nehemiah 5, 1-19). The full and final fulfilment of this prophecy is future. 23. set up—i. e., raise up by Divine appointment; alluding to the declaration of God to David, "I will set up thy seed after thee" (2 Samuel 7, 12); and, "Yet have I set my king on my holy hill of Zion" (Psalm 2, 6; cf. Acts 2, 30; 13, 23). one Shepherd—lit., a Shepherd, one: singularly and pre-eminently one: the only one of His kind, to whom none is comparable (Song of Solomon 5, 10). The Lord Jesus refers to this prophecy (John 10, 14), "I am THE Good Shepherd." Also "one" as uniting in one the heretofore divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and also "gathering together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and on earth" (Ephesians 1, 10); thus healing worse breaches than that between Israel and Judah (Colossians 1, 20). "God by Him reconciling all things unto Himself, whether things in earth or in heaven." David—the antitypical David, Messiah, of the seed of David, which no other king after the captivity was: who was fully, what David was only in a degree, "the man after God's own heart." Also, David means beloved: Messiah was truly God's beloved Son (Isaiah 42, 1; Matthew 3, 17). Shepherd means King, rather than religious instructor; in this pre-eminently He was the true David, who was the Shepherd King (Luke 1, 32, 33). Messiah is called "David" in Isaiah 55, 3, 4; Jeremiah 30, 9; Hosea 3, 5. 24. my servant—implying fitness for ruling in the name of God, not pursuing a self-chosen course, as other kings, but acting as the faithful administrator of the will of God; Messiah realized fully this character (Psalm 40, 7, 8; Isaiah 42, 1; 49, 3, 6; 53, 11; Philippians 2, 7), which David typically and partially represented (Acts 13, 36); so He is the fittest person to wield the world-sceptre, abused by all the world-kings (Daniel 2, 34, 35, 44, 45). 25. covenant of peace . . . evil beasts . . . to cease . . . dwell safely—The original promise of the law (Leviticus 26, 6) shall be realized for the first time fully under Messiah (Isaiah 11, 6-9; 35, 9; Hosea 2, 18). 26. them and the places round about my hill—the Jews, and Zion, God's hill (Psalm 2, 6), are to be sources of blessing, not merely to themselves, but to the surrounding heathen (Isaiah 19, 24; 56, 6, 7; 60, 3; Micah 5, 7; Zechariah 8, 13). The literal fulfilment is, however, the primary one, though the spiritual also is designed. In correspondence with the settled reign of righteousness internally, all is to be prosperity externally, fertilizing showers (according to the promise of the ancient covenant, Leviticus 26, 4; Psalm 68, 9; Malachi 3, 10), and productive trees and lands (v. 27). Thus shall they realize the image of v. 14, viz., a flock richly pastured by God Himself. 27. served themselves of them—availed themselves of their services, as if the Jews were their slaves (Jeremiah 22, 13; 25, 14; cf. Genesis 15, 13; Exodus 1, 14). 28. dwell safely—(Jeremiah 23, 6.) 29. plant of renown—Messiah, the "Rod" and "Branch" (Isaiah 11, 1), the "righteous Branch" (Jeremiah 23, 5), who shall obtain for them "renown." FAIRBAIRN less probably translates, "A plantation for a name," i. e., a flourishing condition, represented as a garden (alluding to Eden, Genesis 2, 8-11, with its various trees, good for food and pleasant to the sight), the planting of the Lord (Isaiah 60, 21; 61, 3), and an object of "renown" among the heathen. 31. ye my flock . . . are men—not merely an explanation of the image, as JEROME represents, but as God had promised many things which mere "men" could not expect to realize, He shows that it is not from man's might their realization is to be looked for, but from God, who would perform them for His covenant-people, "His flock." [ROSENMULLER.] When we realize most our weakness, and God's power and faithfulness to His covenant, we are in the fittest state for receiving His blessings.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 1-15. JUDGMENT ON EDMO. Another feature of Israel's prosperity; those who exulted over Israel's humiliation, shall themselves be a "prey." Already stated in ch. 25, 12-14; properly repeated here in full detail, as a commentary on v. 23 of last chapter. The Israelites "shall be no more a prey;" but Edom, the type of their most bitter foes, shall be destroyed irrecoverably. 2. Mount Seir—i. e., Idumea (Genesis 36, 9). Singled out as badly pre-eminently in its bitterness against God's people, to represent all their enemies everywhere and in all ages. So in Isaiah 34, 5, and 63, 1-4, Edom, the region of the greatest enmity towards God's people, is the ideal scene of the final judgments of all God's foes. "Seir" means shaggy, alluding to its rugged hills and forests. 3. most desolate—lit., desolation and desolateness (Jeremiah 49, 17, &c.). It is only in their national character of foes to God's people, that the Edomites are to be utterly destroyed. A remnant of Edom, as of the other heathen, is to be "called by the name of God" (Amos 9, 12). 5. perpetual hatred—(Psalm 137, 7; Amos 1, 11; Obadiah 10-16.) Edom perpetuated the hereditary hatred derived from Esau against Jacob. shed the blood of, &c.—The lit. translation is better, "Thou hast poured out the children of Israel;" viz., like water. So Psalm 22, 14; 63, 10, Margin; Jeremiah 18, 21. Cf. 2 Samuel 14, 14. by the force of the sword—lit., "by" or "upon the hands of the sword;" the sword being personified as a devourer whose "hands" were the instruments of destruction. in the time that their iniquity had an end—i. e., had its consummation (ch. 21, 25, 29). Edom consummated his guilt when he exulted over Jerusalem's downfall, and helped the foe to destroy it (Psalm 137, 7; Obadiah 11). 6. I will prepare thee unto blood—I will expose thee to slaughter. sith—old English for "seeing that" or "since." thou hast not hated blood—The Hebrew order is, "thou hast hated not—blood;" i. e., thou couldst not bear to live without bloodshed. [GROTIUS.] There is a play on similar sounds in the Hebrew; Edom resembling dam, the Hebrew for "blood;" as Edom means red, the transition to blood is easy. Edom, akin to blood in name, so also in nature and acts; "blood therefore shall pursue thee." The measure which Edom meted to others should be meted to himself (Psalm 109. 17; Matthew 7. 2; 26. 52). cut off . . . him that passeth—i. e., every passer to and fro; "the highways shall be unoccupied" (ch. 29. 11; Judges 5. 6). 9. shall not return—to their former state (ch. 16. 55); shall not be restored. The Hebrew text (Chetib) reads, "shall not be inhabited" (cf. ch. 26. 20; Malachi 1. 3, 4). 10. So far from being allowed to enter on Israel's vacated inheritance, as Edom hoped (ch. 36. 5; Psalm 83. 4, 12; Obadiah 13), it shall be that he shall be deprived of his own; and whereas Israel's humiliation was temporary, Edom's shall be perpetual. Lord was there—(Ch. 48. 35; Psalm 48. 1, 3; 132. 13, 14.) Jehovah claimed Judea as His own, even when the Chaldeans had overthrown the state; they could not remove Him, as they did the idols of heathen lands. The broken sentences express the excited feelings of the prophet at Edom's wicked presumption. The transition from the "two nations and two countries" to "it" marks that the two are regarded as one whole. The last clause, "and Jehovah was there," bursts in, like a flash of lightning, reproving the wicked presumption of Edom's thought. 11. according to thine anger—(James 2. 13.) As thou in anger and envy hast injured them, so I will injure thee. I will make myself known among them—viz., the Israelites. I will manifest my favour to them, after that I have punished thee. 12, 13. blasphemies . . . against . . . Israel . . . against me—God regards what is done against His people as done against Himself (Matthew 25. 45; Acts 9. 2, 4, 5). Edom implied, if he did not express it, in his taunts against Israel, that God had not sufficient power to protect His people. A type of the spirit of all the foes of God and His people (1 Samuel 2. 3; Revelation 13. 6). 14. (Isaiah 65. 13, 14.) "The whole earth" refers to Judea and the nations that submit themselves to Judea's God; when these rejoice the foes of God and His people, represented by Edom as a nation, shall be desolate. Things shall be completely reversed; Israel, that now for a time mourns, shall then rejoice and for ever. Edom, that now rejoices over fallen Israel, shall then, when elsewhere all is joy, mourn, and for ever (Isaiah 65. 17-19; Matthew 5. 4; Luke 6. 25). HAVERNICK loses this striking antithesis by translating, "According to the joy of the whole land (of Edom), so I will make thee desolate;" which would make the next verse a mere repetition of this. 15. (Obadiah 12, 15.)

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Ver. 1-38. ISRAEL AVENGED OF HER FOES, AND RESTORED, FIRST TO INWARD HOLINESS, THEN TO OUTWARD PROSPERITY. The distinction between Israel and the heathen (as Edom) is, Israel has a covenant relation to God ensuring restoration after chastisement, so that the heathen's hope of getting possession of the elect people's inheritance must fall, and themselves be made desolate (v. 1-15). The reason for the chastisement of Israel was, Israel's sin and profanation of God's name (v. 16-21). God has good in store for Israel, for His own name's sake, to revive his people; first, by a spiritual renewal of their hearts, and, next, by an external restoration to prosperity (v. 22-33). The result is, the heathen shall be impressed with the power and goodness of God manifested so palpably towards the restored people (v. 34-38). 1, 2. mountains of Israel—in contrast to "Mount Selt" of the previous prophecy. They are here personified; Israel's elevation is moral, not merely physical, as Edom's. Her hills are "the everlasting hills" of Jacob's prophecy (Genesis 49. 26). "The enemy" (Edom, the singled-out representative of all God's foes), with a shout of exultation, "Aha!" had claimed, as the nearest kinsman of Israel (the brother of their father Esau), his vacated inheritance, as much as to say, the so-called "everlasting" inheritance of Israel and of the "hills," which typified the unmovable perpetuity of it (Psalm 135. 1, 2), has come to an end, in spite of the promise of God, and has become "ours" (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 13; 33. 15). 3. Lit., Because, even because. swallowed you up—lit., panted after you, as a beast after its prey; implying the greedy cupidity of Edom as to Israel's inheritance (Psalm 56. 1, 2). lips of talkers—lit., "lips of the tongue," i. e., of the slanderer, the man of tongue. Edom slandered Israel because of the connection of the latter with Jehovah, as though He were unable to save them. Deuteronomy 28. 37; Jeremlah 24. 9, had foretold Israel's reproach among the heathen (Daniel 9. 16). 4. Inanimate creatures are addressed, to imply that the creature also, as it were, groans for deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God (Romans 8. 19-21). [POLANUS.] The completeness of the renewed blessedness of all parts of the land is implied. derision—(Psalm 79. 4.) 5. to cast it out for a prey—i. e., to take the land for a prey, its inhabitants being cast out. Or the land is compared to a prey cast forth to wild beasts. FAIRBAIRN needlessly alters the Hebrew pointing, and translates, "that they may plunder its pasturage." 6. the shame of the heathen—viz., the shame with which the heathen cover you (Psalm 123. 3, 4). 7. lifted . . . mine hand—in token of an oath (ch. 20. 5; Genesis 14. 22). they shall bear their shame—a perpetual shame; whereas the "shame" which Israel bore from these heathen was only for a time. 8. they are at hand to come—i. e., the Israelites are soon about to return to their land. This proves that the primary reference of the prophecy is to the return from Babylon, which was "at hand," or comparatively near. But this only in part fulfilled the prediction, the full and final blessing in future, and the restoration from Babylon was an earnest of it. 10. wastes . . . builded—Isaiah 58. 12; 61. 4; Amos 9. 11, 12, 14, where, as here (ch. 34. 23, 24), the names of David, Messiah's type, and Edom, Israel's foe, are introduced in connection with the coming restoration. 11. do better . . . than at your beginnings—as in the case of Job (Job 42. 12). Whereas the heathen nations fall irrevocably, Israel shall be more than restored; its last estate shall exceed even its first. 12. to walk upon you—O mountains of Israel (v. 8)! thou . . . thou—change from plural to singular: O hill of Zion, singled out from the other mountains of Israel (ch. 34. 26); or land, thou shalt no more . . . bereave them of men—thou shalt no more provoke God to bereave them of children (so the ellipsis ought to be supplied, as Ezekiel probably alludes to Jeremiah 15. 7, "I will bereave them of children"). 13. Thou land devoured up men—alluding to the words of the spies (Numbers 13. 32). The land personified is represented as doing that which was done in it. Like an unnatural mother it devoured, i. e., it was the grave of its people; of the Canaanites, its former possessors, through mutual wars, and finally by the sword of Israel; and now, of the Jews, through internal and external ills; e. g., wars, famine (to which v. 30, "reproach of famine among the heathen," implies the allusion here is). 14. bereave—so the Keri or Hebrew Margin reads, to correspond to "bereave" in v. 13; but "cause to fall" or "stumble," in the Hebrew text or Chetib, being the more difficult reading, is the one least likely to come from a corrector; also, it forms a good transition to the next subject, viz., the moral cause of the people's calamities, viz., their falls, or stumblings through sin. The latter ceasing, the former also shall cease. So the same expression follows in v. 15, "Neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more." 17. removed woman—(Leviticus 15. 19, &c.) 18, 19. The reason for their removal was their sin, which God's holiness could not let pass unpunished; just as a woman's legal uncleanness was the reason for her being separated from the congregation. 20. profaned my holy name, when they (the heathen) said to them (the Israelites), These, &c.—The Israelites gave a huddle of reproach to the heathen against God, who would naturally say, These who take usury, oppress, commit adultery, &c., and who, in such an abject plight, are "gone forth" as exiles "out of his land," are specimens of what Jehovah can or will effect, for His people, and show what kind of a God this so-called holy, omnipotent, covenant-keeping God must be! (Isaiah 52, 5; Romans 2, 24). 21. I had pity for mine holy name—i. e., I felt pity for it; God's own name, so dishonoured, was the primary object of His pitying concern; then His people, secondarily, through His concern for it. [FAIRBAIRN.] 22. not . . . for your sakes—i. e., not for any merit in you; for, on the contrary, on your part, there is every thing to call down continued severity (cf. Deuteronomy 9, 5, 6). The sole and sure ground of hope was God's regard to "His own name," as the God of covenant grace (Psalm 106, 45), which He must vindicate from the dishonour brought on it by the Jews, before the heathen. 23. sanctify—vindicate and manifest as holy, in opposition to the heathen reproaches of it brought on by the Jews' sins and their punishment (note, v. 20). sanctified in you—i. e., in respect of you; I shall be regarded in their eyes as the Holy One, and righteous in my dealings towards you (ch. 20, 41; 28, 22). 24. Fulfilled primarily in the restoration from Babylon; ultimately to be so in the restoration "from all countries." 25. The external restoration must be preceded by an internal one. The change in their condition must not be superficial, but must be based on a radical renewal of the heart. Then the heathen, understanding from the regenerated lives of God's people how holy God is, would perceive Israel's past troubles to have been only the necessary vindications of His righteousness. Thus God's name would be "sanctified" before the heathen, and God's people be prepared for onward blessings. sprinkle . . . water—phrasology taken from the law; viz., the water mixed with the ashes of a heifer sprinkled with a hyssop on the unclean (Numbers 19, 9-18); the thing signified being the cleansing blood of Christ sprinkled on the conscience and heart (Hebrews 9, 13, 14; 10, 22; cf. Jeremiah 33, 8; Ephesians 5, 26). from all your idols—Literal idolatry has ceased among the Jews ever since the captivity; so far, the prophecy has been already fulfilled; but "cleansing from all their idols," e. g., covetousness, prejudices against Jesus of Nazareth, is yet future. 26. new heart—mind and will. spirit—motive and principle of action. stony heart—unimpressible in serious things; like the "stony ground" (Matthew 13.), unfit for receiving the good seed so as to bring forth fruit. heart of flesh—not "carnal" in opposition to "spiritual;" but impressible and docile, fit for receiving the good seed. In ch. 18, 31 they are commanded, "Make you a new heart, and a new spirit." Here God says, "A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you." Thus the responsibility of man, and the sovereign grace of God, are shown to be coexistent. Man cannot make himself a new heart unless God gives it (Philippians 2, 12, 13). 27. my Spirit—(Ch. 11, 19; Jeremiah 32, 39.) The partial reformation at the return from Babylon (Ezra 10, 6, &c.; Nehemiah 8., 9.) was an earnest of the full renewal hereafter under Messiah. 28. ye . . . my people . . . I . . . your God—(Ch. 11, 20; Jeremiah 30, 22.) 29. save . . . from all . . . uncleannesses—The province of Jesus, according to the signification of His name (Matthew 1, 21). To be specially exercised in behalf of the Jews in the latter days (Romans 11, 26). call for . . . corn—as a master "calls for" a servant; all the powers and productions of nature are the servants of Jehovah (Psalm 105, 16; Matthew 8, 8, 9). Cf. as to the subordination of all the intermediate agents to the Great First Cause, who will give "corn" and all good things to His people, Hosea 2, 21, 22; Zechariah 8, 12. 30. no more reproach of famine among the heathen—to which their taunt (v. 13), "Thou land devourer up men," in part referred. 31. remember your . . . evil ways—with shame and loathing. The unexpected grace and love of God, manifested in Christ to Israel, shall melt the people into true repentance, which mere legal fear could not (ch. 16, 61, 63; Psalm 130, 4; Zechariah 12, 10; cf. Jeremiah 33, 8, 9). 35. they shall say—The heathen, who once made Israel's desolation a ground of reproach against the name of Jehovah Himself (v. 20, 21); but now He so vindicates its sanctity (v. 22, 23) that these same heathen are constrained to acknowledge Israel's more than renewed blessedness to be God's own work, and a ground for glorifying His name (v. 36). Eden—as Tyre (the type of the world-powers in general; so Assyria, a cedar "in the garden of God, Eden," ch. 31, 8, 9), in original advantages, had been compared to "Eden, the garden of God" (ch. 28, 13), from which she had fallen irrecoverably; so Israel, once desolate, is to be as "the garden of Eden" (Isaiah 51, 3), and is to be so unchangeably. 36. Lord . . . spoken . . . do it—(Numbers 23, 19.) 37. I will yet for this be inquired of—so as to grant it. On former occasions He had refused to be inquired of by Israel, because the inquirers were not in a fit condition of mind to receive a blessing (ch. 14, 3; 20, 3). But hereafter, as in the restoration from Babylon (Nehemiah 8., 9.; Daniel 9, 3-20, 21, 23), God will prepare His people's hearts (v. 26) to pray aright for the blessings which He is about to give (Psalm 102, 13-17, 20; Zechariah 12, 10-14; 13, 1). like a flock—resuming the image (ch. 34, 23, 31). 38. As the holy flock—the great flock of choice animals for sacrifice, brought up to Jerusalem at the three great yearly festivals, the pass-over, pentecost, and feast of the tabernacles.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 1-23. THE VISION OF DRY BONES REVIVIFIED, SYMBOLIZING ISRAEL'S DEATH AND RESURRECTION. Three stages in Israel's revival present themselves to the prophet's eye. 1. The new awakening of the people, the resurrection of the dead (ch. 37, 1-14). 2. The reunion of the formerly hostile members of the community, whose contentions had affected the whole (ch. 37, 15-28). 3. The community thus restored is strong enough to withstand the assault of Gog, &c. (chs. 38., 39). [EWALD.] 1. carried . . . in the Spirit—The matters transacted, therefore, were not literal, but in vision. the valley—probably that by the Chebar (ch. 3, 22); the valley represents Mesopotamia, the scene of Israel's sojourn in her state of national deadness. 2. dry—bleached by long exposure to the atmosphere. 3. can these bones live? . . . thou knowest—implying that, humanly speaking, they could not; but faith leaves the question of possibility to rest with God, with whom nothing is impossible (Deuteronomy 32, 39). An image of Christian faith which believes in the coming general resurrection of the dead, in spite of all appearances against it, because God has said it (John 5, 21; Romans 4, 17; 2 Corinthians 1, 9). 4. Prophecy—Proclaim God's quickening word to them. On account of this innate power of the Divine word to effect its end, prophets are said to do that which they prophesy as about to be done (Jeremiah 1, 10). 5. I . . . cause breath to enter into you—so Isaiah 26, 19, containing the same vision, refers primarily to Israel's restoration. Cf. as to God's renovation of the earth and all its creatures hereafter by His breath, Psalm 104, 30. ye shall live—come to life again. 6. ye shall know that I am the Lord—by the actual proof of my divinity which I will give in reviving Israel. 7. noise—of the bones when coming in mutual collision. Perhaps referring to the decree of Cyrus, or the noise of the Jews' exultation at their deliverance and return. bones came together—lit., "ye bones came together;" as in Jeremiah 49, 11 (Hebrew), "ye widows of thine shall trust in me." The second person puts the scene vividly before one's eyes, for the whole resurrection-scene is a prophecy in action to render more palpably to the people the prophecy in word (v. 21). 8. So far, they were only cohering in order as unsightly skeletons. The next step, that of covering them successively with sinews, skin, and flesh, gives them beauty; but still "no breath" of life in them. This may imply that Israel hereafter, as at the restoration from Babylon was the case in part, shall return to Judea unconverted at first (Zechariah 13, 8, 9). Spiritually: a man may assume all the semblances of spiritual life, yet have none, and so be dead before God. 9. wind—rather, the spirit of life or life-breath (Margin). For it is distinct from "the four winds" from which it is summoned. from the four winds—implying that Israel is to be gathered from the four quarters of the earth (Isaiah 43, 5, 6; Jeremiah 31, 8), even as they were "scattered into all the winds" (ch. 5, 10; 12, 14; 17, 21; cf. Revelation 7, 1, 4). 10. Such honour God gives to the Divine word, even in the mouth of a man. How much more when in the mouth of the Son of God! (John 5, 25-29). Though this chapter does not directly prove the resurrection of the dead, it does so indirectly; for it takes for granted the future fact as one recognized by believing Jews, and so made the image of their national restoration (so Isaiah 25, 8; 26, 19; Daniel 12, 2; Hosea 6, 2; 13, 14; cf. Note, v. 12).

11. Our bones are dried—(Psalm 141, 7), explained by "our hope is lost" (Isaiah 49, 14); our national state is as hopeless of resurrection, as marrowless bones are of reanimation. cut off for our parts—i. e., so far as we are concerned. There is nothing in us to give hope, like a withered branch "cut off" from a tree, or a limb from the body. 12. my people—in antithesis to "for our parts" (v. 11). The hope that is utterly gone, if looking at themselves, is sure for them in God, because He regards them as His people. Their covenant-relation to God ensures His not letting death permanently reign over them. Christ makes the same principle the ground on which the literal resurrection rests. God had said, "I am the God of Abraham," &c.; God, by taking the patriarchs as His, undertook to do for them all that Omnipotence can perform: He, being the ever-living God, is necessarily the God of, not dead, but living persons, i. e., of those whose bodies His covenant love binds him to raise again. He can—and because He can,—He will,—He must. [FAIRBAIRN.] He calls them "my people" when receiving them into favour; but "thy people," in addressing His servant, as if He would put them away from him (ch. 13, 17; 33, 2; Exodus 32, 7). out of your graves—out of your politically-dead state, primarily in Babylon, finally hereafter in all lands (cf. ch. 6, 8; Hosea 13, 14). The Jews regarded the lands of their captivity and dispersion as their "graves;" their restoration was to be as "life from the dead" (Romans 11, 15). Before, the bones were in the open plain (v. 1, 2); now, in the graves, i. e., some of the Jews were in the graves of actual captivity, others at large but dispersed. Both alike were nationally dead. 16. stick—alluding to Numbers 17, 2, the tribal rod. The union of the two rods was a prophecy in action of the brotherly union which is to reunite the ten tribes and Judah. As their severance under Jeroboam was fraught with the greatest evil to the covenant people, so the first result of both being joined by the spirit of life to God is, they become joined to one another under the one covenant King, Messiah-David. Judah, and . . . children of Israel his companions—i. e., Judah, and, besides Benjamin and Levi, those who had joined themselves to him of Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, Asher, Zebulun, Issachar, as having the temple and lawful priesthood in his borders (2 Chronicles 11, 12, 13, 16; 15, 9; 30, 11, 18). The latter became identified with Judah after the carrying away of the ten tribes, and returned with Judah from Babylon, and so shall be associated with that tribe at the future restoration. For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim—Ephraim's posterity took the lead, not only of the other descendants of Joseph (cf. v. 19), but of the ten tribes of Israel. For 400 years, during the period of the judges, with Manasseh and Benjamin, its dependent tribes, it had formerly taken the lead: Shiloh was its religious capital; Shechem, its civil capital. God had transferred the birth-right from Reuben, for dishonouring his father's bed, to Joseph, whose representative, Ephraim, though the younger, was made (Genesis 48, 19; 1 Chronicles 5, 1). From its pre-eminence "Israel" is attached to it as "companions." The "all" in this case, not in that of Judah, which has only attached as "companions" "the children of Israel" (i. e., some of them, viz., those who followed the fortunes of Judah), implies that the bulk of the ten tribes did not return at the restoration from Babylon, but is distinct from Judah, until the coming union with it at the restoration. 18. God does not explain the symbolical prophecy, until the Jews have been stimulated by the type to consult the prophet. 19. The union effected at the restoration from Babylon embraced but comparatively few of Israel; a future complete fulfilment must therefore be looked for. stick of Joseph . . . in the hand of Ephraim—Ephraim, of the descendants of Joseph, had exercised the rule among the ten tribes: that rule, symbolized by the "stick," was now to be withdrawn from him, and to be made one with the other, Judah's rule, in God's hand. them—the "stick of Joseph," would strictly require "it:" but Ezekiel expresses the sense, viz., the ten tribes who were subject to it, with him—i. e., Judah; or "it," i. e., the stick of Judah. 22. one nation—(Isaiah 11, 13; Jeremiah 3, 18; Hosea 1, 11.) one king—not Zerubbabel, who was not a king either in fact or name, and who ruled over but a few Jews, and that only for a few years; whereas the King here reigns for ever. MESSIAH is meant (ch. 34, 23, 24). The union of Judah and Israel under King Messiah symbolizes the union of Jews and Gentiles under Him, partly now, perfectly hereafter (v. 24; John 10, 16). 23. (Ch. 36, 25). out of . . . their dwelling-places—(Ch. 36, 28, 33.) I will remove them from the scene of their idolatries to dwell in their own land, and to serve idols no more. 24. David—Messiah (Notes, ch. 34, 23, 24). 25. For ever—(Isaiah 60, 21; Joel 3, 20; Amos 9, 15.) 26. covenant of peace—better than the old legal covenant, because an unchangeable covenant of grace (ch. 34, 25; Isaiah 55, 3; Jeremiah 32, 40). I will place them—set them in an established position; no longer unsettled as heretofore. my sanctuary—the temple of God: spiritual in the heart of all true followers of Messiah (2 Corinthians 6, 16); and, in some literal sense, in the restored Israel (chs. 40-44). 27. My tabernacle . . . with them—as foretold (Genesis 9, 27); John 1, 14, "The Word . . . dwell among us" (lit., tabernacled); first, in humiliation; hereafter, in manifested glory (Revelation 21, 3). 28. (Ch. 36, 23.) sanctify Israel—set it apart as holy unto myself and inviolable (Exodus 19, 5, 6).

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 1-23. THE ASSAULT OF GOG, AND GOD'S JUDGMENT ON HIM. The objections to a literal interpretation of the prophecy are—1. The ideal nature of the name Gog, which is the root of Magog, the only kindred name found in Scripture or history. 2. The nations congregated are selected from places most distant from Israel, and from one another, and therefore most unlikely to act in concert, Persians and Libyans, &c. 3. The whole spoil of Israel could not have given a handful to a tithe of their number, or maintained the myriads of invaders a single day (ch. 33, 12, 13). 4. The wood of their invaders' weapons was to serve for fuel to Israel for seven years! And all Israel were to take seven months in burying the dead! Supposing a million of Israelites to bury each two corpses a day, the aggregate buried in the 180 working days of the seven months would be 360 millions of corpses! Then the pestilential vapours from such masses of victims before they were all buried! What Israelite could live in such an atmosphere? 5. The scene of the Lord's controversy here is different from that in Isaiah 34, 6, Edom, which creates a discrepancy. [But probably a different judgment is alluded to.] 6. The gross carnality of the representation of God's dealings with His adversaries is inconsistent with Messianic times; it therefore requires a non-literal interpretation. The prophetic delineations of the Divine principles of government are thrown into the familiar forms of Old Testament relations. The final triumph of Messiah's truth over the most distant and barbarous nations is represented as a literal conflict on a gigantic scale, Israel being the battle-field, ending in the complete triumph of Israel's anointed King, the Saviour of the world. It is a prophetical parable. [FAIRBAIRN.] However, though the details are not literal, the distinctiveness in this picture, characterizing also parallel descriptions in writers less ideally picturesque than Ezekiel, gives probability to a more definite and generally literal interpretation. The awful desolations caused in Judea by Antiochus Epiphanes, of Syria (1 Maccabees; and PORPHYRY, quoted by JEROME on Ezekiel), his defilement of Jehovah's temple by sacrificing swine and sprinkling the altar with the broth, and setting up the altar of Jupiter Olympius, seem to be an earnest of the final desolations to be caused by Antichrist in Israel, previous to His overthrow by the Lord Himself, coming to reign (cf.

Daniel 8. 10-26; 11. 21-45; 12. 1; Zechariah 13. 9; 14. 2, 3). GROTIUS explains Gog as a name taken from Gyges, king of Lydia; and Magog as Syria, in which was a city called Magog (PLINY 5. 28). What Ezekiel stated more generally, Revelation 20. 7-9 states more definitely as to the Antichristian confederacy which is to assail the beloved city. 2. Gog—the prince of the land of Magog. The title was probably a common one of the kings of the country, as "Pharaoh" in Egypt. Chakan was the name given by the Northern Asiatics to their king, and is still a title of the Turkish sultan: "Gog" may be a contraction of this. In Ezekiel's time a horde of Northern Asiatics, termed by the Greeks "Scythians," and probably including the Moschi and Tibareni, near the Caucasus, here ("Meshech . . . Tubal") undertook an expedition against Egypt (HERODOTUS, 1. 103-106). These names might be adopted by Ezekiel from the historical fact familiar to men at the time, as ideal titles for the great last Antichristian confederacy. Magog—(Genesis 10. 2; 1 Chronicles.) The name of a land belonging to Japhet's posterity. Maha, in Sanscrit, means "land." Gog is the ideal political head of the region. In Revelation 20. 8, Gog and Magog are two peoples. the chief prince—rather, "prince of Rosh," or "Rhos" [LXX.]. The Scythian Tauri in the Crimea were so called. The Araxes also was called Rhos. The modern Russians may have hence assumed their name, as Moscow and Tobolsk from Meshech and Tubal, though their proper ancient name was Stavi, or Wends. HENGSTENBERG supports English Version, as "Rosh" is not found in the Bible. "Magog was Gog's original kingdom, though he acquired also Meshech and Tubal, so as to be called their chief prince." 3. His high-sounding titles are repeated to imply the haughty self-confidence of the invader as if invincible. 4. turn thee back—as a refractory wild beast, which thinks to take its own way, but is bent by a superior power to turn on a course which must end in its destruction. Satan shall be, by overruling Providence, permitted to deceive them to their ruin (Revelation 20. 7, 8). hooks into thy jaws—(Ch. 20. 4; 2 Kings 19. 28.) 5. Persia . . . Libya—Expressly specified by APPIAN as supplying the ranks of Antiochus' army. 6. Gomer—the Celtic Cimmerians of Crim-Tartary. Togarmah—The Armenians of the Caucasus, south of Iberia. 7. Irony. Prepare thee and all thine with all needful accoutrements for war—that ye may perish together. be . . . a guard unto them—i. e., if thou canst. 8. thou shalt be visited—in wrath, by God (Isaiah 29. 6). Probably there is allusion to Isaiah 24. 21, 22, "The host of the high ones . . . shall be gathered . . . as prisoners . . . in the pit, . . . and after many days shall they be visited." I therefore prefer English Version to GROTIUS' rendering, "Thou shalt get the command" of the expedition. The "after many days" is defined by "in the latter years," i. e., in the times just before the coming of Messiah, viz., under Antiochus, before His first coming; under Antichrist, before His second coming. the mountains of Israel . . . always waste—i. e., waste during the long period of the captivity, the earnest of the much longer period of Judea's present desolation (to which the language "always waste" more fully applies). This marks the impious atrocity of the act, to assail God's people, who had only begun to recover from their protracted calamities. but it is brought . . . and they shall dwell—rather, "And they (the Israelites) were brought . . . dwelt safely." [FAIRBAIRN.] English Version means, "Against Israel, which has been waste, but which (i. e., whose people) is now (at the time of the invasion) brought forth out of the nations where they were dispersed, and shall be found by the invader dwelling securely, so as to seem an easy prey to him." 9. cloud . . . cover the land—with the multitude of thy forces. 10. an evil thought—as to attacking God's people in their defenceless state. 11. dwell safely—i. e., securely, without fear of danger (cf. Esther 9. 19). Antiochus, the type of Antichrist, took Jerusalem without a blow. 12. midst of the land—lit., the navel of the land (Judges 9. 37, Margin). So, in ch. 5. 5, Israel is said to be set "in the midst of the nations," not physically, but morally, a central position for being a blessing to the* world: so (as the favoured or "beloved city," Revelation 20. 9) an object of envy. GROTIUS translates, "In the height of the land" (so v. 8), "the mountains of Israel," Israel being morally elevated above the rest of the world. 13. Sheba, &c.—These mercantile peoples, though not taking an active part against the cause of God, are well pleased to see others do it. Worldliness makes them ready to deal in the ill-gotten spoil of the invaders of God's people. Gain is before godliness with them (1 Maccabees 3. 41). young lions—daring princes and leaders. 14. shalt thou not know it?—to thy cost, being visited with punishment, whilst Israel dwells safely. 16. I will bring thee against my land, that the heathen may know me—so in Exodus 9. 16, God tells Pharaoh, "For this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth." 17. thou he of whom I have spoken in old time—Gog, &c., are here identified with the enemies spoken of in other prophecies (Numbers 24. 17-24; Isaiah 27. 1; cf. Isaiah 26. 20, 21; Jeremiah 30. 23, 24; Joel 3. 1; Micah 5. 5, 6; Isaiah 14. 12-14; 59. 19). God is represented as addressing Gog at the time of his assault; therefore, the "old time" is the time long prior, when Ezekiel uttered these prophecies; so, he also, as well as Daniel (11.), and Zechariah (14.), are included among "the prophets of Israel" here. many years—ago. 18. fury shall come up in my face—lit., nose; in Hebrew, the idiomatic expression for anger, as men in anger breathe strongly through the nostrils. Anthropopathy: God stooping to human modes of thought (Psalm 18. 8). 19. great shaking—an earthquake: physical agitations after accompanying social and moral revolutions. Foretold also in Joel 3. 16; cf. Haggai 2. 6, 7; Matthew 24. 7, 29; Revelation 16. 18. 20. fishes—disturbed by the fleets which I will bring. fowls, &c.—frightened at the sight of so many men: an ideal picture. mountains—i. e., the fortresses on the mountains. steep places—lit., "stairs" (Song of Solomon 2. 14); steep terraces for vines on the sides of hills, to prevent the earth being washed down by the rains. every wall—of towns. 21. every man's sword . . . against his brother—I will destroy them partly by my people's sword, partly by their swords being turned against one another (cf. 2 Chronicles 20. 23). 22. plead—a forensic term; because God in His inflictions acts on the principles of His own immutable justice, not by arbitrary impulse (Isaiah 66. 16; Jeremiah 25. 31). blood . . . hailstones . . . fire—(Revelation 8. 7, 16. 21.) The imagery is taken from the destruction of Sodom and the plagues of Egypt (cf. Psalm 11. 6). Antiochus died by "pestilence" (2 Maccabees 9. 5).

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Ver. 1-29. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECY AGAINST GOG. 1. Repeated from ch. 33. 3, to impress the prophecy more on the mind. 2. leave but the sixth part of thee—Margin, "strike thee with six plagues" (viz., pestilence, blood, overflowing rain, hailstones, fire, brimstone, ch. 33. 22); or, "draw thee back with an hook of six teeth" (ch. 33. 4), the six teeth being those six plagues. Rather, "lead thee about" [LUDOVICUS DE DREU and LXX.], as Antiochus was led (to his ruin) to leave Egypt for an expedition against Palestine; so shall the last great enemy of God be. north parts—from the extreme north. [FAIRBAIRN.] 3. bow—in which the Scythians were most expert. 4, 5. (Cf. v. 17-20.) upon the mountains of Israel—the scene of Israel's preservation shall be that of the ungodly foe's destruction. 6. carelessly—in self-confident security. the isles—those dwelling in maritime regions, who had helped Gog with fleets and troops, shall be visited with the fire of God's wrath in their own lands. 7. not let them pollute my holy name—by their sins bringing down judgments which made the heathen think that I was unable or unwilling to save my people. 8. it is come . . . it is done—the prediction of the salvation of my people, and the ruin of their enemy, is come to pass—is done: expressing that the event foretold is as certain as if it were already accomplished. 9, 10. The burning of the foe's weapons implies that nothing belonging to them should be left to pollute the land. The seven years (seven being the sacred number) spent on this work, implies the completeness of the cleansing, and the people's zeal for purity. How different from the ancient Israelites, who left not merely the arms, but the heathen themselves, to remain among them [FAIRBAIRN] (Judges 1. 27, 28; 2. 2, 3; Psalm 106. 34-36). The desolation by Antiochus began in the one hundred and forty-first year of the Seleucide. From this date to 148, a period of six years and four months ("2300 days," Daniel 8. 14), when the temple worship was restored (1 Maccabees 4. 52), God vouchsafed many triumphs to His people; from this time to the death of Antiochus, early in 149, a period of seven months, the Jews had rest from Antiochus, and purified their land, and on the twenty-fifth day of the ninth month celebrated the Encaenia, or feast of dedication (John 10. 22) and purification of the temple. The whole period, in round numbers, was seven years. Mattathias was the patriotic Jewish leader, and his third son, Judas, the military commander under whom the Syrian generals were defeated. He retook Jerusalem and purified the temple. Simon and Jonathan, his brothers, succeeded him: the independence of the Jews was secured, and the crown vested in the Asmonean family, in which it continued till Herod the Great.

11. place . . . of graves—Gog only found a grave where he had expected the spoils of conquest. valley—so vast were to be the masses that nothing but a deep valley would suffice for their corpses. the passengers on the east of the sea—those travelling on the high road, east of the Dead Sea, from Syria to Petra and Egypt. The publicity of the road would cause many to observe God's judgments, as the stench (as English Version translates) or the multitude of graves (as HENDERSON translates, "it shall stop the passengers") would arrest the attention of passers-by. Their grave would be close to that of their ancient prototypes, Sodom and Gomorrah in the Dead Sea, both alike being signal instances of God's judgments. 13. I . . . glorified—in destroying the foe (ch. 28. 22). 14. with the passengers—the men employed continually in the burying were to be helped by those happening to pass by; all were to combine. after the end of seven months shall they search—to see if the work was complete. [MUNSTER.] 15. First "all the people of the land" engaged in the burying for seven months; then special men were employed, at the end of the seven months, to search for any still left unburied. The passers-by helped them by setting up a mark near any such bones, in order to keep others from being defiled by casually touching them, and that the buriers might come and remove them. Denoting the minute care to put away every relic of heathen pollution from the Holy Land. 16. A city in the neighbourhood was to receive the name Hamonah (multitude) to commemorate the overthrow of the multitudes of the foe. [HENDERSON,] The multitude of the slain shall give a name to the city of Jerusalem after the land shall have been cleansed. [GROTIUS.] Jerusalem shall be famed as the conqueror of multitudes. 17. (Revelation 19. 17.) sacrifice—ancient worshippers feasted on the sacrifices. The birds and beasts of prey are invited to the sacrificial feast provided by God (cf. Isaiah 18. 6; 34. 6; Zephaniah 1. 7; Mark 9. 49). Here this sacrifice holds only a subordinate place in the picture, and so is put last. Not only shall their bones lie long unburied, but they shall be stripped of the flesh by beasts and birds of prey. 18. rams . . . lambs . . . goats—by these various animal victims used in sacrifices are meant various ranks of men, princes, generals and soldiers (cf. Isaiah 34. 6). fatlings of Bashan—ungodly men of might (Psalm 22. 12). Bashan, beyond Jordan, was famed for its fat cattle. Fat implies prosperity which often makes men refractory towards God (Deuteronomy 32. 14, 15). 20. my table—the field of battle on the mountains of Israel (ch. 38. 8, 20). charlots—i. e., charlotteers. 22. So the house of Israel shall know . . . Lord—by my interposition for them. So, too, the heathen shall be led to fear the name of the Lord (Psalm 102. 15). 23. hid . . . my face—(Deuteronomy 31. 17; Isaiah 59. 2). 25. bring again the captivity—restore from calamity to prosperity. the whole house of Israel—so "all Israel" (Romans

11. 26). The restorations of Israel heretofore have been partial; there must be one yet future that is to be universal (Hosea 1. 11). 26. After that they have borne their shame—the punishment of their sin; after they have become sensible of their guilt, and ashamed of it (ch. 20. 43; 36. 31). 27. sanctified in them—vindicating as holy in my dealings with them. 28. The Jews, having no dominion, settled country, or fixed property to detain them, may return at any time without difficulty (cf. Hosea 3. 4, 5). 29. poured out my Spirit upon . . . Israel—the sure forerunner of their conversion (Joel 2. 28; Zechariah 12. 10). The pouring out of His Spirit is a pledge that He will hide His face no more (2 Corinthians 1. 22; Ephesians 1. 14; Philippians 1. 6).

CHAPTER XL.

Ver. 1-49. THE REMAINING CHAPS., 40.-48., GIVE AN IDEAL PICTURE OF THE RESTORED JEWISH TEMPLE. The arrangements as to the land and the temple are, in many particulars, different from those subsisting before the captivity. There are things in it so improbable physically as to preclude a purely literal interpretation. The general truth seems to hold good that, as Israel served the nations for his rejection of Messiah, so shall they serve him in the person of Messiah, when he shall acknowledge Messiah (Isaiah 60. 12; Zechariah 14. 17-19; cf. Psalm 72. 11). The ideal temple exhibits, under Old Testament forms, used as being those then familiar to the men whom Ezekiel, a priest himself, and one who delighted in sacrificial images, addresses, not the precise literal outline, but the essential character of the worship of Messiah as it shall be when He shall exercise sway in Jerusalem among His own people, the Jews, and thence to the ends of the earth. The very fact that the whole is a vision (v. 2), not an oral face-to-face communication such as that granted to Moses (Numbers 12. 6-8), implies that the directions are not to be understood so precisely literal as those given to the Jewish lawgiver. The description involves things which, taken literally, almost involve natural impossibilities. The square of the temple, in ch. 42. 20, is six times as large as the circuit of the wall enclosing the old temple, and larger than all the earthly Jerusalem. Ezekiel gives three and a half miles and 140 yards to his temple square. The boundaries of the ancient city were about two and a half miles. Again, the city in Ezekiel has an area between three or four thousand square miles, including the holy ground set apart for the prince, priests, and Levites. This is nearly as large as the whole of Judea west of the Jordan. As Zion lay in the centre of the ideal city, the one-half of the sacred portion extended to nearly thirty miles south of Jerusalem, i. e., covered nearly the whole southern territory, which reached only to the Dead Sea (ch. 47. 19), and yet five tribes were to have their inheritance on that side of Jerusalem, beyond the sacred portion (ch. 48. 23-28). Where was land to be found for them there? A breadth of but four or five miles apiece would be left. As the boundaries of the land are given the same as under Moses, these incongruities cannot be explained away by supposing physical changes about to be effected in the land such as will meet the difficulties of the purely literal interpretation. The distribution of the land is in equal portions among the twelve tribes, without respect to their relative numbers, and the parallel sections running from east to west. There is a difficulty also in the supposed separate existence of the twelve tribes, such separate tribeships no longer existing, and it being hard to imagine how they could be restored as distinct tribes, mingled as they now are. So the stream that issued from the east threshold of the temple and flowed into the Dead Sea in the rapidity of its increase and the quality of its waters, is unlike anything ever known in Judea or elsewhere in the world. Lastly, the catholicity of the Christian dispensation, and the spirituality of its worship, seem incompatible with a return to the local narrowness and "beggarly elements" of the Jewish ritual and carnal ordinances, disannulled "because of the unprofitableness thereof" [FAIRBAIRN], (Galatians 4. 3, 9; 5. 1; Hebrews 8

10; 10. 18). "A temple with sacrifices now would be a denial of the all-sufficiency of the sacrifice of Christ. He who sacrificed before confessed the Messiah; He who should sacrifice now would solemnly deny him." [DOUGLAS.] These difficulties, however, may be all seeming, not real. Faith accepts God's word as it is, waits for the event, sure that it will clear up all such difficulties. Perhaps, as some think, the beau-ideal of a sacred commonwealth is given according to the then existing pattern of temple-services, which would be the imagery most familiar to the prophet and his hearers at the time. The minute particularizing of details is in accordance with Ezekiel's style, even in describing purely ideal scenes. The old temple embodied in visible forms and rites spiritual truths affecting the people even when absent from it. So this ideal temple is made in the absence of the outward temple to serve by description the same purpose of symbolical instruction as the old literal temple did by forms and acts. As in the beginning God promised to be a "sanctuary" (ch. 11, 16) to the captives at the Chebar, so now at the close is promised a complete restoration and realization of the theocratic worship and polity under Messiah in its noblest ideal (cf. Jeremiah 31, 33-40). In Revelation 21, 22 "no temple" is seen, as in the perfection of the new dispensation the accidents of place and form are no longer needed to realize to Christians what Ezekiel imparts to Jewish minds by the imagery familiar to them. In Ezekiel's temple holiness stretches over the entire temple, so that in this there is no longer a distinction between the different parts, as in the old temple: parts left undetermined in the latter obtain now a Divine sanction, so that all arbitrariness is excluded. So that it is to be a perfect manifestation of the love of God to His covenant people (chs. 40-43, 12); and from it, as from a new centre of religious life, there gushes forth the fulness of blessings to them, and so to all people (ch. 47). [FAIRBAIRN and HAVERNICK.] The temple built at the return from Babylon can only very partially have realized the model here given. The law is seemingly opposed to the gospel (Matthew 5, 21, 22, 27, 28, 33, 34). It is not really so (cf. Matthew 5, 17, 18; Romans 3, 31; Galatians 3, 21, 22). It is true Christ's sacrifice superseded the law sacrifices (Hebrews 10, 12-18). Israel's province may hereafter be to show the essential identity, even in the minute details of the temple sacrifices, between the law and gospel (Romans 10, 8). The ideal of the theocratic temple will then first be realized. 1. beginning of the year—the ecclesiastical year, the first month of which was Nisan. the city . . . thither—Jerusalem, the centre to which all the prophet's thoughts tended. 2. visions of God—Divinely-sent visions, very high mountain—Moriah, very high, as compared with the plains of Babylon, still more so as to its moral elevation (ch. 17, 22; 20, 40). by which—Ezekiel coming from the north is set down at (as the Hebrew for "upon" may be translated) Mount Moriah, and sees the city-like frame of the temple stretching southward. In v. 3, "God brings him thither," i. e., close up to it, so as to inspect it minutely (cf. Revelation 21, 10). In this closing vision, as in the opening one of the book, the Divine hand is laid on the prophet, and he is borne away in the visions of God. But the scene there was by the Chebar, Jehovah having forsaken Jerusalem; now it is the mountain of God, Jehovah having returned thither; there, the vision was calculated to inspire terror; here, hope and assurance. 3. man—The Old Testament manifestations of heavenly beings as men prepared men's minds for the coming incarnation. brass—resplendent. line—used for longer measurements (Zechariah 2, 1). reed—used in measuring houses (Revelation 21, 15). It marked the straightness of the walls. 5. Measures were mostly taken from the human body. The greater cubit, the length from the elbow to the end of the middle finger, a little more than two feet: exceeding the ordinary cubit (from the elbow to the wrist) by an hand-breadth, i. e., twenty-one inches in all. Cf. ch. 43, 13, with ch. 40, 5. The palm was the full breadth of the hand, three and a half inches. breadth of the building—i. e., the boundary wall. The imperfections in the old temple's boundary wall were to have no place here. The buildings attached to it had been sometimes turned to common uses; e. g., Jeremiah was imprisoned in one (Jeremiah 20, 2; 29, 26). But now all these were to be holy to the Lord. The gates and doorways to the city of God were to be imprinted in their architecture with the idea of the exclusion of everything defiled (Revelation 21, 27). The east gate was to be especially sacred, as it was through it the glory of God had departed (ch. 11, 23), and through it the glory was to return (ch. 43, 1, 2; 44, 2, 3). 6. the stairs—seven in number (v. 26). threshold—the sill. [FAIRBAIRN.] other threshold—FAIRBAIRN considers there is but one threshold, and translates, "even the one threshold, one rod broad." But there is another threshold mentioned in v. 7. The two thresholds here seem to be the upper and the lower. 7. chamber—These chambers were for the use of the Levites who watched at the temple gates; guard-chambers (2 Kings 22, 4; 1 Chronicles 9, 26, 27); also for depositing utensils and musical instruments in. 9. posts—projecting column-faced fronts of the sides of the doorway, opposite to one another. 12. space—rather, "the boundary." 16. narrow—latticed. [HENDERSON.] The ancients had no glass, so they had them latticed, narrow in the interior of the walls, and widening at the exterior. "Made fast," or "firmly fixed in the chambers." [MAURER.] arches—rather, "porches." pavement—tesselated mosaic (Esther 1, 6). chambers—serving as lodgings for the priests on duty in the temple, and as receptacles of the tithes of salt, wine and oil. 18. The higher pavement was level with the entrance of the gates, the lower was on either side of the raised pavement thus formed. Whereas Solomon's temple had an outer court open to alterations and even idolatrous innovations (2 Kings 23, 11, 12; 1 Chronicles 20, 5), in this there was to be no room for human corruptions. Its compass was exactly defined, 100 cubits; and the fine pavement implied it was to be trodden only by clean feet (cf. Isaiah 35, 8). 20-27. The different approaches corresponded in plan. In the case of these two other gates, however, no mention is made of a building with thirty chambers such as was found on the east side. Only one was needed, and it was assigned to the east as being the sacred quarter, and that most conveniently situated for the officiating priests. 23. and toward the east—an elliptical expression for "The gate of the inner court was over against the (outer) gate toward the north (just as the inner gate was over against the outer gate) toward the east." 28-37. The inner court and its gates. according to these measures—viz., the measures of the outer gate. The figure and proportions of the inner answered to the outer. 30. This verse is omitted in LXX., the Vatican MS. and others. The dimensions here of the inner gate do not correspond to the outer, though v. 23 asserts that they do. HAVERNICK, retaining the verse, understands it of another porch looking inwards towards the temple. arches—the porch. [FAIRBAIRN.] The columns on which the arches rest. [HENDERSON.] 31. eight steps—the outer porch had only seven (v. 26). 37. posts—LXX. and Vulgate read, "the porch," which answers better to v. 31. "The arches" or "porch." [MAURER.] 38. chambers . . . entries—lit., a chamber and its door. by the posts—i. e., at or close by the posts or columns. where they washed the burnt offering—this does not apply to all the gates but only to the north gate. For Leviticus 1, 11 directs the sacrifices to be killed north of the altar; and ch. 8, 5, calls the north gate, "the gate of the altar." And v. 40 particularly mentions the north gate. 43. hooks—cooking apparatus for cooking the flesh of the sacrifices that fell to the priests. The hooks were "fastened" in the walls within the apartment, to hang the meat from, so as to roast it. The Hebrew comes from a root "fixed" or "placed." 44. the chambers of the singers—two in number, as proved by what follows: "and their prospect (i. e., the prospect of one) was toward the south, (and one toward the north." So LXX. 46. Zadok—lineally descended from Aaron; he had the high priesthood conferred on him by Solomon, who had set aside the family of Ithamar because of the part which Abiathar had taken in the rebellion of Adonijah (1 Kings 1, 7; 2, 26, 27). 47. court . . . an hundred cubits . . . four square—not to be confounded with the inner court, or court of Israel, which was open to all who had sacrifices to bring, and went round the three sides of the sacred territory 100 cubits broad. This court was 100 cubits square, and had the altar in it, in front of the temple. It was the court of the priests, and hence is connected with those who had charge of the altar and the music. The description here is brief, as the things connected with this portion were from the first divinely regulated. 48, 49. These two verses belong to ch. 41., which treats of the temple itself. twenty . . . eleven cubits—in Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6.3) "twenty . . . ten cubits." The breadth perhaps was ten and a half; 1 Kings 6.3, designates the number by the lesser next round number, "ten;" Ezekiel here, by the larger number, "eleven." [MENOCHIUS.] LXX. read "twelve." he brought me by the steps—they were ten in number [LXX.].

CHAPTER XLI.

Ver. 1-26. THE CHAMBERS AND ORNAMENTS OF THE TEMPLE. 1. tabernacle—as in the measurement of the outer porch he had pointed to Solomon's temple; so here in the edifice itself, he points to the old tabernacle, which being eight boards in breadth (each one and a half cubits broad) would make in all twelve cubits, as here. Internally it was only ten cubits. 2. length thereof—viz., of the holy place. [FAIRBAIRN.] 3. inward—towards the most holy place. 4. thereof—of the holy of holies. before the temple—i. e., before, or in front of the most holy place (so "temple" is used in 1 Kings 6.3). The angel went in and measured it, whilst Ezekiel stood in front, in the only part of the temple accessible to him. The dimensions of the two apartments are the same as in Solomon's temple, since being fixed originally by God, they are regarded as finally determined. 5. side chamber—the singular used collectively for the plural. These chambers were appendages attached to the outside of the temple, on the west, north and south; for on the east side, the principal entrance, there were no chambers. The narrowness of the chambers was in order that the beams be supported without needing pillars. The plan is similar to that of the hall at Koyunjik, a large central hall, called the oracle, with smaller rooms built round it. 6. might . . . hold, but . . . not hold in . . . wall of the house—1 Kings 6.6, tells us there were rests made in the walls of the temple for supports to the side-chambers; but the temple walls did not thereby become part of this side building; they stood separate from it. "They entered," viz., the beams of the chambers, which were three-storied, and thirty in consecutive order, entered into the wall, i. e., were made to lean on rests projecting from the wall. 7. the breadth . . . so increased from the lowest . . . to the highest—i. e., the breadth of the internal space above was greater than that below. 8. foundations . . . six . . . cubits—the sub-structure, on which the foundations rested, was a full reed of six cubits. great—lit., to the extremity or root, viz., of the hand. [HENDERSON.] "To the joining," or point, where the foundation of one chamber ceased and another began. [FAIRBAIRN.] 9. that which was left—there was an unoccupied place within chambers that belonged to the house. The buildings in this unoccupied place, west of the temple, and so much resembling it in size, imply that no place was to be left which was to be held, as of old, not sacred. Manasseh (2 Kings 23. 11) had abused these "suburbs of the temple" to keeping horses sacred to the sun. All excuse for such abominations was henceforth to be taken away, the Lord claiming every space, and filling up this also with sacred erections. [FAIRBAIRN.] 10. the chambers—i. e., of the priests in the court: between these and the side-chambers was the wideness, &c. Whilst long details are given as to the chambers, &c., no mention is made of the ark of the covenant. FAIRBAIRN thus interprets this: In future there was to be a perfect conformity to the Divine Idea, such as there had not been before. The dwellings of His people should all become true sanctuaries of piety. Jehovah Himself, in the full display of the Divine Shekinah, shall come in the room of the ark of the covenant (Jeremiah 3. 16, 17),

The interior of the temple stands empty, waiting for His entrance to fill it with His glory (ch. 43. 1-12). It is the same temple, but the courts of it have become different to accommodate a more numerous people. The entire compass of the temple mount has become a holy of holies (ch. 43. 12). 12-15. Sum of the measures of the temple, and of the buildings behind and on the side of it. 15. galleries—terrace buildings. On the west or back of the temple, there was a separate place occupied by buildings of the same external dimensions as the temple, i. e., one hundred cubits square in the entire compass. [FAIRBAIRN.] 16. covered—being the highest windows they were "covered" from the view below. Or else "covered" with lattice-work. 17. by measure—measurements (were taken). [FAIRBAIRN.] 21. appearance of the one as the appearance of the other—the appearance of the sanctuary or holy of holies was similar to that of the temple. They differed only in magnitude. 23. table . . . before the Lord—the altar of incense (ch. 44. 16); at it, not at the table of shewbread, the priests daily ministered. It stood in front of the veil, and is therefore said to be "before the Lord." It is called a table, as being that at which the Lord will take delight in His people, as at a feast. Hence its dimensions are larger than that of old—three cubits high, two broad, instead of two and one. 25. thick planks—a thick-plank work at the threshold.

CHAPTER XLII.

Ver. 1-20. CHAMBERS OF THE PRIESTS: MEASUREMENTS OF THE TEMPLE. 2. Before the length of an hundred cubits—i. e., Before "the separate place," which was that length (ch. 41. 13). He had before spoken of chambers for the officiating priests on the north and south gates of the inner court (ch. 40. 44-46). He now returns to take a more exact view of them. 5. shorter—i. e., the building became narrower as it rose in height. The chambers were many: so "in my Father's house are many mansions" (John 14. 2); and besides these there was much "room" still left (cf. Luke 14. 22). The chambers, though private, were near the temple. Prayer in our chambers is to prepare us for public devotions, and to help us in improving them. 16. five hundred reeds—LXX. substitute "cubits" for "reeds," to escape the immense compass assigned to the whole, viz., a square of 500 rods or 3000 cubits (two feet each; ch. 40. 5), in all a square of one and one-seventh miles, i. e., more than all ancient Jerusalem; also, there is much space thus left unappropriated. FAIRBAIRN rightly supports English Version, which agrees with the Hebrew. The vast extent is another feature marking the ideal character of the temple. It symbolizes the great enlargement of the kingdom of God, when Jehovah-Messiah shall reign at Jerusalem, and from thence to the ends of the earth (Isaiah 2. 2-4; Jeremiah 3. 17; Romans 11. 12, 15). 20. wall . . . separation between . . . sanctuary and . . . profane—no longer shall the wall of partition be to separate the Jew and the Gentile (Ephesians 2. 14), but to separate the sacred from the profane. The lowness of it renders it unfit for the purpose of defence (the object of the wall, Revelation 21. 12). But its square form (as in the city, Revelation 21. 16) is the emblem of the kingdom that cannot be shaken (Hebrews 12. 28), resting on prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ver. 1-27. JOHovah's RETURN TO THE TEMPLE. Every thing was now ready for His reception. As the Shekinah-glory was the peculiar distinction of the old temple, so it was to be in the new in a degree as much more transcendent as the proportions of the new exceeded those of the old. The fact that the Shekinah-glory was not in the second temple proves that it cannot be that temple which is meant in the prophecy. 2. the way of the east—the way whereby the glory had departed (ch. 11. 22, 23), and rested on Mount Olivet (cf. Zechariah 14. 4). his voice . . . like . . . many waters—So English Version rightly, as ch. 1. 24, "voice of the Almighty;" Revelation 1. 15; 14. 2, prove. Not as FAIRBAIRN translates, "its noise," earth his glory—(Revelation 18. 1.) 3. when I came to destroy the city—i. e., to pronounce God's word for its destruction. So completely did the prophets identify themselves with Him in whose name they spake. 6. the man—who had been measuring the buildings (ch. 40. 3). 7. the place—i. e., beheld the place of my throne, &c.—the place on which your thoughts have so much dwelt (Isaiah 2. 1-3; Jeremiah 3. 17; Zechariah 14. 16-20; Malachi 3. 1). God from the first claimed to be their King politically as well as religiously: and had resisted their wish to have a human king, as implying a rejection of Him as the proper Head of the state. Even when He yielded to their wish, it was with a protest against their king ruling except as His vicegerent. When Messiah shall reign at Jerusalem, He shall realize then first the original idea of the theocracy, with its at once Divine and human king reigning in righteousness over a people all righteous (v. 12; Isaiah 52. 1; 54. 13; 60. 21). I will dwell in the midst . . . for ever—(Revelation 21. 3.) 9. carcasses of their kings—It is supposed that some of their idolatrous kings were buried within the bounds of Solomon's temple. [HENDERSON.] Rather, "the carcasses of their idols," here called "kings," as having had lordship over them in past times (Isaiah 26. 13); but henceforth Jehovah, alone their rightful lord, shall be their king, and the idols that had been their "kings" would appear but as "carcasses." Hence these defunct kings are associated with the "high places" in v. 7. [FAIRBAIRN.] Leviticus 26. 30; Jeremiah 16. 18, confirm this. Manasses had built altars in the courts of the temple to the host of heaven (2 Kings 21. 5; 23. 6). 10. show the house . . . that they may be ashamed of their iniquities—When the spirituality of the Christian scheme is shown to men by the Holy Ghost, it makes them "ashamed of their iniquities." 12. whole . . . most holy—This superlative, which had been used exclusively of the holy of holies (Exodus 26. 34), was now to characterize the entire building. This all-pervading sanctity was to be "the law of the (whole) house," as distinguished from the Levitical law, which confined the peculiar sanctity to a single apartment of it. 13-27. As to the altar of burnt offering, which was the appointed means of access to God. 15. Altar—Hebrew, "Harel," i. e., mount of God; denoting the high security to be imparted by it to the restored Israel. It was a high place, but a high place of God, not of idols. From the altar—lit., "the lion of God," Arieil (in Isaiah 29. 1, "Ariel" is applied to Jerusalem). MENOCHIUS supposes that on it four animals were carved; the lion perhaps was the uppermost, whence the horns were made to issue. GESENIUS regards the two words as expressing the hearth or fireplace of the altar. 16. square in the four squares—square on the four sides of its squares. [FAIRBAIRN.] 17. settle—ledge. [FAIRBAIRN.] stairs—rather, "the ascent," as "steps" up to God's altar were forbidden in Exodus 20. 26. 18-27. The sacrifices here are not mere commemorative, but propitiatory ones. The expressions, "blood" (v. 18), and "for a sin offering" (v. 19, 21, 22), prove this. In the literal sense they can only apply to the second temple. Under the Christian dispensation they would directly oppose the doctrine taught in Hebrews 10. 1-18, viz., that Christ has by one offering for ever atoned for sin. However, it is possible that they might exist with a retrospective reference to Christ's sufferings, as the Levitical sacrifices had a prospective reference to them; not propitiatory in themselves, but memorials to keep up the remembrance of His propitiatory sufferings, which form the foundation of His kingdom, lest they should be lost sight of in the glory of that kingdom. [DE BURGH.] The particularity of the directions make it unlikely that they are to be understood in a merely vague spiritual sense. 20. cleanse—lit., make expiation for. 21. burn it . . . without the sanctuary—(Hebrews 13. 11.) 26. consecrate themselves—lit., fill their hands, viz., with offerings; referring to the mode of consecrating a priest (Exodus 29. 24, 35). 26. Seven days—referring to the original directions of Moses for seven days' purification services of the altar (Exodus

29. 37). 27. I will accept you—(Ch. 20. 40, 41; Romans 15. 1; 1 Peter 2. 5.)

CHAPTER XLIV.

Ver. 1-31. ORDINANCES FOR THE PRINCE AND THE PRIESTS. 2. shut . . . not be opened—(Job 12. 14; Isaiah 22. 22; Revelation 3. 7.) "Shut" to the people (Exodus 19. 21, 22), but open to "the prince" (v. 3), he holding the place of God in political concerns, as the priests do in spiritual. As a mark of respect to an Eastern monarch, the gate by which he enters is thenceforth shut to all other persons (cf. Exodus 19. 24). 3. the prince—not King Messiah, as He never would offer a burnt offering for Himself, as the prince is to do (ch. 46. 4). The prince must mean the civil ruler under Messiah. His connection with the east gate (by which the Lord had returned to His temple) implies, that, as ruling under God, he is to stand in a place of peculiar nearness to God. He represents Messiah, who entered heaven, the true sanctuary, by a way that none other could, viz., by His own holiness; all others must enter as sinners by faith in His blood, through grace. eat bread before the Lord—a custom connected with sacrifices (Genesis 31. 54; Exodus 18. 12; 24. 11; 1 Corinthians 10. 18). 4. &c. Directions as to the priests. Their acts of desecration are attributed to "the house of Israel" (v. 6, 7), as the sins of the priesthood and of the people acted and reacted on one another; "like people, like priest" (Jeremiah 5. 31; Hosea 4. 9). 7. uncircumcised in heart—Israelites circumcised outwardly, but wanting the true circumcision of the heart (Deuteronomy 10. 16; Acts 7. 51). uncircumcised in flesh—not having even the outward badge of the covenant people. 8. keepers . . . for yourselves—such as yourselves thought fit, not such as I approve of. Or else, "Ye have not yourselves kept the charge of my holy things, but have set others as keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves." [MAURER.] 10, 11. Levites . . . shall . . . bear (viz., the punishment of) their iniquity . . . Yet they shall be ministers—So Mark, a Levite, nephew of Barnabas (Acts 4. 36), was punished by Paul for losing an opportunity of bearing the cross of Christ, and yet was afterwards admitted into his friendship again, and showed his zeal (Acts 13. 13; 15. 37; Colossians 4. 10; 2 Timothy 4. 11). One may be a believer, and that too in a distinguished place, and yet lose some special honour—be acknowledged as pious, yet be excluded from some dignity. [BENGEL.] charge at the gates—Better to be "a doorkeeper in the house of God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness" (Psalm 84. 10). Though standing as a mere doorkeeper, it is in the house of God, which hath foundations; whereas he who dwells with the wicked, dwells in but shifting tents. 15. Zadok—The priests of the line of Ithamar were to be discharged from ministrations in the temple, because of their corruptions, following in the steps of Eli's sons, against whom the same denunciation was uttered (1 Samuel 2. 32, 35). Zadok, according to his name, which means righteous, and his line, were to succeed (1 Kings 2. 35; 1 Chronicles 24. 3), as they did not take part in the general apostasy to the same degree, and perhaps [FAIRBAIRN] the prophet, referring to their original state, speaks of them as they appeared when first chosen to the office. 17. linen—symbolical of purity. Wool soon induces perspiration in the sultry East, and so becomes uncleanly. 18. bonnets—turbans. 19. not sanctify the people with their garments—viz., those peculiarly priestly vestments in which they ministered in the sanctuary. 20. Neither . . . shave . . . heads—as mourners do (Leviticus 21. 1-5). The worshippers of the Egyptian idols Serapis and Isis shaved their heads; another reason why Jehovah's priests are not to do so. nor suffer . . . locks to grow long—as the luxurious, barbarians, and soldiers in warfare did. [JEROME.] 21. Neither . . . wine—lest the holy enthusiasm of their devotion should be mistaken for inebriation, as in Peter's case (Acts 2. 13, 15, 18). 28. I am their inheritance—(Numbers 18. 20; Deuteronomy 10. 9; 18. 1; Joshua 13. 14, 33). 30. give . . . priest the first . . . that he may cause the blessing to rest—(Proverbs 3. 9, 10; Malachi 3. 10.)

CHAPTER XLV.

Ver. 1-25. ALLOTMENT OF THE LAND FOR THE SANCTUARY, THE CITY, AND THE PRINCE. 1. offer an oblation—from a Hebrew root to heave or raise; because when anything was offered to God, the offerer raised the hand. The special territorial division for the tribes is given in ch. 47, 48. Only Jehovah's portion is here subdivided into its three parts: (1) that for the sanctuary (v. 2, 3); (2) that for the priests (v. 4); (3) that for the Levites (v. 5). Cf. ch. 48, 8-13. five and twenty thousand reeds, &c.—so English Version rightly fills the ellipsis (cf. Note, ch. 42, 16). Hence "cubits" are mentioned in v. 2, not here, implying that there alone cubits are meant. Taking each reed at twelve feet, the area of the whole would be a square of sixty miles on each side. The whole forming a square betokens the settled stability of the community and the harmony of all classes. "The holy portion of the Lord" (v. 1) comprised the whole length, and only two-fifths of the breadth. The outer territory in its distribution harmonizes with the inner and more sacred arrangements of the sanctuary. No room is to be given for oppression (see v. 8), all having ample provision made for their wants and comforts. All will mutually co-operate without constraint or contention. 7. The prince's possession is to consist of two halves, one on the west, the other on the east, of the sacred territory. The prince, as head of the holy community, stands in closest connection with the sanctuary; his possession, therefore, on both sides must adjoin that which was peculiarly the Lord's. [FAIRBAIRN.] 12. The standard weights were lost when the Chaldeans destroyed the temple. The threefold enumeration of shekels, twenty, twenty-five, fifteen, probably refers to coins of different value, representing respectively so many shekels, the three collectively making up a maneh. By weighing these together against the maneh, a test was afforded whether they severally had their proper weight: sixty shekels in all, containing one coin a fourth of the whole (fifteen shekels), another a third (twenty shekels), another a third and a twelfth (twenty-five shekels). [MENOCHIUS.] LXX. read, "if thy shekels shall be your maneh." 13-15. In these oblations there is a progression as to the relation between the kind and the quantity: of the corn, the sixth of a tenth, i. e., a sixtieth part of the quantity specified; of the oil, the tenth of a tenth, i. e., an hundredth part; and of the flock, one from every 200. 18. The year is to begin with a consecration service, not mentioned under the Levitical law; but an earnest of it is given in the feast of dedication of the second temple, which celebrated its purification by Judas Maccabeus, after its defilement by Antiochus. 20. for him that is simple—for sins of ignorance (Leviticus 4, 2, 13, 27). 21. As a new solemnity, the feast of consecration is to prepare for the passover, so the passover itself is to have different sacrifices from those of the Mosaic law. Instead of one ram and seven lambs for the daily burnt offering, there are to be seven bullocks and seven rams. So also whereas the feast of tabernacles had its own offerings, which diminished as the days of the feast advanced, here the same are appointed as on the passover. Thus it is implied, that the letter of the law is to give place to its spirit, those outward rites of Judaism having no intrinsic efficacy, but symbolizing the spiritual truths of Messiah's kingdom, as for instance the perfect holiness which is to characterize it. Cf. 1 Corinthians 5, 7, 8, as to our spiritual "passover," wherein, at the Lord's supper, we feed on Christ by faith, accompanied with "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." Literal ordinances, though not slavishly bound to the letter of the law, will set forth the catholic and eternal verities of Messiah's kingdom.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Ver. 1-24. CONTINUATION OF THE ORDINANCES FOR THE PRINCE AND FOR THE PEOPLE IN THEIR WORSHIP. 2. The prince is to go through the east gate without (open on the sabbath only, to mark its peculiar sanctity) to the entrance of the gate of the inner court; he is to go no further, but "stand by the post" (cf. 1 Kings 8, 14, 22, Solomon standing before the altar of the Lord in the presence of the congregation; also 2 Kings 11, 14; 23, 3, "by a pillar: the customary place), the court within belonging exclusively to the priests. There, as representative of the people, in a peculiarly near relation to God, he is to present his offerings to Jehovah, whilst at a greater distance, the people are to stand worshipping at the outer gate of the same entrance. The offerings on sabbaths are larger than those of the Mosaic law, to imply that the worship of God is to be conducted by the prince and people in a more munificent spirit of self-sacrificing liberality than formerly. 9. The worshippers were on the great feasts to pass from one side to the other, through the temple courts, in order that, in such a throng as should attend the festivals, the ingress and egress should be the more unimpeded, those going out not being in the way of those coming in. 10. prince in the midst—not isolated as at other times, but joining the great throng of worshippers, at their head, after the example of David (Psalm 42, 4, "I had gone with the multitude . . . to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy day"); the highest in rank animating the devotions of the rest by his presence and example. 12-15. Not only is he to perform official acts of worship on holy days and feasts, but in "voluntary" offerings daily he is to show his individual zeal, surpassing all his people in liberality, and so setting them a princely example. 16-18. The prince's possession is to be inalienable, and any portion given to a servant is to revert to his sons at the year of jubilee, that he may have no temptation to spoil his people of their inheritance, as formerly (cf. Ahab and Naboth, 1 Kings 21). The mention of the year of jubilee implies that there is something literal meant, besides the spiritual sense. The jubilee year was restored after the captivity. [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 14, 10, 6; 1 Maccabees 6, 49.] Perhaps it will be restored under Messiah's coming reign. Cf. Isaiah 61, 2, 3, where "the acceptable year of the Lord" is closely connected with the comforting of the mourners in Zion, and "the day of vengeance" on Zion's foes. The mention of the prince's sons is another argument against Messiah being meant by "the prince." 19-24. Due regard is to be had for the sanctity of the officiating priests' food, by cooking-courts being provided close to their chambers. One set of apartments for cooking was to be at the corners of the inner court, reserved for the flesh of the sin offerings, to be eaten only by the priests whose requisite it was (Leviticus 6, 25; 7, 7), before coming forth to mingle again with the people; another set at the corners of the outer court, for cooking the flesh of the peace offerings, of which the people partook along with the priests. All this implies that no longer are the common and unclean to be confounded with the sacred and divine, but that in even the least things, as eating and drinking, the glory of God is to be the aim (1 Corinthians 10, 31). 23. courts joined—FAIRBAIRN translates, "roofed" or "vaulted." But these cooking apartments seem to have been uncovered, to let the smoke and smell of the meat the more easily pass away. They were "joined" or "attached" to the walls of the courts at the corners of the latter. [MENOCHIUS.] 23. boiling-places—boilers, under the rows—at the foot of the rows, i. e., in the lowest part of the walls, were the places for boiling made.

CHAPTER XLVII.

Ver. 1-23. VISION OF THE TEMPLE WATERS, BORDERS AND DIVISION OF THE LAND. The happy fruit to the earth at large of God's dwelling with Israel in holy fellowship is, that the blessing is no longer restricted to the one people and locality, but is to be diffused with comprehensive catholicity through the whole world. So the plant from the cedar of Lebanon is represented as gathering under its shelter "all fowl of every wing" (ch. 17, 23). Even the desert places of the earth shall be made fruitful by the healing waters of the gospel (cf. Isaiah 35, 1). 1. waters—so Revelation 22, 1, represents "the water of life as proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb." His throne was set up in the temple at Jerusalem (ch. 43. 7). Thence it is to flow over the earth (Joel 3. 18; Zechariah 13. 1; 14. 8). Messiah is the temple and the door; from His pierced side flow the living waters, ever increasing, both in the individual believer and in the heart. The fountains in the vicinity of Moriah suggested the image here. The waters flow eastward, i. e., towards the Kedron, and thence towards the Jordan, and so along the Ghor into the Dead Sea. The main point in the picture is the rapid augmentation from a petty stream into a mighty river, not by the influx of side-streams, but by its own self-supply from the sacred miraculous source in the temple. [HENDERSON.] (Cf. Psalm 36. 8, 9; 46. 4; Isaiah 11. 9; Habakkuk 2. 14.) Searching into the things of God, we find some easy to understand, as the water up to the ankles; others more difficult, which require a deeper search, as the waters up to the knees or loins; others beyond our reach, of which we can only adore the depth (Romans 11. 33). The healing of the waters of the Dead Sea here answers to "there shall be no more curse" (Revelation 22. 3; cf. Zechariah 14. 11). 7. trees—not merely one tree of life as in Paradise (Genesis 2), but many: to supply immortal food and medicine to the people of God, who themselves also become "trees of righteousness" (Isaiah 61. 3) planted by the waters, and (Psalm 1. 3) bearing fruit unto holiness. 8. the desert—or plain, Hebrew "Arabah" (Deuteronomy 3. 17; 4. 49; Joshua 8. 16), which is the name still given to the valley of the Jordan and the plain south of the Dead Sea, and extending to the Elanitic gulf of the Red Sea. the sea—the Dead Sea. "The sea" noted as covering with its waters the guilty cities of the plain, Sodom and Gomorrah. In its bituminous waters no vegetable or animal life is said to be found. But now death is to give place to life in Judea, and throughout the world, as symbolized by the healing of these death-pervaded waters covering the doomed cities. Cf. as to "the sea" in general, regarded as a symbol of the troubled powers of nature, disordered by the fall, henceforth to rage no more, Revelation 21. 1. 9. rivers—in Hebrew, "two rivers." Hence Hebrew expositors think that the waters from the temple were divided into two branches, the one emptying itself into the eastern or Dead Sea, the other into the western or Mediterranean. So Zechariah 14. 8. However, though this probably is covertly implied in the Hebrew dual, the flowing of the waters into the Dead Sea only is expressed. Cf. v. 8, "waters . . . healed," which can apply only to it, not to the Mediterranean; also v. 10, "fish as the fish of the great sea;" the Dead Sea, when healed, containing fish, as the Mediterranean does. 10. En-gedi . . . En-eglaim—En-gedi (meaning "fountain of the kid"), anciently, Hazazon-Tamar, now Ain-Jidy; west of the Dead Sea; David's place of refuge from Saul. En-eglaim means "fountain of two calves," on the confines of Moab, over against En-gedi, and near where Jordan enters the Dead Sea (Isaiah 15. 8). These two limits are fixed on, to comprise between them the whole Dead Sea. fish . . . according to their kinds—JEROME quotes an ancient theory that "there are 153 kinds of fishes," all of which were taken by the apostles (John 21. 11), and not one remained uncaptured; signifying that both the noble and base-born, the rich and the poor, and every class, are being drawn out of the sea of the world to salvation. Cf. Matthew 14. 47, the gospel net; the apostles being fishermen, at first literally, afterwards spiritually (Matthew 4. 19). 11. marshes—marshy places. The region is known to have such pits and marshes. The Arabs take the salt collected by evaporation in these pits for their own use, and that of their flocks. not be healed—those not reached by the healing waters of the gospel, through their sloth and earthly-mindedness, are given over (Revelation 22. 11) to their own bitterness and barrenness (as "saltiness" is often employed to express, Deuteronomy 29. 23; Psalm 107. 34; Zephaniah 2. 9); an awful example to others in the punishment they suffer (2 Peter 2. 6). 12. Instead of the "vine of Sodom and grapes of Gomorrah" (Deuteronomy 32. 32), nauseous and unwholesome, trees of life-giving and life-restoring virtue shall bloom similar in properties to, and

exceeding in number, the tree of life in Eden (Revelation 2. 7; 22. 2, 14). leaf . . . not fade—expressing not only the unfulfilling character of the heavenly medicine of the tree of life, but also that the graces of the believer (as a tree of righteousness), which are the leaves, and his deeds, which are the fruits that flow from those graces, are immortal (Psalm 1. 3; Jeremiah 17. 8; Matthew 10. 42; 1 Corinthians 15. 58). new fruit—lit., firstlings, or first-fruit. They are still, each month afresh, as it were, yielding their first-fruit. [FAIRBAIRN.] The first-born of a thing, in Hebrew idiom, means the chiefest. As Job 18. 13, "the first-born of death," i. e., the most fatal death. 13. The re-division of the land: the boundaries. The latter are substantially the same as those given by Moses in Numbers 34.; they here begin with the north, but in Numbers 34. they begin with the south. It is only Canaan proper, exclusive of the possession of the two and a half tribes beyond Jordan, that is here divided. Joseph . . . two portions—according to the original promise of Jacob (Genesis 48. 5, 22). Joseph's sons were given the birth-right forfeited by Reuben the first-born (1 Chronicles 5. 1). Therefore the former is here put first. His two sons having distinct portions make up the whole number twelve portions, as he had just before specified "twelve tribes of Israel;" for Levi had no separate inheritance, so that he is not reckoned in the twelve. 15. Zedad—on the north boundary of Canaan. 16. Hamath—as Israel was a separate people, so their land was a separate land. On no scene could the sacred history have been so well transacted as on it. On the east was the sandy desert. On the north and south, mountains. On the west, an inhospitable sea-shore. But it was not always to be a separate land. Between the parallel ranges of Lebanon is the long valley of El-Bekaa, leading to "the entering in of Hamath" on the Orontes, in the Syrian frontier. Roman roads, and the harbour made at Cæsarea, opened out doors through which the gospel should go from it to all lands. So in the last days, when all shall flock to Jerusalem as the religious centre of the world. Berothah—a city in Syria conquered by David (2 Samuel 8. 8); meaning wells. Hazar-hatticon—meaning "the middle village." Hauran—a tract in Syria, south of Damascus; Auranitis. 17. Hazar-enan—a town in the north of Canaan, meaning "village of fountains." 18. east sea—the Dead Sea. The border is to go down straight to it by the valley of the Jordan. So Numbers 34. 11, 12. 19. Tamar—not Tadmor in the desert, but Tamar, the last town of Judea, by the Dead Sea. Meaning "palm-tree;" so called from palm-trees abounding near it. 22. to the strangers—It is altogether unprecedented under the old covenant, that "strangers" should have "inheritance" among the tribes. There would not be locally room within Canaan for more than the tribes. The literal sense must therefore be modified, as expressing that Gentiles are not to be excluded from settling among the covenant people, and that spiritually their privileges are not to be less than those of Israel (Romans 10. 12; Galatians 3. 23; Ephesians 3. 6; Colossians 3. 11; Revelations 7. 9, 10). Still, "sojourneth," in v. 23, implies that in Canaan, the covenant-people are regarded as at home, the strangers as settlers.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Ver. 1-35. ALLOTMENT OF THE LAND TO THE SEVERAL TRIBES. 1. Dan—The lands are divided into portions of ideal exactness, running alongside of each other, the whole breadth from west to east, standing in a common relation to the temple in the centre: seven tribes' portions on the north, five in the smaller division in the south. The portions of the city, the temple, the prince, and the priesthood, are in the middle, not within the boundaries of any tribe, all alike having a common interest in them. Judah has the place of honour next the centre on the north, Benjamin the corresponding place of honour next the centre on the south; because of the adherence of these two to the temple ordinances and to the house of David for so long, when the others deserted them. Dan, on the contrary, so long locally and morally semi-heathen

(Judges 18.), is to have the least honourable place, at the extreme north. For the same reason, St. John (Revelation 7. 5-8) omits Dan altogether. 3. Asher—a tribe of which no one of note is mentioned in the Old Testament. In the New Testament one is singled out of it, the prophetic Anna. 4. Manasseh—the intercourse and unity between the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan, and the nine and a half west of it, had been much kept up by the splitting of Manasseh, causing the visits of kinsmen one to the other from both sides of the Jordan. There shall be no need for this in the new order of things. 5. Ephraim—This tribe, within its two dependent tribes, Manasseh and Benjamin, for upwards of 400 years under the judges held the pre-eminence. 6. Reuben—doomed formerly for incest and instability "not to excel" (Genesis 49. 4). So no distinguished prophet, priest, or king had come from it. Of it were the notorious Dathan and Abiram, the mutineers. A pastoral and Bedouin character marked it and Gad (Judges 5. 16). 15-17. The 5000 rods, apportioned to the city out of the 25,000 square, are to be laid off in a square of 4500, with the 250 all around for suburbs. profane—i. e., not strictly sacred as the sacerdotal portions, but applied to secular uses. 24. Benjamin—Cf. Jacob's prophecy (Genesis 49. 27; Deuteronomy 33. 12). It alone with Judah had been throughout loyal to the house of David, so its prowess at the "night" of the national history was celebrated as well as "In the morning." 25. Simeon—omitted in the blessing of Moses in Deuteronomy 33, perhaps because of the Simeonite "prince," who at Baal-peor led the Israelites in their idolatrous whoredoms with Midian (Numbers 25. 14). 26. Issachar—Its ancient portion had been on the plain of Esdraelon. Compared (Genesis 49. 14) to "a strong ass crouching between two burdens," i. e., tribute and tillage; never meddling with wars except in self-defence. 31. gates—(Revelation 21. 12, &c.) The twelve gates bear the names of the twelve tribes, to imply that all are regarded as having an interest in it. 35. Lord is there—Jehovah-Shammah. Not that the city will be called so in mere name, but that the reality will be best expressed by this descriptive title (Jeremiah 3. 17; 33. 16; Zechariah 2. 10; Revelation 21. 3; 22. 3).

BOOK OF DANIEL.

INTRODUCTION.

DANIEL, i. e., God is my judge; probably of the blood royal (cf. ch. 1. 3, with 1 Chronicles 3. 1, where a son of David is named so). Jerusalem may have been his birth-place (though ch. 9. 24, "thy holy city," does not necessarily imply this). He was carried to Babylon among the Hebrew captives brought thither by Nebuchadnezzar at the first deportation in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. As he and his three companions are called (ch. 1. 4) "children," he cannot have been more than about twelve years old when put in training, according to Eastern etiquette, to be a courtier (ch. 1. 3, 6). He then received a new name, by which it was usual to mark a change in one's condition (2 Kings 23. 34; 24. 17; Ezra 5. 14; Esther 2. 7), Belteshazzar, i. e., a prince favoured by Bel. His piety and wisdom were proverbial among his countrymen at an early period; probably owing to that noble proof he gave of faithfulness, combined with wisdom, in abstaining from the food sent to him from the king's table, as being polluted by the idolatries usual at heathen banquets (ch. 1. 8-16). Hence Ezekiel's reference to him (Ezekiel 14. 14, 20; 23. 3) is precisely of that kind we should expect; a coincidence which must be undesigned. Ezekiel refers to him not as a writer, but as exhibiting a character righteous and wise in discerning secrets, in those circumstances now found in his book, which are earlier than the time when Ezekiel wrote. As Joseph rose in Egypt by interpreting Pharaoh's dreams, so Daniel, by interpreting Nebuchadnezzar's, was promoted to be governor of Babylonia, and president of the Magian priest-caste. Under Evil-merodach, Nebuchadnezzar's successor, as a change of officers often attends the accession of a new king, Daniel seems to have had a lower post, which led him occasionally to be away from Babylon (ch. 8. 2, 27). Again he came into note when he read the mystic writing of Belshazzar's doom on the wall on the night of that monarch's impious feast. BEROSUS calls the last Babylonian king Nabonidus, and says he was not killed, but had an honourable abode in Carmania assigned to him, after having surrendered voluntarily in Borsippa. RAWLINSON has cleared up the discrepancy from the Nineveh inscription. Belshazzar was joint-king with his father, Evil-merodach or Nabonidus (called Minus in the inscriptions), to whom he was subordinate. He shut himself up in Babylon, whilst the other king took refuge elsewhere, viz., in Borsippa. BEROSUS gives the Chaldean account, which suppresses all about Belshazzar, as being to the national dishonour. Had Daniel been a late book, he would no doubt have taken up the later account of BEROSUS. If he gave a history differing from that current in Babylonia, the Jews of that region would not have received it as true. Darius the Mede, or Cyaxares II., succeeded and reigned two years. The mention of this monarch's reign, almost unknown to profane history, being eclipsed by the splendour of Cyrus, is an incidental proof that Daniel wrote as a contemporary historian of events which he knew, and did not borrow from others. In the third year of Cyrus he saw the visions (ch. 10.-12.) relating to his people down to the latest days and the coming resurrection. He must have been about eighty-four years old at this time. Tradition represents Daniel as having died and been buried at Shushan. Though his advanced age did not allow him to be among those who returned to Palestine, yet he never ceased to have his people's interests nearest to his heart (chs. 9. and 10. 12).

AUTHENTICITY OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL. Ch. 7. 1, 28; 8. 2; 9. 2; 10. 1, 2; 12. 4, 5, testify that it was composed by Daniel himself. He does not mention himself in the first six chapters, which are historical; for in these it is not the author, but the events which are the prominent point. In the last six, which are prophetic, the author makes himself known, for here it was needed, prophecy being a revelation of words to particular men. It holds a third rank in the Hebrew canon: not among the prophets, but in the Haglographa (Chetubim), between Esther and Ezra, books like it relating to the captivity; because he did not strictly belong to those who held exclusively the profession of "prophets" in the theocracy, but was rather a "seer," having the gift, but not the office of prophet. Were the book an interpolated one, it would have been doubtless placed among the prophets. Its present position is a proof of its genuineness, as it was deliberately put in a position different from that where most would expect to find it. Placed between Esther, and Ezra and Nehemiah, it separated the historical books of the time after the captivity. Thus, Daniel was, as BENGEI calls him, the politician, chronologer, and historian among the prophets. The Psalms also though many are prophetic, are ranked with the Hagiographa, not with the prophets; and the Revelation of John is separated from his Epistles, as Daniel is from the Old Testament prophets. Instead of writing in the midst of the covenant people, and making them the foreground of his picture, he writes in a heathen court, the world-kings occupying the foreground, and the kingdom of God, though ultimately made the most significant, the background. His peculiar position in the heathen court is reflected in his peculiar position in the canon. As the "prophets" in the Old Testament, so the Epistles of the apostles in the New Testament were written by divinely-commissioned persons for their contemporaries. But Daniel and John were not in immediate contact with the congregation, but isolated and alone with God, the one in a heathen court, the other on a lonely isle (Revelation 1. 9). PORPHYRY, the assailant of Christianity in the third century, asserted that the book of Daniel was a forgery of the time of the Maccabees, 170-164 B. C., a time when confessedly there were no prophets, written after the events as to Antiochus Epiphanes, which it professes to foretell; so accurate are the details. A conclusive proof of Daniel's inspiration, if his prophecies can be shown to have been before the events. Now we know, from JOSEPHUS, that the Jews in Christ's days recognized Daniel as in the canon, Zechariah, Ezra, and Nehemiah, centuries before Antiochus, refer to it. Jesus refers to it in His characteristic designation, "Son of man," Matthew 24. 30 (Daniel 7. 13); also expressly by name, and as a "prophet," in Matthew 24. 15 (cf. Matthew 24. 21, with Daniel 12. 1, &c.); and in the moment that decided His life (Matthew 26. 64) or death, when the high priest adjured him by the living God. Also, in Luke 1. 19-26, "Gabriel" is mentioned, whose name occurs nowhere else in Scripture, save ch. 8. 16; 9. 21. Besides the references to it in Revelation, Paul confirms the prophetic part of it, as to the blasphemous king (Daniel 7. 8, 25; 11. 36), in 1 Corinthians 6. 2; 2 Thessalonians 2. 3, 4; the narrative part, as to the miraculous deliverances from "the lions" and "the fire," in Hebrews 11. 33, 34. Thus the book is expressly attested by the New Testament on the three points made the stumbling-block of neologists—the predictions, the narratives of miracles, and the manifestations of angels. An objection has been started to the unity of the book, viz., that Jesus quotes no part of the first half of Daniel. But Matthew 21. 44 would be an enigma if it were not a reference to the "stone that smote the image" (Daniel 2. 34, 35, 44, 45). Thus the New Testament sanctions chs. 2., 3., 6., 7., and 11. The design of the miracles in the heathen courts where Daniel was, as of those of Moses in Egypt, was to lead the world-power, which seemed to be victorious over the theocracy, to see the essential inner superiority of the seemingly fallen kingdom of God to itself, and to show prostrate Israel that the power of God was the same as of old in Egypt. The first book of Maccabees (cf. 1 Maccabees 1. 24; 9. 27, 40, with Daniel 12. 1; 11. 26, of LXX.) refers to Daniel as an accredited book, and even refers to the LXX. Alexandrian version of it. The fact of Daniel having a place in the LXX. shows it was received by the Jews at large prior to the Maccabean times. The LXX. version so arbitrarily deviated from the Hebrew Daniel, that Theodotion's version was substituted for it in the early Christian Church. JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 7. 11, 8) mentions that Alexander the Great had designed to punish the Jews for their fidelity to Darius, but that Jaddua (332 B. C.), the high priest, met him at the head of a procession, and averted his wrath by showing him Daniel's prophecy that a Grecian monarch should overthrow Persia. Certain it is, Alexander favoured the Jews, and JOSEPHUS' statement gives an explanation of the fact; at least it shows that the Jews in JOSEPHUS' days believed that Daniel was extant in Alexander's days, long before the Maccabees. With Jaddua (high priest from B. C. 341-322) the Old Testament history ends (Nehemiah 12. 11). (The register of the priests and Levites was not written by Nehemiah, who died about 400 B. C., but was inserted with Divine sanction by the collectors of the canon subsequently.) An objection to Daniel's authenticity has been rested on a few Greek words found in it. But these are mostly names of Greek musical instruments, which were imported by Greece from the East, rather than vice versa. Some of the words are derived from the common Indo-Germanic stock of both Greek and Chaldee; hence their appearance in both tongues. And one or two may have come through the Greeks of Asia Minor to the Chaldee. The fact that from the fourth verse of the second chapter to the end of the seventh, the language is Chaldee, but the rest Hebrew, is not an argument against, but for, its authenticity. So in Ezra the two languages are found. The work, if that of one author, must have been composed by some one in the circumstances of Daniel, i. e., by one familiar with both languages. No native-born Hebrew who had not lived in Chaldea would know Chaldee so well as to use it with the same idiomatic ease as his native tongue; the very impurities in Daniel's use of both are just such as were natural to one in his circumstances, but unnatural to one in a later age, or to one not half Hebrew, half Chaldean in residence as Daniel was. Those parts of Daniel which concern the whole world are mostly Chaldee, then the language of the world-empire. So Greek was made the language of the New Testament, which was designed for the whole world. Those affecting the Jews, mostly Hebrew; and this not so impure as that of Ezekiel. His Chaldee is a mixture of Hebrew and Aramaic. Two predictions alone are enough to prove to us that Daniel was a true prophet. (1.) That his prophecies reach beyond Antiochus; viz., he foretells the rise of the four great monarchies, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome (the last not being in Daniel's time known beyond the precincts of Italy, or rather of Latium), and that no other earthly kingdom would subvert the fourth, but that it would divide into parts. All this has come to pass. No fifth great earthly monarchy has arisen, though often attempted, as by Charlemagne, Charles V., and Napoleon. (2.) The time of Messiah's advent, as dated from a certain decree, His being cut off, and the destruction of the city. "He who denies Daniel's prophecies," says Sir Isaac Newton, "undermines Christianity, which is founded on Daniel's prophecies concerning Christ."

CHARACTERISTICS OF DANIEL. The vision mode of revelation is the exception in other prophets, the rule in Daniel. In Zechariah (1-6.), who lived after Daniel, the same mode appears, but the other form from the seventh chapter to the end. The Revelation of St. John alone is perfectly parallel to Daniel, which may be called the Old Testament Apocalypse. In the contents too there is the difference above noticed, that he views the kingdom of God from the standpoint of the world-kingsdoms, the development of which is his great subject. This mode of viewing it was appropriate to his own position in a heathen court, and to the relation of subjection in which the covenant people then stood to the world-powers. No longer are single powers of the world incidentally introduced, but the universal monarchies are the chief theme, in which the worldly principle, opposed to the kingdom of God, manifests itself fully. The near and distant are not seen in the same perspective, as by the other prophets, who viewed the whole future from the eschatological point; but in Daniel the historical details are given of that development of the world-powers which must precede the advent of the kingdom. [AUBERLEN.]

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY. The exile is the historical basis of Daniel's prophecies, as Daniel implies in the first chapter, which commences with the beginning, and ends with the termination, of the captivity (ch. 1. 1, 21; cf. ch. 9. 1, 2). A new stage in the theocracy begins with the captivity. Nebuchadnezzar made three incursions into Judah. The first under Jehoiakim (606 B. C.), in which Daniel was carried away, subjected the theocracy to the Babylonian world-power. The second (598 B. C.) was that in which Jehoiachin and Ezekiel were carried away. The third (588 B. C.), in which Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem and carried away Zedekiah. Originally, Abraham was raised out of the "sea" (Daniel 7. 2) of the nations, as an island holy to God, and his seed chosen as God's mediator of His revelations of love to mankind. Under David and Solomon, the theocracy, as opposed to the heathen power, attained its climax in the Old Testament, not only being independent, but lord of the surrounding nations; so that the period of these two kings was henceforth made the type of the Messianic. But when God's people, instead of resting on Him, seek alliance with the world-power, that very power is made the instrument of their chastisement. So Ephraim (722 B. C.) fell by Assyria; and Judah also, drawn into the sphere of the world's movements from the time of Ahaz, who sought Assyrian help (740 B. C.; Isaiah 7.), at last fell by Babylon, and thenceforth has been more or less dependent on the world-monarchies, and so, till Messiah, was favoured with no revelations from the time of Malachi, 400 years. Thus, from the beginning of the exile, the theocracy, in the strict sense, ceased on earth; the rule of the world-powers superseding it. But God's covenant with Israel remains firm (Romans 11. 29); therefore, a period of blessing under Messiah's kingdom is now foretold as about to follow their long chastisement. The exile thus is the turning-point in the history of the theocracy, which Roos thus divides: (1.) From Adam to the exodus out of Egypt. (2.) From the exodus to the beginning of the Babylonian captivity. (3.) From the captivity to the millennium. (4.) From the millennium to the end of the world. The position of Daniel in the Babylonian court was in unison with the altered relations of the theocracy and the world-power, which new relation was to be the theme of his prophecy. Earlier prophets, from the stand-point of Israel, treated of Israel in its relation to the world-powers; Daniel, from Babylon, the centre of the then world-power, treats of the world-powers in their relation to Israel. His seventy years' residence in Babylon, and his high official position there, gave him an insight into the world's politics, fitting him to be the recipient of political revelations; while his spiritual experiences, gained through Nebuchadnezzar's humiliation, Belshazzar's downfall and the rapid decay of the Babylonian empire itself, as well as the miraculous deliverances of himself and his friends (ch. 3.-6.), all fitted him for regarding things from the spiritual stand-point, from which the world's power appears transient, but the glory of God's kingdom eternal. As his political position was the body, the school of magicians in which he had studied for three years (ch. 1. 4, 5) was the soul; and his mind strong in faith and nourished by the earlier prophecies (ch. 9. 2), the spirit of his prophecy, which only waited for the spirit of revelation from above to kindle it. So God fits His organs for their work. AUBERLEN compares Daniel to Joseph: the one at the beginning, the other at the end of the Jewish history of revelation; both representatives of God and His people at heathen courts; both interpreters of the dim presentiments of truth, expressed in God-sent dreams, and therefore raised to honour by the powers of the world: so representing Israel's calling to be a royal priesthood among the nations; and types of Christ, the true Israel, and of Israel's destination to be a light to lighten the whole Gentile world, as Romans 11. 12, 15 foretells. As Achilles at the beginning, and Alexander at the end, of Grecian history are the mirrors of the whole life of the Hellenic people, so Joseph and Daniel of Israel.

CONTENTS OF THE BOOK. Historical and biographical introduction in the first chapter. Daniel, a captive exile, is representative of his nation in its servitude and exile: while his heavenly insight into dreams, far exceeding that of the magi, represents the Divine superiority of the covenant people over their heathen lords. The high dignities, even in the world, which he thereby attained, typify the giving of the earth-kingdom at last "to the people of the saints of the Most High" (ch. 7. 27). Thus Daniel's personal history is the typical foundation of his prophecy. The prophets had to experience in themselves, and in their age, something of what they foretold about future times; just as David felt much of Christ's sufferings in his own person (cf. Hosea 1. 2-9, 10, 11; 2. 3). So Jonah 1., &c. [Roos.] Hence biographical notices of Daniel and his friends are inserted among his prophecies. Chs. 2.-12 contain the substance of the book, and consist of two parts. The first, viz., chs. 2.-7., represent the development of the world-powers, viewed from a historical point. The second, chs. 8.-12., their development in relation to Israel, especially in the future preceding Christ's first advent, foretold in the ninth chapter. But prophecy looks beyond the immediate future to the complete fulfilment in the last days, since the individual parts in the organic history of salvation cannot be understood except in connection with the whole. Also Israel looked forward to the Messianic time, not only for spiritual salvation, but also for the visible restoration of the kingdom which even now we too expect. The prophecy which they needed ought therefore to comprise both, and so much of the history of the world as would elapse before the final consummation. The period of Daniel's prophecies, therefore, is that from the downfall of the theocracy at the captivity till its final restoration, yet future—the period of the dominion of the world-powers, not set aside by Christ's first coming (John 18. 36; for, to have taken the earth-kingdom then, would have been to take it from Satan's hands, Matthew 4. 8-10), but to be superseded by His universal and everlasting kingdom at His second coming (Revelation 11. 15). Thus the general survey of the development and final destiny of the world-powers (chs. 2.-7.) fittingly precedes the disclosures as to the immediate future (chs. 8.-12.). Daniel marks the division by writing the first part in Chaldee, and the second, and the introduction, in Hebrew; the former, referring to the powers of the world, in the language of the then dominant world-power under which he lived; the latter, relating to the people of God, in their own language. An interpolator in a later age would have used Hebrew, the language of the ancient prophets throughout, or if anywhere Aramaic, so as to be understood by his contemporaries, he would have used it in the second rather than in the first part, as having a more immediate reference to his own times. [AUBERLEN.]

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-21. THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY BEGINS; DANIEL'S EDUCATION AT BABYLON, &c. 1. third year—cf. Jeremiah 25. 1, "the fourth year; Jehoiakim came to the throne at the end of the year, which Jeremiah reckons as the first year, but which Daniel leaves out of count, being an incomplete year; thus, in Jeremiah, it is "the fourth year;" in Daniel, "the third." [JAHN.] However, Jeremiah (25. 1; 46. 2) merely says, the fourth year of Jehoiakim coincided with the first of Nebuchadnezzar, when the latter conquered the Egyptians at Carchemish; not that the deportation of captives from Jerusalem was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim: this probably took place in the end of the third year of Jehoiakim, shortly before the battle of Carchemish. [FAIRBAIRN.] Nebuchadnezzar took away the captives as hostages for the submission of the Hebrews. Historical Scripture gives no positive account of this first deportation, with which the Babylonian captivity, i. e., Judah's subjection to Babylon for seventy years (Jeremiah 29. 10), begins. But 2 Chronicles 36. 6, 7, states, that Nebuchadnezzar had intended "to carry Jehoiakim to Babylon," and that he "carried off the vessels of the house of the Lord" thither. But Jehoiakim died at Jerusalem, before the conqueror's intention as to him was carried into effect (Jeremiah 22. 18, 19; 36. 30), and his dead body, as was foretold, was dragged out of the gates by the Chaldean besiegers, and left unburied. The second deportation under Jehoiachin was eight years later. 2. Shinar—the old name of Babylon (Genesis 11. 2; 14. 1; Isaiah 11. 11; Zechariah 5. 11). Nebuchadnezzar took only "part of the vessels," as he did not intend wholly to overthrow the state, but to make it tributary, and to leave such vessels as were absolutely needed for the public worship of Jehovah. Subsequently all were taken away, and were restored under Cyrus (Ezra 1. 7). his god—Bel. His temple, as was often the case among the heathen, was made "treasure-house" of the king. 3. master of . . . eunuchs—called in Turkey the "Kislar Aga." of the king's seed—cf. the prophecy, 2 Kings 20. 17, 18. 4. no blemish—A handsome form was connected, in Oriental ideas, with mental power. "Children" means youths of twelve or fourteen years old. teach . . . tongue of . . . Chaldeans—their language and literature, the Aramaic-Babylonian. That the heathen lore was not altogether valueless appears from the Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses; the Eastern Magi who sought Jesus, and who may have drawn the tradition as to the "King of the Jews" from Daniel 9. 24, &c., written in the East. As Moses was trained in the learning of the Egyptian sages, so Daniel in that of the Chaldeans, to familiarize his mind with mysterious lore, and so develop his heaven-bestowed gift of understanding in visions (v. 4, 5, 17). 5. king's meat—It is usual for an Eastern king to entertain, from the food of his table, many retainers and royal captives (Jeremiah 52. 33, 34). The Hebrew for "meat" implies delicacies. stand before the king—as attendant courtiers; not as eunuchs. 6. children of Judah—the most noble tribe, being that to which the "king's seed" belonged (cf. v. 3). 7. gave names—designed to mark their new relation, that so they might forget their former religion and country (Genesis 41. 45). But as in Joseph's case, whom Pharaoh called Zaphnath-paaneah, so in Daniel's, the name indicative of his relation to a heathen court ("Belteshazzar," i. e., "Bel's prince"), however flattering to him, is not the one retained by Scripture, but the name marking his relation to God ("Daniel," God my Judge, the theme of his prophecies being God's judgment on the heathen world-powers). Hananiah—i. e., Whom Jehovah hath favoured. Shadrach—from Rak, in Babylonian, "the King," i. e., "the Sun;" the same root as in Abrech (Margin, Genesis 41. 43), "Inspired or illumined by the Sun-god." Misael—i. e., "Who is what God is?" Who is comparable to God? Meshach—The Babylonians retained the first syllable of Misael, the Hebrew name; but for El, i. e., God, substituted Shak, the Babylonian goddess, called Sheshach (Jeremiah 23. 26; 51. 41); answering to the Earth, or else Venus, the goddess of love and mirth; it was during her feast that Cyrus took Babylon. Azariah—i. e., "Whom Jehovah helps." Abednego—i. e., Servant of the shining fire. Thus, instead of Jehovah, these His servants were dedicated by the heathen to their four leading gods [HERODOTUS, Clio.] Bel, the Chief-god, the Sun-god, Earth-god, and Fire-god. To the last the three youths were consigned when refusing to worship the golden image (ch. 3). The Chaldee version translates, "Lucifer," in Isaiah 14. 12, Nogea, the same as Nego. The names thus at the outset are significant of the seeming triumph, but sure downfall, of the heathen powers before Jehovah and His people. 8. Daniel . . . would not defile himself with . . . king's meat—Daniel is specified as being the leader in the "purpose" (the word implies a decided resolution) to abstain from defilement, thus manifesting a character already formed for prophetic functions. The other three youths, no doubt, shared in his purpose. It was the custom to throw a small part of the viands and wine upon the earth, as an initiatory offering to the gods, so as to consecrate to them the whole entertainment (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 33). To have partaken of such a feast would have been to sanction idolatry, and was forbidden even after the legal distinction of clean and unclean meats was done away (1 Corinthians 8. 7, 10; 10. 27, 28). Thus the faith of these youths was made instrumental in overruling the evil foretold against the Jews (Ezekiel 4. 13; Hosea 9. 3), to the glory of God. Daniel and his three friends, says AUBERLEN, stand out like an oasis in the desert. Like Moses, Daniel "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season" (see ch. 9). He who is to interpret Divine revelations must not feed on the dainties, nor drink from the intoxicating cup, of this world. This made him as dear a name to his countrymen as Noah and Job, who also stood alone in their plety among a perverse generation (Ezekiel 14. 14; 28. 3). requested—whilst decided in principle, we ought to seek our object by gentleness, rather than by an ostentatious testimony, which, under the plea of faithfulness, courts opposition. 9. God . . . brought Daniel into favour—the favour of others towards the godly is the doing of God. So in Joseph's case (Genesis 39. 21). Especially towards Israel (Psalm 106. 46; cf. Proverbs. 16. 7). 10. worse looking—looking less healthy. your sort—of your age, or class; lit., circle. endanger my head—an arbitrary Oriental despot would, in a fit of wrath at his orders having been disobeyed, command the offender to be instantly decapitated. 11. Melzar—rather, the steward, or chief butler, entrusted by Ashpenaz with furnishing the daily portion to the youths. [GESENIUS.] The word is still in use in Persia. 12. pulse—the Hebrew expresses any vegetable grown from seeds, i. e., vegetable food in general. [GESENIUS.] 13-15. Illustrating Deuteronomy 8. 3, "Man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord." 17. God gave them knowledge—(Exodus 31. 2, 3; 1 Kings 3. 12; Job 32. 8; James 1. 5, 17). Daniel had understanding in . . . dreams—God thus made one of the despised covenant people eclipse the Chaldean sages in the very science on which they most prided themselves. So Joseph in the court of Pharaoh (Genesis 40. 5; 41. 1-8). Daniel, in these praises of his own "understanding," speaks not through vanity, but by the direction of God, as one transported out of himself. See my Introduction, "CONTENTS OF THE BOOK." 18. brought them in—i. e., not only Daniel and his three friends, but other youths (v. 3; and v. 19, "among them all). 19. stood . . . before the king—i. e., were advanced to a position of favour near the throne. 20. ten times—lit., "ten hands." magicians—properly, "sacred scribes, skilled in the sacred writings, a class of Egyptian priests" (GESENIUS); from a Hebrew root, a pen. The word in our English Version, "magicians," comes from Mag, i. e., "a priest." The Magi formed one of the six divisions of the Medes. astrologers—Hebrew, "enchanters," from a root, "to conceal," practisers of the occult arts. 21. Daniel continued . . . unto . . . first year of Cyrus—(2 Chronicles 36. 22; Ezra 1. 1.) Not that he did not continue beyond that year, but the expression is designed to mark the fact that he who was one of the first captives taken to Babylon, lived to see the end of the captivity. See my Introduction, "SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BABYLONIAN EXILE." In ch. 10. 1 he is mentioned as living "in the third year of Cyrus." See Margin Note, on the use of "till," Psalm 110. 1; 112. 8.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-49. NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S DREAM: DANIEL'S INTERPRETATION OF IT, AND ADVANCEMENT. 1. second year of . . . Nebuchadnezzar—Ch. 1. 5 shows that "three years" had elapsed since Nebuchadnezzar had taken Jerusalem. The solution of this difficulty is, Nebuchadnezzar first ruled as subordinate to his father Nabopolassar, to which time ch. 1. refers; whereas "the second year" in ch. 2. is dated from his sole sovereignty. The very difficulty is a proof of genuineness; all was clear to the writer and the original readers from their knowledge of the circumstances, and so he adds no explanation. A forger would not introduce difficulties; the author did not then see any difficulty in the case. Nebuchadnezzar is called "king" (ch. 1. 1), by anticipation. Before he left Judea, he became actual king by the death of his father, and the Jews always called him "king," as commander of the invading army. dreams—It is significant that not to Daniel, but to the-then-world-ruler, Nebuchadnezzar, the dream is vouchsafed. It was from the first of its reprerepresentatives who had conquered the theocracy, that the world-power was to learn its doom, as about to be in its turn subdued, and for ever, by the kingdom of God. As this vision opens, so that in ch. 7, developing the same truth more fully, closes the first part. Nebuchadnezzar, as vicegerent of God (v. 37; cf. Jeremiah 25, 9; Ezekiel 23, 12-15; Isaiah 44, 28; 45, 1; Romans 13, 1), is honoured with the revelation in the form of a dream, the appropriate form to one outside the kingdom of God. So in the cases of Abimelech, Pharaoh, &c. (Genesis 20, and 41.), especially as the heathen attached such importance to dreams. Still it is not he, but an Israelite, who interprets it. Heathendom is passive, Israel active, in Divine things, so that the glory redounds to "the God of heaven." 2. Chaldeans—here, a certain order of priest-magicians, who wore a peculiar dress, like that seen on the gods and deified men in the Assyrian sculptures. Probably they belonged exclusively to the Chaldeans, the original tribe of the Babylonian nation, just as the Magians were properly Medes. 3. troubled to know the dream—He awoke in alarm, remembering that something solemn had been presented to him in a dream, without being able to recall the form in which it had clothed itself. His thoughts on the unprecedented greatness to which his power had attained (v. 29) made him anxious to know what the issue of all this should be. God meets this wish in the way most calculated to impress him. 4. Here begins the Chaldean portion of Daniel, which continues to the end of ch. 7. In it the course, character, and crisis of the Gentile power are treated of; whereas, in the other parts, which are in Hebrew, the things treated of apply more particularly to the Jews and Jerusalem. Syriac—the Aramean Chaldean, the vernacular tongue of the king and his court; the prophet, by mentioning it here, hints at the reason of his own adoption of it from this point. live for ever—a formula in addressing kings, like our "Long live the king!" Cf. 1 Kings 1, 31. 5. The thing—i. e., The Dream, "is gone from me." GENEVIUS translates, "The decree is gone forth from me," irrevocable (cf. Isaiah 45, 23), viz., that you shall be executed, if you do not tell both the dream and the interpretation. English Version is simpler, which supposes the king himself to have forgotten the dream. Pretenders to supernatural knowledge often bring on themselves their own punishment. cut in pieces—(1 Samuel 15, 33.) houses . . . dunghill—rather, a morass heap. The Babylonian houses were built of sun-dried bricks; when demolished, the rain dissolves the whole into a mass of mire, in the wet land, near the river. [STUART.] As to the consistency of this cruel threat with Nebuchadnezzar's character, see ch. 4, 17, "basest of men;" Jeremiah 39, 5, 6; 52, 9-11. 6. rewards—lit., "presents poured out in lavish profusion." 8. gain . . . time—lit., buy. Cf. Ephesians 5, 16; Colossians 4, 5, where the sense is somewhat different. the thing is gone from me—(See Note, v. 5.) 9. one decree—there can be no second one reversing the first (Esther 4, 11). corrupt—deceitful. till the time be changed—till a new state of things arrive, either by my ceasing to trouble myself about the dream, or by a change of government (which perhaps the agitation caused by the dream made Nebuchadnezzar to forebode, and so to suspect the Chaldeans of plotting). tell . . . dream, and I shall know . . . ye can show . . . interpretation—If ye cannot tell the past, a dream actually presented to me, how can ye know, and show, the future events prefigured in it? There is not a man . . . that can show—God makes the heathen, out of their own mouth, condemn their impotent pretensions to supernatural knowledge, in order to bring out in brighter contrast His power to reveal secrets to His servants, though but "men upon the earth" (cf. v. 22, 23). therefore, &c.—i. e., if such things could be done by men, other absolute princes would have required them from their magicians; as they have not, it is a proof such things cannot be done, and cannot be reasonably asked from us. 11. gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh—answering to "no man upon the earth," for there were, in their belief, "men in heaven," viz., men deified; e. g., Nimrod. The supreme gods are referred to here, who alone, in the Chaldean view, could solve the difficulty, but who do not communicate with men. The inferior gods, intermediate between men and the supreme gods, are unable to solve it. Contrast with this heathen idea of the utter severance of God from man, John 1, 14, "The Word was made flesh, and dwell among us;" Daniel was in this case made His representative. 12, 13. Daniel and his companions do not seem to have been actually numbered among the Magi or Chaldeans, and so were not summoned before the king. Providence ordered it so that all mere human wisdom should be shown vain before his Divine power, through His servant, was put forth. Ver. 24 shows that the decree for slaying the wise men had not been actually executed when Daniel interposed. 14. captain of the king's guard—commanding the executioners (see Margin); and Genesis 37, 36, Margin). 15. Why is the decree so hasty—Why were not all of us consulted before the decree for the execution of all was issued? the thing—the agitation of the king as to his dream, and his abortive consultation of the Chaldeans. It is plain from this that Daniel was till now ignorant of the whole matter. 16. Daniel went in—perhaps not in person, but by the mediation of some courtier who had access to him. His first direct interview seems to have been v. 25. [BARNES.] time—the king granted "time" to Daniel, though he would not do so to the Chaldeans, because they betrayed their lying purpose by requiring him to tell the dream, which Daniel did not. Providence doubtless influenced his mind, already favourable (ch. 1, 19, 20), to show special favour to Daniel. 17. Here appears the reason why Daniel sought "time" (v. 16), viz., he wished to engage his friends to join him in prayer to God to reveal the dream to him. 18. An illustration of the power of united prayer (Matthew 18, 19). The same instrumentality rescued Pater from his peril (Acts 12, 5-12). 19. revealed . . . in . . . night vision—(Job 33, 15, 16) 20. answered—responded to God's goodness by praises. name of God—God in His revelation of Himself by acts of love, "wisdom, and might" (Jeremiah 32, 19). 21. changeth . . . times . . . seasons—he herein gives a general preparatory intimation, that the dream of Nebuchadnezzar is concerning the changes and successions of kingdoms." [JEROME.] The "times" are the phases and periods of duration of empires (cf. ch. 7, 25; 1 Chronicles 12, 32; 29, 30); the "seasons," the fitting times for their culmination, decline, and fall (Ecclesiastes 3, 1; Acts 1, 7; 1 Thessalonians 5, 1). The vicissitudes of states, with their times and seasons, are not regulated by chance or fate, as the heathen thought, but by God. removeth kings—(Job 12, 18; Psalm 75, 6, 7; Jeremiah 27, 5; cf. 1 Samuel 2, 7, 8.) giveth wisdom—(1 Kings 3, 9-12; James 1, 5.) 22. revealeth—(Job 12, 22.) So spiritually, Ephesians 1, 17, 18). knoweth what is in . . . darkness—(Psalm 139, 11, 12; Hebrews 4, 13.) light . . . him—(James 1, 17; 1 John 1, 4.) Apocalypse, or "revelation," signifies a Divine, prophecy a human, activity. Cf. 1 Corinthians 14, 6, where the two are distinguished. The prophet is connected with the outer world, addressing to the congregation the words with which the Spirit of God supplies him; he speaks in the Spirit, but the apocalyptic seer is in the Spirit in his whole person (Revelation 1, 10; 4, 2). The form of the apocalyptic revelation (the very term meaning that the veil that hides the invisible world is taken off) is subjectively either the dream, or, higher, the vision. The interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream was a preparatory education to Daniel himself. By gradual steps, each revelation preparing him for the succeeding one, God fitted him for disclosures becoming more and more special. In chs. 2, and 4, he is but an interpreter of Nebuchadnezzar's dreams; then he has a dream himself, but it is only a vision in a dream of the night (ch. 7, 1, 2); then follows a vision in a waking state (ch. 8, 1-3); lastly, in the two final revelations (chs. 9, and 10-12,) the ecstatic state is no longer needed. The progression in the form answers to the progression in the contents of his prophecy; at first general outlines, and these afterwards filled up with minute chronological and historical details, such as are not found in the Revelation of John, though, as became the New Testament, the form of revelation is the highest, viz., clear waking visions. [AUBERLEN.] 23. thee . . . thee—he ascribes all the glory to God. God of my fathers—thou hast shown thyself the same God of grace to me, a captive exile, as thou didst to Israel of old, and this on account of the covenant made with our "fathers" (Luke 1. 54, 55; cf. Psalm 106. 45). given me wisdom and might—thou being the fountain of both; referring to v. 20. Whatever wise ability I have to stay the execution of the king's cruel decree, is thy gift. me . . . we . . . us—the revelation was given to Daniel, as "me" implies; yet with just modesty he joins his friends with him; because it was to their joint prayers, and not to his individually, that he owed the revelation from God. known . . . the king's matter—the very words in which the Chaldeans had denied the possibility of any man on earth telling the dream ("not a man upon the earth can show the king's matter," v. 10). Impostors are compelled by the God of truth to eat up their own words. 24. Therefore—Because of having received the Divine communication. bring me in before the king—implying that he had not previously been in person before the king (Note, v. 16). 25. I have found a man—like all courtiers, in announcing agreeable tidings, he ascribes the merit of the discovery to himself. [JEROME.] So far from it being a discrepancy, that he says nothing of the previous understanding between him and Daniel, or of Daniel's application to the king (v. 15, 16) it is just what we should expect. Arloch would not dare to tell an absolute despot that he had stayed the execution of his sanguinary decree, on his own responsibility; but would, in the first instance, secretly stay it until Daniel had got, by application from the king, the time required, without Arloch seeming to know of Daniel's application as the cause of the respite; then, when Daniel had received the revelation, Arloch would in trembling haste bring him in, as if then for the first time he had "found" him. The very difficulty when cleared up is a proof of genuineness, as it never would be introduced by a forger. 27. cannot—Daniel, being learned in all the lore of the Chaldeans (ch. 1. 4), could authoritatively declare the impossibility of mere man solving the king's difficulty. soothsayers—from a root, "to cut off;" referring to their cutting the heavens into divisions, and so guessing at men's destinies from the place of the stars at one's birth. 28. God—In contrast to "the wise men," &c. (v. 27). revealeth secrets—(Amos 3. 7; 4. 13.) Cf. Genesis 41. 45, "Zaphnath-paaneah," revealer of secrets, the title given to Joseph. the latter days—lit., "in the after days" (v. 29); "hereafter" (Genesis 49. 1). It refers to the whole future, including the Messianic days, which is the final dispensation (Isaiah 2. 2). visions of thy head—conceptions formed in the brain. 29. God met with a revelation Nebuchadnezzar, who had been meditating on the future destiny of his vast empire. 30. not . . . for any wisdom that I have—not on account of any previous wisdom which I may have manifested (ch. 1. 17, 20). The specially-favoured servants of God in all ages disclaim merit in themselves, and ascribe all to the grace and power of God (Genesis 41. 16; Acts 3. 12). The "as for me," disclaiming extraordinary merit, contrasts elegantly with "as for thee," whereby Daniel courteously, but without flattery, implies, that God honoured Nebuchadnezzar, as his viceroyent over the world-kingsdoms, with a revelation on the subject uppermost in his thoughts, the ultimate destinies of those kingsdoms. for their sakes that shall make known, &c.—a Chaldee idiom for, "to the intent that the interpretation may be made known to the king." the thoughts of thy heart—subject of thought before falling asleep. Or, perhaps the probation of Nebuchadnezzar's character through this revelation may be the meaning intended (cf. 2 Chronicles 32. 31; Luke 2. 35). 31. The world-power in its totality appears as a colossal human form: Babylon the head of gold, Medo-Persia the breast and two arms of silver, Græco-Macedonia the belly and two thighs of brass, and Rome, with its Germano-Slavonic offshoots, the legs of iron and feet of iron and clay; the fourth still existing. Those kingsdoms only are mentioned which stand in some relation to the kingdom of God; of these none is left out; the final establishment of that kingdom is the aim of His moral government of the world. The colossus of metal stands on weak feet, of clay. All man's glory is as ephemeral and worthless as chaff (cf. 1. Peter 1. 34). But the kingdom of God, small and unheeded as a "stone" on the ground, is compact in its homogeneous unity; whereas the world-power, in its heterogeneous constituents, successively supplanting one another, contains the elements of decay. The relation of the stone to the mountain is that of the kingdom of the cross (Matthew 16. 23; Luke 24. 26) to the kingdom of glory, the latter beginning, and the former ending when the kingdom of God breaks in pieces the kingsdoms of the world (Revelation 11. 15). Christ's contrast between the two kingsdoms refers to this passage. a great image—lit., "one image that was great." Though the kingsdoms were different, it was essentially one and the same world-power under different phases, just as the image was one, though the parts were of different metals. 32. On ancient coins states are often represented by human figures. The head and higher parts signify the earlier times; the lower, the later times. The metals become successively baser and baser, implying the growing degeneracy from worse to worse. Hesiod, 200 years before Daniel, had compared the four ages to the four metals in the same order; the idea is sanctioned here by Holy Writ. It was perhaps one of those fragments of revelation among the heathen, derived from the tradition as to the fall of man. The metals lessen in specific gravity, as they go downwards; silver is not so heavy as gold, brass not so heavy as silver, and iron not so heavy as brass, the weight thus being arranged in the reverse of stability. [TREGELLES.] Nebuchadnezzar derived his authority from God, not from man, nor as responsible to man. But the Persian king was so far dependent on others that he could not deliver Daniel from the princes (ch. 6. 14, 15); contrast ch. 5. 18, 19, as to Nebuchadnezzar's power from God, "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive" (cf. Ezra 7. 14; Esther 1. 13-16). Græco-Macedonia betrays its deterioration in its divisions, not united as Babylon and Persia. Iron is stronger than brass, but inferior in other respects; so Rome hardy and strong to tread down the nations, but less kingly and showing its chief deterioration in its last state. Each successive kingdom incorporates its predecessor (cf. ch. 5. 28). Power that in Nebuchadnezzar's hands was a God-derived (v. 37, 38) autocracy, in the Persian king's was a rule resting on his nobility of person and birth, the nobles being his equals in rank, but not in office; in Greece, an aristocracy not of birth, but individual influence; in Rome, lowest of all, dependent entirely on popular choice, the emperor being appointed by popular military election. 33. As the two arms of silver denote the kings of the Medes and Persians [JOSEPHUS]; and the two thighs of brass the Seleucidæ of Syria and Lagidæ of Egypt, the two leading sections into which Græco-Macedonia parted, so the two legs of iron signify the two Roman consuls. [NEWTON.] The clay, in v. 41, "potter's clay," v. 43, "miry clay," means earthenware, hard but brittle (cf. Psalm 2. 9; Revelation 2. 27, where the same image is used of the same event); the feet are stable whilst bearing only direct pressure, but easily broken to pieces by a blow (v. 34), the iron intermixed not retarding, but hastening, such a result. 34. stone—Messiah and His kingdom (Genesis 49. 24; Psalm 118. 22; Isaiah 28. 16). In its relations to Israel, it is a "stone of stumbling" (Isaiah 8. 14; Acts 4. 11; 1 Peter 2. 7, 8), on which both houses of Israel are broken, not destroyed (Matthew 21. 32). In its relation to the Church, the same stone which destroys the image is the foundation of the Church (Ephesians 2. 20). In its relation to the Gentile world-power, the stone is its destroyer (v. 35, 44; cf. Zechariah 12. 3). Christ saith (Matthew 21. 44, referring to Isaiah 8. 14, 15), "Whosoever shall fall on this stone (i. e., stumble, and be offended, at Him, as the Jews were, from whom, therefore, He says, 'The kingdom shall be taken') shall be broken." "but (referring to v. 34, 35) on whomsoever it shall fall" (referring to the world-power which had been the instrument of breaking the Jews), it shall not merely break, but "grind him to powder" (1 Corinthians 15. 24). The falling of the stone on the feet of the image cannot refer to Christ at His first advent, for the fourth kingdom was not then as yet divided—no toes were in existence (see Note, v. 44). cut out—viz., from "the mountain" (v. 45); viz., Mount Zion (Isaiah 2, 2), and antitypically, the heavenly mount of the Father's glory, from whom Christ came. without hands—explained in v. 41, "The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom," as contrasted with the image which was made with hands of man. Messiah not created by human agency, but conceived by the Holy Ghost (Matthew 1. 20; Luke 1. 35; cf. Zechariah 4. 6; Mark 14. 58; Hebrews 9. 11, 24). So "not made with hands," i. e., heavenly, 2 Corinthians 5. 1; spiritual, Colossians 2. 11. The world-kingsdoms were reared by human ambition; but this is the "kingdom of heaven:" "not of this world" (John 18. 36). As the fourth kingdom, or Rome, was represented in a twofold state, first strong, with legs of iron, then weak, with toes part of iron, part of clay; so this fifth kingdom, that of Christ, is seen conversely, first insignificant as a "stone," then as a "mountain" filling the whole earth. The ten toes are the ten lesser kingdoms into which the Roman kingdom was finally to be divided; this tenfold division here hinted at is not specified in detail till the seventh chapter. The fourth empire originally was bounded in Europe pretty nearly by the line of the Rhine and Danube; in Asia by the Euphrates. In Africa it possessed Egypt and the north coasts; South Britain and Dacia were afterwards added, but were ultimately resigned. The ten kingdoms do not arise until a deterioration (by mixing clay with the iron) has taken place; they are in existence when Christ comes in glory, and then are broken in pieces. The ten have been sought for in the invading hosts of the fifth and sixth century. But though many provinces were then severed from Rome as independent kingdoms, the dignity of emperor still continued, and the imperial power was exercised over Rome itself for two centuries. So the tenfold divisions cannot be looked for before 731 A. D. But the East is not to be excluded, five toes being on each foot. Thus no point of time before the overthrow of the empire at the taking of Constantinople by the Turks (1453 A. D.) can be assigned for the division. It seems, therefore, that the definite ten will be the ultimate development of the Roman empire just before the rise of Antichrist, who shall overthrow three of the kings, and, after three and a half years, he himself be overthrown by Christ in person. Some of the ten kingdoms will, doubtless, be the same as some past and present divisions of the old Roman empire, which accounts for the continuity of the connection between the toes and legs, a gap of centuries not being interposed, as is objected by opponents of the futurist theory. The lists of the ten made by the latter differ from one another; and are set aside by the fact that they include countries which were never Roman, and exclude one whole section of the empire, viz., the East. [TREGELLES.] upon his feet—the last state of the Roman empire. Not "upon his legs." Cf. "In the days of these kings" (Note, v. 44). 35. broken . . . together—excluding a contemporaneous existence of the kingdom of the world and the kingdom of God (in its manifested, as distinguished from its spiritual phase). The latter is not gradually to wear away the former, but to destroy it at once, and utterly (2 Thessalonians 1. 7-10; 2. 8). However, the Hebrew may be translated, "in one discriminate mass," chaff—image of the ungodly, as they shall be dealt with in the judgment (Psalm 1. 4, 5; Matthew 3. 12). summer threshing-floors—Grain was winnowed in the East on an elevated space in the open air, by throwing the grain into the air with a shovel, so that the wind might clear away the chaff. no place . . . found for them—(Revelation 20. 11; cf. Psalm 37. 10, 36; 103. 16). became . . . mountain—cut out of the mountain (v. 45) originally, it ends in becoming a mountain. So the kingdom of God, coming from heaven originally, ends in heaven being established on earth (Revelation 21. 1-3). filled . . . earth—(Isaiah 11. 9; Habakkuk 2. 14). It is in connection with Jerusalem as the mother Church it is to do so (Psalm 80. 9; Isaiah 2. 2, 3). 36. we—Daniel and his three friends. 37.

Thou . . . art a king of kings—The committal of power in fullest plenitude belongs to Nebuchadnezzar personally, as having made Babylon the mighty empire it was. In twenty-three years after him the empire was ended; with him its greatness is identified (ch. 4. 30), his successors having done nothing notable. Not that he actually ruled every part of the globe, but that God granted him illimitable dominion in whatever direction his ambition led him, Egypt, Niveveh, Arabia, Syria, Tyre, and its Phœnician colonies (Jeremiah 27. 5-8). Cf. as to Cyrus, Ezra 1. 2. 38. men . . . beasts . . . fowls—the dominion originally designed for man (Genesis 1. 28; 2. 19, 20), forfeited by sin; temporarily delegated to Nebuchadnezzar and the world-powers; but, as they abuse the trust for self, instead of for God, to be taken from them by the Son of man, who will exercise it for God, restoring in his person to man the lost inheritance (Psalm 8. 4-6, &c.). Thou art . . . head of gold—alluding to the riches of Babylon, hence called "the golden city" (Isaiah 14. 4; Jeremiah 51. 7; Revelation 18. 16). 39. That Medo-Persia is the second kingdom appears from ch. 5. 28; 8. 20. Cf. 2 Chronicles 36. 20; Isaiah 21. 2. inferior—"The kings of Persia were the worst race of men that ever governed an empire." [PRIDEAUX.] Politically, which is the main point of view here, the power of the central government in which the nobles shared with the king, being weakened by the growing independence of the provinces, was inferior to that of Nebuchadnezzar, whose sole word was law throughout his empire. brass—the Greeks (the third empire, ch. 8. 21; 10. 20; 11. 2-4) were celebrated for the brazen armour of their warriors. JEROME fancifully thinks that the brass, as being a clear-sounding metal, refers to the eloquence for which Greece was famed. The "belly," in v. 32, may refer to the drunkenness of Alexander and the luxury of the Ptolemies. [TIRINUS.] over all the earth—Alexander commanded that he should be called "king of all the world" (JUSTIN, 12. sec. 16. 9; ARRIAN, Exp. Alex. 7. sec. 15). The four successors (Diadochi) who divided Alexander's dominions at his death, of whom the Seleucides in Syria and the Lagides in Egypt were chief, held the same empire. 40. iron—this vision sets forth the character of the Roman power, rather than its territorial extent. [TREGELLES.] breaketh in pieces . . . all—So, in righteous retribution, itself will at last be broken in pieces (v. 44) by the kingdom of God (Revelation 13. 10). 41-43. feet . . . toes . . . part . . . clay . . . iron—explained presently, "the kingdom shall be partly strong, partly broken" (rather, "brittle," as earthenware); and v. 43, "they shall mingle . . . with the seed of men," i. e., there will be power (in its deteriorated form, iron) mixed up with that which is wholly of man, and therefore brittle; power in the hands of the people having no internal stability, though something is left of the strength of the iron. [TREGELLES.] NEWTON, who understands the Roman empire to be added into the ten kingdoms already (whereas TREGELLES makes them future), explains the "clay" mixture as the blending of barbarous nations with Rome by intermarriages and alliances, in which there was no stable amalgamation, though the ten kingdoms retained much of Rome's strength. The "mingling with the seed of men" (v. 44) seems to refer to Genesis 6. 2, where the marriages of the seed of godly Seth with the daughters of ungodly Cain are described in similar words; the reference, therefore, seems to be to the blending of the Christianized Roman empire with the pagan nations, a deterioration being the result. Efforts have been often made to reunite the parts into one great empire, as by Charlemagne and Napoleon, but in vain. Christ alone shall effect that. 44. in the days of these kings—in the days of these kingdoms, i. e., of the last of the four. So Christianity was set up when Rome had become mistress of Judea and the world (Luke 2. 1, &c.). [NEWTON.] Rather, "In the days of these kings," answers to "upon his feet" (v. 34), i. e., the ten toes (v. 42), or ten kings, the final state of the Roman empire. For "these kings" cannot mean the four successional monarchies, as they do not coexist as the holders of power; if the fourth had been meant, the singular, not the plural, would be used. The falling of the stone on the image must mean, destroying judgment on the fourth Gentile power, not gradual evangelization of it by grace; and the destroying judgment cannot be dealt by Christians, for they are taught to submit to the powers that be, so that it must be dealt by Christ himself at his coming again. We live under the divisions of the Roman empire which began 1400 years ago, and which at the time of His coming shall be definitely ten. All that had fallen in the hand of man shall then pass away, and that which is kept in His own hand shall be introduced. Thus the second chapter is the alphabet of the subsequent prophetic statements in Daniel. [TREGELLES.] God of heaven . . . kingdom—hence the phrase, “the kingdom of heaven” (Matthew 3. 2). not . . . left to other people—as the Chaldees had been forced to leave their kingdom to the Medo-Persians, and these to the Greeks, and these to the Romans (Micah 4. 7; Luke 1. 32, 33). break . . . all—(Isaiah 60. 12; 1 Corinthians 13. 24.) 45. without hands—(Note, v. 35.) The connection of the “forasmuch,” &c., is, “as thou sawest that the stone,” &c., this is an indication that “the great God,” &c., i. e., the fact of thy seeing the dream as I have recalled it to thy recollection, is a proof that it is no airy phantom, but a real representation to thee from God of the future. A similar proof of the “certainty” of the event was given to Pharaoh by the doubling of his dream (Genesis 41. 32). 46. fell upon . . . face, and worshipped Daniel—worshipping God in the person of Daniel. Symbolical of the future prostration of the world-power before Messiah and His kingdom (Philippians 2. 10). As other servants of God refused such honours (Acts 10. 25, 26; 14. 13-15; Revelation 22. 8, 9), and Daniel (ch. 1. 8) would not taste defiled food, nor give up prayer to God at the cost of his life (ch. 6.), it seems likely that Daniel rejected the proffered Divine honours. The word “answered” (v. 47) implies that Daniel had objected to these honours; and in compliance with his objection, “the king answered, Of a truth, your God is a God of gods.” Daniel had disclaimed all personal merit in v. 30, giving God all the glory (cf. v. 45). commanded . . . sweet odours—Divine honours (Ezra 6. 10). It is not said his command was executed. 47. Lord of kings—The world-power shall at last have to acknowledge this (Revelation 17. 14; 19. 16); even as Nebuchadnezzar, who had been the God-appointed “king of kings” (v. 37), but who had abused the trust, is constrained by God’s servant to acknowledge that God is the true “Lord of kings.” 48. One reason for Nebuchadnezzar having been vouchsafed such a dream is here seen, viz., that Daniel might be promoted, and the captive people of God be comforted: the independent state of the captives during the exile, and the alleviation of its hardships, were much due to Daniel. 49. Daniel requested—Contrast this honourable remembrance of his humble friends in his elevation with the spirit of the children of the world in the chief butler’s case (Genesis 40. 23; Ecclesiastes 9. 15, 16; Amos 6. 6). in the gate—the place of holding courts of justice and levees in the East (Esther 2. 19; Job 29. 7). So “the Sublime Porte,” or Gate, denotes the sultan’s government, his counsels being formerly held in the entrance of his palace. Daniel was a chief counsellor of the king, and president over the governors of the different orders into which the Magi were divided.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-30. NEBUCHADNEZZAR’S IDOLATROUS IMAGE; SHADRACH, MESHACH, AND ABED-NEGO ARE DELIVERED FROM THE FURNACE. Between the vision of Nebuchadnezzar in the 2d ch., and that of Daniel in the 7th, four narratives of Daniel’s and his friends’ personal history are introduced. As ch. 2. and 7. go together, so ch. 3. and 6. (the deliverance from the lions’ den), ch. 4. and 5.; of these last two pairs, the former shows God’s nearness to save His saints when faithful to Him, at the very time they seem to be crushed by the world-power. The second pair shows in the case of the two kings of the first monarchy, how God can suddenly humble the world-power in the height of its insolence. The latter advances from mere self-glorification, in the fourth chapter, to open opposition to God in the fifth. Nebuchadnezzar demands homage to be paid to his image (ch. 3.), and boasts of his power (ch. 4). But Belshazzar goes further, blaspheming God by polluting His holy vessels. There is a similar progression in the conduct of God’s people, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego refuse positive homage to the image of the world-power (ch. 3.); Daniel will not yield it even a negative homage, by omitting for a time the worship of God (ch. 6). Jehovah’s power manifested for the saints against the world in individual histories (ch. 3.-6.), is exhibited in ch. 2. and 7., in world-wide prophetic pictures; the former heightening the effect of the latter. The miracles wrought in behalf of Daniel and his friends were a manifestation of God’s glory in Daniel’s person, as the representative of the theocracy before the Babylonian king, who deemed himself almighty, at a time when God could not manifest it in His people as a body. They tended also to secure, by their impressive character, that respect for the covenant people on the part of the heathen powers which issued in Cyrus’ decree, not only restoring the Jews, but ascribing honour to the God of heaven, and commanding the building of the temple (Ezra 1. 1-4). [AUBERLEN.] image—Nebuchadnezzar’s confession of God did not prevent him being a worshipper of idols besides. Ancient idolaters thought that each nation had its own gods, and that, in addition to these, foreign gods might be worshipped. The Jewish religion was the only exclusive one that claimed all homage for Jehovah as the only true God. Men will in times of trouble confess God, if they are allowed to retain their favourite heart-idols. The image was that of Bel, the Babylonian tutelary god; or rather, Nebuchadnezzar himself, the personification and representative of the Babylonian empire, as suggested to him by the dream (ch. 2. 38), “Thou art this head of gold.” The interval between the dream and the event here was about nineteen years. Nebuchadnezzar had just returned from finishing the Jewish and Syrian wars, the spoils of which would furnish the means of rearing such a colossal statue. [PRIDEAUX.] The colossal size makes it likely that the frame was wood, overlaid with gold. The “height,” 60 cubits, is so out of proportion with the “breadth,” exceeding it ten times, that it seems best to suppose the thickness from breast to back to be intended, which is exactly the right proportion of a well-formed man. [AUGUSTINE, De Civitate Dei, 15. 26.] PRIDEAUX thinks the 60 cubits to refer to the image and pedestal together, the image being 27 cubits high, or 40½ feet, the pedestal 33 cubits, or 50 feet. HERODOTUS (1. 183) confirms this by mentioning a similar image, 40 feet high, in the temple of Belus at Babylon. It was not the same image, for the one here was on the plain of Dura, not in the city. 2. princes—“satraps” of provinces. [GESENIUS.] captains—rulers, not exclusively military. sheriffs—men learned in the law, like the Arab Mufti. [GESENIUS.] 3. stood before the image—in an attitude of devotion. Whatever the king approved of, they all approve of. There is no stability of principle in the ungodly. 4. The arguments of the persecutor are in brief, Turn or burn. 5. cornet—a wind instrument, like the French horn, is meant. flute—a pipe or pipes, not blown transversely as our “flute,” but by mouth-pieces at the end. sackbut—a triangular stringed instrument, having short strings, the sound being on a high sharp key. psaltery—a kind of harp. dulcimer—a bagpipe consisting of two pipes, thrust through a leathern bag, emitting a sweet plaintive sound. Chaldee Stumponya, the modern Italian Zampogna, Asiatic Zambonja. fall down—that the recusants might be the more readily detected. 6. No other nation but the Jews would feel this edict oppressive; for it did not prevent them worshipping their own gods besides. It was evidently aimed at the Jews by those jealous of their high position in the king’s court, who therefore induced him to pass an edict as to all recusants, representing such refusal of homage as an act of treason to Nebuchadnezzar as civil and religious “head” of the empire. So the edict under Darius (6th ch.) was aimed against the Jews by those jealous of Daniel’s influence. The literal

image of Nebuchadnezzar is a typical prophecy of "the image of the beast," connected with mystical Babylon, in Revelation 13. 14. The second mystical beast there causeth the earth, and them that dwell therein, to worship the first beast, and that as many as would not, should be killed (Revelation 13. 12, 15). furnace—a common mode of punishment in Babylon (Jeremiah 29. 22). It is not necessary to suppose that the furnace was made for the occasion. Cf. "brick kiln," 2 Samuel 12. 31. Any furnace for common purposes in the vicinity of Dura would serve. CHARDIN, in his travels (A. D. 1671-1677), mentions that in Persia, to terrify those who took advantage of scarcity to sell provisions at exorbitant prices, the cooks were roasted over a slow fire, and the bakers cast into a burning oven. 7. None of the Jews seem to have been present, except the officers, summoned specially. 8. accused the Jews—lit., ate the rent limbs, or flesh of the Jews (cf. Job 31. 31; Psalm 14. 4; 27. 2; Jeremiah 10. 25). Not probably in general, but as v. 12 states, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Why Daniel was not summoned does not appear. Probably he was in some distant part of the empire on state business, and the general summons (v. 2) had not time to reach him before the dedication. Also, the Jews' enemies found it more politic to begin by attacking Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who were nearer at hand, and had less influence, before they proceeded to attack Daniel. 9. live for ever—A preface of flattery is closely akin to the cruelty that follows. So Acts 24. 2, 3, &c., Tertullus in accusing Paul before Felix. 12. serve not thy gods—not only not the golden image, but also not any of Nebuchadnezzar's gods. 13. bring—instead of commanding their immediate execution, as in the case of the Magi (ch. 2. 12), Providence inclined him to command the recusants to be brought before him, so that their noble "testimony" for God might be given before the world-powers "against them" (Matthew 10. 18), to the edification of the Church in all ages. 14. Is it true—rather, as Marginal [THEODORET], "Is it purposely that," &c. Cf. the Hebrew, Numbers 35. 20, 22. Notwithstanding his "fury," his past favour for them disposes him to give them the opportunity of excusing themselves on the ground that their disobedience had not been intentional; so he gives them another trial to see whether they would still worship the image. 15. who is that God—so Sennacherib's taunt (2 Kings 18. 35), and Pharaoh's (Exodus 5. 2). not careful to answer thee—rather, "We have no need to answer thee;" thou art determined on thy side, and our mind is made up not to worship the image; there is therefore no use in our arguing as if we could be shaken from our principles. Hesitation, or parleying with sin, is fatal; unhesitating decision is the only safety, where the path of duty is clear (Matthew 10. 19, 28). 17. If it be so—VATABLUS translates, "Assuredly." English Version agrees better with the original. The sense is, If it be our lot to be cast into the furnace, our God (quoted from Deuteronomy 6. 4) is able to deliver us (a reply to Nebuchadnezzar's challenge, "Who is that God that shall deliver you?"), and He will deliver us, &c. (either from death, or in death, 2 Timothy 4. 17, 18). He will, we trust, literally deliver us, but certainly He will do so spiritually. 18. But if not, &c.—connected with v. 18. "Whether our God deliver us, as He is able, or do not, we will not serve thy gods." Their service of God is not mercenary in its motive. Though He slay them, they will still trust in Him (Job 13. 15). Their deliverance from sinful compliance was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace, as that from the furnace was in the kingdom of nature. Their youth, and position as captives and friendless exiles, before the absolute world-potentate and the horrid death awaiting them if they should persevere in their faith, all enhance the grace of God, which carried them through such an ordeal. 19. visage . . . changed—He had shown forbearance (v. 14, 15) as a favour to them, but now that they despise even his forbearance, anger "fills" him, and is betrayed in his whole countenance. seven times more than it was wont—*lit., "than it was (ever) seen to be heated." Seven is the perfect number, i. e., it was made as hot as possible. Passion overdoes and defeats

its own end, for the hotter the fire, the sooner were they likely to be put out of pain. 21. coats . . . hosen . . . hats—HERODOTUS (1. 195) says that the Babylonian costume consisted of three parts: 1. wide, long pantaloons; 2. a woollen shirt; 3. an outer mantle with a girdle round it. So these are specified [GESENIUS], "their pantaloons, inner tunics (hosen, or stockings, are not commonly worn in the East), and outer mantles." Their being cast in so hurriedly, with all their garments on, enhanced the miracle in that not even the smell of fire passed on their clothes, though of delicate, inflammable material. 23. flame . . . slew those men—(Ch. 6. 21; Psalm 7. 16.) 23. fell down—not cast down; for those who brought the three youths to the furnace, perished by the flames themselves, and so could not cast them in. Here follows an addition in LXX., Syrian, Arabic and Vulgate versions, "The Prayer of Azarias," and "The Song of the Three Holy Children." It is not in the Chaldee. The hymn was sung throughout the whole Church in their liturgies, from the earliest times (RUFINUS in Symb. Ap., and ATHANASIUS). The "astonishment" of Nebuchadnezzar in v. 24 is made an argument for its genuineness, as if it explained the cause of his astonishment, viz., "they walked in the midst of the fire praising God, &c., but the angel of the Lord came down into the oven" (v. 1 and v. 27 of the Apocryphal addition). But v. 25 of English Version explains his astonishment, without need of any addition. 24. True, O king—God extorted this confession from His enemies' own mouths. 25. four—whereas but three had been cast in. loose—whereas they had been cast in "bound," Nebuchadnezzar's question, in v. 24, is as if he can scarcely trust his own memory as to a fact so recent, now that he sees through an aperture in the furnace what seems to contradict it. walking in . . . midst of . . . fire—image of the godly unhurt, and at large (John 8. 33), "in the midst of trouble" (Psalm 138. 7; cf. Psalm 23. 3, 4). They walked up and down in the fire, not leaving it, but waiting for God's time to bring them out, just as Jesus waited in the tomb as God's prisoner, till God should let Him out (Acts 2. 26, 27). So Paul (2 Corinthians 12. 8, 9). So Noah waited in the ark, after the flood, till God brought him forth (Genesis 8. 12-18). like the Son of God—unconsciously, like Saul, Caiaphas (John 11. 49-52), and Pilate, he is made to utter Divine truths. "Son of God" in his mouth means only an "angel" from heaven, as v. 28 proves. Cf. Job 1. 6; 38. 7; Psalm 34. 7, 8; and the probably heathen centurion's exclamation (Matthew 27. 54). The Chaldeans believed in families of gods: Bel, the supreme god, accompanied by the goddess Mylitta, being the father of the gods; thus the expression he meant one sprung from and sent by the gods. Really it was the "messenger of the covenant," who herein gave a prelude to His incarnation. 26. the most high God—he acknowledges Jehovah to be supreme above other gods (not that he ceased to believe in these); so he returns to his original confession, "your God is a God of gods" (ch. 2. 47), from which he had swerved in the interim, perhaps intoxicated by his success in taking Jerusalem, whose God he therefore thought unable to defend it. 27. nor . . . an hair—(Luke 12. 7; 21. 18.) fire had no power—fulfilling Isaiah 43. 2; cf. Hebrews 11. 34. God alone is a "consuming fire" (Hebrews 12. 29). nor . . . smell of fire—cf. spiritually, 1 Thessalonians 5. 22. 28. In giving some better traits in Nebuchadnezzar's character, Daniel agrees with Jeremiah 39. 11; 42. 12. changed the king's word—have made the king's attempt to coerce into obedience vain. Have set aside his word (so "alter . . . word," Ezra 6. 11) from regard to God. Nebuchadnezzar now admits that God's law should be obeyed, rather than his (Acts 5. 29). yielded . . . bodies—*viz., to the fire. not serve—by sacrificing. nor worship—by prostration of the body. Decision for God at last gains the respect even of the worldly (Proverbs 16. 7). 29. This decree promulgated throughout the vast empire of Nebuchadnezzar must have tended much to keep the Jews from idolatry in the captivity and thenceforth (Psalm 76. 10).

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-37. EDICT OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR. CONTAINING

HIS SECOND DREAM, RELATING TO HIMSELF. Punished with insanity for his haughtiness, he sinks to the level of the beasts (illustrating Psalm 49, 6, 12). The opposition between bestial and human life, set forth here, is a key to interpret the symbolism in the 7th chapter concerning the beasts and the Son of man. After his conquests, and his burling in fifteen days a new palace, according to the heathen historian, ABYDENUS (263 B. C.), whose account confirms Daniel, he ascended upon his palace-roof (see v. 29, Margin), whence he could see the surrounding city which he had built, and seized by some deity, he predicted the Persian conquest of Babylon, adding a prayer that the Persian leader might on his return be borne where there is no path of men, and where the wild beasts graze (language evidently derived by tradition from v. 32, 33, though the application is different). In his insanity, his excited mind would naturally think of the coming conquest of Babylon by the Medo-Persians, already foretold to him in ch. 2. 1. Peace—the usual salutation in the East, "Shalom," whence Salaam. The primitive revelation of the fall, and man's alienation from God, made "peace" to be felt as the first and deepest want of man. The Orientals (as the East was the cradle of revelation) retained the word by tradition. 2. I thought it good—"It was seemly before me" (Psalm 107, 2-8). signs—tokens significant of God's omnipotent agency. The plural is used, as it comprises the marvellous dream, the marvellous interpretation of it, and its marvellous issue. 4. I was . . . at rest—my wars over, my kingdom at peace. flourishing—"green." Image from a tree (Jeremiah 17, 8). Prosperous (Job 15, 32). 6. It may seem strange that Daniel was not first summoned. But it was ordered by God's providence that he should be reserved to the last, in order that all mere human means should be proved vain, before God manifested His power through His servant; thus the haughty king was stripped of all fleshly confidences. The Chaldees were the king's recognized interpreters of dreams; whereas Daniel's interpretation of the one in ch. 2 had been a peculiar case, and very many years before, nor had he been consulted on such matters since. 8. Belteshazzar—called so from the god Bel or Belus (see Note, ch. 1, 7). 9. spirit of the holy gods—Nebuchadnezzar speaks as a heathen, who yet has imbibed some notions of the true God. Hence he speaks of "gods" in the plural, but gives the epithet "holy," which applies to Jehovah alone, the heathen gods making no pretension to purity, even in the opinion of their votaries (Deuteronomy 32, 31; cf. Isaiah 63, 11). "I know" refers to his knowledge of Daniel's skill many years before (ch. 2); hence he calls him "master of the magicians." troubleth—gives thee difficulty in explaining it. 10. tree—so the Assyrian is compared to a "cedar" (Ezekiel 31, 3; cf. Ezekiel 17, 24). in the midst of the earth—denoting its conspicuous position as the centre whence the imperial authority radiated in all directions. 12. beasts . . . shadow under it—Implying that God's purpose in establishing empires in the world is that they may be as trees affording men "fruits" for "meat," and a "shadow" for rest (cf. Lamentations 4, 20). But the world-powers abuse their trust for self; therefore Messiah comes to plant the tree of His gospel-kingdom, which alone shall realize God's purpose (Ezekiel 17, 23; Matthew 13, 32). HERODOTUS (7, 19) mentions a dream (probably suggested by the tradition of this dream of Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel) which Xerxes had, viz., that he was crowned with olive, and that the branches of the olive filled the whole earth, but that afterwards the crown vanished from his head: signifying his universal dominion soon to come to an end. 13. watcher and an holy one—rather, "even an holy one." Only one angel is intended, and he not one of the bad, but of the holy angels. Called a "watcher," because ever on the watch to execute God's will [JEROME], (Psalm 103, 20, 21). Cf. as to their watchfulness, Revelation 4, 8, "full of eyes within . . . they rest not day and night." Also they watch good men committed to their charge (Psalm 34, 7; Hebrews 1, 14); and watch over the veil to record their sins, and at God's bidding at last punish them (Jeremiah 4, 16, 17), "watchers" applied to human instruments of God's vengeance. As to God (ch. 9, 14; Job 7, 12; 14, 16; Jeremiah 44, 27). In a good sense (Genesis 31, 49; Jeremiah 31, 28). The idea of heavenly "watchers" under the supreme God (called in the Zendavesta of the Persian Zoroaster, "Ormuzd") was founded on the primeval revelation as to evil angels having watched for an opportunity until they succeeded in tempting man to his ruin, and good angels ministering to God's servants (as Jacob, Genesis 28, 15; 32, 1, 2). Cf. the watching over Abraham for good, and over Sodom for wrath after long watching in vain for good men in it, for whose sake he would spare it, Genesis 18.; and over Lot for good, Genesis 19. Daniel fitly puts in Nebuchadnezzar's mouth the expression, though not found elsewhere in Scripture, yet substantially sanctioned by it (2 Chronicles 16, 9; Proverbs 15, 3; Jeremiah 32, 19), and natural to him according to Oriental modes of thought. 14. Hew down—(Matthew 3, 10; Luke 13, 7.) The holy (Jude 14) one incites his fellow-angels to God's appointed work (cf. Revelation 14, 15, 18). beasts get away from under it—it shall no longer afford them shelter (Ezekiel 31, 12). 15. stump—the kingdom is still reserved secure for him at last, as a tree stump secured by a hoop of brass and iron from being split by the sun's heat, in the hope of its growing again (Isaiah 11, 1; cf. Job 14, 7-9). BARNES refers it to the chaining of the royal maniac. 16. heart—understanding (Isaiah 6, 10). times—i. e., years (ch. 12, 7). "Seven" is the perfect number: a week of years; a complete revolution of time accompanying a complete revolution in his state of mind. 17. demand—i. e., determination; viz., as to the change to which Nebuchadnezzar is to be doomed. A solemn council of the heavenly ones is supposed (cf. Job 1, 6; 2, 1), over which God presides supreme. His "decree" and "word" are therefore said to be theirs (cf. v. 24, "decree of the Most High"); "the decree of the watchers," "the word of the holy ones." For He has placed particular kingdoms under the administration of angelic beings, subject to Him (ch. 10, 13, 20; 12, 1). The word "demand," in the second clause, expresses a distinct idea from the first clause. Not only as members of God's council (ch. 7, 10; 1 Kings 22, 19; Psalm 103, 21; Zechariah 1, 10) do they subscribe to His "decree," but that decree is in answer to their prayers, wherein they demand that every mortal shall be humbled, whosoever tries to obscure the glory of God. [CALVIN.] Angels are grieved when God's prerogative is in the least infringed. How awful to Nebuchadnezzar to know that angels plead against him for his pride, and that the decree has been passed in the high court of heaven for his humiliation in answer to angels' demands! The conceptions are moulded in a form peculiarly adapted to Nebuchadnezzar's modes of thought, the living—not as distinguished from the dead, but from the inhabitants of heaven, who "know" that which the men of the world need to be taught (Psalm 9, 16); the ungodly confess there is a God, but would gladly confine Him to heaven. But, saith Daniel, God ruleth not merely there, but "in the kingdom of men." basest—the lowest in condition (1 Samuel 2, 8; Luke 1, 52). It is not one's talents, excellency, or noble birth, but God's will, which elevates to the throne. Nebuchadnezzar abused to the dunghill, and then restored, was to have in himself an experimental proof of this (v. 37). 19. Daniel . . . Belteshazzar—the use of the Hebrew as well as the Chaldean name, so far from being an objection, as some have made it, is an undesigned mark of genuineness. In a proclamation to "all people," and one designed to honour the God of the Hebrews, Nebuchadnezzar would naturally use the Hebrew name (derived from El, God, the name by which the prophet was best known among his countrymen), as well as the Gentile name by which he was known in the Chaldean empire. astonied—overwhelmed with awe at the terrible import of the dream. one hour—the original means often "a moment," or "short time," as in ch. 3, 6, 15. let not the dream . . . trouble thee—many despots would have punished a prophet who dared to foretell his overthrow. Nebuchadnezzar assures Daniel he may freely speak out. the dream be to them that hate thee—We are to desire the prosperity of those under whose authority God's providence has placed us (Jeremiah 29. 7). The wish here is not so much against others, as for the king; a common formula (2 Samuel 18, 32). It is not the language of uncharitable hatred. 20. The tree is the king. The branches, the princes. The leaves, the soldiers. The fruits, the revenues. The shadow, the protection afforded dependent states. 22. It is thou—He speaks pointedly, and without circumlocution (2 Samuel 12. 7). Whilst pitying the king, he uncompromisingly pronounces his sentence of punishment. Let ministers steer the mean between, on the one hand, fulminations against sinners under the pretext of zeal, without any symptom of compassion; and, on the other, flattery of sinners under the pretext of moderation. to the end of the earth—(Jeremiah 27. 6-8.) To the Caspian, Euxine, and Atlantic seas. 24. decree of the Most High—what was termed in v. 17 by Nebuchadnezzar "the decree of the watchers," is here more accurately termed by Daniel, "the decree of the Most High." They are but His ministers. 25. they shall drive thee—a Chaldee idiom for thou shall be driven. Hypochondriacal madness was his malady, which "drove" him under the fancy that he was a beast, to "dwell with the beasts;" v. 34 proves this, "mine understanding returned." The regency would leave him to roam in the large beast-abounding parks attached to the palace. eat grass—i. e., vegetables, or herbs in general (Genesis 3. 18). they shall wet thee—i. e., thou shalt be wet. till thou know, &c.—(Psalm 83. 17, 18; Jeremiah 27. 5.) 26. thou shalt have known, &c.—a promise of spiritual grace to him, causing the judgment to humble, not harden, his heart. heavens do rule—the plural is used, as addressed to Nebuchadnezzar, the head of an organized earthly kingdom, with various principalities under the supreme ruler. So "the kingdom of heaven" (Matthew 4. 17; Greek, "kingdom of the heavens") is a manifold organization, composed of various orders of angels, under the Most High (Ephesians 1. 20, 21; 3. 10; Colossians 1. 16). 27. break off—as a galling yoke (Genesis 27. 40); sin is a heavy load (Matthew 11. 28). LXX. and Vulgate translate not so well, "redeem," which is made an argument for Rome's doctrine of the expiation of sins by meritorious works. Even translate it so, it can only mean, Repent and show the reality of thy repentance by works of justice and charity (cf. Luke 11. 4); so God will remit thy punishment. The trouble will be longer before it comes, or shorter when it does come. Cf. the cases of Hezekiah, Isaiah 38. 1-5; Nineveh, Jonah 3. 5-10; Jeremiah 18. 7, 8. The change is not in God, but in the sinner who repents. As the king who had provoked God's judgments by sin, so he might avert it by a return to righteousness (cf. Psalm 41. 1, 2; Acts 8. 22). Probably, like most Oriental despots, Nebuchadnezzar had oppressed the poor by forcing them to labour in his great public works without adequate remuneration. if . . . lengthening of . . . tranquillity—if haply thy present prosperity shall be prolonged. 29. twelve months—this respite was granted to him to leave him without excuse. So the 120 years granted before the flood (Genesis 6. 3). At the first announcement of the coming judgment he was alarmed, as Ahab (1 Kings 21. 27), but did not thoroughly repent; so when judgment was not executed at once, he thought it would never come, and so returned to his former pride (Ecclesiastes 8. 11). in the palace—rather, upon the (flat) palace roof, whence he could contemplate the splendour of Babylon. So the heathen historian, ABYDENUS, records. The palace roof was the scene of the fall of another king (2 Samuel 11. 2). The outer wall of Nebuchadnezzar's new palace embraced six miles; there were two other embattled walls within, and a great tower, and three brazen gates. 30. Babylon that I have built—HERODOTUS ascribes the building of Babylon to Semiramis and Nitocris, his informant under the Persian dynasty giving him the Assyrian and Persian account. Berosus and Abydenus give the Babylonian account, viz., that Nebuchadnezzar added much to the old city, built a splendid palace and city walls. HERODOTUS, the so-called "father of history," does not even mention Nebuchadnezzar. (Nitocris, to whom he attributes the beautifying of Babylon, seems to have been Nebuchadnezzar's wife.) Hence infidels have doubted the Scriptural account. But the latter is proved by thousands of bricks on the plain, the inscriptions of which have been deciphered, each marked "Nebuchadnezzar, the son of Nabopolassar." "Built," i. e., restored and enlarged (2 Chronicles 11. 5, 6). It is curious, all the bricks have been found with the stamped face downwards. Scarcely a figure in stone, or tablet, has been dug out of the rubbish heaps of Babylon, whereas Nineveh abounds in them; fulfilling Jeremiah 51. 37, "Babylon shall become heaps." The "I" is emphatic, by which he puts himself in the place of God; so the "my . . . my." He impiously opposes his might to God's, as though God's threat, uttered a year before, could never come to pass. He would be more than man; God, therefore, justly, makes him less than man. An acting over again of the fall; Adam, once lord of the world and the very beasts (Genesis 1. 28; so Nebuchadnezzar ch. 2. 38), would be a god (Genesis 3. 5), therefore he must die like the beasts (Psalm 82. 6; 49. 12). The second Adam restores the forfeited inheritance (Psalm 8. 4-8). 31. While, &c.—In the very act of speaking, so that there could be no doubt as to the connection between the crime and the punishment. So Luke 12. 19, 20. O king . . . to thee it is spoken—Notwithstanding thy kingly power, to thee thy doom is now spoken, there is to be no further respite. 33. driven from men—as a maniac fancying himself a wild beast. It is possible, a conspiracy of his nobles may have co-operated towards his having been "driven" forth as an outcast. hairs . . . eagle's feathers—matted together, as the hair-like thick plumage of the ossifraga eagle. The "nails," by being left uncut for years, would become like "claws." 34. lifted up mine eyes unto heaven—whence the "voice" had issued (v. 31) at the beginning of his visitation. Sudden mental derangement often has the effect of annihilating the whole interval, so that, when reason returns, the patient remembers only the event that immediately preceded his insanity. Nebuchadnezzar's looking up towards heaven was the first symptom of his "understanding" having "returned." Before, like the beasts, his eyes had been downward to the earth. Now, like Jonah's (Jonah 2. 1, 2, 4) out of the fish's belly, they are lifted up to heaven in prayer. He turns to Him that smiteth him (Isaiah 9. 13), with the faint glimmer of reason left to him, and owns God's justice in punishing him. praised . . . him—praise is a sure sign of a soul spiritually healed (Psalm 116. 12, 14; Mark 5. 15, 18, 19). I . . . honoured him—implying that the cause of his chastisement was that he had before robbed God of His honour. everlasting dominion—not temporary or mutable, as a human king's dominion. 35. all . . . as nothing—(Isaiah 40. 15, 17.) according to his will in . . . heaven—(Psalm 115. 3; 135. 6; Matthew 6. 10; Ephesians 1. 11.) army—the heavenly hosts, angels and starry orbs (cf. Isaiah 24. 21). none . . . stay his hand—tit, strike His hand. Image from striking the hand of another, to check him in doing anything (Isaiah 43. 13; 45. 9). What doest thou—(Job 42. 12; Romans 9. 20.) 36. An inscription in the East India Company's Museum is read as describing the period of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity. [G. V. SMITH.] In the so-called standard Inscription read by Sir H. Rawlinson, Nebuchadnezzar relates that during four (?) years he ceased to lay out buildings, or to furnish with victims Merodach's altar, or to clear out the canals for irrigation. No other instance in the cuneiform inscriptions occurs of a king recording his own inaction. my counsellors . . . sought unto me—desired to have me, as formerly, to be their head, wearied with the anarchy which prevailed in my absence (cf. note, v. 33); the likelihood of a conspiracy of the nobles is confirmed by this verse. majesty was added—my authority was greater than ever before (Job 42. 12; Proverbs 22. 4; Matthew 6. 33, "added"). 37. praise . . . extol . . . honour—He heaps word on word, as if he cannot say enough in praise of God. all whose works . . . truth . . . judgment—i. e., are true and just (Revelation 15. 3; 16. 7). God has not dealt unjustly or too severely with me; whatever I have suffered, I deserved it all. It is a mark of true contrition to condemn one's self, and justify God (Psalm 51. 4) thou that walk in pride . . . abase—exemplified in me. He condemns himself before the whole world, in order to glorify God.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-31. BELSHAZZAR'S IMPIOUS FEAST; THE HANDWRITING ON THE WALL INTERPRETED BY DANIEL OF THE DOOM OF BABYLON AND ITS KING. 1. Belshazzar—Rawlinson, from the Assyrian inscriptions, has explained the seeming discrepancy between Daniel and the heathen historians of Babylon, BEROSUS and ABYDENUS, who say the last king (Nabonidus) surrendered in Borsippa, after Babylon was taken, and had an honourable abode in Caramania assigned to him. Belshazzar was joint-king with his father (called Minus in the inscriptions), but subordinate to him; hence the Babylonian account suppresses the fact which cast discredit on Babylon, viz., that Belshazzar shut himself up in that city, and fell at its capture; whilst it records the surrender of the principal king in Borsippa (see my Introduction to Daniel). The heathen XENOPHON'S description of Belshazzar accords with Daniel's; he calls him "Impious," and illustrates his cruelty by mentioning that he killed one of his nobles, merely because in hunting the noble struck down the game before him; and unmanned a courtier, Gadates, at a banquet, because one of the king's concubines praised him as handsome. Daniel shows none of the sympathy for him which he had for Nebuchadnezzar. XENOPHON confirms Daniel as to Belshazzar's end. Winer explains the "shazzar" in the name as meaning fire, made . . . feast—heaven-sent infatuation when his city was at the time being besieged by Cyrus. The fortifications and abundant provisions in the city made the king to despise the besiegers. It was a solemn festival-day among the Babylonians [XENOPHON]. drank . . . before the thousand—The king, on this extraordinary occasion, departed from his usual way of feasting apart from his nobles (cf. Esther 1. 3). 2. whiles he tasted the wine—whilst under the effects of wine, men will do what they dare not do when sober. his father Nebuchadnezzar—i. e., his forefather. So "Jesus . . . the son of David, the son of Abraham." Daniel does not say that the other kings mentioned in other writers did not reign between Belshazzar and Nebuchadnezzar, viz., Evil-merodach (Jeremiah 52. 31), Neriglissar, his brother-in-law, and Laborasorched (nine months). BEROSUS makes Nabonidus the last king to have been one of the people, raised to the throne by an insurrection. As the inscriptions show that Belshazzar was distinct from, and joint king with, him, this is not at variance with Daniel, whose statement that Belshazzar was son (grandson) of Nebuchadnezzar is corroborated by Jeremiah (Jeremiah 27. 7). Their joint, yet independent, testimony, as contemporaries, and having the best means of information, is more trustworthy than any of the heathen historians, if there were a discrepancy. Evil-merodach, son of Nebuchadnezzar (according to BEROSUS), reigned but a short time (one or two years), having, in consequence of his bad government, been dethroned by a plot of Neriglissar, his sister's husband; hence Daniel does not mention him. At the elevation of Nabonidus as supreme king, Belshazzar, the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, was doubtless suffered to be subordinate king and successor, in order to conciliate the legitimate party. Thus the seeming discrepancy becomes a confirmation of genuineness when cleared up, for the real harmony must have been undesigned. wives . . . concubines—not usually present at feasts in the East, where females of the harem are kept in strict seclusion. Hence Vashti's refusal to appear at Ahasuerus' feast (Esther 1). But the Babylonian court, in its reckless excesses, seems not to have been so strict as the Persian. XENOPHON (Cyrop. 5. 2, 23) confirms Daniel, representing a feast of Belshazzar where the concubines are present. At the beginning "the lords" (v. 1), for whom the feast was made, alone seem to have been present; but as the revelry advanced, the females were introduced. Two classes of them are mentioned, those to whom belonged the privileges of "wives," and those strictly concubines (2 Samuel 5. 13; 1 Kings 11.

3; Song of Solomon 6. 5). 3. This act was not one of necessity, or for honour's sake, but in reckless profanity. 4. praised—sang and shouted praises to "gods," which being of gold, "are their own witnesses" (Isaiah 44. 9), confuting the folly of those who fancy such to be gods. 5. In the same hour—That the cause of God's visitation might be palpable, viz., the profanation of His vessels and His holy name. fingers of . . . hand—God admonishes him, not by a dream (as Nebuchadnezzar had been warned), or by a voice, but by "fingers coming forth," the invisibility of Him who moved them heightening the awful impressiveness of the scene, the hand of the Unseen. One attesting his doom before the eyes of himself and his guilty fellow-revellers. against the candlestick—the candelabra; where the mystic characters would be best seen. BARNES makes it the candlestick taken from the temple of Jerusalem, the nearness of the writing to it intimating that the rebuke was directed against the sacrilege. upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace—written in cuneiform letters on slabs on the walls, and on the very bricks, are found the perpetually recurring recital of titles, victories, and exploits, to remind the spectator at every point of the regal greatness. It is significant, that on the same wall on which the king was accustomed to read the flattering legends of his own magnificence, he beholds the mysterious inscription which tells his fall (cf. Proverbs 16. 18; Acts 12. 21-23). part of the hand—the anterior part, viz., the fingers. 6. countenance—lit., brightness, i. e., his bright look. joints of his loins—"the vertebrae of his back." [GESENIUS.] 7. He calls for the magicians, who more than once had been detected in imposture. He neglects God, and Daniel, whose fame as an interpreter was then well established. The world wishes to be deceived, and shuts its eyes against the light. [CALVIN.] The Hebrews think the words were Chaldee, but in the old Hebrew character (like that now in the Samaritan Pentateuch). third ruler—the first place was given to the king; the second, to the son of the king, or of the queen; the third, to the chief of the satraps. 8. The words were in such a character as to be illegible to the Chaldees, God reserving this honour to Daniel. 10. queen—the queen-mother, or grandmother, Nitocris, had not been present till now. She was wife either of Nebuchadnezzar or of Evil-merodach; hence her acquaintance with the services of Daniel. She completed the great works which the former had begun. Hence HERODOTUS attributes them to her alone. This accounts for the deference paid to her by Belshazzar. (See my Note, ch. 4. 36.) Cf. similar rank given to the queen-mother among the Hebrews, 1 Kings 15. 13. 11. spirit of the holy gods—she remembers and repeats Nebuchadnezzar's language (ch. 4. 8, 9, 13). As Daniel was probably, according to Oriental custom, deprived of the office to which Nebuchadnezzar had promoted him, as "master of the magicians" (ch. 4. 9), at the king's death, Belshazzar might easily be ignorant of his services. the king . . . thy father the king . . . thy father—The repetition marks with emphatic gravity both the excellences of Daniel, and the fact that Nebuchadnezzar, whom Belshazzar is bound to reverence as his father, had sought counsel from him in similar circumstances. 13. the captivity of Judah—the captive Jews residing in Babylon. 17. Not inconsistent with v. 23. For here he declares his interpretation of the words is not from the desire of reward. The honours in v. 29 were doubtless urged on him, without his wish, in such a way that he could not with propriety refuse them. Had he refused them after announcing the doom of the kingdom, he might have been suspected of cowardice or treason. 18. God gave—It was not his own birth or talents which gave him the vast empire, as he thought. To make him unlearn his proud thought was the object of God's visitation on him. majesty—in the eyes of his subjects. glory—from his victories. honour—from the enlargement and decoration of the city. 19. A purely absolute monarchy (Jeremiah 27. 7). 21. heart was made like . . . beasts—lit., "he made his heart like the beasts," i. e., he desired to dwell with them. 22. Thou hast erred not through ignorance, but through deliberate contempt of God, notwithstanding that thou hadst before thine eyes the striking warning given in thy grandfather's case. 23. whose are all thy ways—(Jeremiah 10, 23.) 24. Then—When thou liftedst up thyself against the Lord. the part of the hand—the fore part, the fingers. was . . . sent from him—i. e., from God. 25. Mene, Tekel, Upharsin—lit., numbered, weighed, and dividers. 26. God hath fixed the number of years of thine empire, and that number is now complete. 27. weighed in the balances—The Egyptians thought that Osiris weighed the actions of the dead in a literal balance. The Babylonians may have had the same notion, which would give a peculiar appropriateness to the image here used. found wanting—too light before God, the weigher of actions (1 Samuel 2, 3; Psalm 62, 9). Like spurious gold or silver (Jeremiah 6, 30). 28. Peres—the explanation of "dividers" (v. 25), the active participle plural there being used for the passive participle singular, "dividers" for "divided." The word "Peres" alludes to the similar word Persia. divided—viz., among the Medes and Persians [MAURER]; or, severed from thee. [GROTIUS.] 29. Belshazzar . . . clothed Daniel with scarlet—To come from the presence of a prince in a dress presented to the wearer as a distinction is still held a great honour in the East. Daniel was thus restored to a similar rank to what he had held under Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 2, 48). Godly fidelity which might be expected to bring down vengeance, as in this case, is often rewarded even in this life. The king, having promised, was ashamed before his courtiers to break his word. He perhaps also affected to despise the prophecy of his doom, as an idle threat. As to Daniel's reasons for now accepting what at first he had declined, cf. Note, v. 17. The insignia of honour would be witnesses for God's glory to the world of his having by God's aid interpreted the mystic characters. The cause of his elevation too would secure the favour of the new dynasty (ch. 6, 2) for both himself and his captive countrymen. As the capture of the city by Cyrus was not till near daylight, there was no want of time in that eventful night for accomplishing all that is here recorded. The capture of the city so immediately after the prophecy of it (following Belshazzar's sacrilege), marked most emphatically to the whole world the connection between Babylon's sin and its punishment. 30. HERODOTUS and XENOPHON confirm Daniel as to the suddenness of the event. Cyrus diverted the Euphrates into a new channel, and, guided by two deserters, marched by the dry bed into the city, whilst the Babylonians were carousing at an annual feast to the gods. See also Isaiah 21, 5; 44, 27; and Jeremiah 50, 38, 39; and 51, 36. As to Belshazzar's being slain, cf. Isaiah 14, 18-20; 21, 2-9; Jeremiah 50, 29-35; 51, 57. 31. Darius the Median—i. e., Cyaxares II., the son and successor of Astyages, B. C. 569-536. Though Koresh, or Cyrus, was leader of the assault, yet all was done in the name of Darius; therefore, he alone is mentioned here; but ch. 6, 28 shows Daniel was not ignorant of Cyrus' share in the capture of Babylon. Isaiah 13, 17; 21, 2, confirm Daniel in making the Medes the leading nation in destroying Babylon. So also Jeremiah 51, 11, 28. HERODOTUS, on the other hand, omits mentioning Darius, as that king, being weak and sensual, gave up all the authority to his energetic nephew, Cyrus (XENOPHON, Cyrop. 1, 5; 8, 7). threescore and two years old—This agrees with XENOPHON, Cyrop. 8, 5, 19, as to Cyaxares II.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-28. DARIUS' DECREE: DANIEL'S DISOBEDIENCE, AND CONSEQUENT EXPOSURE TO THE LIONS: HIS DELIVERANCE BY GOD, AND DARIUS' DECREE. 1. Darius—GROTEFEND has read it in the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis, as Darheush, i. e., Lord-King, a name applied to many of the Medo-Persian kings in common. Three of the name occur: Darius Hystaspes, B. C. 521, in whose reign the decree was carried into effect for rebuilding the temple (Ezra 4, 5; Haggai 1, 1); Darius Codomanus, B. C. 336, whom Alexander overcame, called "the Persian" (Nehemiah 12, 22), an expression used after the rule of

Macedon was set up; and Darius Cyaxares II., between Astyages and Cyrus (ÆSCHYLUS, Pers. 762, 763). hundred and twenty—satraps; set over the conquered provinces (including Babylon) by Cyrus (XENOPHON, Cyrop. 8, 6, 1). No doubt Cyrus acted under Darius, as in the capture of Babylon; so that Daniel rightly attributes the appointment to Darius. 3. Daniel was preferred—probably because of his having so wonderfully retold the fall of Babylon. Hence the very expression used by the queen-mother on that occasion (ch. 5, 12) is here used, "because an excellent spirit was in him." king thought to set him over the whole realm—agreeing with Darius' character, weak and averse to business, which he preferred to delegate to favourites. God overruled this to the good both of Daniel, and, through him, of His people. 4. occasion . . . concerning the kingdom—pretext for accusation in his administration (Ecclesiastes 4, 4). 5. It is the highest testimony to a godly man's walk, when his most watchful enemies can find no ground of censure save in that he walks according to the law of God even where it opposes the ways of the world. 6. assembled together—lit., "assembled hastily and tumultuously." Had they come more deliberately, the king might have refused their grant; but they gave him no time for reflection, representing that their test-decree was necessary for the safety of the king. live for ever—ARRIAN (4) records that Cyrus was the first before whom prostration was practised. It is an undesigned mark of genuineness that Daniel should mention no prostration before Nebuchadnezzar or Darius (see Note, ch. 3, 9). 7. The Persian king was regarded as representative of the chief god, Ormuzd; the seven princes near him represented the seven Amshaspands before the throne of Ormuzd; hence Mordecai (Esther 3, 4) refused such homage to Haman, the king's prime minister, as inconsistent with what is due to God alone. A weak despot, like Darius, much under the control of his princes, might easily be persuaded that such a decree would test the obedience of the Chaldeans just conquered, and tame their proud spirits. So absolute is the king in the East, that he is regarded not merely as the ruler, but the owner, of the people. All . . . governors . . . counsellors, &c.—several functionaries are here specified, not mentioned in v. 4, 6. They evidently exaggerate the case to the weak king, as if their request was that of all the officers in the empire. den of lions—an underground cave or pit, covered with a stone. It is an undesigned proof of genuineness, that the "fiery furnace" is not made the means of punishment here, as in ch. 3; for the Persians were fire-worshippers, which the Babylonians were not. 8. decree—or, interdict. that it be not changed—(Esther 1, 19; 8, 8.) This immutability of the king's commands was peculiar to the Medes and Persians: it was due to their regarding him infallible as the representative of Ormuzd; it was not so among the Babylonians. Medes and Persians—the order of the names is an undesigned mark of genuineness. Cyrus the Persian reigned subordinate to Darius the Mede as to dignity, though exercising more real power. After Darius' death, the order is "the Persians and Medes" (Esther 1, 14, 19, &c.). 9. Such a despotic decree is quite explicable by remembering that the king, as the incarnation of Ormuzd, might demand such an act of religious obedience as a test of loyalty. Persecuting laws are always made on false pretences. Instead of bitter complaints against men, Daniel prays to God. Though having vast business as a ruler of the empire, he finds time to pray thrice a day. Daniel's three companions (ch. 3) are not alluded to here, nor any other Jew who conscientiously may have disregarded the edict, as the conspirators aimed at Daniel alone (v. 5). 10. when Daniel knew . . . writing . . . signed—and that, therefore, the power of advising the king against it was taken from him. went into his house—withdrawing from the God-dishonouring court. windows . . . open—not in vain glory, but that there might be no obstruction to his view of the direction in which Jerusalem, the earthly seat of Jehovah under the Old Testament, lay; and that the sight of heaven might draw off his mind from earthly thoughts. To Christ in the heavenly temple let us turn our eyes in prayer, from this land of our captivity (1 Kings 8, 44, 48; 2 Chronicles 6, 29, 34, 38; Psalm 5, 7). chamber—the upper room, where prayer was generally offered by the Jews (Acts 1, 13). Not on the house-top (Acts 10, 9), where he would be conspicuous. upon his knees—humble attitudes in prayer become humble suppliants. three times a day—(Psalm 55, 17.) The third, sixth, and ninth hour; our nine, twelve, and three o'clock (Acts 2, 15; 10, 9; 3, 1; 10, 30; cf. ch. 9, 21). as . . . aforesaid—not from contempt of the king's command. 11. assembled—as in v. 6, assembled or ran hastily, so as to come upon Daniel suddenly and detect him in the act. 12. They preface their attack by alleging the king's edict, so as to get him again to confirm it unalterably, before they mention Daniel's name. Not to break a wicked promise, is not firmness, but guilty obstinacy (Matthew 14, 9; Mark 6, 26). 13. That Daniel—contemptuously. of . . . captivity of Judah—recently a captive among thy servants, the Babylonians—one whom humble obedience most becomes. Thus they aggravate his guilt, omitting mention of his being prime minister, which might only remind Darius of Daniel's state services. regardeth not thee—because he regarded God (Acts 4, 19; 5, 29). 14. displeased with himself—for having suffered himself to be entrapped into such a hasty decree (Proverbs 29, 20). On the one hand he was pressed by the immutability of the law, fear that the princes might conspire against him, and desire to consult for his own reputation, not to seem fickle; on the other, by regard for Daniel, and a desire to save him from the effects of his own rash decree. till . . . going down of . . . sun—The king took this time to deliberate, thinking that after sunset Daniel would be spared till morning, and that meanwhile some way of escape would turn up. But (v. 15) the conspirators assembled tumultuously (lit.) to prevent this delay in the execution, lest the king should meantime change his decree. 16. Thy God . . . will deliver thee—The heathen believed in the interposition of the gods at times in favour of their worshippers. Darius recognized Daniel's God as a god, but not the only true God. He had heard of the deliverance of the three youths in ch. 3., and hence augurs Daniel's deliverance. I am not my own master, and cannot deliver thee, however much I wish it. "Thy God will." Kings are the slaves of their flatterers. Men admire piety to God in others, however disregarding Him themselves. 17. stone . . . sealed—typical of Christ's entombment under a seal (Matthew 27, 66). Divinely ordered, that the deliverance might be the more striking. his own signet, and . . . of his lords—the concurrence of the lords was required for making laws. In this, kingly power had fallen since it was in Nebuchadnezzar's hands. The Median king is a puppet in his lords' hands; they take the security of their own seal as well as his, that he should not release Daniel. The king's seal guaranteed Daniel from being killed by them, should he escape the lions. 18. neither were instruments of music, &c.—GESENIUS translates, "concubines." Daniel's mentioning to us as an extraordinary thing of Darius, that he neither approached his table nor his harem, agrees with XENOPHON'S picture of him as devoted to wine and women, vain, and without self-control. He is sorry for the evil which he himself had caused, yet takes no steps to remedy it. There are many such halts between good and bad, who are ill at ease in their sins, yet go forward in them, and are drawn on by others. 19. His grief overcame his fear of the nobles. 20. living God—having life Himself, and able to preserve thy life; contrasted with the lifeless idols. Darius borrowed the phrase from Daniel; God exhorting from an idolater a confession of the truth. thou servest continually—in times of persecution, as well as times of peace. is thy God . . . able—the language of doubt, yet hope. 21. Daniel might have indulged in anger at the king, but does not; his sole thought is, God's glory has been set forth in his deliverance. 22. his angel—the instrument, not the author, of his deliverance (Psalm 91, 11; 34, 7). shut . . . lions' mouths—(Hebrews 11, 33.) So spiritually, God will shut the roaring lion's mouth (1 Peter 5, 8) for His servants. forasmuch as before him innocency—not absolutely (in ch. 9, 7, 18 he dis-claims such a plea), but relatively to this case. God has attested the justice of my cause in standing up for His worship, by delivering me. Therefore, the "forasmuch" does not justify Rome's doctrine of works meriting salvation. before thee—Obedience to God is in strictest compatibility with loyalty to the king (Matthew 22, 21; 1 Peter 2, 17). Daniel's disobedience to the king was seeming, not real, because it was not from contempt of the king, but from regard to the King of kings (cf. Acts 24, 16). 23. because he believed—"Faith" is attested in Hebrews 11, 33 to have been his actuating principle: a prelude to the gospel. His belief was not with a view to a miraculous deliverance. He shut his eyes to the event, committing the keeping of his soul to God, in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator (1 Peter 4, 19), sure of deliverance in a better life, if not in this. 24. (Deuteronomy 19, 19; Proverbs 19, 5.) accused—lit., devoured the bones and flesh. It was just that they who had torn Daniel's character, and sought the tearing of his person, should be themselves given to be torn in pieces (Proverbs 11, 8). their children—among the Persians, the whole kindred were involved in the guilt of one culprit. The Mosaic law expressly forbade this (Deuteronomy 24, 16; 2 Kings 14, 6), or ever—i. e., before ever. The lions' sparing Daniel could not have been because they were full, as they showed the keenness of their hunger on the accusers. 26. Stronger than the decree (ch. 3, 29). That was negative; this, positive; not merely men must say "nothing amiss of," but must "fear before God." 28. It was in the third year of Cyrus Daniel's visions (ch. 10-12.) were given. Daniel "prospered" because of his prophecies (Ezra 1, 1, 2).

CHAPTER VII.

VER. 1-28. VISION OF THE FOUR BEASTS. This chapter treats of the same subject as the second chapter. But there the four kingdoms, and Messiah's final kingdom, were regarded according to their external political aspect; but here according to the mind of God concerning them, and their moral features. The outward political history had been shown in its general features to the world-ruler, whose position fitted him for receiving such a revelation. But God's prophet here receives disclosures as to the characters of the powers of the world, in a religious point of view, suited to his position and receptivity. Hence in the second chapter the images are taken from the inanimate sphere; in the seventh chapter they are taken from the animate. Nebuchadnezzar saw superficially the world-power as a splendid human figure, and the kingdom of God as a mere stone at the first. Daniel sees the world-kingdoms in their inner essence as of an animal nature lower than human, being estranged from God; and that only in the kingdom of God ("the Son of man," the representative-man) is the true dignity of man realized. So, as contrasted with Nebuchadnezzar's vision, the kingdom of God appears to Daniel, from the very first, superior to the world-kingdom. For though in physical force the beasts excel man, man has essentially spiritual powers. Nebuchadnezzar's colossal image represents mankind in its own strength, but only the outward man. Daniel sees man spiritually degraded to the beast-level, led by blind impulses, through his alienation from God. It is only from above that the perfect Son of man comes, and in His kingdom man attains his true destiny. Cf. Psalm 8, with Genesis 1, 26-28. Humanity is impossible without divinity: it sinks to bestiality (Psalm 32, 9; 49, 20; 73, 22). Obstinate heathen nations are compared to "bulls" (Psalm 63, 30). Egypt to the dragon in the Nile (Isaiah 27, 1; 51, 9; Ezekiel 29, 3). The animal with all its sagacity looks always to the ground, without consciousness of relation to God. What elevates man is communion with God, in willing subjection to Him. The moment he tries to exalt himself to independence of God, like Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 4, 30), he sinks to the beast's level. Daniel's acquaintance with the animal colossal figures in Babylon and Nineveh was a psychological preparation for his animal visions. Hosea 13, 7, 8 would occur to him whilst viewing those ensigns of the world-

power. Cf. Jeremiah 2, 15; 4, 7; 5, 6. 1. Belshazzar—Good Hebrew MSS. have Belshazzar; meaning "Bel is to be burnt with hostile fire" (Jeremiah 50, 2; 51, 44). In the history he is called by his ordinary name; in the prophecy, which gives his true destiny, he is called a corresponding name, by the change of a letter. visions of his head—not confused "dreams," but distinct images seen whilst his mind was collected. sum—a summary. In predictions, generally, details are not given so fully as to leave no scope for free agency, faith, and patient waiting for God manifesting His will in the event. He "wrote" it for the Church in all ages; he "told" it for the comfort of his captive fellow-countrymen. 2. the four winds—answering to the "four beasts; their several conflicts in the four quarters or directions of the world. stroke—burst forth (from the abyss.) [MAURER.] sea—the world-powers rise out of the agitations of the political sea (Jeremiah 46, 7, 8; Luke 21, 25; cf. Revelation 13, 1; 17, 15; 21, 1); the kingdom of God and the Son of man from the clouds of heaven (v. 13; cf. John 8, 23). TREGELLES takes "the great sea" to mean, as always elsewhere in Scripture (Joshua 1, 4; 9, 1), the Mediterranean, the centre territorially of the four kingdoms of the vision, which all border on it, and have Jerusalem subject to them. Babylon did not border on the Mediterranean, nor rule Jerusalem, till Nebuchadnezzar's time, when both things took place simultaneously. Persia encircled more of this sea, viz. from the Hellespont to Cyrene. Greece did not become a monarchy before Alexander's time, but then, succeeding to Persia, it became mistress of Jerusalem. It surrounded still more of the Mediterranean, adding the coasts of Greece to the part held by Persia. Rome, under Augustus, realized three things at once—it became a monarchy, became mistress of the last of the four parts of Alexander's empire (symbolized by the four heads of the third beast), and of Jerusalem; it surrounded all the Mediterranean. 3. beasts—not living animals, as the cherubic four in Revelation 4, 7 (for the original is a different word from beasts, and ought to be there translated, "living animals"). The cherubic living animals represent redeemed man, combining in himself the highest forms of animal life. But the "beasts" here represent the world-powers, in their beast-like, grovelling character. It is on the fundamental harmony between nature and spirit, between the three kingdoms of nature, history, and revelation, that Scripture symbolism rests. The selection of symbols is not arbitrary, but based on the essence of things. 4. lion—the symbol of strength and courage; chief among the kingdoms, as the lion among the beasts. Nebuchadnezzar is called "the lion" (Jeremiah 4, 7). eagle's wings—denoting a widespread and rapidly-acquired (Isaiah 46, 11; Jeremiah 4, 13; Lamentations 4, 19; Habakkuk 1, 6) empire (Jeremiah 48, 40). plucked—its ability for widespread conquests passed away under Evil-merodach, &c. [GROTIUS.] Rather, during Nebuchadnezzar's privation of his throne, whilst deranged. it was lifted up from the earth—i. e., from its grovelling bestiality. made stand . . . as a man—so long as Nebuchadnezzar, in haughty pride, relied on his own strength, he forfeited the true dignity of man, and was therefore degraded to be with the beasts. Ch. 4, 16: "Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him." But after that he learned by this sore discipline, that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men" (ch. 4, 35, 36), the reverse change took place in him, "a man's heart is given to him, instead of his former beast's heart, he attains man's true position, viz., to be consciously dependent on God." Cf. Psalm 9, 20. 5. bear—symbolizing the austere life of the Persians in their mountains, also their cruelty (Isaiah 13, 17, 18; Cambyyses, Ochus, and other of the Persian princes were notoriously cruel; the Persian laws involved, for one man's offence, the whole kindred and neighbourhood in destruction, ch. 6, 24) and rapacity. "A bear is an all-devouring animal" [ARISTOTLE, 8, 5.] (Jeremiah 51, 48, 56). raised . . . itself on one side—But the Hebrew, "It raised up one dominion." The Medes, an ancient people, and the Persians, a modern tribe, formed one united sovereignty, in contrast to the third and fourth kingdoms, each original'y one, afterwards divided. English Version is the result of a slight change of a Hebrew letter. The idea then would be, "It lay on one of its fore feet, and stood on the other;" a figure still to be seen on one of the stones of Babylon (MUNTER, Relig. Babyl. 112); denoting a kingdom that had been at rest, but is now rousing itself for conquest. Media is the lower side, passiveness; Persia, the upper, active element. [AUBERLEN.] The three ribs in its mouth are Media, Lydia, and Babylon, brought under the Persian sway. Rather, Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt, not properly parts of its body, but seized by Medo-Persia. [SIR I. NEWTON.] Called "ribs," because they strengthened the Medo-Persian empire. "Between its teeth," as being much grinded by it. deavour much flesh—i. e., subjugate many nations. 6. leopard—smaller than the lion; swift (Habakkuk 1, 8); cruel (Isaiah 11, 6), the opposite of tame; springing suddenly from its hiding-place on its prey (Hosea 13, 7); spotted. So Alexander, a small king, of a small kingdom, Macedon, attacked Darius at the head of the vast empire reaching from the Ægean Sea to the Indies. In twelve years he subjugated part of Europe, and all Asia from Illyricum and the Adriatic to the Ganges, not so much fighting as conquering. [JEROME.] Hence, whereas Babylon is represented with two wings, Macedon has four, so rapid were its conquests. The various spots denote the various nations incorporated into his empire [BOCHART]; or Alexander's own variations in character, at one time mild, at another cruel, now temperate, and now drunken and licentious. four heads—explained chapter 8, 8, 22; the four kingdoms of the Diadochi or successors into which the Macedonian empire was divided at the death of Alexander, viz., Macedon and Greece under Cassander, Thrace and Bithynia under Lysimachus, Egypt under Ptolemy, and Syria under Seleucus. dominion . . . given to it—by God; not by Alexander's own might. For how unlikely it was that 30,000 men should overthrow several hundreds of thousands! JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 11, 6) says that Alexander adored the high priest of Jerusalem, saying that he at Dium in Macedonia had seen a vision of God so habited, inviting him to go to Asia, and promising him success. 7. As Daniel lived under the kingdom of the first beast, and therefore needed not to describe it, and as the second and third are described fully in the second part of the book, the chief emphasis falls on the fourth. Also prophecy most dwells on the end, which is the consummation of the preceding series of events. It is in the fourth that the world-power manifests fully its God-opposing nature. Whereas the three former kingdoms were designated respectively, as a lion, bear, and leopard, no particular beast is specified as the image of the fourth; for Rome is so terrible as to be not describable by any one, but combines in itself all that we can imagine inexpressibly fierce in all beasts. Hence thrice (v. 7, 19, 23) it is repeated, that the fourth was "diverse from all" the others. The formula of introduction, "I saw in the night visions," occurs here, as at v. 2, and again at v. 13, thus dividing the whole vision into three parts—the first embracing the three kingdoms, the second the fourth and its overthrow, the third Messiah's kingdom. The first three together take up a few centuries; the fourth, thousands of years. The whole lower half of the image in ch. 2, is given to it. And whereas the other kingdoms consist of only one material, this consists of two, iron and clay (on which much stress is laid, ch. 2, 41-43); the "iron teeth" here allude to one material in the fourth kingdom of the image. ten horns—It is with the crisis, rather than the course, of the fourth kingdom, this seventh chapter is mainly concerned. The ten kings (v. 24, the "horns" representing power), i. e., kingdoms, into which Rome was divided on its incorporation with the Germanic and Slavonic tribes, and again at the Reformation, are thought by many to be here intended. But the variation of the list of the ten, and their ignoring the eastern half of the empire altogether, and the existence of the Papacy before the breaking up of even the Western empire, instead of being the "little horn" springing up after the other ten, are against this view. The Western

Roman empire continued till A. D. 751, and the Eastern, till A. D. 1453. The ten kingdoms, therefore, prefigured by the ten "toes" (ch. 2, 41; cf. Revelation 13, 1; 17, 12), are the ten kingdoms into which Rome shall be found finally divided when Antichrist shall appear. [TREGELLES.] These, probably, are prefigured by the number ten being the prevalent one at the chief turning-points of Roman history. 8. little horn—little at first, but afterwards waxing greater than all others. He must be sought "among them," viz., the ten horns. The Roman empire did not represent itself as a continuation of Alexander's; but the Germanic empire calls itself "the holy Roman empire." Napoleon's attempted universal monarchy was avowedly Roman: his son was called king of Rome. The czar (Cæsar) also professes to represent the eastern half of the Roman empire. The Roman civilization, church, language and law are the chief elements in Germanic civilization. But the Romanic element seeks universal empire, whilst the Germanic seeks individualization. Hence the universal monarchies attempted by the Papacy, Charlemagne, Charles V., and Napoleon have failed, the iron not amalgamating with the clay. In the king symbolized by "the little horn," the God-opposing, haughty spirit of the world, represented by the fourth monarchy, finds its intensest development. "The man of sin," "the son of perdition" (2 Thessalonians 2). Antichrist (1 John 2, 18, 22; 4, 3). It is the complete evolution of the evil principle introduced by the fall. three of the first horns plucked up—the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards and the state of Rome, which constituted the Pope's dominions at the first; obtained by Pope Zachary and Stephen II. in return for acknowledging the usurper Pepin lawful king of France. [NEWTON.] See TREGELLES' objections, v. 7, "ten horns." Note. The "little horn," in his view, is to be Antichrist rising three and a half years before Christ's second advent, having first overthrown three of the ten contemporaneous kingdoms, into which the fourth monarchy, under which we live, shall be finally divided. Popery seems to be a fulfilment of the prophecy in many particulars, the Pope claiming to be God on earth and above all earthly dominions; but the spirit of Antichrist prefigured by Popery will probably culminate in one individual, to be destroyed by Christ's coming; He will be the product of the political world-powers, whereas Popery, which prepares His way, is a Church become worldly. eyes of a man—eyes express intelligence (Ezekiel 1, 18); so (Genesis 3, 5) the serpent's promise was, man's "eyes should be opened," if he would but rebel against God. Antichrist shall consummate the self-apotheosis, begun at the fall, high intellectual culture, independent of God. The metals representing Babylon and Medo-Persia, gold and silver, are more precious than brass and iron, representing Greece and Rome; but the latter metals are more useful to civilization (Genesis 4, 22). The clay, representing the Germanic element, is the most plastic material. Thus there is a progress in culture; but this is not a progress necessarily in man's truest dignity, viz., union and likeness to God. Nay, it has led him farther from God, to self-reliance and world-love. The beginnings of civilization were among the children of Cain (Genesis 4, 17-24; Luke 16, 8). Antiochus Epiphanes, the first Antichrist, came from civilized Greece, and loved art. As Hellenic civilization produced the first, so modern civilization under the fourth monarchy will produce the last Antichrist. The "mouth" and "eyes" are those of a man, while the symbol is otherwise brutish, i. e., it will assume man's true dignity, viz., wear the guise of the kingdom of God (which comes as the Son of man" from above), whilst it is really bestial, viz., severed from God. Antichrist promises the same things as Christ, but in an opposite way. A caricature of Christ, offering a regenerated world without the cross. Babylon and Persia in their religion had more reverence for things Divine than Greece and Rome in the imperial stages of their history. Nebuchadnezzar's human heart, given him (ch. 4, 16) on his repentance, contrasts with the human eyes of Antichrist, the pseudo son of man, viz., intellectual culture, while heart and mouth blaspheme God. The deterioration politically corresponds: the first kingdom, an organic unity; the second, divided into Median and Persian; the third branches off into four; the fourth, into ten. The two eastern kingdoms are marked by nobler metals; the two western, by baser; individualization and division appear in the latter, and it is they which produce the two Antichrists. 9. I beheld till—I continued looking till, &c. thrones . . . cast down—rather, "thrones were placed" [Vulgate and LUTHER], viz., for the saints and elect angels to whom "judgment is given" (v. 22), as assessors with the Judge. Cf. v. 10, "thousand thousands ministered unto Him" (Matthew 19, 28; Luke 22, 30; 1 Corinthians 6, 2, 3; 1 Timothy 5, 21; Revelation 2, 26; 4, 4). In English Version the thrones cast down are those of the previously-mentioned kings who give place to Messiah. Ancient of days—"The everlasting Father" (Isalah 9, 6). He is the Judge here, as the Son does not judge in His own cause, and it is His cause which is the one at issue with Antichrist. sit—the attitude of a judge about to pass sentence. white—the judicial purity of the Judge, and of all things round Him, is hereby expressed (Revelation 1, 14). wheels—as Oriental thrones move on wheels. Like the rapid flame, God's judgments are most swift in falling where He wills them (Ezekiel 1, 15, 16). The judgment here is not the last judgment, for then there will be no beast, and heaven and earth shall have passed away; but it is that on Antichrist (the last development of the fourth kingdom), typical of the last judgment: "Christ coming to substitute the millennial kingdom of glory for that of the cross" (Revelation 17, 12-14; 19, 15-21; 11, 15). 10. thousand . . . ministered unto him—so at the giving of the law (Deuteronomy 33, 2; Psalm 68, 17; Hebrews 12, 22; Jude 14). ten . . . thousand before him—image from the Sanhedrim, in which the father of the consistory sat with his assessors on each side, in the form of a semicircle, and the people standing before him. judgment was set—the judges sat (Revelation 20, 4). books . . . opened—(Revelation 20, 12.) Forensic image; all the documents of the cause at issue, connected with the condemnation of Antichrist and his kingdom, and the setting up of Messiah's kingdom. Judgment must pass on the world as being under the curse, before the glory comes; but Antichrist offers glory without the cross, a renewed world without the world being judged. 11. Here is set forth the execution on earth of the judgment pronounced in the unseen heavenly court of judicature (v. 9, 10). body . . . given to . . . flame—(Revelation 19, 20.) 12. "The rest of the beasts," i. e., the three first, had passed away not by direct destroying judgments, such as consumed the little horn, as being the finally-matured evil of the fourth beast. They had continued to exist, but their "dominion was taken away;" whereas the fourth beast shall cease utterly, superseded by Messiah's kingdom. for a season . . . time—not only the triumph of the beasts over the godly, but their very existence is limited to a definite time, and that time the exactly suitable one (cf. Matthew 24, 22). Probably a definite period is meant by a "season and time" (cf. v. 25; Revelation 20, 3). It is striking, the fourth monarchy, though Christianized for 1500 years past, is not distinguished from the previous heathen monarchies, or from its own heathen portion. Nay, it is represented as the most God-opposed of all, and culminating at last in blasphemous Antichrist. The reason is, Christ's kingdom now is not of this world (John 18, 36), and only at the second advent of Christ becomes an external power of the world. Hence Daniel, whose province it was to prophesy of the world-powers, does not treat of Christianity until it becomes a world-power, viz., at the second advent. The kingdom of God is a hidden one till Jesus comes again (Romans 8, 17; Colossians 3, 2, 3; 2 Timothy 2, 11, 12). Rome was worldly whilst heathen, and remains worldly, though Christianized. So the New Testament views the present æon or age of the world as essentially heathenish, which we cannot love without forsaking Christ (Romans 12, 2; 1 Corinthians 1, 20; 2, 6, 8; 3, 18; 7, 31; 2 Corinthians 4, 4; Galatians 1, 4; Ephesians 2, 2; 2 Timothy 4, 10; cf. 1 John 2, 15, 17). The object of Christianity is not so much to Christianize the present world as to save souls out of it, so as not to be condemned with the world (1 Corinthians 11. 32), but to rule with Him in his millennium (Matthew 5. 5; Luke 12. 32; 22. 28-30; Romans 5. 17; 1 Corinthians 6. 2; Revelation 1. 6; 2. 26-28; 3. 21; 20. 4). This is to be our hope, not to reign in the present world course (1 Corinthians 4. 8; 2 Corinthians 4. 13; Philippians 3. 20; Hebrews 13. 14). There must be a "re-generation" of the world, as of the individual, a death previous to a resurrection, a destruction of the world-kingsdoms, before they rise anew as the kingdoms of Christ (Matthew 19. 28). Even the millennium will not perfectly eradicate the world's corruption, another apostasy and judgment will succeed (Revelation 20. 7-15), in which the world of nature is to be destroyed and renewed, as the world of history was before the millennium (2 Peter 3. 8-13); then comes the perfect earth and heaven (Revelation 21. 1). Thus there is an onward progress, and the Christian is waiting for the consummation (Mark 13. 33-37; Luke 12. 35, 36, 40-46; 1 Thessalonians 1. 9, 10), as His Lord also is "expecting" (Hebrews 10. 13). 13. Son of man—(See Note, Ezekiel 2. 1.) Not merely Son of David, and King of Israel, but Head of restored humanity (corresponding to the world-wide horizon of Daniel's prophecy); the seed of the woman, crushing Antichrist, the seed of the serpent, according to the Protevangel in Paradise (Genesis 3). The Representative man shall then realize the original destiny of man as Head of the creation (Genesis 1. 26, 28); the centre of unity to Israel and the Gentiles. The beast, which taken conjointly represents the four beasts, ascends from the sea (ch. 7. 2; Revelation 13. 1); the Son of man descends from "heaven." Satan, as the serpent, is the representative head of all that is bestial; man, by following the serpent, has become bestial. God must, therefore, become man, so that man may cease to be bestialike. Whoever rejects the incarnate God will be judged by the Son of man just because He is the Son of man (John 5. 27). This title is always associated with His coming again, because the kingdom that then awaits him is that which belongs to Him as the Saviour of man, the Restorer of the lost inheritance. "Son of man" expresses His VISIBLE state, formerly in His humiliation, hereafter in His exaltation. He "comes to the Ancient of days" to be invested with the kingdom. Cf. Psalm 110. 2: "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength (Messiah) out of Zion." This investiture was at His ascension "with the clouds of heaven" (Acts 1. 9; 2. 33, 34; Psalm 2. 6-9; Matthew 28. 18), which is a pledge of His return "in like manner" "in the clouds" (Acts 1. 11; Matthew 26. 64), and "with clouds" (Revelation 1. 7). The kingdom then was given to Him in title and invisible exercise; at His second coming it shall be in visible administration. He will vindicate it from the misrule of those who received it to hold for and under God, but who ignored His supremacy. The Father will assert His right by the Son, the heir, who will hold it for Him (Ezekiel 21. 27; Hebrews 1. 2; Revelation 19. 13-16). TREGELLES thinks the investiture here immediately precedes Christ's coming forth; because He sits at God's right hand until His enemies are made His footstool, then the kingdom is given to the Son in actual investiture, and He comes to crush His so prepared footstool under His feet. But the words, "with the clouds," and the universal power actually, though invisibly, given Him then (Ephesians 1. 20-22), agree best with His investiture at the ascension, which, in the prophetic view that overlaps the interval of ages, is the precursor of His coming visibly to reign; no event of equal moment taking place in the interval. 15. body—lit., sheath: the body being the sheath of the soul. 17. kings—i. e., kingdoms. Cf. v. 23, "fourth kingdom;" ch. 2. 38; 8. 20-22. Each of the four kings represents a dynasty. Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, Antiochus, and Antichrist, though individually referred to, are representatives of characteristic tendencies. 18. the Most High—the emphatic title of God in this prophecy, who delegates His power first to Israel; then to the Gentiles (ch. 2. 37, 38), on Israel failing to realize the idea of the theocracy; lastly, to Messiah, who shall rule truly for God, taking it from the Gentile world-powers, whose history is one of continual degeneracy culminating in the last of the kings, Antichrist. Here, in the interpretation, "the saints," but in the vision (v. 13, 14), "the Son of man" takes the kingdom; for Christ and His people are one in suffering, and one in glory. TREGELLES translates, "most high places" (Ephesians 1. 3; 2. 6). Though oppressed by the beast and little horn, they belong not to the earth from which the four beasts arise, but to the most high places. 19. Balaam, an Aramean, dwelling on the Euphrates, at the beginning of Israel's independent history, and Daniel at the close of it, prophetically exhibit to the hostile world-powers Israel as triumphant over them at last, though the world-powers of the East (Asshur) and the West (Chittim) carry all before them and afflict Eber (Israel) for a time (Numbers 23. 8-10, 28; 24. 2, 7-9, 22-24). To Balaam's "Asshur" correspond Daniel's two eastern kingdoms, Babylon and Medo-Persia; to "Chittim," the two western kingdoms, Greece and Rome (cf. Genesis 10. 4, 11, 22). In Babel, Nimrod the hunter (revolter) founds the first kingdom of the world (Genesis 10. 8-13). The Babylonian world-power takes up the thread interrupted at the building of Babel, and the kingdom of Nimrod. As at Babel, so in Babylon the world is united against God; Babylon, the first world-power, thus becomes the type of the God-opposed world. The fourth monarchy consummates the evil; it is "diverse" from the others only in its more unlimited universality. The three first were not in the full sense universal monarchies. The fourth is; so in it the God-opposed principle finds its full development. All history moves within the Romanic, Germanic, and Slavonic nations; it shall continue so to Christ's second advent. The fourth monarchy represents universalism externally; Christianity, internally. Rome is Babylon fully developed. It is the world-power corresponding in contrast to Christianity, and therefore contemporary with it (Matthew 13. 38; Mark 1. 15; Luke 2. 1; Galatians 4. 4). 20. look . . . more stout than . . . fellows—viz., than that of the other horns. 21. made war with the saints—persecuted the Church (Revelation 11. 7; 13. 7), prevailed—but not ultimately. The limit is marked by "until" (v. 22). The little horn continues, without intermission, to persecute up to Christ's second advent (Revelation 17. 12, 14; 19. 19, 20). 22. Ancient of days came—the title applied to the Father in v. 13 is here applied to the Son; who is called "the everlasting Father" (Isaiah 9. 6). The Father is never said to "come;" it is the Son who comes. Judgment was given to . . . saints—judgment includes rule; "kingdom" in the end of this verse (1 Corinthians 6. 2; Revelation 1. 6; 5. 10; 20. 4). Christ first receives "judgment" and the "kingdom," then the saints with Him (v. 13, 14). 24. ten horns—answering to the ten "toes" (ch. 2. 41). out of this kingdom—it is out of the fourth kingdom that ten others arise, whatever exterior territory any of them possess (Revelation 13. 1; 17. 12). rise after them—yet contemporaneous with them; the ten are contemporaries. Antichrist rises after their rise, at first "little" (v. 8); but after destroying three of the ten, he becomes greater than them all (v. 20, 21). The three being gone, he is the eighth (cf. Revelation 17. 11); a distinct head, and yet "of the seven." As the previous world-kingdoms had their representative heads (Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar; Persia, Cyrus; Greece, Alexander), so the fourth kingdom and its Antichrists shall have their evil concentrated in the one final Antichrist. As Antiochus Epiphanes, the Antichrist of the third kingdom in ch. 8., was the personal enemy of God, so the final Antichrist of the fourth kingdom, his antitype, The Church has endured a pagan and a papal persecution; there remains for her an infidel persecution, general, purifying, and cementing. [CERUL.] He will not merely, as Popery, substitute himself for Christ in Christ's name, but "deny the Father and the Son" (1 John 2. 22). The persecution is to continue up to Christ's second coming (v. 21, 22); the horn of blasphemy cannot therefore be past; for now there is almost a general cessation of persecution. 25. Three attributes of Antichrist are specified: (1.) The highest worldly wisdom and civilization. (2.) The uniting of the whole civilized world under his dominion. (3.) Atheism, antitheism, and autotheism in its fullest development (1 John 2. 22). Therefore, not only is power taken from the fourth beast, as in the case of the other three, but God destroys it and the world-power in general by a final judgment. The present external Christianity is to give place to an almost universal apostasy. think—lit., carry within him as it were the burden of the thought. change times—the prerogative of God alone (ch. 2, 21); blasphemously assumed by Antichrist. The "times and laws" here meant are those of religious ordinance; stated times of feasts. [MAURER.] Perhaps there are included the times assigned by God to the duration of kingdoms. He shall set Himself above all that is called God (2 Thessalonians 2, 4), putting his own "will" above God's times and laws (ch. 11, 36, 37). But the "times" of His wilfulness are limited for the elect's sake (Matthew 24, 22). they—the saints. given into his hand—to be persecuted. time . . . times and . . . dividing of time—one year, two years, and half a year: 1260 days (Revelation 12, 6, 14); forty-two months (Revelation 11, 2, 3). That literally three and a half years are to be the term of Antichrist's persecution is favoured by ch. 4, 16, 23, where the year-day theory would be impossible. If the Church, moreover, had been informed that 1260 years must elapse before the second advent, the attitude of expectancy which is inculcated (Luke 12, 38; 1 Corinthians 1, 7; 1 Thessalonians 1, 9, 10; 2 Peter 3, 12) on the ground of the uncertainty of the time, would be out of place. The original word for "time" denotes a stated period or set feast; or the interval from one set feast to its recurrence, i.e., a year [TREGELLES]; Leviticus 23, 4, "seasons;" Leviticus 23, 44, "feasts." The passages in favour of the year-day theory are Ezekiel 4, 6, where each day of the forty during which Ezekiel lay on his right side is defined by God as meaning a year. Cf. Numbers 14, 34, where a year of wandering in the wilderness was appointed for each day of the forty during which the spies searched Canaan; but the days were, in these two cases, merely the type or reason for the years, which were announced as they were to be fulfilled. In the prophetic part of Numbers 14, 34 years are literal. If the year-day system was applied to them, they would be 14,400 years! In Ezekiel 4, 4-6, if day meant year, Ezekiel would have lain on his right side forty years! The context here in v. 24, 25, is not symbolical. Antichrist is no longer called a horn, but a king subduing three out of ten kings (no longer horns. v. 7, 8). So in ch. 12, 7, where "time, times, and half a time," again occur, nothing symbolic occurs in the context. So that there is no reason why the three and a half years should beso. For the first four centuries the "days" were interpreted literally; a mystical meaning of the 1260 days then began. WALTER BRUTE first suggested the year-day theory in the end of the fourteenth century. The seventy years of the Babylonian captivity foretold by Jeremiah (Jeremiah 25, 12; 29, 10) were understood by Daniel (ch. 9, 2) as literal years, not symbolical, which would have been 25,200 years! [TREGELLES.] It is possible that the year-day and day-day theories are both true. The seven (symbolical) times of the Gentile monarchies (Leviticus 26, 24) during Israel's casting off will end in the seven years of Antichrist. The 1260 years of papal misrule in the name of Christ may be represented by three and a half years of open Antichristianity and persecution before the millennium. Witnessing churches may be succeeded by witnessing individuals, the former occupying the longer, the latter the shorter period (Revelation 11, 3). The beginning of the 1260 years is by ELLIOTT set at 529 A. D., or 533, when Justinian's edict acknowledged Pope John II, to be head of the Church. By LUTHER, at 606, when Phocas confirmed Justinian's grant. But 752 is the most likely date, when the temporal dominion of the popes began by Pepin's grant to Stephen II. (for Zachary, his predecessor's recognition of his title to France), confirmed by Charlemagne. For it was then first that the little horn plucked up three horns, and so became the prolongation of the fourth secular kingdom. [NEWTON.] This would bring us down to about 2000 A. D., or the seventh thousand millenary from creation. But CLINTON makes about 1862 the seventh millenary, which may favour the dating from 529 A. D. consume . . . destroy—a twofold operation. Antichrist is to be gradually "consumed," as the Papacy has been consuming for 400 years past, and especially of late years. He is also to be "destroyed" suddenly by Christ at His coming; the fully-developed Man of sin (2 Thessalonians 2, 3) or false prophet making a last desperate effort in confederacy with the "beast" (Revelation 16, 13, 14, 16) or secular power of the Roman empire (some conjecture Louis Napoleon): destroyed at Armageddon in Palestine. 27. greatness of the kingdom under . . . whole heaven—i.e., the power, which those several kingdoms had possessed, shall all be conferred on Messiah's kingdom. "Under . . . heaven," shows it is a kingdom on earth, not in heaven. people of . . . saints of . . . Most High—"the people of the saints, or holy ones" (Margin, ch. 8, 24); the Jews, the people to whom the saints stand in a peculiar relation. The saints are gathered out of Jews and Gentiles, but the stock of the Church is Jewish (Romans 9, 24; 11, 24); God's faithfulness to this election Church is thus virtually faithfulness to Israel, and a pledge of their future national blessing. Christ confirms this fact, whilst withholding the date (Acts 1, 6, 7). everlasting kingdom—If everlasting, how can the kingdom here refer to the millennial one? Answer. Daniel saw the whole time of future blessedness as one period. The clearer light of the New Testament distinguishes, in the whole period, the millennial and the time of the new heaven and new earth (cf. Revelation 20, 4 with 21, 1 and 22, 5). Christ's kingdom is "everlasting." Not even the last judgment shall end it, but only give it a more glorious appearance, the new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven, with the throne of God and the Lamb in it (cf. Revelation 5, 9, 10; 11, 15). 28. cogitations . . . troubled me—showing that the Holy Spirit intended much more to be understood by Daniel's words than Daniel himself understood. We are not to limit the significance of prophecies to what the prophets themselves understood (1 Peter 1, 11, 12).

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-27. VISION OF THE RAM AND HE-GOAT: THE 2300 DAYS OF THE SANCTUARY BEING TRODDEN DOWN. With this chapter the Hebrew part of the book begins, and continues to be the language of the remainder; the visions relating wholly to the Jews and Jerusalem. The scene here narrows from world-wide prophecies to those affecting the one covenant people in the five centuries between the exile and the advent. Antichrist, like Christ, has a more immediate future, as well as one more remote. The vision, ch. 8, begins, and that, ch. 10-12., concludes, the account of the Antichrist of the third kingdom. Between the two visions ch. 9 is inserted, as to Messiah and the covenant people at the end of the half millennium (seventy weeks of years). 1. vision—a higher kind of revelation than a dream. after that . . . at the first—that in ch. 7, 1. 2. Shushan—Susa. Though then comparatively insignificant, it was destined to be the capital of Persia after Cyrus' time. Therefore Daniel is transported into it, as being the capital of the kingdom signified by the two-horned ram (Nehemiah 1, 1; Esther 1, 2-5). Elam—west of Persia proper, east of Babylonia, south of Media. Daniel was not present there personally, but in vision. Ulat—called in Pliny Euloens; by the Greeks, Choaspes. Now Kerak, or Karasu. So in ch. 10, 4 he receives a vision near another river, the Hiddekel. So Ezekiel (Ezekiel 1, 1) at the Chebar. Perhaps because synagogues used to be built near rivers, as before praying they washed their hands in the water [ROSENMULLER], (Psalm 137, 1). 3. two horns—the two ought not to be in italics, as if it were not in the original; for it is expressed by the Hebrew dual. "Horn" in the East is the symbol of power and royalty. one . . . higher than . . . other . . . the higher came up last—Persia, which was of little note till Cyrus' time, became then ascendant over Media, the more ancient kingdom. Darius was sixty-two years old (ch. 5, 31) when he began to reign; during his short reign of two years, being a weak king (ch. 6), the government was almost entirely in Cyrus' hands. Hence HERODOTUS does not mention Darius; but XENOPHON does under the name of Cyaxares II. The "ram" here corresponds to the "bear"

(ch. 7. 5), symbolizing clumsy firmness. The king of Persia wore a jewelled ram's head of gold instead of a diadem, such as are seen on the pillars at Persepolis. Also the Hebrew for ram springs from the same root as "Elam," or Persia. [NEWTON.] The "one horn higher than the other" answers to the bear "raising itself on one side" (cf. Note, ch. 7. 5). 4. ram pushing westward—Persia conquered westward Babylon, Mesopotamia, Syria, Asia Minor. northward—Colchis, Armenia, Iberia, and the dwellers on the Caspian Sea. southward—Judea, Egypt, Ethiopia, Libya; also India, under Darius. He does not say eastward, for the Persians themselves came from the east (Isaiah 46. 11). did according to his will—(Ch. 11. 3, 16; cf. ch. 5. 19.) 5. he-goat—Græco-Macedonia. notable horn—Alexander. "Touched not . . . ground," implies the incredible swiftness of his conquests; he overran the world in less than twelve years. The he-goat answers to the leopard (ch. 7. 6). Caranus, the first king of Macedonia, was said to have been led by goats to Edessa, which he made the seat of his Kingdom, and called Æge, i. e., goat-city. 6. standing before the river—Ulai. It was at the "river" Graneus that Alexander fought his first victorious battle against Darius, 334 B. C. 7. moved with cholera—Alexander represented the concentrated wrath of Greece against Persia for the Persian invasions of Greece; also for the Persian cruelties to Greeks, and Darius' attempts to seduce Alexander's soldiers to treachery. [NEWTON.] stamped upon him—In 331 B. C. he defeated Darius Codomanus, and 330 B. C. burned Persepolis and completed the conquest of Persia. none . . . could deliver—not the immense hosts of Persia could save it from the small army of Alexander (Psalm 33. 16). 8. when he was strong . . . great horn was broken—the empire was in full strength at Alexander's death by fever at Babylon, and seemed then least likely to fall. Yet it was then "broken." His natural brother, Philip Aridæus, and his two sons, Alexander Ægus and Hercules, in fifteen months were murdered. four . . . toward . . . four winds—Seleucus, in the east, obtained Syria, Babylonia, Media, &c.; Cassander, in the west, Macedon, Thessaly, Greece; Ptolemy, in the south, Egypt, Cyprus, &c.; Lysimachus, in the north, Thrace, Cappadocia, and the north parts of Asia Minor. 9. little horn—not to be confounded with the little horn of the fourth kingdom in ch. 7. 8. The little horn in ch. 7. comes as an eleventh horn after ten preceding horns. In ch. 8. it is not an independent fifth horn, after the four previous ones, but arises out of one of the four existing horns. This horn is explained (v. 23) to be "a king of fierce countenance," &c. Antiochus Epiphanes is meant. Greece with all its refinement produces the first, i. e., the Old Testament Antichrist. Antiochus had an extraordinary love of art, which expressed itself in grand temples. He wished to substitute Zeus Olympius for Jehovah at Jerusalem. Thus first heathen civilization from below, and revealed religion from above, came into collision. Identifying himself with Jupiter, his aim was to make his own worship universal (cf. v. 25 with ch. 11. 36); so mad was he in this that he was called Epimanes (maniac) instead of Epiphanes. None of the previous world-rulers, Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 4. 31-34), Darius (ch. 6. 27, 28), Cyrus (Ezra 1. 2-4), Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezra 7. 12), had systematically opposed the Jews' religious worship. Hence the need of prophecy to prepare them for Antiochus. The struggle of the Maccabees was a fruit of Daniel's prophecy (1 Maccabees 2. 59). He is the forerunner of the final Antichrist, standing in the same relation to the first advent of Christ that Antichrist does to His second coming. The sins in Israel which gave rise to the Greek Antichrist were that some Jews adopted Hellenic customs (cf. ch. 11. 30, 32), erecting theatres, and regarding all religions alike, sacrificing to Jehovah, but at the same time sending money for sacrifices to Hercules. Such shall be the state of the world when ripe for Antichrist. At v. 9 and 23 the description passes from the literal Antiochus to features which, though partially attributed to him, hold good in their fullest sense only of his antitype, the New Testament Antichrist. The Mohammedan Antichrist may also be included; answering to the Euphratean (Turk) horsemen (Revelation 9. 14-21), loosed "an hour, a day, a month, a year" (391 years, in the year-day theory), to scourge corrupted idolatrous Christianity. In 637 A. D. the Saracen Moslem mosque of Omar was founded on the site of the temple, "treading under foot the sanctuary" (v. 11-13); and there it still remains. The first conquest of the Turks over Christians was in 1281 A. D.; and 391 years after they reached their zenith of power and began to decline, Sobieski defeating them at Vienna. Mohammed II, called "the conqueror," reigned 1451-1481 A. D., in which period Constantinople fell; 391 years after brings us to our own day, in which Turkey's fall is imminent. waxed . . . great, toward . . . south—(Ch. 11. 25.) Antiochus fought against Ptolemy Philometer and Egypt, i. e., the south. toward the east—he fought against those who attempted a change of government in Persia. toward the pleasant land—Judea, "the glorious land" (ch. 11. 16, 41, 45; cf. Psalm 43. 2; Ezekiel 20. 6, 15). Its chief pleasantness consists in its being God's chosen land (Psalm 132. 13; Jeremiah 3. 19). Into it Antiochus made his inroad after his return from Egypt. 10. great, even to . . . host of heaven—explained v. 24, "the mighty and holy people," i. e., the Jews (ch. 7. 21) and their priests (cf. Isaiah 24. 21). The Levites' service is called "a warfare" (Margin, Numbers 8. 24, 25). Great civil and religious powers are symbolized by "stars" (Matthew 24. 29). See 1 Maccabees 1. 25, &c.; 2. 35, &c.; 5. 2, 12, 13. TREGELLES refers "stars" to those Jews whose portion from God is heavenly glory (ch. 12. 3), being believers in Him who is above at God's right hand; not the blinded Jews. cast . . . stars to the ground—so Babel, as type of Antichrist, is described (Isaiah 14. 13, 14), "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God." Cf. Revelation 12. 4; 2 Maccabees 9. 10, as to Antiochus. 11. to the prince of the host—i. e., God Himself, the Lord of Sabaoth, the hosts in heaven and earth, stars, angels, and earthly ministers. So v. 25, "he shall stand up against the Prince of princes;" "against the God of gods" (ch. 11. 36; cf. ch. 7. 8). He not only opposes God's ancient people, but also God Himself. daily sacrifice—offered morning and evening (Exodus 29. 38, 39). taken away—by Antiochus (1 Maccabees 1. 20-50). sanctuary . . . cast down—though robbed of its treasures, it was not strictly "cast down" by Antiochus. So that a fuller accomplishment is future. Antiochus took away the daily sacrifice for a few years; the Romans, for many ages, and "cast down" the temple; and Antichrist, in connection with Rome, the fourth kingdom, shall do so again after the Jews in their own land, still unbelieving, shall have rebuilt the temple, and restored the Mosaic ritual: God giving them up to him "by reason of transgression" (v. 12), i. e., not owning the worship so rendered [TREGELLES]; and then the opposition of the horn to the "truth" is especially mentioned. 12. an host—rather, "the host was given up to him," i. e., the holy people were given into his hands. So in v. 10 "the host" is used; and again in v. 13, where also "give" is used as here for "giving up" for destruction (cf. ch. 11. 6). [MAURER.] against . . . daily sacrifice—rather (the host was given up for him to tread upon), "together with the daily sacrifice" (cf. v. 13). by reason of transgression—1 Maccabees 1. 11-16 traces all the calamities suffered under Antiochus to the transgression of certain Jews who introduced heathen customs into Jerusalem just before. But transgression was not at the full (v. 23) under Antiochus; for Onias the high priest administered the laws in godliness at the time (2 Maccabees 3. 1). Therefore the "transgression" must refer to that of the Jews hereafter restored to Palestine in unbelief. the truth—the worship of the true God. Isaiah 59. 14, "Truth is fallen in the street." practised, and prospered—whatever he undertook succeeded (v. 4; ch. 11. 28, 36). 13. that certain saint—Daniel did not know the names of these two holy angels, but saw only that one was speaking to the other. How long shall be the vision concerning . . . daily sacrifice—How long shall the daily sacrifice be suspended? transgression of desolation—lit., making desolate, i. e., Antiochus' desolating profanation of the temple (ch. 11. 31; 12. 11). Cf. as to Rome and the last Antichrist, Matthew 24. 15 16.

unto me—the answer is to Daniel, not to the inquirer, for the latter had asked in Daniel's name, as vice versa the salnt or angel (Job 15. 15; Psalm 89. 6, 7) speaks of the vision granted to Daniel, as if it had been granted to himself. For holy men are in Scripture represented as having attendant angels, with whom they are in a way identified in interests. If the conversation had been limited to the angels, it could have been of no use to us. But God conveys it to prophetic men, for our good, through the ministry of angels. two thousand . . . three hundred days—lit., mornings and evenings, specified in connection with the morning and evening sacrifice. Cf. Genesis 1. 5. Six years and 110 days. This includes not only the three and a half years during which the daily sacrifice was forbidden by Antiochus (JOSEPHUS, B. J. 1. 1. sec. 1), but the whole series of events whereby it was practically interrupted: beginning with the "little horn waxing great toward the pleasant land," and "casting down some of the host" (v. 9. 10); viz., when in 171 B. C., or the month Sivan in the year 112 of the era of the Seleucide, the sacrifices began to be neglected, owing to the high priest Jason introducing at Jerusalem Grecian customs and amusements, the palestra and gymnasium; ending with the death of Antiochus, 165 B. C., or the month Shebat, in the year 148 of the Seleucid era. Cf. 1 Maccabees 1. 11-15; 2 Maccabees 4. 9, &c. The reason for the greater minuteness of historical facts and dates, given in Daniel's prophecies, than in those of the New Testament, is, that Israel not having yet the clear views which Christians have of immortality and the heavenly inheritance, could only be directed to the earthly future; for it was on earth the looked-for Messiah was to appear, and the sum and subject of Old Testament prophecy was the kingdom of God upon earth. The minuteness of the revelation of Israel's earthly destiny was to compensate for the absence, in the Old Testament, of views of heavenly glory. Thus, in ch. 9., the times of Messiah are foretold to the very year; in ch. 8. the times of Antiochus, even to the day; and in ch. 11. the Syro-Egyptian struggles in most minute detail. TREGELLES thinks the 2300 days answer to the week of years (ch. 9. 27), during which the destroying prince (ch. 9. 26) makes a covenant, which he breaks in the midst of the week (viz., at the end of three and a half years). The seven years exceed the 2300 days by considerably more than a half year. This period of the seven years' excess above the 2300 days may be allotted to the preparations needed for setting up the temple worship, with Antichrist's permission to the restored Jews, according to his "covenant" with them; and the 2300 days may date from the actual setting up of the worship. But, says AUBERLEN, the more accurate to a day the dates as to Antiochus are given, the less should we say the 1290, or 1335 days (ch. 12. 11, 12) correspond to the half week (roughly), and the 2300 to the whole. The event, however, may, in the case of Antichrist, show a correspondence between the days here given and ch. 9. 27, such as is not yet discernible. The term of 2300 days cannot refer to 2300 years of the treading down of Christianity by Mohammedanism, as this would leave the greater portion of the time yet future; whereas, Mohammedanism is fast waning. If the 2300 days mean years, dating from Alexander's conquests, 334 B. C. to 323, we should arrive at about the close of the sixth thousand years of the world, just as the 1260 years (ch. 7. 25) from Justinian's decree arrive at the same terminus. The Jews' tradition represents the seventh thousand as the millennium. CUMMING remarks, 480 B. C. is the date of the waning of the Persian empire before Greece; deducting 480 from 2300, we have 1820; and in 1821, Turkey, the successor of the Greek empire, began to wane, and Greece became a separate kingdom. See Note, ch. 12. 11. cleansed—lit., justified, vindicated from profanation. Judas Maccabeus celebrated the feast of dedication after the cleansing, on the twenty-fifth of the ninth month, Kislev (1 Maccabees 4. 51-58; 2 Maccabees 10. 1-7; John 10. 22). As to the antitypical dedication of the new temple, see Ezekiel 43., &c.; also Amos 9. 11, 12. 16. Gabriel—meaning, The strength of God. 17. the time of the end—so v. 19; ch. 11. 35, 36, 40. The event being to take place at "the time of the end" makes it likely that the Antichrist ultimately referred to (besides the immediate reference to Antiochus) in this chapter, and the one in ch. 7. 8, are one and the same. The objection that the one in ch. 7. springs out of the ten divisions of the Roman earth, the fourth kingdom, the one in ch. 8. and 11. from one of the four divisions of the third kingdom, Greece, is answered thus: The four divisions of the Grecian empire, having become parts of the Roman empire, shall at the end form four of its ten final divisions. (TREGELLES.) However, the origin from one of the four parts of the third kingdom may be limited to Antiochus, the immediate subject of ch. 8. and 11., whilst the ulterior typical reference of these chapters, viz., Antichrist, may belong to one of the ten Roman divisions, not necessarily one formerly of the four of the third kingdom. The event will tell. "Time of the end" may apply to the time of Antiochus. For it is the prophetic phrase for the time of fulfilment, seen always at the end of the prophetic horizon (Genesis 49. 1; Numbers 24. 14). 19. the last end of the indignation—God's displeasure against the Jews for their sins. For their comfort they are told, the calamities about to come are not to be for ever. The "time" is limited (ch. 9. 27; 11. 27, 35, 36; 12. 7; Habakkuk 2. 3). 21. the first king—Philip was king of Macedon before Alexander, but the latter was the first who, as a generalissimo of Greece, subdued the Persian empire. 22. not in his power—not with the power which Alexander possessed. [MAUER.] An empire united, as under Alexander, is more powerful than one divided, as under the four Diadochi. 23. transgressors are come to the full—This does not hold good of the times of Antiochus, but of the closing times of the Christian era. Cf. Luke 18. 8, and 2 Timothy 3. 1-9, as to the wickedness of the world in general just before Christ's second coming. Israel's guilt, too, shall then be at the full, when they who rejected Christ shall receive Antichrist; fulfilling Jesus' words, "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive" (cf. Genesis 15. 16; Matthew 23. 32; 1 Thessalonians 2. 16). of fierce countenance—(Deuteronomy 28. 50); one who will spare neither old nor young. understanding dark sentences—rather, artifices. [GESENIUS.] Antiochus made himself master of Egypt and Jerusalem successively by craft (1 Maccabees 1. 30, &c.; 2 Maccabees 5. 24, &c.). 24. not by his own power—which in the beginning was "little" (v. 9; ch. 7. 8); but by gaining over others through craft, the once little horn became "mighty" (cf. v. 25; ch. 11. 23). To be fully realized by Antichrist. He shall act by the power of Satan, who shall then be permitted to work through him in unrestricted license, such as he has not now (Revelation 13. 2); hence the ten kingdoms shall give the beast their power (2 Thessalonians 2. 9-12; Revelation 17. 13). prosper and practise—prosper in all that he attempts (v. 12). holy people—his persecutions are especially directed against the Jews. 25. by peace—by pretending "peace" and friendship; in the midst of security [GESENIUS], suddenly striking his blow (cf. Note, Jeremiah 15. 8). "A spoiler at noon-day." also . . . against the Prince of princes—not merely against the Jews (v. 11; ch. 11. 36). broken without hand—by God's special visitation. The stone "cut out of the mountain without hands," i. e., Christ, is to smite the world-power image on his feet (ch. 2. 34), i. e., in its last development (cf. ch. 7. 11). Antiochus' horrible death by worms and ulcers, when on his way to Judea, intending to take vengeance for the defeat of his armies by the Maccabees, was a primary fulfilment, foreshadowing God's judgment on the last enemy of the Jewish Church. 26. shut . . . up . . . vision—implying the vision was not to be understood for the present. In Revelation 22. 10 it is said, "Seal not the vision, for the time is at hand." What in Daniel's time was hidden was more fully explained in Revelation, and as the time draws nearer it will be clearer still. it shall be for many days—it refers to remote times (Ezekiel 12. 27). 27. I . . . was sick—through grief at the calamities coming on my people and the Church of God (cf. Psalm 102. 14). afterward I . . . did the king's business—he who holds nearest communion with heaven can best discharge the duties of common life. none understood it—he had heard of kings, but knew not their names; he foresaw the events, but not the time when they were to take place; thereupon he could only feel "astonished," and leave all with the omniscient God. [JEROME.]

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-27. DANIEL'S CONFESSION AND PRAYER FOR JERUSALEM: GABRIEL COMFORTS HIM BY THE PROPHECY OF THE SEVENTY WEEKS. The world-powers here refered from the view; Israel, and the salvation by Messiah promised to it, are the subject of revelation. Israel had naturally expected salvation at the end of the captivity. Daniel is therefore told, that, after the seventy years of the captivity, seventy times seven must elapse, and that even then Messiah would not come in glory, as the Jews might through misunderstanding expect from the earlier prophets, but by dying would put away sin. This ninth chapter (Messianic prophecy) stands between the two visions of the Old Testament Antichrist, to comfort "the wise." In the interval between Antiochus and Christ, no further revelation was needed; therefore, as in the first part of the book, so in the second, Christ and Antichrist in connection are the theme. 1. first year of Darius—Cyaxares II., in whose name Cyrus, his nephew, son-in-law, and successor, took Babylon 538 B. C. The date of this chapter is therefore 537 B. C., a year before Cyrus permitted the Jews to return from exile, and sixty-nine years after Daniel had been carried captive at the beginning of the captivity, 606 B. C. son of Ahasuerus—called Astyages by XENOPHON. Ahasuerus was a name common to many of the kings of Medo-Persia. made king—the phrase implies that Darius owed the kingdom not to his own prowess, but to that of another, viz., Cyrus. 2. understood by books—rather, letters, i. e., Jeremiah's letter (Jeremiah 29. 10) to the captives in Babylon; also Jeremiah 23. 11, 12; cf. 2 Chronicles 36. 21; Jeremiah 30. 18; 31. 38. God's promises are the ground on which we should, like Daniel, rest sure hope; not so as to make our prayers needless, but rather to encourage them. 3. prayer . . . supplication—lit., "intercessions . . . entreaties for mercy." Praying for blessings, and deprecating evils. 4. my confession—according to God's promises in Leviticus 26. 39-42, that if Israel in exile for sin should repent and confess, God would remember for them His covenant with Abraham (cf. Deuteronomy 30. 1-5; Jeremiah 29. 12-14; James 4. 10). God's promise was absolute, but prayer also was ordained as about to precede its fulfilment, this too being the work of God in His people, as much as the external restoration which was to follow. So it shall be at Israel's final restoration (Psalm 102. 13-17). Daniel takes his countrymen's place of confession of sin, identifying himself with them, and, as their representative and intercessory priest, "accepts the punishment of their iniquity." Thus he typifies Messiah, the Sin-bearer and great Intercessor. The prophet's own life and experience forms the fit starting-point of the prophecy concerning the sin-atonement. He prays for Israel's restoration as associated in the prophets (cf. Jeremiah 31. 4, 11, 12, 31, &c.) with the hope of Messiah. The revelation, now granted, analyzes into its successive parts that which the prophets, in prophetic perspective, heretofore saw together in one, viz., the redemption from captivity, and the full Messianic redemption. God's servants, who, like Noah's father (Genesis 5. 29), hoped many a time that now the Comforter of their afflictions was at hand, had to wait from age to age, and to view preceding fulfilments only as pledges of the coming of Him whom they so earnestly desired to see (Matthew 13. 17); as now also Christians, who believe that the Lord's second coming is nigh, are expected to continue waiting. So Daniel is informed of a long period of seventy prophetic weeks before Messiah's coming, instead of seventy years, as he might have expected (cf. Matthew 13. 21, 22). [AUBERLEN.] great and dreadful God—as we know to our cost by the calamities we suffer. The greatness of God and His dreadful abhor-rence of sin should prepare sinners for reverent, humble acknowledgment of the justice of their punishment. keeping . . . covenant and mercy—i. e., the covenant of thy mercy, whereby thou hast promised to deliver us, not for our merits, but of thy mercy (Ezekiel 36. 22, 23). So weak and sinful is man that any covenant for good on God's part with him, to take effect, must depend solely on His grace. If he be a God to be feared for His justice, He is one to be trusted for His "mercy." love . . . keep his commandments—keeping his commandments is the only sure test of love to God (John 14. 15). 5. Cf. Nehemiah's confession, Nehemiah 9. sinned . . . committed iniquity . . . done wickedly . . . rebelled—a climax. Erred in ignorance . . . sinned by infirmity . . . habitually and wilfully done wickedness . . . as open and obstinate rebels set ourselves against God. 6. prophets . . . spake . . . to our kings . . . to all the people—they fearlessly warned all without respect of persons. 7. confusion of faces, as at this day—shame at our guilt, betrayed in our countenance, is what belongs to us; as our punishment "at this day" attests. near, and . . . far off—the chastisement, however varied, some Jews not being cast off so far from Jerusalem as others, all alike were sharers in the guilt. 9. mercies—the plural intensifies the force; mercy manifold and exhibited in countless ways. As it is humbling to recollect "righteousness belongeth unto God," so it is comforting, that "mercies belong to the Lord our God," though we have rebelled—rather, since, &c. [Vulgate] (Psalm 25. 11). Our punishment is not inconsistent with His "mercies," since we have rebelled against Him. 10. set before us—not ambiguously, but plainly, so that we were without excuse. 11. all—(Psalm 14. 3; Romans 3. 12.) the curse . . . and . . . oath . . . in . . . law—the curse against Israel, if disobedient, which God ratified by oath (Leviticus 26. 14-39; Deuteronomy 27. 15-26; 28. 15-68; 29). 12. confirmed his words—showed by the punishments we suffer, that His words were no idle threats. under . . . heaven hath not been done as . . . upon Jerusalem—(Lamentations 1. 12.) 13. yet made we not our prayer before—lit., soothed not the face of. Not even our chastisement has taught us penitence (Isaiah 9. 13; Jeremiah 5. 3; Hosea 7. 10). Diseased, we spurn the healing medicine. that we might turn, &c.—Prayer can only be accepted when joined with the desire to turn from sin to God (Psalm 66. 18; Proverbs 28. 9). understand thy truth—attentively regard thy faithfulness in fulfilling thy promises, and also thy threats. [CALVIN.] Thy law (ch. 8. 12). [MAURER.] 14. watched upon the evil—expressing ceaseless vigilance that His people's sins might not escape His judgment, as a watchman on guard night and day (Job 14. 16; Jeremiah 31. 28; 44. 27). God watching upon the Jews' punishment forms a striking contrast to the Jews' slumbering in their sins. God is righteous—True penitents "justify" God, "ascribing righteousness to Him," instead of complaining of their punishment as too severe (Nehemiah 9. 33; Job 36. 3; Psalm 51. 4; Lamentations 3. 39-42). 15. brought thy people . . . out of . . . Egypt—a proof to all ages that the seed of Abraham is thy covenant people. That ancient benefit gives us hope that thou wilt confer a like one on us now under similar circumstances (Psalm 80. 8-14; Jeremiah 32. 21; 23. 7, 8). as at this day—is known. 16. thy righteousness—not stern justice in punishing, but thy faithfulness to thy promises of mercy to them who trust in thee (Psalm 31. 1; 143. 1). thy city—chosen as thine in the election of grace, which changes not. for . . . iniquities of . . . fathers—(Exodus 20. 5.) He does not impugn God's justice in this, as did the murmurers (Ezekiel 18. 2, 3; cf. Jeremiah 31. 29). thy people . . . a reproach—which brings reproach on thy name. "All the nations that are about us" will say that thou, Jehovah, wast not able to save thy peculiar people. So v. 17, "for the Lord's sake," v. 19, "for thine own sake" (Isaiah 48. 9, 11). 17. cause thy face to shine—metaphor from the sun, which gladdens all that it beams upon (Numbers 6. 25; Malachi 4. 2). 18. present . . . supplications—lit., cause to fall, &c. (cf. note, Jeremiah 36. 7). 19. The short broken ejaculations and repetitions show the intense fervour of his supplications. defer not—he in-

plies that the seventy years are now all but complete. thine own sake—often repeated, as being the strongest plea (Jeremiah 14. 21.) 20. whiles I was speaking—repeated in v. 21; emphatically marking that the answer was given before the prayer was completed, as God promised (Isaiah 30, 19; 65, 24; cf. Psalm 32, 5). 21. I had seen in the vision at the beginning—viz., in the former vision by the river Ulai (ch. 8. 1, 16). fly swiftly—lit., with weariness, i. e., move swiftly as one breathless and wearied out with quick running. [GESENIUS.] English Version is better (Isaiah 6, 2; Ezekiel 1. 6; Revelation 14. 6). time of . . . evening oblation—the ninth hour, three o'clock (cf. 1 Kings 18. 36). As formerly, when the temple stood, this hour was devoted to sacrifices, so now to prayer. Daniel, during the whole captivity to the very last, with pious patriotism never forgot God's temple-worship, but speaks of its rites long abolished, as if still in use. 22. to give thee . . . understanding—ch. 8. 16; v. 26 in that chapter shows that the symbolical vision had not been understood. God therefore now gives "information" directly, instead of by symbol, which required interpretation. 23. At the beginning of thy supplications, &c.—The promulgation of the Divine decree was made in heaven to the angels as soon as Daniel began to pray. came forth—from the Divine throne; so v. 22. thou art greatly beloved—lit., a man of desires (cf. Ezekiel 23. 6, 12); the object of God's delight. As the apocalyptic prophet of the New Testament was "the disciple whom Jesus loved," so the apocalyptic prophet of the Old Testament was "greatly beloved" of God. the vision—the further revelation as to Messiah in connection with Jeremiah's prophecy of seventy years of the captivity. The charge to "understand" is the same as in Matthew 24. 15, where Rome primarily, and Antichrist ultimately, is referred to (cf. note, v. 27, below). 24. Seventy weeks—viz., of years; lit., Seventy sevens; seventy heptads or hebdomads; 490 years; expressed in a form of "concealed definiteness" [HENGSTENBERG], a usual way with the prophets. The Babylonian captivity is a turning-point in the history of the kingdom of God. It terminated the free Old Testament theocracy. Up to that time Israel, though oppressed at times, was, as a rule, free. From the Babylonian captivity the theocracy never recovered its full freedom down to its entire suspension by Rome; and this period of Israel's subjection to the Gentiles is to continue till the millennium (Revelation 20.), when Israel shall be restored as head of the New Testament theocracy, which will embrace the whole earth. The free theocracy ceased in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, and the fourth of Jehoiakim; the year of the world 3333, the point at which the seventy years of the captivity begin. Heretofore Israel had a right, if subjugated by a foreign king, to shake off the yoke (Judges 4. and 5; 2 Kings 18. 7) as an unlawful one, at the first opportunity. But the prophets (Jeremiah 27. 9-11) declared it to be God's will that they should submit to Babylon. Hence every effort of Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah to rebel was vain. The period of the world-times, and of Israel's depression, from the Babylonian captivity to the millennium, though abounding more in afflictions (e. g., the two destructions of Jerusalem, Antiochus's persecution, and those which Christians suffered), contains all that was good in the preceding ones, summed up in Christ, but in a way visible only to the eye of faith. Since He came as a servant, He chose for His appearing the period darkest of all as to His people's temporal state. Always fresh persecutors have been rising, whose end is destruction, and so it shall be with the last enemy, Antichrist. As the Davidic epoch is the point of the covenant people's highest glory, so the captivity is that of their lowest humiliation. Accordingly, the people's sufferings are reflected in the picture of the suffering Messiah. He is no longer represented as the theocratic King, the Antitype of David, but as the Servant of God and Son of man; at the same time the cross being the way to glory (cf. ch. 9. with ch. 2. 34, 35, 44, and ch. 12. 7). In the second and seventh chapters, Christ's first coming is not noticed, for Daniel's object was to prophesy to his nation as to the whole period from the destruction to the re-establishment of Israel; but this

ninth chapter minutely predicts Christ's first coming, and its effects on the covenant people. The seventy weeks date thirteen years before the rebuilding of Jerusalem; for then the re-establishment of the theocracy began, viz., at the return of Ezra to Jerusalem, 457 B. C. So Jeremiah's seventy years of the captivity begin 606 B. C., eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem, for then Judah ceased to exist as an independent theocracy, having fallen under the sway of Babylon. Two periods are marked in Ezra: (1.) The return from the captivity under Jeshua and Zerubbabel, and rebuilding of the temple, which was the first anxiety of the theocratic nation. (2.) The return of Ezra (regarded by the Jews as a second Moses) from Persia to Jerusalem, the restoration of the city, the nationality, and the law. Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign, gave him the commission which virtually includes permission to rebuild the city, afterwards confirmed to and carried out by Nehemiah in the twentieth year (Ezra 9. 9; 7, 11, &c.); v. 25, "from the going forth of the commandment to build Jerusalem," proves that the second of the two periods is referred to. The words in v. 24 are not, "are determined upon the holy city," but "upon thy people and thy holy city;" thus the restoration of the religious national polity and the law (the inner work fulfilled by Ezra the priest), and the rebuilding of the houses and walls (the outer work of Nehemiah, the governor), are both included in v. 25, "restore and build Jerusalem." "Jerusalem" represents both the city, the body, and the congregation, the soul of the state. Cf. Psalm 46., 48., 87. The starting-point of the seventy weeks dated from eighty-one years after Daniel received the prophecy: the object being not to fix for him definitely the time, but for the Church: the prophecy taught him that the Messianic redemption, which he thought near, was separated from him by at least a half millennium. Expectation was sufficiently kept alive by the general conception of the time; not only the Jews, but many Gentiles looked for some great Lord of the earth to spring from Judea at that very time (TACITUS, Hist. 5. 13; Suetonius, Vesp. 4). Ezra's placing of Daniel in the canon immediately before his own book and Nehemiah's was perhaps owing to his feeling that he himself brought about the beginning of the fulfilment of the prophecy (ch. 9). [AUBERLEN.] determined—lit., cut out, viz., from the whole course of time, for God to deal in a particular manner with Jerusalem. thy . . . thy—Daniel had in his prayer often spoken of Israel as "thy people, thy holy city;" but Gabriel, in reply, speaks of them as Daniel's ("thy" . . . "thy") people and city, God thus intimating that until the "everlasting righteousness" should be brought in by Messiah, He could not fully own them as His (TRIGLLE) (cf. Exodus 32. 7). Rather, as God is wishing to console Daniel and the godly Jews, "the people whom thou art so anxiously praying for;" such weight does God give to the intercessions of the righteous (James 5. 16-18). finish—lit., shut up; remove from God's sight, i. e., abolish (Psalm 51. 9). [LENGKERKE.] The seventy years' exile was a punishment, but not a full atonement, for the sin of the people; this would come only after seventy prophetic weeks, through Messiah. make an end of—The Hebrew reading, "to steal," i. e., to hide out of sight (from the custom of sealing up things to be concealed, cf. Job 9. 7), is better supported. make reconciliation for—lit., to cover, to overlay (as with pitch, Genesis 6. 14). Cf. Psalm 32. 1. bring in everlasting righteousness—viz., the restoration of the normal state between God and man (Jeremiah 23. 5, 6); to continue eternally (Hebrews 9. 12; Revelation 14. 6). seal up . . . vision . . . prophecy—lit., prophet. To give the seal of confirmation to the prophet and his vision by the fulfilment. anoint the Most Holy—primarily, to "anoint," or to consecrate after its pollution "the Most Holy" place: but mainly Messiah, the antitype to the Most Holy place (John 2. 19-22). The prophetic in the temple (the same Greek word expresses the mercy-seat and propitiation, Romans 3. 25), which the Jews looked for at the restoration from Babylon, shall have its true realization only in Messiah. For it is only when sin is "made an end of," God's presence can be perfectly manifested. As to "anoint," cf. Exodus 40. 9, 34. Messiah was anointed with the Holy Ghost (Acts 4. 27; 10. 38). So hereafter, God-Messiah will "anoint" or consecrate with His presence the holy place at Jerusalem (Jeremiah 3. 16, 17; Ezekiel 37. 27, 28), after its pollution by Antichrist, of which the feast of dedication after the pollution by Antiochus was a type. 25. from the going forth of the commandment—viz., the command from God, whence originated the command of the Persian king (Ezra 6. 14). AUBERLEN remarks, there is but one Apocalypse in each Testament. Its purpose in each is to sum up all the preceding prophecies, previous to the "troublesome times" of the Gentiles, in which there was to be no revelation. Daniel sums up all the previous Messianic prophecy, separating into its individual phases what the prophets had seen in one and the same perspective, the temporary deliverance from captivity and the antitypical final Messianic deliverance. The seventy weeks are separated (v. 25-27) into three unequal parts, seven, sixty-two, one. The seventieth is the consummation of the preceding ones, as the Sabbath of God succeeds the working days; an idea suggested by the division into weeks. In the sixty-nine weeks Jerusalem is restored, and so a place is prepared for Messiah wherein to accomplish His sabbatic work (v. 25, 26) of "confirming the covenant" (v. 27). The Messianic time is the Sabbath of Israel's history, in which it had the offer of all God's mercies, but in which it was cut off for a time by its rejection of them. As the seventy weeks end with seven years, or a week, so they begin with seven times seven, i. e., seven weeks. As the seventieth week is separated from the rest as a period of revelation, so it may be with the seven weeks. The number seven is associated with revelation; for the seven spirits of God are the mediators of all His revelations (Revelation 1. 4; 3. 1; 4. 5). Ten is the number of what is human; e. g., the world-power issues in ten heads and ten horns (ch. 2. 42; 7. 7). Seventy is ten multiplied by seven, the human moulded by the Divine. The seventy years of exile symbolize the triumph of the world-power over Israel. In the seven times seventy years the world number ten is likewise contained, i. e., God's people is still under the power of the world ("troublesome times"); but the number of the Divine is multiplied by itself; seven times seven years, at the beginning a period of Old Testament revelation to God's people by Ezra, Nehemiah, and Malachi, whose labours extend over about half a century, or seven weeks, and whose writings are last in the canon; and in the end, seven years, the period of New Testament revelation in Messiah. The commencing seven weeks of years of Old Testament revelation are hurried over, in order that the chief stress might rest on the Messianic week. Yet the seven weeks of Old Testament revelation are marked by their separation from the sixty-two, to be above those sixty-two wherein there was to be none. Messiah the Prince—Hebrew, Nagid. Messiah is Jesus' title in respect to Israel (Psalm 2. 2; Matthew 27. 37, 42). Nagid, as Prince of the Gentiles (Isalah 55. 4). Nagid is applied to Titus, only as representative of Christ, who designates the Roman destruction of Jerusalem as, in a sense, His coming (Matthew 24; John 21. 22). Messiah denotes His calling; Nagid, His power. He is to "be cut off, and there shall be nothing for Him." (So the Hebrew for "not for Himself," v. 26, ought to be translated). Yet He is "the Prince" who is to "come," by His representative at first, to inflict judgment, and at last in person. wall—the "trench" or "scarp rampart." [TREGELLES.] The street and trench include the complete restoration of the city externally and internally, which was during the sixty-nine weeks. 26. after threescore and two weeks—rather, the threescore and two, &c. In this verse, and v. 27, Messiah is made the prominent subject, while the fate of the city and sanctuary are secondary, being mentioned only in the second halves of the verses. Messiah appears in a twofold aspect, salvation to believers, judgment on unbelievers (Luke 2. 34; cf. Malachi 3. 1-6; 4. 1-3). He repeatedly, in Passion week, connects His being "cut off" with the destruction of the city, as cause and effect (Matthew 21. 37-41; 23. 37, 38; Luke 21. 20-24; 23. 28-31). Israel might naturally expect Messiah's kingdom of glory, if not after the seventy years' captivity, at least at the end of the sixty-two weeks; but, instead of that, shall be His death, and the consequent destruction of Jerusalem. not for himself—rather, "there shall be nothing to Him" [HENGSTENBERG]; not that the real object of His first coming (His spiritual kingdom) should be frustrated; but the earthly kingdom anticipated by the Jews should, for the present, come to naught, and not then be realized. TREGELLES refers the title, "the Prince" (v. 25), to the time of His entering Jerusalem on an ass's colt, His only appearance as a king, and six days afterwards put to death as "King of the Jews." the people of the prince—the Romans, led by Titus, the representative of the world-power, ultimately to be transferred to Messiah, and so called by Messiah's title, "the Prince;" as also because sent by Him, as His instrument of judgment (Matthew 22. 7). end thereof—of the sanctuary. TREGELLES takes it, "the end of the Prince," the last head of the Roman power, Antichrist. with a flood—viz., of war (Psalm 90. 5; Isalah 8. 7, 8; 28. 18). Implying the completeness of the catastrophe, "not one stone left on another." unto the end of the war—rather, "unto the end there is war." determined—by God's decree (Isalah 10. 23; 28. 22). 27. he shall confirm the covenant—Christ. The confirmation of the covenant is assigned to Him also elsewhere. Isalah 42. 6, "I will give thee for a covenant of the people" (i. e., He in whom the covenant between Israel and God is personally expressed); cf. Luke 22. 20, "The new testament in my blood;" Malachi 3. 1, "the angel of the covenant;" Jeremiah 31. 31-34, describes the Messianic covenant in full. Contrast ch. 11. 30, 32, "forsake the covenant," "do wickedly against the covenant." The prophecy as to Messiah's confirming the covenant with many would comfort the faithful in Antiochus' times, who suffered partly from persecuting enemies, partly from false friends (ch. 11. 33-35). Hence arises the similarity of the language here and in ch. 11. 30, 32, referring to Antiochus, the type of Antichrist. with many—(Isalah 53. 11; Matthew 20. 28; 26. 28; Romans 5. 15, 19; Hebrews 9. 28.) in . . . midst of . . . week—the seventy weeks extend to 33 A. D. Israel was not actually destroyed till 79 A. D., but it was so virtually, 33 A. D., about three or four years after Christ's death, during which the gospel was preached exclusively to the Jews. When the Jews persecuted the Church and stoned Stephen (Acts 7), the respite of grace granted to them was at an end (Luke 13. 7-9). Israel, having rejected Christ, was rejected by Christ, and henceforth is counted dead (cf. Genesis 2. 17 with 5. 5; Hosea 13. 1, 2), its actual destruction by Titus being the consummation of the removal of the kingdom of God from Israel to the Gentiles (Matthew 21. 43), which is not to be restored until Christ's second coming, when Israel shall be at the head of humanity (Matthew 23. 39; Acts 1. 6, 7; Romans 11. 25-31; 15). The interval forms for the covenant people a great parenthesis. he shall cause the sacrifice . . . oblations to cease—distinct from the temporary "taking away" of "the daily" (sacrifice) by Antiochus (ch. 8. 11; 11. 31). Messiah was to cause all sacrifices and oblations in general to "cease" utterly. There is here an allusion only to Antiochus' act; to comfort God's people when sacrificial worship was to be trodden down, by pointing them to the Messianic time when salvation would fully come and yet temple sacrifices cease. This is the same consolation as Jeremiah and Ezekiel gave under like circumstances, when the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar was impending (Jeremiah 3. 16; 31. 31; Ezekiel 11. 19). Jesus died in the middle of the last week, 30 A. D. His prophetic life lasted three and a half years, the very time in which "the saints are given into the hand" of Antichrist (ch. 7. 25). Three and a half does not, like ten, designate the power of the world in its fulness, but (whilst opposed to the Divine, expressed by seven) broken and defeated in its seeming triumph; for immediately after the three and a half times, judgment falls on the victorious world-powers (ch. 7. 25, 26). So Jesus' death seemed the triumph of the world, but was really its defeat (John 12.31). The rending of the veil marked the cessation of sacrifices through Christ's death (Leviticus 4. 6, 17; 16. 2, 15; Hebrews 10. 14-18). There cannot be a covenant without sacrifice (Genesis 8. 20; 9. 17; 15. 9, &c.; Hebrews 9. 15). But here the old covenant is to be confirmed, but in a way peculiar to the New Testament, viz., by the one sacrifice, which would terminate all sacrifices (Psalm 40. 6, 11). Thus as the Levitical rites approached their end, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, with ever-increasing clearness, oppose the spiritual new covenant to the transient earthly elements of the old. for the overspreading of abominations—on account of the abominations committed by the unholty people against the Holy One, He shall not only destroy the city and sanctuary (v. 25), but shall continue its desolation until the time of the consummation "determined" by God (the phrase is quoted from Isaiah 10. 22, 23), when at last the world-power shall be judged and dominion be given to the saints of the Most High (ch. 7. 26, 27). AUBERLEN translates, "On account of the desolating summit of abominations (cf. ch. 11. 31; 12. 11; thus the repetition of the same thing as in v. 26 is avoided), and till the consummation which is determined, it (the curse, v. 11, foretold by Moses) will pour on the desolated." Israel reached the summit of abominations, which drew down desolation (Matthew 24. 28), nay, which is the desolation itself, when, after murdering Messiah, they offered sacrifices, Mosaic indeed in form, but heathenish in spirit (cf. Isaiah 1. 13; Ezekiel 5. 11). Christ refers to this passage (Matthew 24. 15), "When ye see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place" (the latter words being tacitly implied in "abominations" as being such as are committed against the sanctuary). TREGELLES translates, "upon the wing of abominations shall be that which causeth desolation;" viz., an idol set up on a wing or pinnacle of the temple (cf. Matthew 4. 5) by Antichrist, who makes a covenant with the restored Jews for the last of the seventy weeks of years (fulfilling Jesus' words, "If another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive"), and for the first three and a half years keeps it, then in the midst of the week breaks it, causing the daily sacrifices to cease. TREGELLES thus identifies the last half week with the time, times, and a half of the persecuting little horn (ch. 7. 25). But thus there is a gap of at least 1830 years put between the sixty-nine weeks and the seventieth week. SIR ISAAC NEWTON explains the wing ("overspreading") of abominations to be the Roman ensigns (eagles) brought to the east gate of the temple, and there sacrificed to by the soldiers; the war, ending in the destruction of Jerusalem, lasted from spring 67 A. D. to autumn 70 A. D., i. e., just three and a half years, or the last half week of years (JOSEPHUS, B. J. 6. 6). poured upon the desolate—TREGELLES translates, "the causer of desolation," viz., Antichrist. Cf. "abomination that maketh desolate" (ch. 12. 11). Perhaps both interpretations of the whole passage may be in part true; the Roman desolator, Titus, being a type of Antichrist, the final desolator of Jerusalem. BACON (Adv. Learn. 2. 3) says, "Prophecies are of the nature of the Author, with whom a thousand years are as one day; and therefore are not fulfilled punctually at once, but have a springing and germinant accomplishment through many years, though the height and fulness of them may refer to one age."

CHAPTER X.

VER. 1-21. DANIEL COMFORTED BY AN ANGELIC VISION. Ch. 10-12, more fully describe the vision in ch. 8, by a second vision on the same subject, just as the vision in the seventh chapter explains more fully that in the second. The tenth chapter is the prologue; the eleventh, the prophecy itself; and the twelfth, the epilogue. The tenth chapter unfolds the spiritual world as the background of the historical world (Job 1. 7; 2. 1, &c.; Zechariah 3. 1, 2; Revelation 12. 7), and angels as the ministers of God's government of men. As in the world of nature (John 5. 4; Revelation 7. 1-3), so in that of history here, Michael, the champion of Israel, and with him another angel, whose aim is to realize God's will in the heathen world, resist the God-opposed spirit of the world. These struggles are not merely symbolical, but real (1 Samuel 16. 13-15; 1 Kings 22. 22; Ephesians 6. 12). 1. third year of Cyrus—two years after Cyrus' decree for the restoration of the Jews had gone forth, in accordance with Daniel's prayer in ch. 9. This vision gives not merely general outlines, or symbols, but minute details of the future, in short, anticipative history. It is the expansion of the vision in ch. 8, that which then "none understood," he says here, "he understood;" the messenger being sent to him for this (v. 11, 14), to make him understand it. Probably Daniel was no longer in office at court; for in ch. 1. 21, it is said, "Daniel continued even unto the first year of King Cyrus;" not that he died then. See Note there. but the time appointed was long—rather, "it (i. e., the prophecy) referred to great calamity!" [MAURER]; or, "long and calamitous warfare." [GESENIUS.] Lit., host going to war; hence, warfare, calamity. 2. mourning—i. e., afflicting myself by fasting from "pleasant bread, flesh and wine" (v. 3), as a sign of sorrow, not for its own sake. Cf. Matthew 9. 14, "fast," answering to "mourn" (v. 15). Cf. 1 Corinthians 8. 8; 1 Timothy 4. 3, which prove that "fasting" is not an indispensable Christian obligation; but merely an outward expression of sorrow, and separation from ordinary worldly enjoyments, in order to give one's self to prayer (Acts 13. 2). Daniel's mourning was probably for his countrymen, who met with many obstructions to their building of the temple, from their adversaries in the Persian court. 3. no pleasant bread—"unleavened bread, even the bread of affliction" (Deuteronomy 16. 3). anoint—the Persians largely used unguents. 4. first month—Nisan, the month most suited for considering Israel's calamity, being that in which the feast of unleavened bread reminded them of their Egyptian bondage. Daniel mourned not merely for the seven days appointed (Exodus 12. 18), from the evening of the fourteenth to the twenty-first of Nisan, but thrice seven days, to mark extraordinary sorrow. His mourning ended on the twenty-first day, the closing day of the passover feast; but the vision is not till the twenty-fourth, because of the opposition of "the prince of Persia" (v. 13). I was by . . . the . . . river—in waking reality, not a trance (v. 7); when younger, he saw the future in images, but now when old, he receives revelations from angels in common language, i. e., in the apocalyptic mode. In the patriarchal period God often appeared visibly, i. e., theophany. In the prophets, next in the succession, the inward character of revelation is prominent. The consummation is when the seer looks up from earth into the unseen world, and has the future shown to him by angels, i. e., apocalypse. So in the New Testament there is a parallel progression: God in the flesh, the spiritual activity of the apostles and the apocalypse. [AUBERLEN.] Hiddekel—the Tigris. 5. lifted up mine eyes—from the ground on which they had been fixed in his mourning. certain man—lit., one man. An angel of the highest order; for in ch. 8. 16 he commands Gabriel to make Daniel to understand the vision, and in ch. 12. 6 one of the two angels inquires of him how long it would be till the end predicted. linen—the raiment of priests, being the symbol of sanctity, as more pure than wool (Exodus 28. 42); also of prophets (Jeremiah 13. 1); and of angels (Revelation 15. 6). girded with . . . gold—i. e., with a girdle interwoven with gold (Revelation 1. 13). 6. beryl—lit., Tarshish, in Spain. The beryl, identical with the chrysolite or topaz, was imported into the East from Tarshish, and therefore is called "the Tarshish stone." 7. they fled—terrified by the presence of the angel. 8. comeliness—lit., vigour, i. e., lively expression and colour. into corruption—deadliness, i. e., death-like paleness (ch. 5. 6; 7. 28). 9. voice of his words—the sound of his words. I was in a deep sleep—"I sank into a deep sleep." [LENGKERKE.] 10. an hand—viz., of Gabriel, who interpreted other revelations to Daniel (ch. 8. 16). [THEODORET.] set me upon my knees—GESENIUS translates, "cause me to reel on my knees," &c. 11. man . . . beloved—(ch. 9. 23, Note.) understand—attend to. See ch. 8. 17, 18. 12. Fear not—Be not affrighted at my presence. didst set thine heart to understand—what shall come to pass to thy people at the last times (cf. v. 14). chasten thyself—(v. 2, 3) thy words were heard—(Acts 10, 4.) Prayer is heard at once in heaven, though the sensible answer may seem to be delayed. God's messenger was detained on the way (v. 13) by the opposition of the powers of darkness. If in our prayers amidst long protracted sorrows we believed God's angel is on his way to us, what consolation it would give us! for thy words—because of thy prayers. 13. prince of . . . Persia—the angel of darkness that represented the Persian world-power, to which Israel was then subject. This verse gives the reason why, though Daniel's "words were heard from the first day" (v. 12), the good angel did not come to him until more than three weeks had elapsed (v. 4). one and twenty days—answering to the three weeks of Daniel's mourning (v. 2). Michael—i. e., "Who is like God?" Though an archangel, "one of the chief princes," Michael was not to be compared to God. help me—Michael, as patron of Israel before God (v. 21; 12, 1), "helped" to influence the Persian king to permit the Jews' return to Jerusalem. I remained—I was detained there with the kings of Persia, i. e., with the angel of the Persian rulers, with whom I had to contend, and from whom I should not have got free, but for the help of Michael. GESSENIUS translates, "I obtained the ascendancy," i. e., I gained my point against the adverse angel of Persia, so as to influence the Persian authorities to favour Israel's restoration. 14. what shall befall thy people in the latter days—an intimation that the prophecy, besides describing the doings of Antiochus, reaches to the concluding calamities of Israel's history, prior to the nation's full restoration at Christ's coming—calamities of which Antiochus' persecutions were the type. vision is for many days—i. e., extends far into the future. 15. face toward the ground—in humble reverence (Genesis 19, 1). dumb—with overwhelming awe. 16. touched my lips—the same significant action wherewith the Son of man accompanied His healing of the dumb (Mark 7, 33). He alone can give spiritual utterance (Isaiah 6, 6, 7; Ephesians 6, 19), enabling one to "open the mouth boldly." The same one who makes dumb (v. 15) opens the mouth. sorrows—lit., writhings as of a woman in travail. 17. this . . . this my lord—to avoid the tautology in English Version, join rather "this," with servant, "How can this servant of my lord (i. e., how can I who am so feeble) talk with this my lord (who is so majestic)?" Thus Daniel gives the reason why he is so overwhelmed with awe. [MAURER.] 18. again . . . touched me—It was gradually that Daniel recovered his strength. Hence there was need of the second touch, that he might hear the angel with composure. 19. peace be unto thee—God is favourable to thee and to thy people Israel. See visions 13, 21, 22, as to the fear of some evil resulting from a vision of angels. 20. Knowest thou wherefore—The angel asks, after Daniel had recovered from his fright, whether he has understood what was revealed (v. 13). On Daniel, by his silence, intimating that he did understand, the angel declares he will return to renew the fight with the evil angel, the prince of Persia. This points to new difficulties to the Jews' restoration which would arise in the Persian court, but which would be counteracted by God, through the ministry of angels. prince of Grecia shall come—Alexander the Great, who conquered Persia, and favoured the Jews. [CALVIN.] Rather, as the prince of Persia is an angel, representing the hostile world-power, so the prince of Grecia is a fresh angelic adversary, representing Greece. When I am gone forth from conquering the Persian foe, a fresh one starts up, viz., the world-power that succeeds Persia, Greece; Antiochus Epiphanes, and his antitype Antichrist, but him, too, with the help of Michael, Israel's champion, I shall overcome. [GEIER.] 21. noted in the scripture of truth—In the secret book of God's decrees (Psalm 139, 16; Revelation 5, 1), which are truth, i. e., the things which shall most surely come to pass, being determined by God (cf. John 17, 17). none . . . but Michael—to him alone of the angels the office of protecting Israel, in concert with the angelic speaker, was delegated; all the world-powers were against Israel.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-45. This chapter is an enlargement of the eighth: THE OVERTHROW OF PERSIA BY GRECIA: THE FOUR DIVISIONS OF ALEXANDER'S KINGDOM: CONFLICTS BETWEEN THE KINGS OF THE SOUTH AND OF THE NORTH, THE PTOLEMIES AND SELEUCIDE: ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES. 1.—the angel (ch. 10, 13). first year of Darius—CYRUS II.; the year of the conquest of Babylon (ch. 5, 31). Cyrus, who wielded the real power, though in name subordinate to Darius, in that year promulgated the edict for the restoration of the Jews, which Daniel was at the time praying for (ch. 9, 1, 2, 21, 23). stood—implying promptness in helping (Psalm 94, 16). strengthen him—viz., Michael; even as Michael (ch. 10, 21, "strengtheneth himself with me") helped the angel, both joining their powers in behalf of Israel. [ROSENMULLER.] Or, Darius, the angel "confirming him" in his purpose of kindness to Israel. 2. three kings in Persia—Cambyses, Pseudo-Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspes. (Ahasuerus, Artaxerxes, and Darius, in Ezra 4, 6, 7, 24.) The Ahasuerus of Esther (see Note, ch. 9, 1) is identified with Xerxes, both in Greek history and in Scripture, appearing proud, self-willed, careless of contravening Persian customs, amorous, facile, and changeable (v. 2). fourth . . . riches . . . against . . . Grecia—Xerxes, whose riches were proverbial. Persia reached its climax and showed its greatest power in his invasion of Greece 480 B. C. After his overthrow at Salamis, Persia is viewed as politically dead, though it had an existence. Therefore, the third verse, without noticing Xerxes' successors, proceeds at once to Alexander, under whom, first, the third world-kingdom, Grecia, reached its culmination, and assumed an importance as to the people of God. stir up all—four years were spent in gathering his army out of all parts of his vast empire, amounting to two millions six hundred and forty-one thousand men. [PRIDEAUX, Connex. 1, 4, 1, 40.] 3. mighty king . . . do according to his will—answering to the he-goat's "notable horn" (ch. 8, 6, 7, 21). Alexander invaded Persia 334 B. C., to avenge the wrongs of Greece on Persia for Xerxes' past invasion (as Alexander said in a letter to Darius Codomanus, ARRIAN, Alex. 2, 14, 7). 4. kingdom . . . divided toward . . . four winds—the fourfold division of Alexander's kingdom at his death (ch. 8, 2, 22), after the battle of Ipsus, 301 B. C. not to his posterity—(Notes, ch. 8, 8, 22.) nor according to his will—answering to the he-goat's "notable horn" had so wide a dominion as Alexander himself. others besides those—besides Alexander's sons, Hercules by Barsine, Darius' daughter, and Alexander by Roxana, who were both slain. [MAURER.] Rather, besides the four successors to the four chief divisions of the empire, there will be other lesser chiefs who shall appropriate smaller fragments of the Macedonian empire. [JEROME.] 5. Here the prophet leaves Asia and Greece and takes up Egypt and Syria, these being in continual conflict under Alexander's successors, entailing misery on Judea, which lay between the two. Holy Scripture handles external history only so far as it is connected with God's people, Israel. [JEROME.] TREGELLES puts a chasm between v. 4 and 5, making the transition to the final Antichrist here, answering to the chasm (in his view) at ch. 8, 22, 23. king of . . . south—lit., of midday: Egypt (v. 8, 42); Ptolemy Soter, son of Lagus. He took the title "king," whereas Lagus was but "governor." one of his princes—Seleucus, at first a satrap of Ptolemy Lagus, but from 312 B. C. king of the largest empire after that of Alexander (Syria, Babylon, Media, &c.), and called therefore Nicator, i. e., Conqueror. Connect the words thus, "And one of his (Ptolemy's) princes, even he (Seleucus) shall be strong above him" (above Ptolemy, his former master). 6. in . . . end of years—when the predicted time shall be consummated (v. 13, Margin, ch. 8, 17; 12, 13). king's daughter of the south—Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt. The latter, in order to end his war with Antiochus Theus, "king of the north" (lit., midnight: the prophetic phrase for the region whence came affliction to Israel, Jeremiah 1, 13-15; Joel 2, 20), i. e., Syria, gave Berenice to Antiochus, who thereupon divorced his former wife, Laodice, and disinherited her son, Seleucus Callinicus. The designation, "king of the north" and "of the south," is given in relation to Judea, as the stand-point. Egypt is mentioned by name (v. 8, 42), though Syria is not; because the former was in Daniel's time a flourishing kingdom, whereas Syria was then a mere dependency of Assyria and Babylon: an undesigned proof of the genuineness of the book of Daniel. agreement—lit., rights, i. e., to put things to rights between the belligerents. she shall not retain the power of the arm—she shall not be able to effect the purpose of the alliance, viz., that she should be the mainstay of peace. Ptolemy having died, Antiochus took back Laodice, who then poisoned him, and caused Berenice and her son to be put to death, and raised her own son, Seleucus Nicator, to the throne. neither shall he stand—the king of Egypt shall not gain his point of setting his line on the throne of Syria. his arm—that on which he relied. Berenice and her offspring. they that brought her—her attendants from Egypt. he that begat her—rather, as Margin, "the child whom she brought forth." [Ewald.] If English Version (which MAURER approves) be retained, as Ptolemy died a natural death, "given up" is not in his case, as in Berenice's, to be understood of giving up to death, but in a general sense, of his plan proving abortive. he that strengthened her in these times—Antiochus Theus, who is to attach himself to her (having divorced Laodice) at the times predicted. [GJEER.] 7. a branch of her roots . . . in his estate—Ptolemy Euergetes, brother of Berenice, succeeding in the place (see Margin) of Philadelphus, avenged her death by overrunning Syria, even to the Euphrates. deal against them—he shall deal with the Syrians at his own pleasure. He slew Laodice. 8. carry . . . into Egypt their gods, &c.—Ptolemy, on hearing of a sedition in Egypt, returned with 40,000 talents of silver, precious vessels, and 2400 images, including Egyptian idols, which Cambyses had carried from Egypt into Persia. The idolatrous Egyptians were so gratified, that they named him Euergetes, or Benefactor. continue more years—Ptolemy survived Seleucus four years, reigning in all forty-six years. MAURER translates, "Then he for several years shall desist from (contending with) the king of the north" (cf. v. 9). 9. come into his kingdom—Egypt: not only with impunity, but with great spoil. 10. his sons—the two sons of the king of the north, Seleucus Callinicus, upon his death by a fall from his horse, viz., Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great. one shall come—Ceraunus having died, Antiochus alone prosecuted the war with Ptolemy Philopater, Euergetes' son, until he had recovered all the parts of Syria subjugated by Euergetes. pass through—like an "overflowing" torrent (v. 22, 26, 40; Isaiah 8. 8). Antiochus penetrated to Dura (near Casarea), where he gave Ptolemy a four months' truce. return—renew the war at the expiration of the truce (so v. 13). even to his fortress—Ptolemy's; Raphia, a border-fortress of Egypt against incursions by way of Edom and Arabia Petraea, near Gaza; here Antiochus was vanquished. 11. the king of the south . . . moved with cholera—at so great losses, Syria having been wrested from him, and his own kingdom imperilled, though otherwise an indolent man, to which his disasters were owing, as also to the odium of his subjects against him for having murdered his father, mother, and brother, whence in irony they called him Philopater, "Father-lover," he shall set forth a great multitude—Antiochus, king of Syria, whose force was 70,000 infantry and 5000 cavalry. but . . . multitude . . . given into his hand—into Ptolemy's hands; 10,000 of Antiochus' army were slain, and 4000 made captives. 12. when he hath taken away—i. e., subdued "the multitude"—of Antiochus. heart . . . lifted up—instead of following up his victory by making himself master of the whole of Syria, as he might, he made peace with Antiochus, and gave himself up to licentiousness [POLYB. 37.; JUSTIN. 30. 4], and profaned the temple of God by entering the holy place. [GROTIUS.] not be strengthened by it—he shall lose the power gained by his victory through his luxurious indolence. 13. return—renew the war. after certain years—fourteen years after his defeat at Raphia.

Antiochus, after successful campaigns against Persia and India, made war with Ptolemy Epiphanes, son of Philopater, a mere child. 14. many stand up against the king of the south—Philip, king of Macedon, and rebels in Egypt itself, combined with Antiochus against Ptolemy. robbers of thy people—i. e., factious men of the Jews shall exalt themselves, so as to revolt from Ptolemy, and join themselves to Antiochus; the Jews helped with provisions Antiochus' army, when on his return from Egypt he besieged the Egyptian garrison left in Jerusalem (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 12. 3. 3). to establish the vision—Those turbulent Jews unconsciously shall help to fulfil the purpose of God, as to the trials which await Judea, according to this vision. but they shall fall—though helping to fulfil the vision, they shall fail in their aim, of making Judea independent. 15. king of . . . north—Antiochus the Great. take . . . fenced cities—Scopas, the Egyptian general, met Antiochus at Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan, and was defeated, and fled to Sidon, a strongly "fenced city," where he was forced to surrender. chosen people—Egypt's choicest army was sent under Eropus, Menocles, and Damoxenus, to deliver Scopas, but in vain. [JEROME.] 16. he that cometh against him—Antiochus coming against Ptolemy Epiphanes. glorious land—Judea (v. 41, 45; ch. 8. 9; Ezekiel 20. 6, 15). by his hand shall be consumed—lit., perfected; i. e., completely brought under his sway. JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 12. 3. 3) shows that the meaning is not, that the Jews should be utterly consumed; for Antiochus favoured them for taking his part against Ptolemy, but that their land should be subjected to him. [LENGKERKE.] GROTIUS translates, "shall be perfected by him," i. e., shall flourish under him. English Version gives a good sense, viz., that Judea was much "consumed" or desolated by being the arena of conflict between the combatants, Syria and Egypt. TREGELLES refers (v. 14), "robbers of thy people," to the Gentiles, once oppressors, attempting to restore the Jews to their land by mere human effort, whereas this is to be effected only by Divine interposition: their attempt is frustrated (v. 16) by the wilful king, who makes Judea the scene of his military operations. 17. set his face—purpose steadfastly. Antiochus' purpose was, however, turned from open assault to wile, by his war with the Romans in his endeavour to extend his kingdom to the limits it had under Seleucus Nicator. upright ones—Jasher*, or Jeshurun (Deuteronomy 32. 15; Isaiah 41. 2); the epithet applied by the Hebrews to their nation. It is here used not in praise; for in v. 14 (see Note) they are called "robbers," or men of violence, factious: it is the general designation of Israel, as having God for their God. Probably it is used to rebuke those who ought to have been God's "upright ones" for confederating with godless heathen in acts of violence (the contrast to the term in v. 14 favours this). thus shall he do—instead of at once invading Ptolemy's country with his "whole strength," he prepares his way for doing so by the following plan: he gives to Ptolemy Epiphanes his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, promising Coelo-Syria and Judea as a dowry, thus securing his neutrality in the war with Rome: he hoped through his daughter to obtain Syria, Cilicia, and Lycia, and even Egypt itself at last; but Cleopatra favoured her husband rather than her father, and so defeated his scheme. [JEROME.] "She shall not stand on his side." 18. isles—he "took many" of the isles in the Ægean in his war with the Romans, and crossed the Hellespont. prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach . . . to cease—Lucius Scipio Asiaticus, the Roman general, by routing Antiochus at Magnesia (190 B. C.), caused the reproach which he offered Rome by inflicting injuries on Rome's allies, to cease. He did it for his own glory. without his own reproach—with untarnished reputation. 19. Then he shall turn . . . toward . . . his own land—compelled by Rome to relinquish all his territory west of the Taurus, and defray the expenses of the war, he garrisoned the cities left to him. stumble . . . not be found—attempting to plunder the temple of Jupiter at Elymais by night, whether through avarice, or the want of money to pay the tribute imposed by Rome (a thousand talents), he was slain with his soldiers in an insurrection of the inhabitants [JUSTIN. 32. 2]. 20. in his estate—in Antiochus' stead: his successor, Seleucus Philopater, his son. in the glory of the kingdom—i. e., inheriting it by hereditary right. MAURER translates, "one who shall cause the tax-gatherer (Heliodorus) to pass through the glory of the kingdom," i. e., Judea, "the glorious land" (v. 16, 41; ch. 8. 9). Simon, a Benjamite, in spite against Onias III., the high priest, gave information of the treasures in the Jewish temple; and Seleucus having reunited to Syria Cælo-Syria and Palestine, the dowry formerly given by Antiochus the Great to Cleopatra, Ptolemy's wife, sent Heliodorus to Jerusalem to plunder the temple. This is narrated, 2 Maccabees 3. 4, &c. Contrast Zechariah 9. 8, "No oppressor shall pass through . . . any more." within few days . . . destroyed—after a reign of twelve years, which were "few" compared with the thirty-seven years of Antiochus' reign. Heliodorus, the instrument of Seleucus' sacrilege, was made by God the instrument of his punishment. Seeking the crown, in the absence at Rome of Seleucus' only son and heir, Demetrius, he poisoned Seleucus. But Antiochus Epiphanes, Seleucus' brother, by the help of Eumenes, king of Pergamos, succeeded to the throne, 175 B. C. neither in anger, nor in battle—not in a popular outbreak, nor in open battle. 21. vile—Antiochus, called Epiphanes, i. e., the illustrious, for vindicating the claims of the royal line against Heliodorus, was nicknamed, by a play of sounds, Epimanes, i. e., the madman, for his mad freaks beneath the dignity of a king. He would carouse with the lowest of the people, bathe with them in the public baths, and foolishly jest and throw stones at passers-by [POLYB. 26. 10]. Hence, as also for his crafty supplanting of Demetrius, the rightful heir, from the throne, he is termed "vile." they shall not give . . . kingdom: but . . . by flatteries—the nation shall not, by a public act, confer the kingdom on him, but he shall obtain it by artifice, "flattering" Eumenes and Attalus of Pergamos to help him, and, as he had seen candidates at Rome doing, canvassing the Syrian people high and low, one by one, with embraces [LIVY, 41. 20]. 22. shall they be overflown . . . before him—Antiochus Epiphanes shall invade Egypt with overwhelming forces. prince of the covenant—Ptolemy Philometer, the son of Cleopatra, Antiochus' sister, who was joined in covenant with him. Ptolemy's guardians, whilst he was a boy, sought to recover from Epiphanes Cælo-Syria and Palestine, which had been promised by Antiochus the Great as Cleopatra's dowry in marrying Ptolemy Epiphanes. Hence arose the war. Philometer's generals were vanquished, and Pelusium, the key of Egypt, taken by Antiochus, 171 B. C. 23. TREGELLES notes three divisions in the history of the "vile people," which is continued to the end of the chapter: (1.) His rise (v. 21, 22). (2.) The time from his making the covenant to the taking away of the daily sacrifice and setting up of the abomination of desolation (v. 23-31). (3.) His career of blasphemy, to his destruction (v. 32-45); the latter two periods answering to the "week" of years of his "covenant with many" (viz., in Israel) (ch. 9. 27), and the last being the closing half week of ch. 9. But the context so accurately agrees with the relations of Antiochus to Ptolemy that the primary reference seems to be to the "league" between them. Antitypically, Antichrist's relations towards Israel are probably delineated. Cf. ch. 8. 11, 25, with v. 22 here, "prince of the covenant," work deceitfully—feigning friendship to young Ptolemy, as if he wished to order his kingdom for him, he took possession of Memphis and all Egypt ("the fattest places," v. 34) as far as Alexandria. with a small people—at first, to throw off suspicion, his forces were small. 24. peaceably—lit., unexpectedly; under the guise of friendship he seized Ptolemy Philometer. he shall do that which his fathers have done—his predecessors, kings of Syria, had always coveted Egypt, but in vain: he alone made himself master of it, scatter among them . . . prey—among his followers (1 Maccabees 1. 19). forecast his devices against . . . strongholds—he shall form a studied scheme for making himself master of the Egyptian fortresses. He gained them all except Alexandria, which successfully resisted him. Retaining to himself Pelusium, he retired to Judea, where, in revenge for the joy shown by the Jews at the report of his death, which led them to a revolt, he subdued Jerusalem by storm or stratagem. for a time—his rage shall not be for ever; it is but for a time limited by God. CALVIN makes "for a time" in antithesis to "unexpectedly," in the beginning of the verse. He suddenly mastered the weaker cities: he had to "forecast his plans" more gradually ("for a time") as to how to gain the stronger fortresses. 25. A fuller detail of what was summarily stated (v. 22-24). This is the first of Antiochus' three (v. 20) open invasions of Egypt. against the king of the south—against Ptolemy Philometer. Subsequently, Ptolemy Physcon (the Gross), or Euergetes II., was made king by the Egyptians, as Ptolemy Philometer was in Antiochus' hands. great army—as distinguished from the "small people" (v. 23) with which he first came. This was his first open expedition; he was emboldened by success to it. Antiochus "entered Egypt with an overwhelming multitude, with chariots, elephants, and cavalry" (1 Maccabees 1. 17). stirred up—by the necessity, though naturally indolent. not stand—Philometer was defeated. they shall forecast, &c.—his own nobles shall frame treacherous "devices" against him (see v. 26). Eulæus and Lencæus mal-administered his affairs. Antiochus, when checked at last at Alexandria, left Ptolemy Philometer at Memphis as king, pretending that his whole object was to support Philometer's claims against the usurper Physcon. 26. they that feed of . . . his meat—those from whom he might naturally have looked for help, his intimates and dependants (Psalm 41. 9; John 13. 18); his ministers and guardians. his army shall overflow—Philometer's army shall be dissipated as water. The phrase is used of overflowing numbers, usually in a victorious sense, but here in the sense of defeat, the very numbers which ordinarily ensure victory, hastening the defeat through mismanagement. many shall fall down slain—(1 Maccabees 1. 18, "many fell wounded to death".) Antiochus, when he might have slain all in the battle near Pelusium, rode around and ordered the enemy to be taken alive, the fruit of which policy was, he soon gained Pelusium and all Egypt (DROPHUS SCULUS, 26. 77). 27. both . . . hearts . . . to do mischief—each to the other. speak lies at one table—they shall, under the semblance of intimacy, at Memphis try to deceive one another (Notes, v. 3, 25). it shall not prosper—neither of them shall carry his point at this time. yet the end shall be—"the end" of the contest between them is reserved for "the time appointed" (v. 29, 30). 28. (1 Maccabees 1. 19, 20, &c.) against the holy covenant—on his way back to Syria, he attacked Jerusalem, the metropolis of Jehovah's covenant-people, slew 80,000, took 40,000 prisoners, and sold 40,000 as slaves (2 Maccabees 5. 5-14). he shall do exploits—he shall effect his purpose. Guided by Menelaus, the high priest, he entered the sanctuary with blasphemies, took away the gold and silver vessels, sacrificed swine on the altar, and sprinkled broth of the flesh through the temple (2 Maccabees 5. 15-21). 20. At the time appointed—"the time" spoken of in v. 27. return—his second open invasion of Egypt. Ptolemy Philometer, suspecting Antiochus' designs with Physcon, hired mercenaries from Greece. Whereupon Antiochus advanced with a fleet and an army, demanding the cession to him of Cyprus, Pelusium, and the country adjoining the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile. It shall not be as the former—not successful as the former expedition. Popilius Lænas, the Roman ambassador, met him at Elensis, four miles from Alexandria, and presented him the decree of the senate; on Antiochus replying that he would consider what he was to do, Popilius drew a line round him with a rod, and said, I must have a reply to give to the senate before you leave this circle. Antiochus submitted, and retired from Egypt; and his fleets withdrew from Cyprus. or as the latter—that mentioned in v. 42, 43. [TREGELLES.] Or, making this the third expedition, the sense is "not as the first or as the second" expeditions. [PISCATOR.] Rather "not as the former, so shall be this latter" expedition.

[GROTIUS.] 30. ships of Chittim—the Roman ambassadors arriving in Macedonian Grecian vessels (see Note, Jeremiah 2. 10). Chittim, properly Cyprian, so called from a Phœnician colony in Cyprus; then the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean in general. grieved—humbled and dispirited through fear of Rome. indignation against the holy covenant—indignant that meantime God's worship had been restored at Jerusalem, he gives vent to his wrath at the check given him by Rome, on the Jews. intelligence with them that forsake the . . . covenant—viz., with the apostates in the nation (1 Maccabees 1. 11-15). Menelaus and other Jews instigated the king against their religion and country; learning from Greek philosophy that all religions are good enough to keep the masses in check. These had cast off circumcision and the religion of Jehovah for Greek customs. Antiochus, on his way home, sent Apollonius (167 B. C.) with 22,000 to destroy Jerusalem, two years after its capture by himself. Apollonius slew multitudes, dismantled and pillaged the city. They then, from a fortress which they built commanding the temple, fell on and slew the worshippers; so that the temple service was discontinued. Also, Antiochus decreed that all, on pain of death, should conform to the Greek religion, and the temple was consecrated to Jupiter Olympius. Identifying himself with that god, with fanatical haughtiness he wished to make his own worship universal (1 Maccabees 1. 41; 2 Maccabees 6. 7). This was the gravest peril which ever heretofore threatened revealed religion, the holy people, and the theocracy on earth, for none of the previous world-rulers had interfered with the religious worship of the covenant people, when subject to them (ch. 4. 31-34; 6. 27, 28; Ezra 1. 2, 4; 7. 12; Nehemiah 2. 18). Hence arose the need of such a forewarning of the covenant people as to him—so accurate, that PORPHYRY, the adversary of revelation, saw it was hopeless to deny its correspondence with history, but argued from its accuracy that it must have been written subsequent to the event. But as Messianic events are foretold in Daniel, the Jews, the adversaries of Jesus, would never have forged the prophecies which confirm his claims. The ninth chapter was to comfort the faithful Jews, in the midst of the "abominations" against "the covenant," with the prospect of Messiah who would "confirm the covenant." He would show by bringing salvation, and yet abolishing sacrifices, that the temple service which they so grieved after, was not absolutely necessary; thus the correspondence of phraseology would suggest comfort (cf. ch. 9. 27 with ch. 11. 30, 31). 31. arms—viz., of the human body; not weapons; human forces. they—Antiochus' hosts confederate with the apostate Israelites; these latter attain the climax of guilt, when they not only, as before, "forsake the covenant" (v. 30), but "do wickedly against" it (v. 32), turning complete heathens. Here Antiochus' actions are described in language which reach beyond him the type, to Antichrist the antitype [JEROME] (just as in Psalm 72, many things are said of Solomon the type, which are only applicable to Christ the Antitype); including perhaps Rome, Mohammed, and the final personal Antichrist. SIR ISAAC NEWTON refers the rest of the chapter from this verse to the Romans, translating, "after him arms (i. e., the Romans) shall stand up;" at the very time that Antiochus left Egypt, the Romans conquered Macedonia, thus finishing the reign of Daniel's third beast; so here the prophet naturally proceeds to the fourth beast. JEROME'S view is simpler; for the narrative seems to continue the history of Antiochus, though with features only in type applicable to him, fully to Antichrist. sanctuary of strength—not only naturally a place of strength, whence it held out to the last against the besiegers, but chiefly the spiritual stronghold of the covenant people (Psalm 48. 1-3, 12-14). Apollonius "polluted" it with altars to idols and sacrifices of swine's flesh, after having "taken away the daily sacrifice" (see Note, ch. 8. 11). place . . . abomination that maketh desolate—i. e., that pollutes the temple (ch. 8. 12, 13). Or rather, "the abomination of the desolator," Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Maccabees 1. 29, 37-49). Cf. ch. 9. 27, wherein the antitypical desolating abomination of

Rome (the eagle standard, the bird of Jupiter, sacrificed to by Titus' soldiers within the sacred precincts, at the destruction of Jerusalem), of Mohammed, and of the final Antichrist, is foretold. 1 Maccabees 1. 54, uses the very phrase, "the fifteenth day of the month Casleu, in the 145th year, they set up the abomination of desolation on the altar;" viz., an idol-altar and image of Jupiter Olympius, erected upon Jehovah's altar of burnt offerings. "Abomination" is the common name for an idol in the Old Testament. The Roman emperor Adrian's erection of a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus where the temple of God had stood, 132 A. D.; also the erection of the Mohammedan mosque of Omar in the same place (it is striking, Mohammedanism began to prevail in 610 A. D., only about three years of the time when Popery assumed the temporal power); and the idolatry of the Church of Rome in the spiritual temple, and the final blasphemy of the personal Antichrist in the literal temple (2 Thessalonians 2.), may all be antitypically referred to here under Antiochus the type, and the Old Testament Antichrist. 33. (1 Maccabees 1. 52.) corrupt—seduce to apostasy. by flatteries—promises of favour. people that . . . know their God—the Maccabees and their followers (1 Maccabees 1. 62, 63). 33. they that understand—who know and keep the truth of God (Isaiah 11. 2). instruct many—in their duty to God and the law, not to apostatize. yet they shall fall—as Eleazar (2 Maccabees 6. 18, &c.). They shall be sorely persecuted, even to death (Hebrews 11. 35, 36, 37; 2 Maccabees 6., 7). Their enemies took advantage of the Sabbath to slay them on the day when they would not fight. TREGELLES thinks, from comparison with v. 35, it is the people who "fall," not those of understanding. But v. 35 makes the latter "fall," not an unmeaning repetition; in v. 33 they fall (die) by persecution; in v. 35 they fall (spiritually) for a time by their own weakness. flame—in caves, whither they had retired to keep the Sabbath. Antiochus caused some to be roasted alive (2 Maccabees 7. 3-5). many days—rather, "certain days," as in ch. 8. 27. JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 12. 7, 6, 7) tells us the persecution lasted for three years (1 Maccabees 1. 59; 4. 54; 2 Maccabees 10. 1-7). 34. a little help—the liberty obtained by the Maccabean heroes for the Jews was of but short duration. They soon fell under the Romans and Herodians, and ever since every attempt to free them from Gentile rule has only aggravated their sad lot. The period of the world-times (Gentile rule) is the period of depression of the theocracy, extending from the exile to the millennium. [ROOS.] The more immediate reference seems to be, the forces of Mattathias and his five sons were originally few (1 Maccabees 2.). many shall cleave to them—as was the case under Judas Maccabeus, who was thus able successfully to resist Antiochus. with flatteries—those who had deserted the Jewish cause in persecution, now, when success attended the Jewish arms, joined the Maccabean standard, e. g., Joseph, the son of Zecharias, Azarias, &c. (1 Maccabees 5. 55-57; 2 Maccabees 12. 40; 13. 21). MAURER explains it, of those who through fear of the Maccabees' severity against apostates joined them, though ready, if it suited their purpose, to desert them (1 Maccabees 2. 44; 3. 58). 35. to try them—the design of affliction. Image from metals tried with fire. to purge—even in the elect there are dregs which need to be purged out (1 Peter 1. 7). Hence they are allowed to fall for a time; not finally (2 Chronicles 32. 31; Luke 22. 31). Image from wheat cleared of its chaff by the wind. make . . . white—image from cloth (Revelation 7. 9). to . . . time of . . . end—God will not suffer His people to be persecuted without limitation (1 Corinthians 10. 13). The godly are to wait patiently for "the end" of "the time" of trial; "for it is (to last) yet for a time appointed" by God. 36. The wilful king here, though primarily Antiochus, is antitypically and mainly Antichrist, the seventh head of the seven-headed and ten-horned beast of Revelation 13., and the "beast" of Armageddon (Revelation 16. 13, 16; 19. 19). Some identify him with the revived French emperors, the eighth head of the beast (Revelation 17. 11), who is to usurp the kingly, as the Pope has the priestly, dignity of Christ—the false Messiah of the Jews, who will "plant his tabernacle between the seas in the holy mountain," "exalting himself above every god" (2 Thessalonians 2, 4; Revelation 13, 5, 6). This last clause only in part holds good of Antiochus; for though he assumed Divine honours, identifying himself with Jupiter Olympus, yet it was for that god he claimed them; still it applies to him as the typic. speak marvellous things against . . . God of gods—so ch. 7, 25, as to the "little horn," which seemingly identifies the two (cf. ch. 8, 25). Antiochus forbade the worship of Jehovah by a decree "marvellous" for its wickedness: thus he was a type of Antichrist. Cf. ch. 7, 8, "a mouth speaking great things." Indignation . . . accomplished—God's visitation of wrath on the Jews for their sins (ch. 8, 19), that . . . determined—(Ch. 9, 26, 27; 10, 21.) 37. Neither . . . regard . . . the desire of women—(Cf. Ezekiel 24, 16, 18.) The wife, as the desire of man's eyes, is the symbol of the tenderest relations (2 Samuel 1, 26). Antiochus would set at naught even their entreaties that he should cease from his attack on Jehovah's worship. [POLANUS.] MAURER refers it to Antiochus' attack on the temple of the Syrian Venus, worshipped by women (1 Maccabees 6, 1, &c.; 2 Maccabees 1, 13). NEWTON refers it to Rome's "forbidding to marry." ELLIOT rightly makes the antitypical reference be to Messiah. Jewish women desired to be mothers with a view to Him, the promised seed of the woman (Genesis 30, 23; Luke 1, 25, 28). nor regard any god—(2 Thessalonians 2, 4) 38. God of forces—probably Jupiter Capitolinus, to whom Antiochus began to erect a temple at Antioch [LIVY, 41, 20]. Translate, "He shall honour the god of fortresses on his basis," i. e., the base of the statue. NEWTON translates, "And the god 'Mahuzzim' (guardians, i. e., saints adored as 'protectors' in the Greek and Roman churches) shall he honour." honour with gold, &c.—cf. Revelation 17, 4 as to Antiochus' antitype, Antichrist. 39. NEWTON transposes, "to the defenders of Mahuzzim (the monks and priests who uphold saint-worship), together with the strange god whom he shall acknowledge, he shall multiply honour." English Version is better: He shall do (exploits) in the most strong holds (i. e., shall succeed against them) with a strange god (under the auspices of a god which he worshipped not before, viz., Jupiter Capitolinus, whose worship he imported into his empire from Rome). Antiochus succeeded against Jerusalem, Sidon, Pelusium, Memphis. cause them—Antiochus "caused" his followers and the apostates "to rule over many" Jews, having "divided their land" (Judea), "for gain" (i. e., as a reward for their compliance). 40. The difficulty of reconciling this with Antiochus' history is, no historian but PORPHYRY mentions an expedition of his into Egypt towards the close of his reign. This v. 40, therefore, may be a recapitulation summing up the facts of the first expedition to Egypt (B. C. 171, 170), in v. 22, 25; and 41, the former invasion of Judea, in v. 28; 42, 43, the second and third invasions of Egypt (169 and 168 B. C.) in v. 23, 24, 29, 30. AUBERLEN takes rather PORPHYRY'S statement, that Antiochus, in the eleventh year of his reign (166, 165 B. C.), invaded Egypt again, and took Palestine on his way. The "tidings" (v. 44) as to the revolt of tributary nations then led him to the East. PORPHYRY'S statement that Antiochus starting from Egypt took Arad in Judah, and devastated all Phenicia, agrees with v. 45; then he turned to check Artaxias, king of Armenia. He died in the Persian town Tabes, 161 B. C., as both POLYBIUS and PORPHYRY agree. Doubtless, antitypically, the final Antichrist, and its predecessor Mohammed, are intended, to whom the language may be more fully applicable than to Antiochus the type. The Saracen Arabs "of the south" "pushed at" the Greek emperor Heraclius, and deprived him of Egypt and Syria. But the Turks of "the north" not merely pushed at, but destroyed the Greek empire; therefore more is said of them than of the Saracens. Their "horsemen" are specified, being their chief strength. Their standards still are horse tails. Their "ships," too, often gained the victory over Venice, the great naval power of Europe in that day. They "overflowed" Western Asia, and then "passed over" into Europe, fixing their seat of empire at Constantinople under Mohammed II. [NEWTON.] 41. Antiochus, according to PORPHYRY, march- ing against Ptolemy, though he turned from his course to wreak his wrath on the Jews, did not meddle with Edom, Moab, and Ammon on the side of Judea. In 1 Maccabees 4, 61; 5, 3, &c., it is stated that he used their help in crushing the Jews, of whom they were the ancient enemies. Cf. Isaiah 11, 14, as to Israel's future retribution, just as the Maccabees made war on them as the friends of Antiochus (1 Maccabees 5). Antitypically, the Turks under Selim entered Jerusalem on their way to Egypt, and retain "the glorious land" of Palestine to this day. But they never could conquer the Arabs, who are akin to Edom, Moab, and Ammon (Genesis 16, 12). So in the case of the final Antichrist. 42, 43. Egypt . . . Libyans . . . Ethiopians—the latter two, being the allies of the first, served under Antiochus when he conquered Egypt. Antitypically, Egypt, though it held out long under the Mamelukes, in 1517 A. D. fell under the Turks. Algiers, Tunis, and others parts of Africa, are still under them. at his steps—following him (Margin, Exodus 11, 8; Judges 4, 10). 44. tidings out of the east and out of the north—Artaxias, king of Armenia, his vassal, had revolted in the north, and Arsaces, leader of the Parthians, in the east (1 Maccabees 3, 10, &c., 37; TACITUS, H. 5, 8). In 147 B. C. Antiochus went on the expedition against them, on the return from which he died. great fury—at the Jews, on account of their successes under Judas Maccabeus, whence he desired to replenish his treasury with means to prosecute the war with them; also at Artaxias and Arsaces, and their respective followers. DE BURGH makes the "tidings" which rouse his fury, to be concerning the Jews' restoration: such may be the antitypical reference. 45. plant . . . between the seas—the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. tabernacles of . . . palace—his palacelike military tents, such as Oriental princes travel with. See Note, v. 40, as to the time of Antiochus' attack on Judea, and his subsequent "end" at Tabes, which was caused by chagrin both at hearing that his forces under Lysias were overcome by the Jews, and at the failure of his expedition against the temple of Elymais (2 Maccabees 9, 5). holy mountain—Jerusalem and Mount Zion. The desolation of the sanctuary by Antiochus, and also the desecration of the consecrated ground round Jerusalem by the idolatrous Roman ensigns, as also by the Mohammedan mosque, and, finally, by the last Antichrist, is referred to. So the last Antichrist is to sit upon "the mount of the congregation" (Isaiah 14, 13), but "shall be brought down to hell" (cf. Note, ch. 7, 26; 2 Thessalonians 2, 8).

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-13. CONCLUSION OF THE VISION (chs. 10-12.) AND EPILOGUE TO THE BOOK. Cf. v. 4, 13; as v. 6, 7 refer to ch. 7, 25, i. e., to the time of Antichrist, so the subsequent v. 8-12 treat of the time of Antiochus (cf. v. 11 with ch. 11, 31), thus putting together in one summary view the two great periods of distress. The political resurrection of the Jews under the Maccabees is the starting-point of transition to the literal resurrection about to follow the destruction of Antichrist by Christ's coming in glory. The language passes here from the nearer to the more remote event, to which alone it is fully applicable. 1. at that time—typically, towards the close of Antiochus' reign; antitypically, the time when Antichrist is to be destroyed at Christ's coming. Michael—the guardian angel of Israel ("thy people"), (ch. 10, 13). The transactions on earth affecting God's people have their correspondences in heaven, in the conflict between good and bad angels; so at the last great contest on earth which shall decide the ascendancy of Christianity (Revelation 12, 7-10). An archangel, not the Lord Jesus; for he is distinguished from "the Lord" in Jude 9. there shall be—rather, "it shall be." time of trouble, such as never was—partially applicable to the time of Antiochus, who was the first subverter of the Jews' religion, and persecutor of its professors, which no other world-power had done. Fully applicable to the last times of Antichrist, and his persecutions of Israel restored to Palestine. Satan will be allowed to exercise an unhindered, unparalleled energy (Isaiah 26, 20, 21; Jeremlah 30. 7; Matthew 24. 21; cf. ch. 8. 24, 25; 11. 36). thy people shall be delivered—(Romans 11. 26.) The same deliverance of Israel as in Zechariah 13. 8, 9, "the third part . . . brought through the fire . . . refined as silver." The remnant in Israel spared, as not having joined in the Antichristian blasphemy (Revelation 14. 9, 10); not to be confounded with those who have confessed Christ before His coming, "the remnant according to the election of grace" (Romans 11. 5), part of the Church of the first-born who will share His millennial reign in glorified bodies; the spared remnant (Isaiah 10. 21) will only know the Lord Jesus when they see Him, and when the spirit of grace and supplication is poured out on them. [TREGELLES.] written in the book—viz., of God's secret purpose, as destined for deliverance (Psalm 56. 8; 69. 28; Luke 10. 20; Revelation 20. 15; 21. 27). Metaphor from a muster-roll of citizens (Nehemiah 7. 5). 2. many . . . that sleep—"many from among the sleepers . . . these shall be unto everlasting life; but those (the rest of the sleepers who do not awake at this time) shall be unto shame." [TREGELLES.] Not the general resurrection, but that of those who share in the first resurrection; the rest of the dead being not to rise till the end of the thousand years (Revelation 20. 3, 5, 6; cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 23; 1 Thessalonians 4. 16). Israel's national resurrection, and the first resurrection of the elect Church, are similarly connected with the Lord's coming forth out of His place to punish the earth in Isaiah 26. 19, 21; 27. 6. Cf. Isaiah 25. 6-9. The Jewish commentators support TREGELLES. AUBERLEN thinks the sole purpose for which the resurrection is introduced in this verse is an incitement to faithful perseverance in the persecutions of Antiochus; and that there is no chronological connection between the time of trouble in v. 1 and the resurrection in v. 2; whence the phrase, "at that time," twice occurs in v. 1, but no fixing of time in v. 2, 3: 2 Maccabees 7. 9, 14, 23, shows the fruit of this prophecy in animating the Maccabean mother and her sons to brave death, whilst confessing the resurrection in words like those here. Cf. Hebrews 11. 35. NEWTON'S view that "many" means all, is not so probable; for Romans 5. 15, 19, which he quotes, is not in point, since the Greek is "the many," i. e., all, but there is no article in the Hebrew here. Here only in the Old Testament is "everlasting life" mentioned. 3. wise—(Proverbs 11. 30.) Answering to "they that understand" (ch. 11. 33, 35), the same Hebrew, "Maskilim;" Israelites who, though in Jerusalem when wickedness is coming to a head, are found intelligent witnesses against it. As then they appeared worn out with persecutions (typically, of Antiochus; antitypically, of Antichrist); so now in the resurrection they "shine as the brightness of the firmament." The design of past afflictions here appears "to make them white" (Matthew 13. 43; Revelation 7. 9, 14). turn . . . to righteousness—lit., justify, i. e., convert many to justification through Christ (James 5. 20). stars—(1 Corinthians 15. 41, 42.) 4. shut up . . . seal the book—John, on the contrary, is told (Revelation 22. 10) not to seal his visions. Because Daniel's prophecy refers to a distant time, and is therefore obscure for the immediate future, whereas John's was to be speedily fulfilled (Revelation 1. 1, 3; 22. 6). Israel, to whom Daniel prophesied after the captivity, with premature zeal sought after signs of the predicted period: Daniel's prophecy was designed to restrain this. The Gentile Church, on the contrary, for whom John wrote, needs to be impressed with the shortness of the period, as it is, owing to its Gentile origin, apt to conform to the world, and to forget the coming of the Lord (cf. Matthew 25. 13, 19; Mark 13. 32-37; 2 Peter 3. 8, 12; Revelation 22. 20). run to and fro—not referring to the modern rapidity of locomotion, as some think, nor to Christian missionaries going about to preach the gospel to the world at large [BARNES], which the context scarcely admits, but, whereas row but few care for this prophecy of God, "at the time of the end," i. e., near its fulfilment, "many shall run to and fro," i. e., scrutinize it, running through every page. Cf. Habakkuk 2. 2 [CALVIN]: it is thereby that "the knowledge (viz., of God's purposes as revealed in prophecy) shall be increased." This is probably being now fulfilled. 5. A vision of two other angels, one on one side of the Hiddekel or Tigris, the other on the other side, implying that on both sides angels attend to execute God's commands. The angel addressing Daniel had been over the river "from above" (v. 6, Margin). 6. one—viz., of the two (v. 5). man . . . in linen—who had spoken up to this point. God impelled the angel to ask in order to waken us out of our torpor, seeing that the very "angels desire to look into" the things affecting man's redemption (1 Peter 1. 12), as setting forth the glory of their Lord and ours (Ephesians 3. 10). How long . . . to the end of these wonders—This question of the angel refers to the final dealings of God in general, Antichrist's overthrow, and the resurrection. Daniel's question (v. 8) refers to the more immediate future of his nation. [AUBERLEN.] 7. held up . . . right . . . and . . . left hand—usually the right hand was held up in affirmation as an appeal to heaven to attest the truth (Deuteronomy 32. 40; Revelation 10. 5, 6). Here both hands are lifted up for the fuller confirmation. time, times, and a half—(See Note, ch. 7. 25.) NEWTON, referring this prophecy to the Eastern apostasy, Mohammedanism, remarks that the same period of three and a half years, or 1260 prophetic days, is assigned to it as the Western apostasy, of the little horn (ch. 7. 25), and so, says PRIDEAUX, Mohammed began to forge his imposture, retiring to his cave, 606 A. D., the very year that Phocas made the grant to the bishop of Rome, whence he assumed the title, The Universal Pastor; Antichrist thus setting both his feet on Christendom together, the one in the East, and the other in the West. Three and a half is the time of the world-power, in which the earthly kingdoms rule over the heavenly. [AUBERLEN.] "Three and a half" represents the idea of spiritual trial; [besides this certain symbolical meaning, there is doubtless an accurate chronological meaning, which is as yet to us uncertain]: it is half of "seven," the complete number, so a semi-perfect state, one of probation. The holy city is trodden by the Gentiles forty-two months (Revelation 11. 2), so the exercise of the power of the beast (Revelation 13. 5). The two witnesses preach in sackcloth 1260 days, and remained unburied three days and a half: so the woman in the wilderness; also the same for a "time, times, and a half" (Revelation 11. 3, 9, 11; 12. 6, 14). Forty-two connects the Church with Israel, whose haltings in the wilderness were forty-two (Numbers 33. 1-50). The famine and drought on Israel in Elijah's days were for "three years and six months" (Luke 4. 25; James 5. 17); the same period as Antiochus' persecution: so the ministry of The Man of Sorrows, which ceased in the midst of a week (ch. 9. 27). [WORDSWORTH, Apocalypse.] scatter . . . holy people—"accomplished" here answers to "the consummation" (ch. 9. 27), viz., the "pouring out" of the last dregs of the curse on the "desolated" "holy people." Israel's lowest humiliation (the utter "scattering of her power") is the precursor of her exaltation, as it leads her to seek her God and Messiah (Matthew 23. 39). 8. understood not—Daniel "understood" the main features of the vision as to Antiochus (ch. 10. 1, 14), but not as to the times. 1 Peter 1. 10-12 refers mainly to Daniel: for it is he who foretells "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow;" it is he who prophesies "not unto himself, but unto us;" it is he who "searched what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ in him did signify." 9. Daniel's desire of knowing more is thus deferred "till the time of the end." John's Revelation in part reveals what here is veiled (Note, v. 4, and ch. 8. 26). 10. There is no need of a fuller explanation as to the time; for when the predictions so far given shall have come to pass, the godly shall be "purified" by the foretold trials, and shall understand that the end is at hand, but the wicked shall not understand, and so shall rush on their own ruin (ch. 11. 33-35). [MAUREL.] The "end" is primarily, of Antiochus' persuasion; antitypically, the end of Antichrist's. It is the very clearness in the main which renders necessary the obscurity. The fulfilment of God's decree is not a mere arithmetical problem which the profane may understand by arithmetical calculations, but a holy enigma to stimulate to a faithful observance of God's ways, and to a diligent study of the history of God's people. [AUBERLEN.] To this Christ refers (Matthew 24. 15), "Whoso readeth, let him understand." 11. from . . . sacrifice . . . taken away . . . abomination—(Ch. 11. 31.) As to this epoch, which probably is prophetically germinant and manifold; the profanation of the temple by Antiochus (in the month Ijar of the year 145 B. C., till the restoration of the worship by Judas Maccabeus on the twenty-fifth day of the ninth month (Chisleu) of 148 B. C., according to the Seleucid era, 1290 days; forty-five days more elapsed before Antiochus' death in the month Shebat of 143 B. C., so ending the Jews' calamities [MAURER]); by Pagan Rome, after Christ's death; by Mohammed; by Antichrist, the culmination of apostate Rome. The "abomination" must reach its climax (see AUBERLEN'S translation, "summit," ch. 9. 27), and the measure of iniquity be full, before Messiah comes, thousand two hundred and ninety days—a month beyond the "time, times, and a half" (v. 7). In v. 12, forty-five days more are added, in all 1335 days. TREGELLES thinks Jesus at his coming will deliver the Jews. An interval elapses, during which their consciences are awakened to repentance and faith in Him. A second interval elapses in which Israel's outcasts are gathered, and then the united blessing takes place. These stages are marked by the 1260, 1290, and 1335 days. CUMMING thinks the 1260 years begin when Justinian in 533 A. D. subjected the Eastern churches to John II., bishop of Rome; ending in 1792, when the code Napoleon was established and the Pope was dishonoured. 1290 reach to 1822, about the time of the waning of the Turkish power, the successor to Greece in the empire of the East. Forty-five years more end in 1867, the end of "the times of the Gentiles." See Leviticus 26, 24, "seven times," i. e., 7×360 , or 2520 years: 652 B. C. is the date of Judah's captivity, beginning under Manasseh; 2520 from this date end in 1868, thus nearly harmonizing with the previous date, 1867. See Note, also ch. 8. 14. The seventh millenary of the world [CLINTON] begins in 1862. Seven years to 1869 (the date of the second advent) constitute the reign of the personal Antichrist; in the last three and a half, the period of final tribulation, Enoch (or else Moses) and Elijah, the two witnesses, prophesy in sackcloth. This theory is very dubious (cf. Matthew 24. 36; Acts 1. 7; 1 Thessalonians 5. 2; 2 Peter 3. 10); still the event alone can tell whether the chronological coincidences of such theories are fortuitous, or solid data on which to fix the future times. HALES makes the periods 1260, 1290, 1335, begin with the Roman destruction of Jerusalem and end with the precursory dawn of the Reformation, the preaching of Wycliffe and Huss. 13. rest—in the grave (Job 3. 17; Isaiah 57. 2). He, like his people Israel, was to wait patiently and confidently for the blessing till God's time. He "received not the promise," but had to wait until the Christian elect saints should be brought in, at the first resurrection, that he and the other Old Testament saints "without us should not be made perfect" (Hebrews 11. 40). stand—implying justification unto life, as opposed to condemnation (Psalm 1. 5). thy lot—image from the allotment of the earthly Canaan.

INTRODUCTION.

THE first of the twelve minor prophets in the order of the canon (called "minor," not as less in point of inspired authority, but simply in point of size). The twelve are first mentioned by Jesus, the son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus 49. 10). St. Stephen, in Acts 7. 42 (in referring to Amos 5. 27), quotes them as forming one collective body of writings, "the book of the prophets." So JEROME, and MELITO, the first Greek father who has left us a catalogue of these books. The collection of the sacred books is by Jewish tradition attributed to the great synagogue of learned scribes formed by Ezra. Many think Nehemiah completed this collection by adding to the books already in the canon those of his own times. Malachi, the last in the series, probably aided him in determining with infallible authority what books were entitled to be ranked in the inspired canon. The chronological order differs from the canonical. Joel, about 810 B. C.; Jonah, about 810 B. C., or, as others, first, 862 B. C.; Amos, about 790 B. C.; Hosea, about 784 B. C. Hosea, the contemporary of Isaiah, Micah, and Amos, seems to have entered on his prophetic office in the last years of Jeroboam (contemporary in part with Uzziah), and to have ended it in the beginning of Hezekiah's reign, 722 B. C., i. e., about sixty years in all, from 784 B. C. to 722 B. C. The prophets, however, were not uninterruptedly engaged in prophesying. Considerable intervals elapsed, though their office as divinely-commissioned public teachers was never wholly laid aside. The book of Hosea which we have constitutes only that portion of his public teachings which the Holy Spirit saw fit to preserve for the benefit of the Church. The cause of his being placed first of the twelve was, probably, the length the vivid earnestness, and patriotism of his prophecies, as well as their closer resemblance to those of the greater prophets. His style is abrupt, sententious, and unrounded; the connecting particles are few; there are changes of person, and anomalies of gender, number, and construction. His name means Salvation. He was son of Beeri, of the tribe of Issachar, born in Beth-shemesh. [JEROME.] His mention, in the inscription, of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, is no proof that he belonged to Judah: for the prophets in Israel regarded its separation from Judah, civil as well as religious, as an apostasy from God, who promised the dominion of the theocracy to the line of David. Hence Elijah in Israel took twelve stones to represent Judah, as well as Israel (1 Kings 18. 31). Hence Hosea dates from Judah's kings, as well as from Jeroboam of Israel, though he belonged to Israel, with whose sins and fate his book is chiefly occupied. He, however, makes incidental references to Judah. His first prophecy foretells the overthrow of Jehu's house, fulfilled on the death of Jeroboam, Jehu's great-grandson (2 Kings 15. 12), in Zachariah, Jeroboam's son, the fourth and last from Jehu, conspired against by Shallum. This first prediction was doubtless in Jeroboam's life, as Zachariah, his son, was only suffered to reign six months; thus the inscription is verified that "the word of the Lord came unto him in the days of Jeroboam." Again, in ch. 10. 14, Shalmaneser's expedition against Israel is alluded to as past, i. e., the first inroad against King Hoshea, who began to reign in the twelfth year of Ahaz; so that as Ahaz's whole reign was sixteen years, the prophecy seems to have been given about the beginning of Hezekiah's reign. Thus the inscription is confirmed that the exercise of his prophetic functions was of such a protracted duration.

Hosea (ch. 11. 1) is quoted by Matthew 2. 15; also ch. 6. 6 by Matthew 9. 13; 12. 7; cf. Romans 9. 25, 26, quoting ch. 1. 10, 2. 1, 23; 1 Corinthians 15. 55, quoting ch. 13. 14; 1 Peter 2. 10, quoting ch. 1. 9, 10; 2. 23. Messianic references are not frequent; but the predictions of the future conversion of Israel to the Lord their God, and David their king, and of the fulfilment of the promise to Abraham that his spiritual seed should be as the sand of the sea (ch. 1. 10; 3. 5), clearly refer to the New Testament dispensation.

The first and third chapters are in prose, the rest of the book is rhythmical.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-11. INSCRIPTION. Spiritual whoredom of Israel set forth by symbolical acts; Gomer taken to wife at God's command: Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi, the children. Yet a promise of Judah and Israel's restoration. 1. See Introduction. Jeroboam—the second; who died in the fifteenth year of Uzziah's forty-one years' reign. From his time forth all Israel's kings worshipped false gods: Zachariah (2 Kings 15. 9), Menahem (2 Kings 15. 18), Pekahiah (2 Kings 15. 24), Pekah (2 Kings 15. 28), Hoshea (2 Kings 17. 2). As Israel was most flourishing externally under Jeroboam II., who recovered the possessions seized on by Syria, Hosea's prophecy of its downfall at that time was the more striking the less it could have been foreseen by mere human sagacity. Jonah the prophet had promised success to Jeroboam II. from God, not for the king's merit, but from God's mercy to Israel; so the coast of Israel was restored by Jeroboam II. from the entering of Hamath to the sea of the plain (2 Kings 14. 23-27). 2. beginning—not of the prophet's predictions generally, but of those spoken by Hosea. take . . . wife of whoredoms—not externally acted, but internally and in vision, as a pictorial illustration of Israel's unfaithfulness. [HENGSTENBERG.] Cf. Ezekiel 16. 8, 15, &c. Besides the loathsomeness of such a marriage, if an external act, it would require years for the birth of three children, which would weaken the symbol (cf. Ezekiel 4. 4). HENDERSON objects that there is no hint of the transaction being fictitious; Gomer fell into lewdness after her union with Hosea, not before; for thus only she was a fit symbol of Israel, who lapsed into spiritual whoredom after the marriage contract with God on Sinai, and made even before at the call of the patriarchs of Israel. Gomer is called "a wife of whoredoms," anticipatively. children of whoredoms—The kingdom collectively is viewed as a mother; the individual subjects of it are spoken of as her children. "Take" being applied to both implies that they refer to the same thing viewed under different aspects. The "children" were not the prophet's own, but born of adultery, and presented to him as his. [KITTO, Biblical Cyclopaedia.] Rather, "children of whoredoms" means that the children, like their mother, fell into spiritual fornication. Cf. "bare him a son" (see ch. 2. 4, 5). Being children of a spiritual whore, they naturally fell into her whorish ways. 3. Gomer . . . daughter of Diblaim—symbolical names; lit., "Completion, daughter of grape-cakes;" the dual expressing the double layers in which these dainties were baked. So, one completely given up to sensuality. MAUREL explains "Gomer" as lit., "a burning coal." Cf. Proverbs 6. 27, 29, as to an adulteress; Job 31. 9, 12. 4. Jezreel—i. e., God will scatter (cf. Zechariah 10. 9). It was the royal city of Ahab and his successors, in the tribe of Issachar. Here Jehu exercised his greatest cruelties (2 Kings 9. 16, 25, 33; 10. 11, 14, 17). There is in the name an allusion to "Israel" by a play of letters and sounds. 5. bow—the prowess (Jeremiah 49. 35; cf. Genesis 49. 24). valley of Jezreel—afterwards called Esdraelon, extending ten miles in breadth, and in length from Jordan to the Mediterranean near Mount Carmel, the great battle-field of Palestine (Judges 6. 33; 1 Samuel 29. 1). 6. Lo-ruhamah—i. e., Not an object of mercy or gracious favour. take . . . away—Israel, as a kingdom, was never restored from Assyria, as Judah was from Babylon after seventy years. MAUREL translates according to the primary meaning, "No more will I have mercy on the house of Israel, so as to pardon them." 7. Judah is only incidentally mentioned to form a contrast to Israel. by the Lord their God—more emphatic than "by myself;" by that Jehovah (me) whom they worship as their God, whereas ye despise Him, not . . . by bow—on which ye Israelites rely (v. 5, "the bow of Israel"); Jeroboam II. was famous as a warrior (2 Kings 14. 25). Yet it was not by their warlike power Jehovah would save Judah (1 Samuel 17. 47; Psalm 20. 7). The deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib (2 Kings 19. 35), and the restoration from Babylon, are herein predicted. 8. weaned—said to complete the symbolical picture, not having any special signification as to Israel. [HENDERSON.] Israel was bereft of all the privileges which were as needful to them as milk is to infants (cf. Psalm 131. 2; 1 Peter 2. 2). [VATABLUS.] Israel was not suddenly, but gradually cast off; God bore with them with long-suffering, until they were incurable. [CALVIN.] But as it is not God, but Gomer who weans Lo-ruhamah, the weaning may imply the lust of Gomer, who was hardly weaned when she is again pregnant. [MANGEE.] 9. Lo-ammi—once "my people," but henceforth not so (Ezekiel 16. 8). The intervals between the marriage and the successive births of the three children, imply that three successive generations are intended. Jezreel, the first child, represents the dynasty of Jeroboam I. and his successors, ending with Jehu's shedding the blood of Jeroboam's line in Jezreel; it was there that Jezebel was slain, in vengeance for Naboth's blood shed in the same Jezreel (1 Kings 16. 1; 2 Kings 9. 21, 30). The scenes of Jezreel were to be enacted over again on Jehu's degenerate race. At Jezreel Assyria routed Israel. [JEROME.] The child's name associates past sins, intermediate punishments, and final overthrow. Lo-ruhamah (Not pitied), the second child, is a daughter, representing the effeminate period which followed the overthrow of the first dynasty, when Israel was at once abject and impious. Lo-ammi (Not my people), the third child, a son, represents the vigorous dynasty (2 Kings 14. 25) of Jeroboam II.; but, as prosperity did not bring with it revived piety, they were still not God's people. 10. Literally fulfilled in part at the return from Babylon, in which many Israelites joined with Judah. Spiritually, the believing seed of Jacob or Israel, Gentiles as well as Jews, numerous "as the sand" (Genesis 32. 12); the Gentiles, once not God's people, becoming His "sons" (John 1. 12; Romans 9. 25, 26; 1 Peter 2. 10; 1 John 3. 1). To be fulfilled in its literal fulness hereafter in Israel's restoration (Romans 11. 26). the living God—opposed to their dead idols. 11. Judah . . . Israel . . . together—(Isaiah 11. 12, 13; Jeremiah 3. 18; Ezekiel 34. 23; 37. 16-24.) one head—Zerubbabel typically; Christ antitypically, under whom alone Israel and Judah are joined, the "Head" of the Church (Ephesians 1. 22; 5. 23), and of the hereafter united kingdom of Judah and Israel (Jeremiah 34. 5, 6; Ezekiel 34. 23). Though "appointed" by the Father (Psalm 2. 6), Christ is in another sense "appointed" as their Head by His people, when they accept and embrace Him as such. out of the land—of the Gentiles among whom they sojourn. the day of Jezreel—"the day of one" is the time of God's special visitation of him, either in wrath or in mercy. Here "Jezreel" is in a different sense from that in v. 4, "God will sow," not "God will scatter;" they shall be the seed of God, planted by God again in their own land (Jeremiah 24. 6; 31. 23; 32. 41; Amos 9. 15).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-23. APPLICATION OF THE SYMBOLS IN CHAP. I. Israel's spiritual fornication, and her threatened punishment: yet a promise of God's restored favour, when chastisements have produced their designed effect. 1. Say . . . unto . . . brethren, Ammi, &c.—i. e., When the prediction (ch. 1. 11) shall be accomplished, then ye will call one another, as brothers and sisters in the family of God, Ammi and Ruhamah. 2. Plead—Expostulate. mother—i. e., the nation collectively. The address is to "her children," i. e., to the individual citizens of the state (cf. Isaiah 50. 1). for she is not my wife—she has deprived herself of her high privilege by spiritual adultery. out of her sight—rather, “from her face.” Her very countenance unblushingly betrayed her lust, as did also her exposed “breasts.” 3. set her as in the day . . . born—(Ezekiel 16. 4; 23. 25, 26, 23.) The day of her political “birth” was when God delivered her from the bondage of Egypt, and set up the theocracy. make her as a wilderness—(Jeremiah 6. 8; Zephaniah 2. 13.) Translate, “make her as the wilderness,” viz., that in which she passed forty years on her way to her goodly possession of Canaan. With this agrees the mention of “thirst” (cf. Jeremiah 2. 6). 4. her children—not even her individual members shall escape the doom of the nation collectively, for they are individually guilty. 5. I will go after—the Hebrew expresses a settled determination. lovers—the idols which Israel fancied to be the givers of all their goods, whereas God gave all these goods (v. 8-13; cf. Jeremiah 44. 17-19). bread and . . . water—the necessaries of life in food. wool . . . flax—clothing. oil . . . drink—perfumed unguents and palatable drinks; the luxuries of Hebrew life. 6, 7. thorns . . . wall—(Job 19. 8; Lamentations 3. 7, 9.) The hindrances which the captivity interposed between Israel and her idols. As she attributes all her temporal blessings to idols, I will reduce her to straits in which, when she in vain has sought help from false gods, she will at last seek me as her only God and Husband, as at the first (Isaiah 54. 5; Jeremiah 3. 14; Ezekiel 16. 8). then—before Israel’s apostasy, under Jeroboam. The way of duty is hedged about with thorns; it is the way of sin that is hedged up with thorns. Crosses in an evil course are God’s hedges to turn us from it. Restraining grace and restraining providences (even sickness and trials) are great blessings when they stop us in a course of sin. Cf. Luke 15. 14-18, “I will arise, and go to my father,” so here, “I will go, and return,” &c.; crosses in both cases being sanctified to produce this effect. 8. she did not know that I—not the idols, as she thought: the “lovers” alluded to in v. 5, which they prepared for Baal—i. e., of which they made images of Baal, or at least the plate-covering of them (ch. 8. 4). Baal was the Phœnician sun-god; answering to the female Astarte, the moon-goddess. The name of the idol is found in the Phœnician Hannibal, Hasdrubal. Israel borrowed it from the Tyrians. 9. my corn . . . my wool . . . my flax—in contrast to “my bread . . . my wool . . . my flax,” &c. (v. 5). Cf. also v. 21-23, on God as the great First Cause giving these through secondary instruments in nature. “Return, and take away,” is equivalent to, “I will take back again,” viz., by sending storms, locusts, Assyrian enemies, &c. “Therefore,” i. e., because she did not acknowledge me as the Giver, in the time thereof—in the harvest-time. 10. lewdness—rather, “the shame of her nakedness;” laying aside the figure, “I will expose her in her state, bereft of every necessary, before her lovers,” i. e., the idols (personified, as if they could see), who, nevertheless, can give her no help. “Discover” is appropriate to stripping off the self-flatteries of her hypocrisy. 11. her feast-days—of Jeroboam’s appointment, distinct from the Mosaic (1 Kings 12. 32). However, most of the Mosaic feasts, “new moons” and “sabbaths” to Jehovah remained, but to degenerate Israel worship was a weariness; they cared only for the carnal indulgence on them (Amos 8. 5). 12. my rewards—my hire as a harlot (Isaiah 23. 17, 18). lovers—idols. destruction . . . vines . . . make . . . forest—(Isaiah 5. 6; 7. 23, 24.) Fulfilled in the overthrow of Israel by Assyria (ch. 9. 4, 5). 13. days of Baalim—the days consecrated to the Baals, or various images of Baal in different cities, whence the names Baal-gad, Baal-hermon, &c. decked herself with earrings—rather, nose-rings (Isaiah 3. 21; Margin, Ezekiel 16. 12), with which harlots decked themselves to attract admirers; answering to the ornaments in which the Israelites decked themselves on the idols’ feasts. forgot me—worse than the nations which had never known God. Israel wilfully apostatized from Jehovah, whom she had known. 14. Therefore—rather, Nevertheless. [HEN-DEKSON.] English Version gives a more lovely idea of God, that which would provoke all others to unappreciable wrath, Israel’s perversity and consequent punishment, is made a reason why God should at last have mercy on her.

As the “therefore” (v. 9) expresses Israel’s punishment as the consequence of Israel’s guilt, so “therefore” here, as in v. 6, expresses, that when that punishment has effected its designed end, the hedging up her way with thorns, so that she returns to God, her first love, the consequence in God’s wondrous grace is, He “speaks comfortably” (lit., speaks to her heart; cf. Judges 19. 3; Ruth 2. 13). So obstinate she is, that God has to “allure her,” i. e., so to temper judgment with unlooked-for grace as to win her to His ways. For this purpose it was necessary to “bring her into the wilderness” (i. e., into temporal want and trials) first, to make her sin hateful to her by its bitter fruits, and God’s subsequent grace the more precious to her by the contrast of the “wilderness.” JEROME makes the “bringing into the wilderness” to be rather a deliverance from her enemies, just as ancient Israel was brought into the wilderness from the bondage of Egypt; to this the phrase here alludes (cf. v. 15). The wilderness sojourn, however, is not literal, but moral: whilst still in the land of their enemies locally, by the discipline of the trial rendering the word of God sweet to them, they are to be brought morally into the wilderness state, i. e., into a state of preparedness for returning to their temporal and spiritual privileges in their own land; just as the literal wilderness prepared their fathers for Canaan: thus the bringing of them into the wilderness state is virtually a deliverance from their enemies. 15. from thence—returning from the wilderness. God gives Israel a fresh grant of Canaan, which she had forfeited; so of her vineyards, &c. (v. 9, 12). Achor—i. e., Trouble. As formerly Israel, after their tedious journey through the wilderness, met with the trouble resulting from Achan’s crime in this valley, on the very threshold of Canaan, and yet that trouble was presently turned into joy at the great victory at Ai, which threw all Canaan into their hands (Joshua 7., 8.); so the very trouble of Israel’s wilderness state will be the “door of hope” opening to better days. The valley of Achor, near Jericho, was specially fruitful (Isaiah 65. 10); so “trouble” and “hope” are rightly blended in connection with it. slug . . . as . . . when she came . . . out of . . . Egypt—it shall be a second exodus song, such as Israel sung after the deliverance at the Red Sea (Exodus 15.; cf. Isaiah 11. 15, 16); and “the song of Moses” (Revelation 15. 2, 3) sung by those who through the Lamb overcome the beast, and so stand on the sea of glass mingled with fire, emblems of fiery trial, such as that of Israel at the Red Sea. 16. Ishi . . . no more Baali—“my Husband . . . no more my Lord.” Affection is the prominent idea in “Husband;” rule, in “Lord.” The chief reason for the substitution of Husband for Lord appears next verse, viz., Baali, the Hebrew for my Lord, had been perverted to express the images of Baal, whose name ought not to be taken on their lips (Exodus 23. 13; Zechariah 13. 2). 17. Baalim—plural, expressing the various images of Baal, which, according to the places of their erection, received various names, Baal-gad, Baal-ammon, &c. 18. for them—for their benefit. covenant . . . with the beasts—not to hurt them (Job 5. 23). They shall fulfil the original law of their creation by becoming subject to man, when man fulfils the law of his being by being subject to God. To be realized fully in millennial times (Isaiah 11. 6-9). break the bow . . . out of the earth—rather, “out of the land;” i. e., I will break and remove war out of the earth (Psalm 46. 9); and “out of the land” of Israel first (Isaiah 2. 4; Ezekiel 39. 9, 10; Zechariah 9. 9, 10). lie down—a reclining posture is the usual one with Orientals when not in action. safely—(Jeremiah 23. 6.) 19, 20. “Betroth” is thrice repeated, implying the intense love of God to His people; and perhaps, also, the three Persons of the Triune God, severally engaging to make good the betrothal. The marriage covenant will be as it were renewed from the beginning, on a different footing; not for a time only, as before, through the apostasy of the people, but “forever” through the grace of God writing the law on their hearts by the Spirit of Messiah (Jeremiah 31. 31-37). righteousness . . . judgment—in rectitude and truth. loving-kindness, &c.—hereby God assures Israel, who might doubt the possibility of their restoration to His favour; low, sunk, and unworthy as thou art, I will restore thee from a regard to my own "loving-kindness," not thy merits. 20. faithfulness—to my new covenant of grace with thee (1 Thesalonians 5. 24; Hebrews 10. 23). 21. in that day—of grace to Israel. heavens . . . hear the earth—personification. However many be the intermediate instruments, God is the Great First Cause of all nature's phenomena. God had threatened (v. 9) He would take back His corn, His wine, &c. Here, on the contrary, God promises to hearken to the skies, as it were, supplicating Him to fill them with rain to pour on the earth; and that the skies again would hearken to the earth begging for a supply of the rain it requires; and again, that the earth would hearken to the corn, wine, and oil, begging it to bring them forth; and these again would hear Jezreel, i. e., would fulfil Israel's prayers for a supply of them. Israel is now no longer "Jezreel" in the sense, God will SCATTER (ch. 1. 4), but in the sense, "God will PLANT" (ch. 1. 11). 23. I will sow her—referring to the meaning of Jezreel (v. 22).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-5. ISRAEL'S CONDITION IN THEIR PRESENT DISPERSION, SUBSEQUENT TO THEIR RETURN FROM BABYLON, SYMBOLIZED. The prophet is to take back his wife, though unfaithful, as foretold, ch. 1. 2. He purchases her from her paramour, stipulating she should wait for a long period before she should be restored to her conjugal rights. So Israel is to live for a long period without her ancient rites of religion, and yet be free from idolatry; then at last she shall acknowledge Messiah, and know Jehovah's goodness restored to her. 1. Go yet—"Go again," referring to ch. 1. 2. [HENDERSON.] a woman—purposely indefinite, for thy wife, to express the separation in which Hosea had lived from Gomer for her unfaithfulness. beloved of her friend—used for "her husband," on account of the estrangement between them. She was still beloved of her husband, though an adulteress; just as God still loved Israel, though idolatrous (Jeremiah 3. 20). Hosea is told, not as in ch. 1. 2, "take a wife," but "love" her, i. e., renew thy conjugal kindness to her. who look to other gods—i. e., have done so heretofore, but henceforth (from the return from Babylon) shall do so no more (v. 4). flagons of wine—rather, pressed cakes of dried grapes; such as were offered to idols (Jeremiah 7. 18). [MAUREL.] 2. I bought her—The price paid is too small to be a probable dowry wherewith to buy a wife from her parents; but it is just half the price of a female slave, in money, the rest of the price being made up in grain (Exodus 21. 32). Hosea pays this for the redemption of his wife, who has become the slave of her paramour. The price being half grain was because the latter was the allowance of food for the slave, and of the coarsest kind, not wheat, but barley. Israel, as committing sin, was the slave of sin (John 8. 34; Romans 6. 16-20; 2 Peter 2. 19). The low price expresses Israel's worthlessness. 3. abide for me—separate from intercourse with any other man, and remaining for me who have redeemed thee (cf. Deuteronomy 21. 13). so will I also be for thee—remain for thee, not taking any other consort. As Israel should long remain without serving other gods, yet separate from Jehovah; so Jehovah on His part, in this long period of estrangement, would form no marriage covenant with any other people (cf. v. 4). He would not immediately receive her to marriage privileges, but would test her repentance and discipline her by the long probation; still the marriage covenant would hold good, she was to be kept separated for but a time, not divorced (Isaiah 50. 1); in God's good time she shall be restored. 4. The long period here foretold was to be one in which Israel should have no civil polity, king, or prince, no sacrifice to Jehovah, and yet no idol, or false god, no ephod, nor teraphim. Exactly describing their state for the last eighteen centuries, separate from idols, yet without any legal sacrifice to Jehovah, whom they profess to worship, and without being acknowledged by Him as His Church. So KIMCHI, a Jew, explains it. The ephod was worn by the high priest above the tunic and robe. It consisted of two finely wrought pieces which hung down, the one in front over the breast, the other on the back, to the middle of the thigh; joined on the shoulders by golden clasps set in onyx stones with the names of the twelve tribes, and fastened round the waist by a girdle (Exodus 28. 6-12). The common ephod worn by the lower priests, Levites, and any person performing sacred rites, was of linen (2 Samuel 6. 14; 1 Chronicles 15. 27). In the breast were the Urim and Thummim by which God gave responses to the Hebrews. The latter was one of the five things which the second temple wanted, and which the first had. It, as representing the divinely-constituted priesthood, is opposed to the idolatrous "teraphim," as "sacrifice" (to Jehovah) is to "an (idolatrous) image." "Abide" answers to "thou shalt abide for me" (v. 3). Abide in solitary isolation, as a separated wife. The teraphim were tutelary household gods, in the shape of human busts, cut off at the waist (as the root of the Hebrew word implies) [MAURER], (Genesis 31. 19, 30-35). They were supposed to give responses to consulters (2 Kings 23. 24; Margis, Ezekiel 21. 21; Zechariah 10. 2). Saul's daughter, Michal, putting one in a bed, as if it were David, proves the shape to have been that of a man. 5. Afterward—After the long period ("many days," v. 4) has elapsed. return—from their idols to "their God," from whom they had wandered. David their king—Israel had forsaken the worship of Jehovah at the same time that they forsook their allegiance to David's line. Their repentance towards God is therefore to be accompanied by their return to the latter. So Judah and Israel shall be one, and under "one head," as is also foretold, ch. 1. 11. That representative and antitype of David is Messiah. "David" means The Beloved. Cf. as to Messiah, Matthew 3. 17; Ephesians 1. 6. Messiah is called David (Isaiah 55. 3, 4; Jeremiah 30. 9; Ezekiel 34. 23, 24; 37. 24, 25). fear the Lord and his goodness—i. e. tremblingly flee to the Lord, to escape from the wrath to come; and "to His goodness," as manifested in Messiah, which attracts them to Him (Jeremiah 31. 12). The "fear" is not that which "hath torment" (1 John 4. 18), but reverence inspired by His goodness realized in the soul (Psalm 130. 4). the latter days—those of Messiah. [KIMCHI.]

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-19. HENCEFORTH THE PROPHET SPEAKS PLAINLY AND WITHOUT SYMBOL, IN TERSE, SENTENTIOUS PROPOSITIONS. In this chapter he reproves the people and priests for their sins in the interregnum which followed Jeroboam's death; hence there is no mention of the king or his family; and in v. 2 bloodshed and other evils usual in a civil war are specified. 1. Israel—the ten tribes. controversy—judicial ground of complaint (Isaiah 1. 18; Jeremiah 25. 31; Micah 6. 2). no . . . knowledge of God—exhibited in practice (Jeremiah 22. 16). 2. they break out—bursting through every restraint. blood toneth blood—lit., bloods. One act of bloodshed follows another without any interval between (see 2 Kings 15. 8-16, 25; Micah 7. 2). 3. land . . . languish—(Isaiah 19. 8; 24. 4; Joel 1. 10, 12.) sea—including all bodies of water, as pools and even rivers (Note, Isaiah 19. 5). A general drought, the greatest calamity in the East, is threatened. 4. let no man . . . reprove—Great as is the sin of Israel, it is hopeless to reprove them; for their presumptuous guilt is as great as that of one who refuses to obey the priest when giving judgment in the name of Jehovah, and who therefore is to be put to death (Deuteronomy 17. 12). They rush on their own destruction as wilfully as such a one. thy people—the ten tribes of Israel; distinct from Judah (v. 1). 5. fall in the day—in broad daylight, a time when an attack would not be expected (Notes, Jeremiah 6. 4, 5; 15. 8). in . . . night—no time, night or day, shall be free from the slaughter of individuals of the people, as well as of the false prophets. thy mother—the Israelitish state, of which the citizens are the children (ch. 2. 2). 6. lack of knowledge—"of God" (v. 1), i. e., lack of piety. Their ignorance was wilful, as the epithet, "my people," implies; they ought to have known, having the opportunity, as the people of God, thou—O priest, so called.

Not regularly constituted, but still bearing the name, whilst confounding the worship of Jehovah and of the calves in Beth-el (1 Kings 12. 29, 31). I will . . . forget thy children—not only those who then were alive should be deprived of the priesthood, but their children who, in the ordinary course, would have succeeded them, should be set aside. 7. As they were increased—in numbers and power. Cf. v. 6, "thy children," to which their "increase" in numbers refers, so they sinned—(Cf. ch. 10. 1 and 13. 6.) will I change their glory into shame—i. e., I will strip them of all they now glory in (their numbers and power), and give them shame instead. A just retribution: as they changed their glory into shame, by idolatry (Psalm 106, 20; Jeremiah 2, 11; Romans 1, 23; Philippians 3, 19). 8. eat . . . sin of my people—i. e., the sin offerings (Leviticus 6, 26; 10, 17). The priests greedily devoured them, set their heart on their iniquity—lit., lift up the animal soul to, i. e., lust after, or strongly desire. Cf. Margin, Deuteronomy 24, 15; Psalm 24, 4; Jeremiah 22, 27. The priests set their own hearts on the iniquity of the people, instead of trying to suppress it. For the more the people sinned the more sacrificial victims in atonement for sin the priests gained. 9. like people, like priests—they are one in guilt, therefore they shall be one in punishment (Isaiah 24, 2). reward them their doings—in homely phrase, "pay them back in their own coin" (Proverbs 1, 31). 10. eat, and not have enough—just retribution on those who "eat up (greedily) the sin of my people" (v. 8; Micah 6, 14; Hagga 1, 6). whoredom, and . . . not increase—lit., break forth: used of giving birth to children (Genesis 23, 14, Margin; cf. Genesis 33, 29). Not only their wives, but their concubines, shall be barren: To be childless was considered a great calamity among the Jews. 11. A moral truth applicable to all times. The special reference here is to the licentious orgies connected with the Syrian worship, which lured Israel away from the pure worship of God (Isaiah 23, 1, 7; Amos 4, 1). take away the heart—i. e., the understanding; make men blind to their own true good (Ecclesiastes 7, 7). 12. Instances of their understanding ("heart") being "taken away." stocks—wooden idols (Jeremiah 2, 27; Habakkuk 2, 19). staff—alluding to divination by rods (Notes, Ezekiel 21, 21, 22). The diviner, says ROSENMULLER, threw a rod from him, which was stripped of its bark on one side, not on the other: if the bare side turned uppermost, it was a good omen; if the side with the bark, it was a bad omen. The Arabs used two rods, the one marked God bids, the other, God forbids; whichever came out first, in drawing them out of a case, gave the omen for, or against, an undertaking. declareth—i. e., is consulted to inform them of future events. spirit of whoredoms—a general disposition on the part of all towards idolatry (ch. 5, 4). err—go astray from the true God. from under their God—they have gone away from God under whom they were, as a wife is under the dominion of her husband. 13. upon . . . mountains—high places were selected by idolaters on which to sacrifice, because of their greater nearness to the heavenly hosts which they worshipped (Deuteronomy 12, 2). elms—rather, "terebinths." [MAUREL.] shadow . . . good—screening the lascivious worshippers from the heat of the sun. daughters . . . commit whoredom . . . spouses . . . adultery—in the polluted worship of Astarte, the Phœnician goddess of love. 14. I will not punish . . . daughters—I will visit with the heaviest punishments "not" the unchaste "daughters and spouses," but the fathers and husbands; for it is these who "themselves" have set the bad example, so that as compared with the punishment of the latter, that of the former shall seem as nothing. [MUNSTER.] separated with whores—withdrawn from the assembly of worshippers to some receptacle of impurity for carnal connection with whores. sacrifice with harlots—they commit lewdness with women who devote their persons to be violated in honour of Astarte. (So the Hebrew for "harlots" means, as distinguished from "whores.") Cf. Numbers 25, 1-3; and the prohibition, Deuteronomy 23, 18. not understand—(Isaiah 44, 18; 45, 20.) shall fall—shall be cast down. 15.

Though Israel's ten tribes indulge in spiritual harlotry, at least thou, Judah, who hast the legal priesthood, and the temple rites, and Jerusalem, do not follow her bad example. Gilgal—situated between Jordan and Jericho on the confines of Samaria; once a holy place to Jehovah (Joshua 5, 10-15; 1 Samuel 10, 8; 15, 21); afterwards desecrated by idol-worship (ch. 9, 15; 12, 11; Amos 4, 4; 5, 5; cf. Judges 3, 19, Margin). Beth-aven—i. e., the house of vanity or idols: a name substituted in contempt for Beth-el, the house of God; once sacred to Jehovah (Genesis 28, 17, 19; 35, 7), but made by Jeroboam the seat of the worship of the calves (1 Kings 12, 28-33; 13, 1; Jeremiah 48, 13; Amos 3, 14; 7, 13). "Go up" refers to the fact that Beth-el was on a hill (Joshua 16, 1). nor swear, The Lord liveth—This formula of oath was appointed by God Himself (Deuteronomy 6, 13; 10, 20; Jeremiah 4, 2); it is therefore here forbidden not absolutely, but in conjunction with idolatry and falsehood (Isaiah 48, 1; Ezekiel 20, 39; Zephaniah 1, 5). 16. backsliding—translate, "Israel is refractory, as a refractory heifer," viz., one that throws the yoke off her neck. Israel had represented God under the form of "calves" (1 Kings 12, 28); but it is she herself who is one. lamb in a large place—not in a good sense, as Isaiah 39, 23. Here there is irony: lambs like a large pasture; but it is not so safe for them as a small one, duly fenced from wild beasts. God will "feed" them, but it shall be with the "rod" (Micah 7, 14). It shall be no longer in the narrow territory of Israel, but "in a large place," viz., they shall be scattered in exile over the wide realm of Assyria, a prey to their foes, as lambs, which are timid, gregarious, and not solitary, are a prey when scattered asunder to wild beasts. 17. Ephraim—the ten tribes. Judah was at this time not so given to idolatry as afterwards. joined to idols—closely and voluntarily; identifying themselves with them as a whoremonger becomes one flesh with the harlot (Numbers 25, 3; 1 Corinthians 6, 16, 17). Idols—the Hebrew means also sorrows, pains, implying the pain which idolatry brings on its votaries. let him alone—leave him to himself. Let him reap the fruits of his own perverse choice: his case is desperate: have you nothing to say to him (cf. Jeremiah 7, 16). Here v. 15 shows the address is to Judah, to avoid the contagion of Israel's bad example. He is bent on his own ruin; leave him to his fate, lest, instead of saving him, thou fall thyself (Isaiah 48, 20; Jeremiah 50, 8; 51, 6, 45; 2 Corinthians 6, 17). 18. Their drink is sour—metaphor for utter degeneracy of principle (Isaiah 1, 22). Or, unbridled licentiousness; not mere ordinary sin, but as abandoned as drunkards who vomit and smell sour with wine potations. [CALVIN.] MAURER not so well translates, "When their drinking is over, they commit whoredoms," viz., in honour of Astarte (v. 13, 14). her rulers—Israel's; lit., shields (cf. Psalm 47, 9). with shame . . . love, Give ye—(Proverbs 30, 15.) No remedy could be effectual against their corruptions, since the very rulers sold justice for gifts. [CALVIN.] MAURER translates, "The rulers are marvellously enamoured of shame." English Version is better. 19. Israel shall be swept away from her land (v. 16) suddenly and violently as if by "the wings of the wind" (Psalm 18, 10; 104, 3; Jeremiah 4, 11, 12). ashamed . . . of their sacrifices—disappointed to their shame in their hope of help through their sacrifices to idols.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-5. GOD'S JUDGMENTS ON THE PRIESTS, PEOPLE, AND PRINCES OF ISRAEL FOR THEIR SINS. Judah too being guilty shall be punished; nor shall Assyria, whose aid they both sought, save them; judgments shall at last lead them to repentance. 1. the king—probably Pekah; the contemporary of Ahaz, king of Judah, under whom first idolatry was carried so far in Judah as to call for the judgment of the joint Syrian and Israelite invasion, as also that of Assyria. judgment is towards you—i. e., threatens you from God. ye have been a snare on Mizpah . . . net . . . upon Tabor—As hunters spread their net and snares on the hills Mizpah and Tabor, so ye have snared the people into idolatry, and made them your prey by injustice.

As Mizpah and Tabor mean a watch-tower, and a lofty place, a fit scene for hunters, playing on the words, the prophet implies, in the lofty place in which I have set you, whereas ye ought to have been the watchers of the people, guarding them from evil, ye have been as hunters entrapping them into it. [JEROME.] These two places are specified, Mizpah in the east and Tabor in the west, to include the high places throughout the whole kingdom, in which Israel's rulers set up idolatrous altars. 2. revolvers—apostates. profound—deeply-rooted [CALVIN] and sunk to the lowest depths, excessive in their idolatry (ch. 9, 9; Isaiah 31, 6). [HENDERSON.] From the antithesis (v. 3), "not hid from me," I prefer explaining, profoundly cunning in their idolatry. Jeroboam thought it a profound piece of policy to set up golden calves to represent God in Dan and Beth-el, in order to prevent Israel's heart from turning again to David's line by going up to Jerusalem to worship. So Israel's subsequent idolatry was grounded by their leaders on various pleas of state expediency (cf. Isaiah 29, 15). to . . . slaughter—he does not say "to sacrifice," for their so-called sacrifices were butcheries rather than sacrifices; there was nothing sacred about them, being to idols instead of to the holy God. though—MAURER translates, "and [in spite of their hope of safety through their slaughter of victims to idols] I will be a chastisement to them all." English Version is good sense: They have deeply revolted, notwithstanding all my prophetic warnings. 3. Ephraim—the tribe so called, as distinguished from "Israel" here, the other nine tribes. It was always foremost of the tribes of the northern kingdom. For 400 years in early history, it, with Manasseh and Benjamin, its two dependent tribes, held the pre-eminence in the whole nation. Ephraim is here addressed as foremost in idolatry. I know . . . not hid from me—notwithstanding their supposed profound cunning (v. 2; Revelation 2, 2, 9, 13, 19). now—"though I have been a rebuker of all them" (v. 2) who commit such spiritual whoredoms, thou art now continuing in them. 4. They—turning from a direct address to Ephraim, he uses the third person plural to characterize the people in general. The Hebrew is against the Margin, "their doings will not suffer them," the omission of "them" in the Hebrew after the verb being unusual. The sense is, they are incurable, for they will not permit (as the Hebrew lit. means) their doings to be framed so as to turn unto God. Implying that they resist the spirit of God, not suffering Him to renew them; and give themselves up to "the spirit of whoredoms" (in antithesis to "the Spirit of God" implied in "suffer" or "permit") (ch. 4, 12; Isaiah 63, 10; Ezekiel 16, 43; Acts 7, 51). 5. the pride of Israel—wherewith they reject the warnings of God's prophets (v. 2), and prefer their idols to God (ch. 7, 10; Jeremiah 13, 17). testify to his face—openly to his face he shall be convicted of the pride which is so palpable in him. Or, "in his face," as Isaiah 3, 9. Judah . . . shall fall with them—This prophecy is later than ch. 4, 15, when Judah had not gone so far in idolatry; now her imitation of Israel's bad example provokes the threat of her being doomed to share in Israel's punishment. 6. with . . . flocks—to propitiate Jehovah (Isaiah 1, 11-15). seek . . . not find—because it is slavish fear leads them to seek Him; and because it then shall be too late (Proverbs 1, 28; John 7, 34). 7. treacherously—as to the marriage covenant (Jeremiah 3, 20). strange children—alluding to "children of whoredoms" (ch. 1, 2; 2, 4). "Strange" or foreign implies, that their idolatry was imported from abroad. [HENDERSON.] Or rather, "regarded by God as strangers, not His," as being reared in idolatry. The case is desperate, when not only the existing, but also the rising generation is reared in apostasy. a month—a very brief space of time shall elapse, and then punishment shall overtake them (Zechariah 11, 8). The allusion seems to be to money loans, which were by the month, not as with us by the year. You cannot put it off; the time of your destruction is immediately and suddenly coming on you; just as the debtor must meet the creditor's demand at the expiration of the month. The prediction is of the invasion of Tiglath-pileser, who carried away Reuben, Gad, Naphtali, and the half tribe of Manasseh. portions—i. e., possessions. Their resources and garrisons will not avail to save them. HENDERSON explains from Isaiah 57, 6, "portions" as their idols; the context favours this, "the Lord" the true "portion of His people" (Deuteronomy 32, 9), being in antithesis to "their portions," the idols. 8. The arrival of the enemy is announced in the form of an injunction to blow an alarm. cornet . . . trumpet—the "cornet" was made of the curved horn of animals, and was used by shepherds. The trumpet was of brass or silver, straight, and used in wars and on solemn occasions. The Hebrew is hutzotzenah, the sound imitating the trumpet note (ch. 8, 1; Numbers 10, 2; Jeremiah 4, 5; Joel 2, 1). Gibeah . . . Ramah—both in Benjamin (Isaiah 10, 29). Beth-aven—in Benjamin; not as in ch. 4, 15, Beth-el, but a town east of it (Joshua 7, 2). "Cry aloud," viz., to raise the alarm. "Benjamin" is put for the whole southern kingdom of Judah (cf. v. 5), being the first part of it which would meet the foe advancing from the north. "After thee, O Benjamin," implies the position of Beth-aven, behind Benjamin, at the borders of Ephraim. When the foe is at Beth-aven, he is at Benjamin's rear, close upon thee, O Benjamin (Judges 5, 14). 9, 10. Israel is referred to in v. 9, Judah in v. 10. the day of rebuke—The day when I shall chastise him. among the tribes of Israel have I made known—proving that the scene of Hosea's labours was among the ten tribes. that which shall surely be—viz., the coming judgment here foretold. It is no longer a conditional decree, leaving a hope of pardon on repentance; it is absolute, for Ephraim is hopelessly impenitent. remove the bound—(Deuteronomy 19, 14; 27, 17; Job 24, 2; Proverbs 22, 28; 23, 10.) Proverbial for the rash setting aside of the ancestral laws by which men are kept to their duty. Ahaz and his courtiers ("the princes of Judah"), setting aside the ancient ordinances of God, removed the borders of the bases and the laver and the sea, and introduced an idolatrous altar from Damascus (2 Kings 16, 10-18); also he burnt his children in the valley of Hinnom, after the abominations of the heathen (2 Chronicles 28, 3). 11. broken in judgment—viz., the "judgment" of God on him (v. 1). walked after the commandment—Jeroboam's, to worship the calves (2 Kings 10, 28-33). Cf. Micah 6, 16, "the statutes of Omri," viz., idolatrous statutes. We ought to obey God rather than men (Acts 5, 29). Jerome reads "filthiness," LXX. gives the sense, not the lit. translation; "after vanities." 12. as a moth—consuming a garment (Job 13, 23; Psalm 39, 11; Isaiah 50, 9). Judah . . . rottenness—Ephraim, or the ten tribes, are as a garment eaten by the moth; Judah as the body itself consumed by rottenness (Proverbs 12, 4). Perhaps alluding to the superiority of the latter in having the house of David, and the temple, the religious centre of the nation. [GROTIUS.] As in v. 13, 14, the violence of the calamity is prefigured by the "wound" which "a lion" inflicts, so here its long protracted duration, and the certainty and completeness of the destruction from small unforeseen beginnings, by the images of a slowly but surely consuming moth and rottenness. 13. wound—lit., bandage; hence a bandaged wound (Isaiah 1, 6; Jeremiah 30, 12). "Saw," i. e., felt its weakened state politically, and the dangers that threatened it. It aggravates their perversity, that, though sensible of their unsound and calamitous state, they did not inquire into the cause, or seek a right remedy. went . . . to the Assyrian—first, Menahem (2 Kings 15, 19) applied to Pul; again, Hoshea to Salmanser (2 Kings 17, 3). sent to King Jareb—Understand Judah as the nominative to "sent." Thus as "Ephraim saw his sickness" (the first clause) answers in the parallelism to "Ephraim went to the Assyrian" (the third clause), so "Judah saw his wound" (the second clause) answers to (Judah) "sent to King Jareb" (the fourth clause). Jareb ought rather to be translated, "their defender," lit., avenger. [JEROME.] The Assyrian "king," ever ready, for his own aggrandizement, to mix himself up with the affairs of neighbouring states, professed to undertake Israel's and Judah's cause; in Judges 6, 32, Jerub, in Jerub-baal, is so used, viz., "plead one's cause." Judah, under Ahaz, applied to Tiglath-pileser for aid against Syria and Israel (2 Kings 16, 7, 8; 2 Chronicles 28, 16-21); the Assyrian "distressed him, but strengthened him not," fulfilling the prophecy here, "he could not heal you, nor cure you of your wound." 14. Lion—the black lion and the young lion are emblems of strength and ferocity (Psalm 91. 13). I, even I—emphatic; when I, even I, the irresistible God, tear in pieces (Psalm 50. 22), no Assyrian power can rescue. go away—as a lion stalks leisurely back with his prey to his lair. 15. return to my place—i. e., withdraw my favour. till they acknowledge their offence—the Hebrews, "till they suffer the penalty of their guilt." Probably "accepting the punishment of their guilt" (cf. Zechariah 11. 5) is included in the idea, as English Version translates. Cf. Leviticus 26. 40, 41; Jeremiah 29. 12, 13; Ezekiel 6. 9; 20. 43; 36. 31. seek my face—i. e., seek my favour (Proverbs 29. 26, Margin). In . . . affliction . . . seek me early—i. e., diligently; rising up before dawn to seek me (Psalm 119. 147; cf. Psalm 78. 34).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-11. THE ISRAELITES' EXHORTATION TO ONE ANOTHER TO SEEK THE LORD. At v. 4 a new discourse, complaining of them, begins; for v. 1-3 evidently belongs to v. 15 of ch. 5., and forms the happy termination of Israel's punishment: primarily, the return from Babylon; ultimately, the return from their present long dispersion. The eighth verse perhaps refers to the murder of Pekahiah; the discourse cannot be later than Pekah's reign, for it was under it that Gilead was carried into captivity (2 Kings 15. 29). 1. let us return—in order that God who has "returned to His place" may return to us (ch. 5. 15). turn, and . . . heal—(Deuteronomy 32. 39; Jeremiah 30. 17). They ascribe their punishment not to fortune, or man, but to God, and acknowledge that none (not the Assyrian, as they once vainly thought, ch. 5. 13) but God can heal their wound. They are at the same time persuaded of the mercy of God, which persuasion is the starting-point of true repentance, and without which men would not seek, but hate and flee from God. Though our wound be severe, it is not past hope of recovery; there is room for grace, and a hope of pardon. He hath smitten us, but not so badly that he cannot heal us (Psalm 130. 4). 2. Primarily, in type, Israel's national revival, in a short period ("two or three" being used to denote a few days, Isaiah 17. 6; Luke 13. 32, 33); antipically the language is so framed as to refer in its full accuracy only to Messiah, the ideal Israel (Isaiah 49. 3; cf. Matthew 2. 15, with ch. 11. 1), raised on the third day (John 2. 19; 1 Corinthians 15. 4; cf. Isaiah 53. 10). "He shall prolong His days." Cf. the similar use of Israel's political resurrection as the type of the general resurrection of which "Christ is the first-fruits" (Isaiah 26. 19; Ezekiel 37. 1-14; Daniel 12. 2). live in his sight—enjoy his favour and the light of his countenance shining on us, as of old; in contrast to ch. 5. 6, 15. "Withdrawn himself from them." 3. know, if we follow up to know the Lord—The result of his recovered favour (v. 2) will be onward growth in saving knowledge of God, as the result of perseverance in following after him (Psalm 63. 8; Isaiah 54. 13). "Then" implies the consequence of the revival in v. 2. The "if" is not so much conditional, as expressive of the means which God's grace will sanctify to the full enlightenment of Israel in the knowledge of Him. As want of "knowledge of God" has been the source of all evils (ch. 4. 1; 5. 4), so the knowledge of Him will bring with it all blessings, yea, it is "life" (John 17. 3). This knowledge is practice, not mere theory (Jeremiah 22. 15, 16). Theology is life, not science; realities, not words. This onward progress is illustrated by the light of "morning" increasing more and more "unto the perfect day" (Proverbs 4. 18). prepared—is sure, lit., fixed, ordered in His everlasting purposes of love to his covenant people. Cf. "prepared of God" (Margin, Genesis 41. 52; Revelation 12. 6). Jehovah shall surely come to the relief of His people after their dark night of calamity. as the morning—(2 Samuel 23. 4.) as the rain . . . latter . . . former—(Job 29. 23; Joel 2. 23.) First, "the rain" generally is mentioned; then the two rains (Deuteronomy 11. 14) which caused the fertility of Palestine, and the absence of which was accounted the greatest calamity, "the latter rain" which falls in the latter half of February, and during March and April, just before the harvest whence it takes its name, from a root meaning "to gather;" and "the former rain," lit., the darting rain, from the middle of October to the middle of December. As the rain fertilizes the otherwise barren land, so God's favour will restore Israel long nationally lifeless. 4. what shall I do unto thee—to bring thee back to plenty. What more could be done that I have not done, both in mercies and chastenings (Isaiah 5. 4)? At this verse a new discourse begins, resuming the threats (ch. 5. 14). See opening remarks on this chapter. goodness—godliness. morning cloud—soon dispersed by the sun (ch. 13. 3). There is a tacit contrast here to the promise of God's grace to Israel hereafter, in v. 3. His going forth is "as the morning," shining more and more unto the perfect day; your goodness is "as a morning cloud," soon vanishing. His coming to His people is "as the (fertilizing) latter and former rains;" your coming to Him "as the early dew goeth away." 5. I hewed them by the prophets—i. e., I announced by the prophets that they should be hewn asunder, like trees of the forest. God identifies His act with that of his prophets; the word being His instrument for executing His will (Jeremiah 1. 10; Ezekiel 43. 3). by . . . words of my mouth—(Isaiah 11. 4; Jeremiah 23. 29; Hebrews 4. 12.) thy judgments—the judgments which I will inflict on thee, Ephraim and Judah (v. 4). So "thy judgments," i. e., those inflicted on thee (Zephaniah 3. 15). are as the light, &c.—like the light, palpable to the eyes of all, as coming from God, the punisher of sin. HENDERSON translates, "lightning" (cf. Margin, Job 37. 3, 15). 6. mercy—put for piety in general, of which mercy or charity is a branch. not sacrifice—i. e., "rather than sacrifice." So not is merely comparative (Exodus 13. 8; Joel 2. 13; John 6. 27; 1 Timothy 2. 14). As God Himself instituted sacrifices, it cannot mean that He desired them not absolutely, but that even in the Old Testament, He valued moral obedience as the only end for which positive ordinances, such as sacrifices, were instituted—as of more importance than a mere external ritual obedience (1 Samuel 15. 22; Psalm 50. 8, 9; 51. 16; Isaiah 1. 11, 12; Micah 6. 6-8; Matthew 9. 13; 12. 7). knowledge of God—experimental and practical, not merely theoretical (v. 3; Jeremiah 22. 16; 1 John 2. 3, 4). "Mercy" refers to the second table of the law, our duty to our fellow-man; "the knowledge of God" to the first table, our duty to God, including inward spiritual worship. The second table is put first, not as superior in dignity, for it is secondary, but in the order of our understanding. 7. like men—the common sort of men (Psalm 82. 7). Not as Margin, "like Adam," Job 31. 33. For the expression "covenant" is not found elsewhere applied to Adam's relation to God; though the thing seems implied (Romans 5. 12-19). Israel "transgressed the covenant" of God as lightly as men break every-day compacts with their fellow-men. there—in the northern kingdom, Israel. 8. Gilead . . . city—Probably Ramoth-gilead, metropolis of the hilly region beyond Jordan, south of the Jabbok, known as "Gilead" (1 Kings 4. 13; cf. Genesis 31. 21-25). work iniquity—(ch. 12. 11.) polluted with blood—"marked with blood traces." [MAURER.] Referring to Gilead's complicity in the regalical conspiracy of Pekah against Pekahiah (2 Kings 15. 25). See Note, on v. 1. Many homicides were there, for there were beyond Jordan more cities of refuge, in proportion to the extent of territory, than on this side of Jordan (Numbers 35. 14; Deuteronomy 4. 41-43; Joshua 20. 8). Ramoth-gilead was one. 9. company—association or guild of priests. murder . . . by consent—lit., with one shoulder (cf. Zephaniah 3. 9, Margin). The image is from oxen putting their shoulders together to pull the same yoke, [RIVETUS.] MAURER translates, "in the way towards Shechem." It was a city of refuge between Ebal and Gerizim; on Mount Ephraim (Joshua 20. 7; 21. 21), long the civil capital of Ephraim, as Shiloh was the religious capital; now called Naploos; for a time the residence of Jeroboam (1 Kings 12. 25). The priests there became so corrupted that they waylaid and murdered persons fleeing to the asylum for refuge [HENDERSON]; and the sanctity of the place enhanced the guilt of the priests who abused their priestly privileges, and the right of asylum to perpetrate murders themselves, or to screen those committed by others. [MAURER.] commit lewdness—deliberate crime, presumptuous wickedness, from an Arabic root, to form a deliberate purpose. 10. horrible thing—(Jeremiah 5. 30; 18. 13; 23. 14). whoredom—idolatry. 11. an harvest—viz., of judgments, as in Jeremiah 51. 33; Joel 3. 13; Revelation 14. 15. Called a "harvest," because it is the fruit of the seed which Judah herself hath sown (ch. 8. 7; 10. 12; Job 4. 8; Proverbs 22. 8). Judah, under Ahaz, lost 120,000 "slain in one day (by Israel under Pekah), because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers." when I returned the captivity of my people—when I, by Oded my prophet, caused 200,000 women, sons, and daughters, of Judah to be restored from captivity by Israel (2 Chronicles 28. 6-15). This prophecy was delivered under Pekah. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] MAURER explains, When Israel shall have been exiled for its sins, and has been subsequently restored by me, thou, Judah, also shalt be exiled for thine. But as Judah's punishment was not at the time when God restored Israel, LUDOVICUS DE DIEU's explanation must be taken. GROTIUS translates, "When I shall have returned to make captive (i. e., when I shall have again made captive) my people." The first captivity of Israel under Tiglath-pileser was followed by a second under Shalmaneser. Then came the siege of Jerusalem, and the capture of the fenced cities of Judah, by Sennacherib, the forerunner of other attacks, ending in Judah's captivity. But the Hebrew is elsewhere used of restoration, not renewed punishment (Deuteronomy 30. 3; Psalm 14. 7).

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-16. REPROOF OF ISRAEL. Probably delivered in the interregn and civil war at Pekah's death; for v. 7, "all their kings . . . fallen," refers to the murder of Zechariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah; in v. 8 the reference seems to be to Menahem's payment of tribute to Pul, in order to secure himself in the usurped throne, also to Pekah's league with Rezin of Syria, and to Hoshea's connection with Assyria during the interregn at Pekah's death. [MAURER.] 1. I would have healed Israel—Israel's restoration of the 200,000 Jewish captives at God's command (2 Chronicles 28. 6-15) gave hope of Israel's reformation. [HENDERSON.] Political, as well as moral, healing is meant. When I would have healed Israel in its calamitous state, then their iniquity was discovered to be so great as to preclude hope of recovery. Then he enumerates their wickedness: "The thief cometh in (doors stealthily), and the troop of robbers spoileth without" (out of doors with open violence). 2. consider not in their hearts—lit., say not to, &c. (Psalm 14. 1). that I remember—and will punish. their own doings have beset them about—as so many witnesses against them (Psalm 9. 16; Proverbs 5. 22). before my face—(Psalm 90. 8). 3. Their princes, instead of checking, "have pleasure in them that do" such crimes (Romans 1. 32). 4. who ceaseth from raising—rather, heating it, from an Arabic root, to be hot. SOLXX. Their adulterous and idolatrous lust is inflamed as the oven of a baker who has it at such a heat, that he ceaseth from heating it only from the time that he hath kneaded the dough, until it be leavened; he only requires to omit feeding it during the short period of the fermentation of the bread. Cf. 2 Peter 2. 14, "that cannot cease from sin." [HENDERSON.] 5. the day of our king—his birth-day, or day of inauguration. have made him sick—viz., the king. MAURER translates, "make themselves sick." with bottles of wine—drinking not merely glasses, but bottles. MAURER translates, "owing to the heat of wine." he stretched out his hand with scorners—the gesture of revellers in holding out the cup and in drinking to one another's health. Scoffers were the king's boon companions. 6. they have made ready—rather, "they make their heart approach," viz., their king, in going to drink with him. like an oven—following out the image in v. 4. As it conceals the lighted fire all night, whilst the baker sleeps, but in the morning

burns as a flaming fire, so they brood mischief in their hearts, whilst conscience is lulled asleep, and their wicked designs wait only for a fair occasion to break forth. [HORSLEY.] Their heart is the oven, their baker the ringleader of the plot. In v. 7 their plots appear, viz., the intestine disturbances and murders of one king after another, after Jeroboam II. 7. all hot—all burn with eagerness to cause universal disturbance (2 Kings 15). devoured their judges—magistrates; as the fire of the oven devours the fuel. all their kings . . . fallen—see Notes at the beginning of this chapter. none . . . calleth unto me—such is their perversity that amidst all these national calamities, none seeks help from me (Isaiah 9. 13; 64. 7). 8. mixed . . . among the people—by leagues with idolaters, and the adoption of their idolatrous practices (v. 9, 11; Psalm 106. 35). Ephraim . . . cake not turned—a cake burnt on one side and unbaked on the other, and so uneatable; an image of the worthlessness of Ephraim. The Easterns bake their bread on the ground, covering it with embers (1 Kings 19. 6), and turning it every ten minutes, to bake it thoroughly without burning it. 9. Strangers—Foreigners: the Syrians and Assyrians (2 Kings 13. 7; 15. 19, 20; 17. 3-6). gray hairs—i. e., symptoms of approaching national dissolution. are here and there upon—lit., are sprinkled on him. yet he knoweth not—though old age ought to bring with it wisdom, he neither knows of his senile decay, nor has the true knowledge which leads to reformation. 10. Repetition of ch. 5. 5. not return to . . . Lord . . . for all this—notwithstanding all their calamities (Isaiah 9. 13). 11. like a silly dove—a bird proverbial for simplicity: easily deceived. without heart—i. e., understanding. call to Egypt—Israel lying between the two great rival empires Egypt and Assyria, sought each by turns to help her against the other. As this prophecy was written in the reign of Hoshea, the allusion is probably to the alliance with So or Sabacho II. (of which a record has been found on the clay cylindrical seals in Koyunjik), which ended in the overthrow of Hoshea and the deportation of Israel (2 Kings 17. 3-6). As the dove betrays its silliness by fleeing in alarm from its nest only to fall into the net of the fowler, so Israel, though warned that foreign alliances would be their ruin, rushed into them. 12. When they shall go—to seek aid from this or that foreign state. spread my net upon them—as on birds taken on the ground (Ezekiel 12. 13), as contrasted with "bringing them down as the fowls of the heavens, viz., by the use of missiles, as their congregation hath heard—viz., by my prophets through whom I threatened "chastisement" (ch. 5. 9; 2 Kings 17. 13-18). 13. fled—as birds from their nest (Proverbs 27. 8; Isaiah 16. 2). me—who both could and would have healed them (v. 1), had they applied to me. redeemed them—from Egypt and their other enemies (Micah 6. 4). lies—(Psalm 78. 36; Jeremiah 3. 10.) Pretending to be my worshippers, when they all the while worshipped idols (v. 14; ch. 12. 1); also defrauding me of the glory of their deliverance, and ascribing it and their other blessings to idols. [CALVIN.] 14. not cried unto me—but unto other gods [MAURER] (Job 35. 9, 10). Or, they did indeed cry unto me, but not "with their heart;" answering to "lies," v. 13 (see Note). when they howled upon their beds—sleepless with anxiety. Image of deep affliction. Their cry is termed howling, as it is the cry of anguish, not the cry of repentance and faith. assemble . . . for corn, &c.—viz., in the temples of their idols, to obtain from them a good harvest and vintage, instead of coming to me, the true Giver of these (ch. 2. 5, 8, 12), proving that their cry to God was "not with their heart." rebel against me—lit., "withdraw themselves against me," i. e., not only withdraw from me, but also rebel against me. 15. I . . . bound—when I saw their arms as it were relaxed with various disasters, I bound them so as to strengthen their sinews; image from surgery. [CALVIN.] MAURER translates, "I instructed them" to war (Psalm 18. 34; 144. 1), viz., under Jeroboam II. (2 Kings 14. 25). GROTIUS explains, "Whether I chastised them (Margin) or strengthened their arms, they imagine mischief against me." English Version is best. 16. return,* but not to the Most High—or, "to one who is not the Most High," one very different from Him, a stock or a stone. So LXX. deceitful bow—(Psalm 78, 57.) A bow which, from its faulty construction, shoots wide of the mark. So Israel pretends to seek God, but turns aside to idols. for the rage of their tongue—their boast of safety from Egyptian aid, and their "lies" (v. 13), whereby they pretended to serve God, whilst worshipping idols; also their perverse defence for their idolatries and blasphemies against God and His prophets (Psalm 73, 9; 120, 2, 3). their derision in . . . Egypt—their "fall" shall be the subject of "derision" to Egypt, to whom they had applied for help (ch. 9, 3, 6; 2 Kings 17, 4).

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-14. PROPHECY OF THE IRRUPTION OF THE ASSYRIANS, IN PUNISHMENT FOR ISRAEL'S APOSTASY, IDOLATRY, AND SETTING UP OF KINGS WITHOUT GOD'S SANCTION. In v. 14, Judah is said to multiply fenced cities; and in v. 7-9, Israel, to its great hurt, is said to have gone up to Assyria for help. This answers best to the reign of Menahem. For it was then that Uziah of Judah, his contemporary, built fenced cities (2 Chronicles 26, 6, 9, 10). Then also Israel turned to Assyria, and had to pay for their sinful folly a thousand talents of silver (2 Kings 15, 19). [MAURER.] 1. Set the trumpet, &c.—to give warning of the approach of the enemy: "To thy palate (i. e., mouth, Job 31, 30, Margin) the trumpet;" the abruptness of expression indicates the suddenness of the attack. So ch. 5, 8, as . . . eagle—the Assyrian (Deuteronomy 28, 49; Jeremiah 48, 40; Habakkuk 1, 8). against . . . house of . . . Lord—not the temple, but Israel viewed as the family of God (ch. 9, 15; Numbers 12, 7; Zechariah 9, 8; Hebrews 3, 2; 1 Timothy 3, 15; 1 Peter 4, 17). 2. My God, we know thee—the singular, "my," is used distributively, each one so addressing God. They, in their hour of need, plead their knowledge of God as the covenant people, whilst in their acts they knew Him not (cf. Matthew 7, 21, 22; Titus 1, 16; also Isaiah 29, 13; Jeremiah 7, 4). The Hebrew joins "Israel," not as English Version, with "shall cry," but "We, Israel, know thee;" God denies the claim thus urged on the ground of their descent from Israel. 3. Israel—God repeats the name in opposition to their use of it (v. 2). the thing that is good—JEROME translates, "God" who is good and doing good (Psalm 119, 68). He is the chief object rejected, but with Him also all that is good. the enemy shall pursue him—in just retribution from God. 4. kings . . . not by me—not with my sanction (1 Kings 11, 31; 12, 20). Israel set up Jeroboam and his successors, whereas God had appointed the house of David as the rightful kings of the whole nation. I knew it not—I approved it not (Psalm 1, 6). of . . . gold . . . idols—(Ch. 2, 8; 13, 2) that they may be cut off—i. e., though warned of the consequences of idolatry, as it were with open eyes they rushed on their own destruction. So Jeremiah 27, 10, 15; 44, 8. 5. hath cast thee off—as the ellipsis of thee is unusual, MAURER translates, "thy calf is abominable." But the antithesis to v. 3 establishes English Version, "Israel hath cast off the thing that is good;" therefore, in just retribution, "thy calf hath cast thee off," i. e., is made by God the cause of thy being cast off (ch. 10, 15). Jeroboam, during his sojourn in Egypt, saw Apis worshipped at Memphis, and Mnevis at Heliopolis, in the form of an ox; this, and the temple cherubim, suggested the idea of the calves set up at Dan and Beth-el. how long . . . ere they attain . . . innocency?—How long will they be incapable of bearing innocency? [MAURER.] 6. from Israel was it—viz., the calf originated with them, not from me. "It also," as well as their "kings set up" by them, "but not by me" (v. 4). 7. sown . . . reap—(Proverbs 22, 8; Galatians 6, 7). "Sow . . . wind," i. e., to make the vain show of worship, whilst faith and obedience are wanting. [CALVIN.] Rather, to offer senseless supplications to the calves for good harvests (cf. ch. 2, 8); the result being that God will make them "reap no stalk," i. e., "standing corn." Also, the phraseology proverbially means, that all their undertakings shall be profitless (Proverbs 11, 29; Eccleslastes 5, 16). the bud—or, "growth," strangers—foreigners (ch. 7, 9). 8. vessel wherein is no pleasure—(Psalm 41, 12; Jeremiah 22, 23; 48, 33.) 9. gone . . . to Assyria—referring to Menahem's application for Pul's aid in establishing him on the throne (cf. ch. 5, 13; 7, 11). Menahem's name is read in the inscriptions in the southwest palace of Ninrod, as a tributary to the Assyrian king in his eighth year. The dynasty of Pul, or Phalluka, was supplanted at Nineveh by that of Tiglath-pileser, about 768 (or 760) B. C. Semiramis seems to have been Pul's wife, and to have withdrawn to Babylon in 768; and her son, Nabonassar, succeeding after a period of confusion, originated "the era of Nabonassar," 747 B. C. [G. V. SMITH.] Usually foreigners coming to Israel's land were said to "go up," here it is the reverse, to intimate Israel's sunken state, and Assyria's superiority. wild ass—a figure of Israel's headstrong perversity in following her bent (Jeremiah 2, 24). alone by himself—characteristic of Israel in all ages; "lo, the people shall dwell alone" (Numbers 23, 9; cf. Job 39, 5-8). hired lovers—reversing the ordinary way, viz., that lovers should hire her (Ezekiel 16, 33, 34). 10. will I gather them—viz., the nations (Assyria, &c.) against Israel, instead of their assisting her as she had wished (Ezekiel 16, 37). a little—rather, "in a little." [HENDERSON.] English Version gives good sense: They shall sorrow a little at the imposition of the tribute; God suspended yet the great judgment, viz., their deportation by Assyria. the burden of the king of princes—the tribute imposed on Israel (under Menahem) by the Assyrian king (Pul, 2 Kings 15, 19-22), who had many "princes" under his sway (Isaiah 10, 8). 11. God in righteous retribution gives them up to their own way; the sin becomes its own punishment (Proverbs 1, 31). many altars—in opposition to God's law (Deuteronomy 12, 5, 6, 13, 14). to shun . . . to sin—their altars which were "sin" (whatever religious intentions they might plead) should be treated as such, and be the source of their punishment (1 Kings 12, 30; 13, 34). 12. great things of . . . law—(Deuteronomy 4, 6, 8; Psalm 19, 8; 119, 18, 72; 147, 19, 20.) MAURER not so well translates, "the many things of my law." my law—as opposed to their inventions. This reference of Hosea to the Pentateuch alone is against the theory that some earlier written prophecies have not come down to us. strange thing—as if a thing with which they had nothing to do. 13. sacrifices of mine offerings—i. e., which they offer to me. eat it—their own carnal gratification is the object which they seek, not my honour. now—i. e., speedily. shall return to Egypt—(Ch. 9, 3, 6; 11, 11). The same threat as in Deuteronomy 28, 68. They fled thither to escape from the Assyrians (cf. as to Judah, Jeremiah 42, 44.), when these latter had overthrown their nation. But see Note, ch. 9, 3. 14. forgotten . . . Maker—(Deuteronomy 32, 18.) temples—to idols. Judah . . . fenced cities—Judah, though less idolatrous than Israel, betrayed want of faith in Jehovah by trusting more to its fenced cities than to Him; instead of making peace with God, Judah multiplied human defences (Isaiah 22, 8; Jeremiah 5, 17; Micah 5, 10, 11). I will send . . . fire upon . . . cities—Sennacherib burned all Judah's fenced cities except Jerusalem (2 Kings 18, 13). palaces thereof—viz., of the land. Cf. as to Jerusalem, Jeremiah 17, 27.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-17. WARNING AGAINST ISRAEL'S JOY AT PARTIAL RELIEF FROM THEIR TROUBLES: THEIR CROSS SHALL FAIL, AND THE PEOPLE LEAVE THE LORD'S LAND FOR EGYPT AND ASSYRIA, WHERE THEY CANNOT, IF SO INCLINED, SERVE GOD ACCORDING TO THE ANCIENT RITUAL; FOLLY OF THEIR FALSE PROPHETS. 1. Rejoice not . . . for joy—lit., to exultation. Thy exultation at the league with Pul, by which peace seems secured, is out of place: since thy idolatry will bring ruin on thee. as other people—the Assyrians for instance, who, unlike thee, are in the height of prosperity. loved a reward upon every corn-floor—thou hast desired, in reward for thy homage to idols, abundance of corn on every threshing-floor (ch. 2, 12). 2. (Ch. 2, 9, 12) fail—disappoint her expectation.

3. return to Egypt—(Note, ch. 8. 13.) As in ch. 11. 5 it is said, "He shall not return into . . . Egypt." FAIRBAIRN thinks it is not the exact country that is meant, but the bondage state with which, from past experience, Egypt was identified in their minds. Assyria was to be a second Egypt to them. Deuteronomy 28. 63, though threatening a return to Egypt, speaks (v. 36) of their being brought to a nation which neither they nor their fathers had known, showing that it is not the literal Egypt, but a second Egypt-like bondage that is threatened. eat unclean things in Assyria—reduced by necessity to eat meats pronounced unclean by the Mosaic law (Ezekiel 4. 13). See 2 Kings 17. 6. 4. offer wine offerings—lit., pour as a libation (Exodus 30. 9; Leviticus 23. 13). neither shall they be pleasing unto him—as being offered on a profane soil. sacrifices . . . as the bread of mourners—which was unclean (Deuteronomy 26. 14; Jeremiah 16. 7; Ezekiel 24. 17). their bread for their soul—their offering for the expiation of their soul [CALVIN] (Leviticus 17. 11). Rather, "their bread for their sustenance ('soul' being often used for the animal life, Genesis 14. 21, Margin) shall not come into the Lord's house;" it shall only subserve their own uses, not my worship. 5. (Ch. 2. 11.) 6. because of destruction—to escape from the devastation of their country. Egypt shall gather them up—i. e., into its sepulchres (Jeremiah 8. 2; Ezekiel 29. 5). Instead of returning to Palestine, they should die in Egypt. Memphis—famed as a necropolis. the pleasant places for their silver—i. e., their desired treasuries for their money. Or, "whatever precious thing they have of silver." [MAURER.] nettles—the sign of desolation (Isaiah 34. 13). 7. visitation—vengeance: punishment (Isaiah 10. 3). Israel shall know it—to her cost experimentally (Isaiah 9. 9). the prophet is a fool—the false prophet who foretold prosperity to the nation shall be convicted of folly by the event. the spiritual man—the man pretending to inspiration (Lamentations 2. 14; Ezekiel 13. 3; Micah 3. 11; Zephaniah 3. 4). for the multitude of thine iniquity, &c.—connect these words with, "the days of visitation, &c., are come;" "the prophet, &c., is mad," being parenthetical. the great hatred—or, "the great provocation" [HENDERSON]; or, (thy) "great apostasy." [MAURER.] English Version means Israel's "hatred" of God's prophets and the law. 8. The watchman . . . was with my God—The spiritual watchmen, the true prophets, formerly consulted my God (Jeremiah 31. 6; Habakkuk 2. 1); but their so-called prophet is a snare, entrapping Israel into idolatry. hatred—rather, (a cause of) "apostasy" (see v. 7). [MAURER.] house of his God—i. e., the state of Ephraim, as in ch. 8. 1. [MAURER.] Or, "the house of his (false) god," the calves. [CALVIN.] Jehovah, "my God," seems contrasted with "his God." CALVIN'S view is therefore preferable. 9. as in the days of Gibeah—as in the day of the perpetration of the atrocity of Gibeah, narrated in Judges 19. 16-22, &c. 10. As the traveller in a wilderness is delighted at finding grapes to quench his thirst, or the early fig (esteemed a great delicacy in the East, Isaiah 28. 4; Jeremiah 24. 2; Micah 7. 1); so it was my delight to choose your fathers as my peculiar people in Egypt (ch. 2. 15). at her first time—when the first-fruits of the tree become ripe. went to Baal-peor—(Numbers 25. 3): the Moabite idol, in whose worship young females prostituted themselves; the very sin Israel latterly was guilty of, separated themselves—consecrated themselves. unto that shame—to that shameful or foul idol (Jeremiah 11. 13). their abominations were according as they loved—rather, as Vulgate, "they became abominable like the object of their love" (Deuteronomy 7. 26; Psalm 115. 8). English Version gives good sense, "their abominable idols they followed after, according as their lusts prompted them" (Margin, Amos 4. 5). 11. their glory shall fly away—fit retribution to those who "separated themselves unto that shame" (v. 10). Children were accounted the glory of parents; sterility, a reproach. "Ephraim" means fruitfulness (Genesis 41. 52); this its name shall cease to be its characteristic. from the birth . . . womb . . . conception—Ephraim's children shall perish in a threefold gradation; (1.) From the birth. (2.) From the time of pregnancy. (3.) From the time of their first conception. 12. Even though they should rear their children, yet will I bereave them (the Ephraimites) of them (Job 27. 14). woe . . . to them when I depart—yet the ungodly in their madness desire God to depart from them (Job 21. 14; 22. 17; Matthew 8. 34). At last they know to their cost how awful it is when God has departed (Deuteronomy 31. 17; 1 Samuel 23. 15, 16; cf. v. 11, and 1 Samuel 4. 21). 13. Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus . . . in a pleasant place—i. e., in looking towards Tyrus (on whose borders Ephraim lay) I saw Ephraim beautiful in situation like her (Ezekiel 26. and 27. and 28). is planted—as a fruitful tree; image suggested by the meaning of "Ephraim" (v. 11). bring forth his children to the murderer—(v. 16; ch. 13. 16.) With all his fruitfulness, his children shall only be brought up to be slain. 14. what wilt thou give—as if overwhelmed by feeling, he deliberates with God what is most desirable. Give . . . a miscarriage—of two evils he chooses the least. So great will be the calamity, that barrenness will be a blessing, though usually counted a great misfortune (Job 3. 3; Jeremiah 20. 14; Luke 23. 29). 15. Gilgal—(see Note, ch. 4. 15.) This was the scene of their first contumacy in rejecting God and choosing a king (1 Samuel 11. 14, 15; cf. 1 Samuel 8. 7), and of their subsequent idolatry. All their wickedness—i. e., their chief guilt. there I hated them—not with the human passion, but holy hatred of their sin, which required punishment to be inflicted on themselves (cf. Malachi 1. 3). out of mine house—as in ch. 8. 1: out of the land holy unto ME. Or, as "love" is mentioned immediately after, the reference may be to the Hebrew mode of divorce, the husband (God) putting the wife (Israel) out of the house. princes—revolters—"Sarim . . . Sorerim" (Hebrew), a play on similar sounds. 16. The figures "root," "fruit," are suggested by the word "Ephraim," i. e., fruitful (Notes, v. 11, 12). "Smitten," viz., with a blight (Psalm 102. 4). 17. My God—"My," in contrast to "them," i. e., the people, whose God Jehovah no longer is. Also Hosea appeals to God as supporting his authority against the whole people. wanderers among . . . nations—(2 Kings 15. 29; 1 Chronicles 5. 26.)

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-15. ISRAEL'S IDOLATRY, THE SOURCE OF PERJURIES AND UNLAWFUL LEAGUES, SOON DESTINED TO BE THE RUIN OF THE STATE, THEIR KING AND THEIR IMAGES BEING ABOUT TO BE CARRIED OFF; A JUST CHASTISEMENT, THE REAPING CORRESPONDING TO THE SOWING. The prophecy was uttered between Shalmaneser's first and second invasions of Israel. Cf. v. 14; also v. 6, referring to Hosea's calling So of Egypt to his aid; also v. 4. 13. 1. empty—stript of its fruits [CALVIN] (Nahum 2. 2); compelled to pay tribute to Pul (2 Kings 15. 20). MAURER translates, "A widespread vine;" so LXX. Cf. Genesis 49. 22; Psalm 80. 9-11; Ezekiel 17. 6. bringeth forth fruit unto himself—not unto ME. according to . . . multitude of . . . fruit . . . increased . . . altars—in proportion to the abundance of their prosperity, which called for fruit unto God (cf. Romans 6. 22), was the abundance of their idolatry (ch. 8. 4, 11). 2. heart . . . divided—(1 Kings 18. 21; Matthew 6. 24; James 4. 8.) now—i. e., soon. he—Jehovah. break down—"cut off" viz., the heads of the victims. Those altars, which were the scene of cutting off the victims' heads, shall be themselves cut off. 3. now, &c.—soon they, deprived of their king, shall be reduced to say, We have no king (v. 7, 15), for Jehovah deprived us of him, because of our not fearing God. What then (seeing God is against us) should a king be able to do for us, if we had one? As they rejected the heavenly King, they were deprived of their earthly king. 4. words—mere empty words. swearing falsely in making a covenant—breaking their engagement to Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17. 4), and making a covenant with So, though covenants with foreigners were forbidden. judgment . . . as hemlock—i. e., Divine judgment shall spring up as rank, and as deadly, as hemlock in the furrows (Deuteronomy 29. 18; Amos 5. 7; 6. 12). GESENIUS translates, "poppy." GROTIUS, "darnel." 5. fear because of the

calves—i. e., shall fear for them. Beth-aven—substituted for Beth-el in contempt (ch. 4. 15). It—singular, the one in Beth-el; after the pattern of which the other “calves” (plural) were made. “Calves” in the Hebrew is feminine, to express contempt. priests—the Hebrew is only used of idolatrous priests (2 Kings 23. 5; Zephaniah 1. 4), from a root meaning either the black garment in which they were attired; or, to resound, referring to their howling cries in their sacred rites. [CALVIN.] that rejoiced on it—because it was a source of gain to them. MAURER translates, “Shall leap in trepidation on account of it;” as Baa’s priests did (1 Kings 18. 26). the glory thereof—the magnificence of its ornaments and its worship. 6. It . . . also—The calf, so far from saving its worshippers from deportation, itself shall be carried off; hence “Israel shall be ashamed” of it. Jacob—(Note, ch. 5. 13.) “A present to the king (whom they looked to as) their defender,” or else avenger, whose wrath they wished to appease, viz., Shalmaneser. The minor states applied this title to the Great King, as the avenging Protector. his own counsel—the calves, which Jeroboam set up as a stroke of policy to detach Israel from Judah. Their severance from Judah and Jehovah proved now to be not politic, but fatal to them. 7. (Ver. 3, 15.) foam—denoting short-lived existence, and speedy dissolution. As the foam though seeming to be eminent, raised on the top of the water, yet has no solidity, such is the throne of Samaria. MAURER translates, “a chip” or broken branch that cannot resist the current. 8. Aven—i. e., Beth-aven. the sin—i. e., the occasion of sin (Deuteronomy 9. 21; 1 Kings 12. 30). they shall say to . . . mountains, Cover us—so terrible shall be the calamity, that men shall prefer death to life (Luke 23. 30; Revelation 6. 16; 9. 6). Those very hills on which were their idolatrous altars, one source of their confidence, as their “king” (v. 7) was the other, so far from helping them, shall be called on by them to overwhelm them. 9. Gibeah—(Ch. 9. 9; Judges 19. and 20.) They are singled out as a specimen of the whole nation. there they stood—i. e., the Israelites have, as there and then, so ever since, persisted in their sin. [CALVIN.] Or, better, “they stood their ground,” i. e., did not perish then. [MAURER.] the battle . . . did not overtake them—though God spared you then, He will not do so now; nay, the battle whereby God punished the Gibeonites “children of iniquity,” shall the more heavily visit you for your continued impotence. Though “they stood” then, it shall not be so now. The change from “thou” to “they” marks God’s alienation from them; they are, by the use of the third person, put to a greater distance from God. 10. my desire . . . chastise—expressing God’s strong inclination to vindicate His justice against sin, as being the infinitely holy God (Deuteronomy 23. 63). the people—foreign invaders “shall be gathered against them.” when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows—Image from two oxen ploughing together side by side, in two contiguous furrows: so the Israelites shall join themselves, to unite their powers against all dangers, but it will not save them from my destroying them. [CALVIN.] Their “two furrows” may refer to their two places of setting up the calves, their ground of confidence, Dan and Beth-el. Or, the two divisions of the nation, Israel and Judah, “in their two furrows,” i. e., in their respective two places of habitation; v. 11, which specifies the two, favours this view. HENDERSON prefers the Keri (Hebrew Margin) reading, “for their two iniquities,” and translates, “when they are bound” in captivity. English Version is best, as the image is carried out in v. 11; only it is perhaps better to translate, “the people (the invaders) binding them,” &c., i. e., making them captives; and so v. 11 alludes to the yoke being put on the neck of Ephraim and Judah. 11. taught—i. e., accustomed. loveth to tread out . . . corn—a far easier and more self-indulgent work than ploughing; in treading corn, cattle were not bound together under a yoke, but either trod it singly with their feet, or drew a threshing sledge over it (Isalah 28. 27, 28); they were free to eat some of the corn from time to time, as the law required they should be unmuzzled (Deuteronomy 25. 4), so that they grew fat in this work. An image of

Israel’s freedom, prosperity, and self-indulgence heretofore. But now God will put the Assyrian yoke upon her, instead of freedom, putting her to servile work. I passed over upon—I put the yoke upon. make . . . to ride—as in Job 30. 22; i. e., hurry Ephraim away to a distant region. [CALVIN.] LYRA translates, “I will make (the Assyrian) to ride upon Ephraim.” MAURER, “I will make Ephraim to carry,” viz., a charioteer. his clods—“the clods before him.” 12. Continuation of the image in v. 11 (Proverbs 11. 18). Act righteously and ye shall reap the reward; a reward not of debt, but of grace. in mercy—according to the measure of the Divine “mercy,” which over and above repays the goodness or “mercy” which we show to our fellow-man (Luke 6. 38). break . . . fallow ground—remove your superstitions and vices, and be renewed. seek . . . Lord, till he come—though not answered immediately, persevere unceasingly “till He come.” rain—send down as a copious shower. righteousness—i. e., the reward of righteousness, i. e., salvation, temporal and spiritual (1 Samuel 26. 23; cf. Joel 2. 23). 13. reaped iniquity—i. e., the fruit of iniquity; as “righteousness” (v. 12) is “the fruit of righteousness” (Job 4. 8; Proverbs 22. 8; Galatians 6. 7, 8). Ites—false and spurious worship. trust in thy way—thy perverse way (Isaiah 57. 10; Jeremiah 2. 23), thy worship of false gods. This was their internal safeguard, as their external was “the multitude of their mighty men.” 14. tumult—a tumultuous war. among thy people—lit., peoples: the war shall extend to the whole people of Israel, through all the tribes, and the peoples allied to her. Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel—i. e., Shalmaneser, a compound name, in which the part common to it, with the names of three other Assyrian kings, is omitted; Tiglath-pileser, Esar-haddon, Shar-azer. So Jeeoniah is abbreviated to Comiah. Arbel was situated in Naphtali in Galilee, on the border nearest Assyria; against it Shalmaneser, at his first invasion of Israel (2 Kings 17. 3), vented his chief rage. God threatens Israel’s fortresses with the same fate as Arbel suffered “in the day (on the occasion of the battle)” then well known, though not mentioned elsewhere (cf. 2 Kings 18. 34). This event, close on the reign of Hezekiah, shows the inscription of Hosea (ch. 1. 1) to be correct. 15. So shall Beth-el do unto you—i. e., Your idolatrous calf at Beth-el shall be the cause of a like calamity befalling you. your great wickedness—lit., the wickedness of your wickedness. in a morning—i. e., speedily, as quickly as the dawn is put to flight by the rising sun (ch. 6. 4; 13. 3; Psalm 30. 5). king—Hoshea.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-12. GOD’S FORMER BENEFITS, AND ISRAEL’S INGRATITUDE RESULTING IN PUNISHMENT, YET JEHOVAH PROMISES RESTORATION AT LAST. Ver. 5 shows this prophecy was uttered after the league made with Egypt (2 Kings 17. 4). 1. Israel . . . called my son out of Egypt—BENGEI translates, “From the time that he (Israel) was in Egypt, I called him my son,” which the parallelism proves. So ch. 12. 9, and 13. 4, use “from . . . Egypt,” for “from the time that thou didst sojourn in Egypt.” Exodus 4. 22 also shows that Israel was called by God, “My son,” from the time of his Egyptian sojourn (Isalah 43. 1). God is always said to have led or brought forth, not to have “called,” Israel from Egypt. Matthew 2. 15, therefore, in quoting this prophecy, typically and primarily referring to Israel, antitypically and fully to Messiah, applies it to Jesus’ sojourn in Egypt, not His return from it. Even from His Infancy, partly spent in Egypt, God called Him His son. God included Messiah, and Israel for Messiah’s sake, in one common love, and therefore in one common prophecy. Messiah’s people and Himself are one, as the Head and the body. Isalah 49. 3 calls Him “Israel.” The same general reason, danger of extinction, caused the infant Jesus, and Israel in its national infancy (cf. Genesis 42. ; 43. ; 45. 13; 46. 3, 4; Ezekiel 16. 4-6; Jeremiah 31. 20) to sojourn in Egypt. So He, and His spiritual Israel, are already called “God’s sons” whilst yet in the Egypt of the world. 2. As they called them—“they,” viz., monitors sent by me. “Called,” in v. 1, suggests the idea of the many subsequent calls by the prophets. went from them—turned away in contempt (Jeremiah 2. 27). Baalim—images of Baal, set up in various places. 3. taught . . . to go—lit., to use his feet. Cf. a similar image, Deuteronomy 1. 31; 8. 2, 5, 15; 32. 10, 11; Nehemiah 9. 21; Isaiah 63. 9; Amos 2. 10. God bore them as a parent does an infant, unable to supply itself, so that it has no anxiety about food, raiment, and its going forth. Acts 13. 18, which probably refers to this passage of Hosea; He took them by the arms, to guide them that they might not stray, and to hold them up that they might not stumble. knew not that I healed them—i. e., that my design was to restore them spiritually and temporally (Exodus 15. 26). 4. cords of a man—parallel to "bands of love;" not such cords as oxen are led by, but humane methods, such as men employ when inducing others, as for instance, a father drawing his child, by leading-strings, teaching him to go (v. 1). I was . . . as they that take off the yoke on their jaws . . . I laid meat—As the humane husbandman occasionally loosens the straps under the jaws by which the yoke is bound on the neck of oxen, and lays food before them to eat. An appropriate image of God's deliverance of Israel from the Egyptian yoke, and of His feeding them in the wilderness. 5. He shall not return into . . . Egypt—viz., to seek help against Assyria (cf. ch. 7. 11), as Israel lately had done (2 Kings 17. 4), after having revolted from the Assyrian, to whom they had been tributary from the times of Menahem (2 Kings 15. 19). In a figurative sense, "he shall return to Egypt" (ch. 9. 3), i. e., to Egypt-like bondage; also many Jewish fugitives were literally to return to Egypt, when the Holy Land was to be in Assyrian and Chaldean hands. Assyrian shall be his king—instead of having kings of their own, and Egypt as their auxiliary. because they refused to return—just retribution. They would not return (spiritually) to God, therefore they shall not return (corporally) to Egypt, the object of their desire. 6. abide—or, "fall upon." [CALVIN.] branches—i. e., his villages, which are the branches or dependencies of the cities. [CALVIN.] GROTIVS translates, "his bars" (so Lamentations 2. 9), i. e., the warriors who were the bulwarks of the state. Cf. ch. 4. 13, "rulers," Margin, "shields" (Psalm 47. 9). because of their own counsels—in worshipping idols, and relying on Egypt (cf. ch. 10. 6). 7. bent to backsliding—not only do they backslide, and that too from me, their "chief good," but they are bent upon it. Though they (the prophets) called them (the Israelites) to the Most High (from their idols), "none would exalt (i. e., extol or honour) Him." To exalt God, they must cease to be "bent on backsliding," and must lift themselves upwards. 8. as Admah . . . Zebolm—among the cities, including Sodom and Gomorrah, irretrievably overthrown (Deuteronomy 29. 23). heart . . . turned within me—with the deepest compassion, so as not to execute my threat (Lamentations 1. 20; cf. Genesis 43. 30; 1 Kings 3. 26). So the phrase is used of a new turn given to the feeling (Psalm 105. 25). repentings—God speaks according to human modes of thought (Numbers 23. 19). God's seeming change is in accordance with His secret everlasting purpose of love to His people, to magnify His grace after their desperate rebellion. 9. I will not return to destroy Ephraim—i. e., I will no more, as in past times, destroy Ephraim. The destruction primarily meant is probably that by Tiglath-pileser, who, as the Jewish king Ahaz's ally against Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Syria, deprived Israel of Gilead, Galilee, and Naphtali (2 Kings 15. 29). The ulterior reference is to the long dispersion hereafter, to be ended by God's covenant-mercy restoring his people, not for their merits, but of His grace. God, . . . not man—not dealing as man would, with implacable wrath under awful provocation (Isaiah 55. 7-9; Malachi 3. 6). I do not, like man, change when once I have made a covenant of everlasting love, as with Israel (Numbers 23. 19). We measure God by the human standard, and hence are slow to credit fully his promises; these, however, belong to the faithful remnant, not to the obstinately impenitent. in the midst of thee—as peculiarly thy God (Exodus 19. 5. 6). not enter into the city—as an enemy: as I entered Ad-

mah, Zebolm, and Sodom, utterly destroying them, whereas I will not utterly destroy thee. Somewhat similarly JEROME: "I am not only such as human dwellers in a city, who take cruel vengeance; I save those whom I correct." Thus "not man," and "in the midst of thee," are parallel to "into the city." Though I am in the midst of thee, it is not as man entering a rebellious city to destroy utterly. MAURER needlessly translates, "I will not come in wrath." 10. he shall roar like a lion—by awful judgments on his foes (Isaiah 31. 4; Jeremiah 25. 28-30; Joel 3. 16), calling his dispersed "children" from the various lands of their dispersion. shall tremble—shall flock in eager agitation of haste. from the west—(Zechariah 8. 7.) Lit., the sea. Probably the Mediterranean, including its "isles of the sea," and maritime coast. Thus as v. 11 specifies regions of Africa and Asia, so here Europe. Isaiah 11. 11-16, is parallel, referring to the very same regions. On "children," see ch. 1. 10. 11. tremble—flutter in haste. dove—no longer "a silly dove" (ch. 7. 11), but as "doves flying to their windows" (Isaiah 60. 8). in their houses—(Ezekiel 23. 26.) Lit., upon, for the Orientals live almost as much upon their flat-roofed houses as in them. 12. MAURER joins this verse with ch. 12. But as this verse praises Judah, whereas ch. 12. censures him, it must belong rather to ch. 11., and a new prophecy begins at ch. 12. To avoid this, MAURER translates this verse as a censure, "Judah wanders with God," i. e., though having the true God, he wanders after false gods. ruleth with God—to serve God is to reign. Ephraim wished to rule without God (cf. 1 Corinthians 4. 8); nay, even, in order to rule, cast off God's worship. [RIVETUS.] In Judah was the legitimate succession of kings and priests. with the saints—the holy priests and Levites. [RIVETUS.] With the fathers and prophets who handed down the pure worship of God. Israel's apostasy is the more culpable, as he had before him the good example of Judah, which he set at naught. The parallelism ("with God") favours Margin, "With THE MOST HOLY ONE."

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-14. REPROOF OF EPHRAIM AND JUDAH: THEIR FATHER JACOB OUGHT TO BE A PATTERN TO THEM. This prophecy was delivered about the time of Israel's seeking the aid of the Egyptian king So, in violation of their covenant with Assyria (see v. 1). He exhorts them to follow their father Jacob's persevering prayerfulness, which brought God's favour upon him. As God is unchangeable, He will show the same favour to Jacob's posterity as He did to Jacob, if, like him, they seek God. 1. feedeth on wind—(Proverbs 15. 14; Isaiah 44. 20.) Followeth after vain objects, such as alliances with idolaters and their idols (cf. ch. 8. 7). east wind—the Sinnoom, blowing from the desert east of Palestine, which not only does not benefit, but does injury. Israel follows not only things vain, but things pernicious (cf. Job 15. 2). increaseth lies—accumulates lie upon lie, i. e., impostures wherewith they deceive themselves, forsaking the truth of God. desolation—violent oppressions practised by Israel. [MAURER.] Acts which would prove the cause of Israel's own desolation. [CALVIN.] covenant with . . . Assyrians—(Ch. 5. 13; 7. 11.) oil . . . into Egypt—as a present from Israel to secure Egypt's alliance (Isaiah 30. 6; 57. 9; cf. 2 Kings 17. 4). Palestine was famed for oil (Ezekiel 27. 17). 2. controversy with Judah—(Ch. 4. 1; Micah 6. 2.) Judah, under Ahaz, had fallen into idolatry (2 Kings 16. 3, &c.). Jacob—i. e., the ten tribes. If Judah, the favored portion of the nation, shall not be spared, much less degenerate Israel. 3. He—Jacob, contrasted with his degenerate descendants, called by his name, Jacob (v. 2; cf. Micah 2. 7). He took Esau by the heel in the womb in order to obtain, if possible, the privileges of the first-born (Genesis 25. 22-26), whence he took his name, Jacob, meaning supplanter; and again, by his strength, prevailed in wrestling with God for a blessing (Genesis 32. 24-29); whereas ye disregard my promises, putting your confidence in idols and foreign alliances. He conquered God, ye are the slaves of idols. Only have Jehovah on your side, and ye are stronger than

Edom, or even Assyria. So the spiritual Israel lays hold of the heel of Jesus, "the First-born of many brethren," being born again of the Holy Spirit. Having no right in themselves to the inheritance, they lay hold of the bruised heel, the humanity of Christ crucified, and let not go their hold of Him who is not, as Esau, a curse (Hebrews 12, 16, 17), but, by becoming a curse for us, is a blessing to us. power with God—referring to his name, "Israel," prince of God, acquired on that occasion (cf. Matthew 11, 12). As the promised Canaan had to be gained forcibly by Israel, so heaven by the faithful (Revelation 3, 21; cf. Luke 13, 24). "Strive," lit., "as in the agony of a contest." So the Canaanitess (Matthew 15, 22). his strength—which lay in his conscious weakness, whence, when his thigh was put out of joint by God, he hung upon Him. To seek strength was his object; to grant it, God's. Yet God's mode of procedure was strange. In human form He tries as it were to throw Jacob down. When simple wrestling was not enough, He does what seems to ensure Jacob's fall, dislocating his thigh joint, so that he could no longer stand. Yet it was then that Jacob prevailed. Thus God teaches us the irresistible might of conscious weakness. For when weak in ourselves, we are strong by His strength put in us (Job 23, 6; Isaiah 27, 5; 2 Corinthians 12, 9, 10). 4. the angel—the uncreated Angel of the Covenant, as God the Son appears in the Old Testament (Malachi 3, 1). made supplication—Genesis 32, 26: "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." he found him—the angel found Jacob, when he was fleeing from Esau into Syria: the Lord appearing to him "in Beth-el" (Genesis 28, 11-19; 35, 1). What a sad contrast, that in this same Beth-el now Israel worships the golden calves! there he spake with us—"with us," as being in the loins of our progenitor Jacob (cf. Psalm 66, 6, "They . . . we;" Hebrews 7, 9, 10). What God there spake to Jacob appertains to us. God's promises to him belong to all his posterity who follow in the steps of his prayerful faith. 5. Lord God—JEHOVAH, a name implying His immutable constancy to His promises. From the Hebrew root meaning existence. "He that is, was, and is to be," always the same. (Hebrews 13, 8; Revelation 1, 4, 8; cf. Exodus 3, 14, 15; 6, 3.) As He was unchangeable in His favour to Jacob, so will He be to His believing posterity. of hosts—which Israel foolishly worshipped. Jehovah has all the hosts (Saba) or powers of heaven and earth at command, so that He is as all-powerful, as He is faithful, to fulfil His promises (Psalm 135, 6; Amos 5, 27). memorial—the name expressive of the character in which God was ever to be remembered (Psalm 135, 13). 6. thou—who dost wish to be a true descendant of Jacob. to thy God—who is therefore bound by covenant to hear thy prayers. keep mercy and judgment—(Micah 6, 8.) These two include the second-table commandments, duty towards one's neighbor, the most visible test of the sincerity of one's repentance. wait on thy God—alone, not on thy idols. Including all the duties of the first table (Psalm 37, 3, 5, 7; 40, 1). 7. merchant—a play on the double sense of the Hebrew, "Canaan," i. e., a Canaanite and a "merchant." Ezekiel 16, 3: "Thy birth is . . . of Canaan." They who naturally were descendants of pious Jacob had become virtually Canaanites, who were proverbial as cheating merchants (cf. Isaiah 23, 11, Margin), the greatest reproach to Israel, who despised Canaan. The Phœnicians called themselves Canaanites or merchants (Isaiah 23, 8). oppress—open violence; as the "balances of deceit" imply fraud. 8. And—i. e., Notwithstanding. Yet I am . . . rich—i. e., I regard not what the prophets say: I am content with my state, as I am rich (Revelation 3, 17). Therefore, in just retribution, this is the very language of the enemy in being the instrument of Israel's punishment. Zechariah 11, 5: "They that sell them say . . . I am rich." Better far poverty with honesty, than riches gained by sin. my labours—my gains by labour. they shall find none—i. e., none shall find any. Iniquity . . . that were sin—iniquity that would bring down the penalty of sin. Ephraim argues, My success in my labours proves that I am not a guilty sinner as the prophets assert. Thus sinners pervert God's long-suffering goodness (Matthew 5, 45) into a justification of their impenitence (cf. Ecclesiastes 8, 11-13). 9. And—rather, "And yet." Though Israel deserves to be cast off for ever, yet I am still what I have been from the time of my delivering them out of Egypt, their covenant God; therefore, "I will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles," i. e., to keep the feast of tabernacles again in remembrance of a new deliverance out of bondage. Fulfilled primarily at the return from Babylon (Nehemiah 8, 17). Fully and antitypically to be fulfilled at the final restoration from the present dispersion (Zechariah 14, 16; cf. Leviticus 23, 42, 43). 10. by . . . the prophets—lit., upon, i. e., my spirit resting on them. I deposited with them my instructions which ought to have brought you to the right way. An aggravation of your guilt, that it was not through ignorance you erred, but in defiance of God and His prophets. [CALVIN.] Ahijah the Shilonite, She-malah, Iddo, Azariah, Hanani, Jehu, Elijah, Elisha, Micah, Joel and Amos were "the prophets" before Hosea. visions . . . similitudes—I adopted such modes of communication, adapted to man's capacities, as were calculated to arouse attention: I left no means untried to reform you. Ch. 1, 2, 3, contain examples of "similitudes." 11. Is there iniquity in Gilead?—He asks the question, not as if the answer was doubtful, but to strengthen the affirmation: "Surely they are vanity;" or as MAURER translates, "They are nothing but iniquity." Iniquity, especially idolatry, in Scripture is often termed "vanity." Proverbs 13, 11: "Wealth gotten by vanity," i. e., iniquity. Isaiah 41, 29: "They are all vanity . . . images." "Gilead" refers to Mizpah-gilead, a city representing the region beyond Jordan (ch. 6, 8; Judges 11, 20); as "Gilgal," the region on this side of Jordan (ch. 4, 15). In all quarters alike they are utterly vile. their altars are as heaps in the furrows—i. e., as numerous as such heaps; viz., the heaps of stones cleared out of a stony field. An appropriate image, as at a distance they look like altars (cf. ch. 10, 1, 4; and 3, 11). As the third member in the parallelism answers to the first, Gilgal to Gilead, so the fourth to the second, "altars" to "vanity." The word "heaps" alludes to the name "Gilgal," meaning a heap of stones. The very scene of the general circumcision of the people, and of the solemn passover kept after crossing Jordan, is now the stronghold of Israel's idolatry. 12. Jacob fled . . . served—Though ye pride yourselves on the great name of "Israel," forget not that your progenitor was the same Jacob who was a fugitive, and who served for Rachel fourteen years. He forgot not me who delivered him when fleeing from Esau, and when oppressed by Laban (Genesis 28, 5; 29, 20, 23; Deuteronomy 26, 5). Ye, though delivered from Egypt (v. 13), and loaded with my favours, are yet unwilling to return to me. country of Syria—the champaign region of Syria, i. e., the portion lying between the Tigris and Euphrates, hence called Mesopotamia. Padan-aram means the same, i. e., Low Syria, as opposed to Aramea (meaning the high country) or Syria (Genesis 48, 7). 13. by a prophet—Moses (Numbers 12, 6-8; Deuteronomy 18, 15, 18). preserved—translate, "kept;" there is an allusion to the same Hebrew word in v. 12, "kept sheep;" Israel was kept by God as His flock, even as Jacob kept sheep (Psalm 80, 1; Isaiah 63, 11). 14. provoked him—i. e., God. leave his blood upon him—not take away the guilt and penalty of the innocent blood shed by Ephraim in general, and to Molech in particular. his reproach shall his Lord return unto him—Ephraim's dishonour to God in worshipping idols, God will repay to him. That God is "his Lord" by right of redemption and special revelation to Ephraim only aggravates his guilt, instead of giving him hope of escape. God does not give up His claim to them as His, however they set aside His dominion.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-16. EPHRAIM'S SINFUL INGRATITUDE TO GOD, AND ITS FATAL CONSEQUENCE; GOD'S PROMISE AT LAST. This chapter and 14, probably belong to the troubled times that followed Pekah's murder by Hoshea (cf. ch. 13, 11; 2 Kings 15, 30). The subject is, the idolatry of Ephraim, notwithstanding God's past benefits, destined to be his ruin. 1.

When Ephraim spake trembling—rather, “When Ephraim (the tribe most powerful among the twelve in Israel’s early history) spake (authoritatively) there was trembling;” all reverentially feared him [JEROME] (cf. Job 20. 8, 9, 21), offended in Baal—i. e., in respect to Baal, by worshipping him (1 Kings 16. 31), under Ahab; a more heinous offence than even the calves. Therefore it is at this climax of guilt that Ephraim “died.” Sin has, in the sight of God, within itself the germ of death, though that death may not visibly take effect till long after. Cf. Romans 7. 9, “Sin revived, and I died.” So Adam in the day of his sin was to die, though the sentence was not visibly executed till long after (Genesis 2. 17; 5. 5). Israel is similarly represented as politically dead in Ezekiel 37. 2. according to their own understanding—i. e., their arbitrary devising. Cf. “will-worship,” Colossians 2. 23. Men are not to be “wise above that which is written,” or to follow their own understanding, but God’s command in worship. kiss the calves—an act of adoration to the golden calves (cf. 1 Kings 19. 18; Job 31. 27; Psalm 2. 12). 3. they shall be as the morning cloud . . . dew—(Ch. 6. 4.) As their “goodness” soon vanished like the morning cloud and dew, so they shall perish like them. the floor—the threshing-floor, generally an open area, on a height, exposed to the winds. chimney—generally in the East an orifice in the wall, at once admitting the light, and giving egress to the smoke. 4. (Ch. 12. 9; Isaiah 43. 11.) no saviour [temporal as well as spiritual] besides me—(Isaiah 45. 21.) 5. I did know thee—i. e., did acknowledge thee as mine, and so took care of thee (Psalm 144. 3; Amos 3. 2). As I knew thee as mine, so thou shouldst know no God but me (v. 4). in . . . land of . . . drought—(Deuteronomy 8. 15.) 6. Image from cattle, waxing wanton in abundant pasture (cf. ch. 2. 5, 8; Deuteronomy 32. 13-15). In proportion as I fed them to the full, they were so satiated that “their heart was exalted;” a sad contrast to the time when, by God’s blessing, Ephraim truly “exalted himself in Israel” (v. 1). therefore have they forgotten me—the very reason why men should remember God, viz., prosperity, which comes from Him, is the cause often of their forgetting Him. God had warned them of this danger (Deuteronomy 6. 11, 12). 7. (Ch. 5. 14; Lamentations 3. 10.) leopard—the Hebrew comes from a root meaning spotted (cf. Jeremiah 13. 23). Leopards lurk in thickets, and thence spring on their victims. observe—i. e., lie in wait for them. Several MSS., LXX., Vulgate, Syriac and Arabic read, by a slight change of the Hebrew vowel pointing, “by the way of Assyria,” a region abounding in leopards and lions. English Version is better. 8. “Writers on the natures of beasts say that none is more savage than a she-bear, when bereaved of her whelps.” [JEROME.] caul of . . . heart—the membrane enclosing it, the pericardium. there—“by the way” (v. 7). 9. thou . . . in me—in contrast. has destroyed thyself—i. e., thy destruction is of thyself (Proverbs 6. 32; 8. 36). in me is thine help—ill., in thine help—(cf. Deuteronomy 33. 26). Hadst thou rested thy hope in me, I would have been always ready at hand for thy help. [GROTIUS.] 10. I will be thy king; where—rather, as Margin and LXX., Syriac, Vulgate, “Where now is thy king?” [MAURER.] English Version is, however, favoured both by the Hebrew, by the antithesis between Israel’s self-chosen and perishing kings, and God, Israel’s abiding King (cf. ch. 3. 4, 5). where . . . Give me a king—Where now is the king whom ye substituted in my stead? Neither Saul, whom the whole nation begged for, not contented with me their true king (1 Samuel 8. 5, 7, 19, 20; 10. 19), nor Jeroboam, whom subsequently the ten tribes chose instead of the line of David my anointed, can save thee now. They had expected from their kings what is the prerogative of God alone, viz., the power of saving them. judges—including all civil authorities under the king (cf. Amos 2. 3). 11. I gave . . . king in . . . anger . . . took . . . away in . . . wrath—true both of Saul (1 Samuel 15. 22, 23; 16. 1) and of Jeroboam’s line (2 Kings 15. 30). Pekah was taken away through Hoshea, as himself took away Pekahiah; and as Hoshea was soon to be taken away by the Assyrian king. 12. bound up . . . hid—treasures, meant to be kept, are bound up and hidden, i. e., do not flatter yourselves, because of the delay, that I have forgotten your sin. Nay (ch. 9. 9), Ephraim’s iniquity is kept as it were safely sealed up, until the due time comes for bringing it forth for punishment (Deuteronomy 32. 34; Job 14. 17; 21. 19; cf. Romans 2. 5). Opposed to “blotting out the handwriting against” the sinner (Colossians 2. 14). 13. sorrows of a travelling woman—calamities sudden and agonizing (Jeremiah 30. 6). unwise—in not foreseeing the impending judgment, and averting it by penitence (Proverbs 22. 3). he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children—when Israel might deliver himself from calamity by the pangs of penitence, he brings ruin on himself by so long deferring a new birth unto repentance, like a child whose mother has not strength to bring ‘t forth, and which therefore remains so long in the passage from the womb as to run the risk of death (2 Kings 19. 3; Isaiah 37. 3; 66. 9). 14. Applying primarily to God’s restoration of Israel from Assyria partially, and, in times yet future, fully, from all the lands of their present long-continued dispersion, and political death (cf. ch. 6. 2; Isaiah 25. 8; 26. 19; Ezekiel 37. 12). God’s power and grace are magnified in quickening what to the eye of flesh seems dead and hopeless (Romans 4. 17, 19). As Israel’s history, past and future, has a representative character in relation to the Church, this verse is expressed in language alluding to Messiah’s (who is the ideal Israel) grand victory over the grave and death, the first-fruits of His own resurrection, the full harvest to come at the general resurrection; hence the similarity between this verse and Paul’s language as to the latter (1 Corinthians 15. 55). That similarity becomes more obvious by translating as LXX., which Paul plainly quotes from; and as the same Hebrew word is translated in v. 10, “O death, where are thy plagues (paraphrased by LXX., ‘thy victory’)? O grave, where is thy destruction” (rendered by LXX., ‘thy sting’)? The question is that of one triumphing over a foe, once a cruel tyrant, but now robbed of all power to hurt. repentance shall be hid from mine eyes—i. e., I will not change my purpose of fulfilling my promise by delivering Israel, on the condition of their return to me (cf. ch. 14. 2-8; Numbers 23. 19; Romans 11. 29). 15. fruitful—referring to the meaning of “Ephraim,” from a Hebrew root, “to be fruitful” (Genesis 41. 52). It was long the most numerous and flourishing of the tribes (Genesis 48. 19). wind of the Lord—i. e., sent by the Lord (cf. Isaiah 40. 7), who has His instruments of punishment always ready. The Assyrian, Shalmaneser, &c., is meant (Jeremiah 4. 11; 18. 17; Ezekiel 19. 12). from the wilderness—i. e., the desert part of Syria (1 Kings 19. 15), the route from Assyria into Israel. he—the Assyrian invader. Shalmaneser began the siege of Samaria in 723 B. c. Its close was in 721 B. c., the first year of Sargon, who seems to have usurped the throne of Assyria whilst Shalmaneser was at the siege of Samaria. Hence, whilst 2 Kings 17. 6 states, “the king of Assyria took Samaria,” 2 Kings 18. 10 says, “at the end of three years they took it.” In Sargon’s magnificent palace at Khorsabad, inscriptions mention the number—27,230—of Israelites carried captive by the founder of the palace from Samaria and other places of Israel. [G. V. SMITH.] 16. This verse and v. 15 foretell the calamities about to befall Israel before her restoration (v. 14), owing to her impotence. her God—the greatest aggravation of her rebellion, that it was against her God (v. 4). infants . . . dashed in pieces, &c.—(2 Kings 8. 12; 15. 16; Amos 1. 13.)

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-9. GOD’S PROMISE OF BLESSING, ON THEIR REPENTANCE: THEIR ABANDONMENT OF IDOLATRY FORETOLD: THE CONCLUSION OF THE WHOLE, AND THE JUST SHALL WALK IN GOD’S WAYS, BUT THE TRANSGRESSOR SHALL FALL THEREIN. 1. fallen by thine iniquity—(Ch. 5. 5; 13. 9.) 2. Take with you words—instead of sacrifices, viz., the words of penitence here put in your mouths by God. “Words,” in Hebrew, mean realities, there being the same term for words and things; so God implies, He will not accept empty professions (Psalm 78. 36; Isaiah 29. 13).

He does not ask costly sacrifices, but words of heartfelt penitence. receive us graciously—lit. (for) good calves of our lips—i. e., instead of sacrifices of calves, which we cannot offer to Thee in exile, we present the praises of our lips. Thus the exile, wherein the temple service ceased, prepared the way for the gospel time, when the types of the animal sacrifices of the Old Testament being realized in Christ's perfect sacrifice once for all, "the sacrifice of praise to God continually that is the fruit of our lips" (Hebrews 13. 14) takes their place in the New Testament. 3. Three besetting sins of Israel are here renounced, trust in Assyria, application to Egypt for its cavalry (forbidden, Deuteronomy 17. 16; cf. ch. 7. 11; 11. 5; 12. 1; 2 Kings 17. 4; Psalm 33. 17; Isaiah 30. 2, 16; 31. 1), and idolatry. fatherless—descriptive of the destitute state of Israel, when severed from God, their true Father. We shall henceforth trust in none but thee, the only Father of the fatherless, and Helper of the destitute (Psalm 10. 14; 68. 5); our nation has experienced Thee such in our helpless state in Egypt, and now in a like state again our only hope is Thy goodness. 4. God's gracious reply to their self-condemning prayer. backsliding—apostasy; not merely occasional backslidings. God can heal the most desperate sinfulness. [CALVIN.] freely—with a gratuitous, unmerited, and abundant love (Ezekiel 16, 60-63). So as to the spiritual Israel (John 15. 16; Romans 3. 24; 5. 8; 1 John 4. 10). 5. as the dew—which falls copiously in the East, supplying the place of the more frequent rains in other regions, God will not be "as the early dew that goeth away," but constant (ch. 6. 3, 4; Job 29. 19; Proverbs 19. 12). the lily—no plant is more productive than the lily, one root often producing fifty bulbs [PLINY, H. N. 21. 5]. The common lily is white, consisting of six leaves opening like bells. The royal lily grows to the height of three or four feet; Matthew 6. 29 alludes to the beauty of its flowers. roots as Lebanon—i. e., as the trees of Lebanon (especially the cedars), which cast down their roots as deeply as is their height upwards; so that they are immovable [JEROME], (Isaiah 10. 34). Spiritual growth consists most in the growth of the root which is out of sight. 6. branches—shoots, or suckers. beauty . . . as the olive—which never loses its verdure. One plant is not enough to express the graces of God's elect people. The lily depicts its lovely growth; but as it wants duration and firmness, the deeply-rooted cedars of Lebanon are added; these, however, are fruitless, therefore the fruitful, peace-bearing, fragrant, ever-green olive is added. smell as Lebanon—which exhaled from it the fragrance of odoriferous trees and flowers. So Israel's name shall be in good savour with all (Genesis 27. 27; Song of Solomon 4. 11). 7. They that used to dwell under Israel's shadow (but who shall have been forced to leave it), shall return, i. e., be restored (Ezekiel 35. 9). Others take "His shadow" to mean Jehovah's (cf. Psalm 17. 8; 91. 1; Isaiah 4. 6), which v. 1, 2, "return unto the Lord," &c., favours. But the "his" in v. 6 refers to Israel, and therefore must refer to the same here. revive as . . . corn—as the corn long buried in the earth springs up, with an abundant produce, so shall they revive from their calamities, with a great increase of offspring (cf. John 12. 24). scent, thereof—i. e., Israel's fame. Cf. v. 6, "His smell as Lebanon;" Song of Solomon 1. 3: "Thy name is as ointment poured forth." LXX, favour Margin, "memorial." as the wine of Lebanon—which was most celebrated for its aroma, flavour, and medicinal restorative properties. 8. Ephraim shall say—being brought to penitence by God's goodness, and confessing and abhorring his past madness. I have heard . . . and observed him—I Jehovah have answered and regarded him with favour; and the opposite of God's "hiding his face from" one (Deuteronomy 31. 17). It is the experience of God's favour, in contrast to God's wrath heretofore, that leads Ephraim to abhor his past idolatry. Jehovah heard and answered: whereas the idols, as Ephraim now sees, could not hear, much less answer. I am . . . a green fir—or cypress; ever green, winter and summer alike; the leaves not falling off in winter. From me is thy fruit found—"From me," as the root. Thou needest go no farther than me for the supply of all thy wants; not merely the protection implied by the shadow of the cypress, but that which the cypress has not, viz., fruit, all spiritual and temporal blessings. It may be also implied, that whatever spiritual graces Ephraim seeks for or may have, are not of themselves, but of God (Psalm 1. 3; John 15. 4, 5, 8; James 1. 17). God's promises to us are more our security for mortifying sin than our promises to God (Isaiah 27. 9). 9. EPILOGUE, summing up the whole previous teaching. Here alone Hosea uses the term "righteous," so rare were such characters in his day. There is enough of saving truth clear in God's word to guide those humbly seeking salvation, and enough of difficulties to confound those who curiously seek them out, rather than practically seek salvation. fall—stumble and are offended at difficulties opposed to their prejudices and lusts, or above their self-wise understanding (cf. Proverbs 10. 29; Micah 2. 7; Matthew 11. 19; Luke 2. 34; John 7. 17; 1 Peter 2. 7, 8). To him who sincerely seeks the agenda, God will make plain the credenda. Christ is the foundation-stone to some: a stone of stumbling and rock of offence to others. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. But their fall is the most fatal who fall in the ways of God, split on the Rock of ages, and suck poison out of the Balm of Gilead.

INTRODUCTION.

JOEL (meaning "one to whom Jehovah is God," i. e., worshipper of Jehovah) seems to have belonged to Judah, as no reference occurs to Israel; whereas he speaks of Jerusalem, the temple, the priests, and the ceremonies, as if he were intimately familiar with them (cf. ch. 1. 14; 2. 1, 15, 32; 3. 1, 2, 6, 16, 17, 20, 21). His predictions were probably delivered in the early days of Joash, B. C. 870-865. For no reference is made in them to the Babylonian, Assyrian, or even the Syrian invasion; and the only enemies mentioned are the Philistines, Phœnicians, Edomites, and Egyptians (ch. 3. 4, 19). Had he lived after Joash, he would doubtless have mentioned the Syrians among the enemies whom he enumerates, since they took Jerusalem, and carried off immense spoil to Damascus (2 Chronicles 24. 23, 24). No idolatry is mentioned; and the temple services, the priesthood, and other institutions of the theocracy, are represented as flourishing. This all answers to the state of things under the high priesthood of Jehoiada, through whom Joash had been placed on the throne, and who lived in the early years of Joash (2 Kings 11. 17, 18; 12. 2-16; 2 Chronicles 24. 4-14). He was son of Pethuel.

The first chapter describes the desolation caused by an inroad of locusts—one of the Instruments of Divine judgment mentioned by Moses (Deuteronomy 23. 38, 39) and by Solomon (1 Kings 8. 37). The second chapter (v. 1-11), the appearance of them, under images of a hostile army suggesting that the locusts were symbols and forerunners of a more terrible scourge, viz., foreign enemies who would consume all before them. (The absence of mention of personal injury to the inhabitants is not a just objection to the figurative interpretation; for the figure is consistent throughout in attributing to the locusts only injury to vegetation, thereby injuring indirectly man and beast.) Ch. 2, 12-17, exhortation to repentance, the result of which will be, God will deliver His people, the former and latter rains shall return to fertilize their desolated lands, and shall be the pledge of the spiritual outpouring of grace beginning with Judah, and thence extending to "all flesh." Ch. 2, 18-32; ch. 3., God's judgments on Judah's enemies, whereas Judah shall be established for ever.

Joel's style is pre-eminently pure. It is characterized by smoothness and fluency in the rhythms, roundness in the sentences, and regularity in the parallelisms. With the strength of Micah it combines the tenderness of Jeremiah, the vividness of Nahum, and the sublimity of Isalah. As a specimen of his style take ch. 2., wherein the terrible aspect of the locusts, their rapidity, irresistible progress, noisy din, and instinct-taught power of marshalling their forces for their career of devastation, are painted with graphic reality.

CHAPTER I.

Ver 1-20. THE DESOLATE ASPECT OF THE COUNTRY THROUGH THE PLAGUE OF LOCUSTS; THE PEOPLE ADMONISHED TO OFFER SOLEMN PRAYERS IN THE TEMPLE; FOR THIS CALAMITY IS THE EARNEST OF A STILL HEAVIER ONE. 1. Joel—meaning, Jehovah is God, son of Pethuel—to distinguish Joel the prophet from others of the name. Persons of eminence also were noted by adding the father's name. 2, 3. A spirited introduction calling attention. old men—the best judges in question concerning the past (Deuteronomy 32, 7; Job 32, 7). Hath this been, &c.—i. e., Hath any so grievous a calamity as this ever been before? No such plague of locusts had been since the ones in Egypt. Exodus 10, 14 is not at variance with this verse, which refers to Judea, in which Joel says there had been no such devastation before. 3. tell ye your children—in order that they may be admonished by the severity of the punishment to fear God (Psalm 78, 6-8; cf. Exodus 13, 8; Joshua 4, 7). 4. This verse states the subject on which he afterwards expands. Four species or stages of locusts, rather than four different insects, are meant (cf. Leviticus 11, 22). Lit., (1.) the gnawing locust; (2.) the swarming locust; (3.) the licking locust; (4.) the consuming locust; forming a climax to the most destructive kind. The last is often three inches long, and the two antennæ, each an inch long. The two hinder of its six feet are larger than the rest, adapting it for leaping. The first "kind" is that of the locust, having just emerged from the egg in spring, and without wings. The second is when at the end of spring, still in their first skin, they put forth little ones without legs or wings. The third, when after their third casting of the old skin, they get small wings, which enable them to leap the better, but not to fly; being not able to go away till their wings are matured, they devour all before them, grass, shrubs, and bark of trees: translated "rough caterpillars" (Jeremiah 51, 27). The fourth kind, the matured winged locust (see Note, Nahum 3, 16). In ch. 2, 25 they are enumerated in the reverse order, where the restoration of the devastations caused by them is promised. The Hebrews make the first species refer to Assyria and Babylon; the second species, to Medo-Persia; the third, to Greco-Macedonia and Antiochus Epiphanes; the fourth, to the Romans. Though the primary reference be to literal locusts, the Holy Spirit doubtless had in view the successive empires which assailed Judea, each worse than its predecessor, Rome being the climax. 5. Awake—out of your ordinary state of drunken stupor, to realize the cutting off from you of your favourite drink. Even the drunkards (from a Hebrew root, any strong drink) shall be forced to "howl," though usually laughing in the midst of the greatest national calamities, so palpably and universally shall the calamity affect all. wine . . . new wine—new or fresh wine, in Hebrew, is the unfermented, and therefore unintoxicating, sweet juice extracted by pressure from grapes or other fruit, as pomegranates (Song of Solomon 8, 2). Wine is the produce of the grape alone, and is intoxicating (see Note, v. 10). 6. nation—applied to the locusts, rather than "people" (Proverbs 30, 25, 26), to mark not only their numbers, but also their savage hostility; and also to prepare the mind of the hearer for the transition to the figurative locusts in ch. 2, viz., the "nation" or Gentile foe coming against Judea (cf. ch. 2, 2). my land—i. e., Jehovah's; which never

would have been so devastated were I not pleased to inflict punishment (ch. 2, 18; Isalah 14, 25; Jeremiah 16, 18; Ezekiel 36, 5; 38, 16). strong—as irresistibly sweeping away before its compact body the fruits of man's industry. without number—so Judges 6, 5; 7, 12, "like grasshoppers (or locusts) for multitude" (Jeremiah 46, 23; Nahum 3, 15). teeth . . . lion—i. e., the locusts are as destructive as a lion; there is no vegetation that can resist their bite (cf. Revelation 9, 8). PLINY says "they gnaw even the doors of houses." 7. barked—BOCHART, with LXX, and Syriac, translates, from an Arabic root, "hath broken," viz., the topmost shoots, which locusts most feed on. CALVIN supports English Version. my vine . . . my fig tree—being in "my land," i. e., Jehovah's (v. 6). As to the vine-abounding nature of ancient Palestine see Numbers 13, 23, 24. cast it away—down to the ground. branches . . . white—both from the bark being stripped off (Genesis 30, 37), and from the branches drying up through the trunk, both bark and wood being eaten up below by the locusts. 8. Lament—O "my land" (v. 6; Isalah 24, 4). virgin . . . for the husband—A virgin betrothed was regarded as married (Deuteronomy 22, 23; Matthew 1, 19). The Hebrew for "husband" is lord or possessor, the husband being considered the master of the wife in the East. of her youth—when the affections are strongest, and when sorrow at bereavement is consequently keenest. Suggesting the thought of what Zion's grief ought to be for her separation from Jehovah, the betrothed husband of her early days (Jeremiah 2, 2; Ezekiel 16, 8; Hosea 2, 7; cf. Proverbs 2, 17; Jeremiah 3, 4). 9. The greatest sorrow to the mind of a religious Jew, and what ought to impress the whole nation with a sense of God's displeasure, is the cessation of the usual temple worship. meat offering—Hebrew, mincha, "meat" not in the English sense "flesh," but the unbloody offering made of flour, oil, and frankincense. As it and the drink offering or libation poured out accompanied every sacrificial flesh offering, the latter is included, though not specified, as being also "cut off," owing to there being no food left for man or beast. priests . . . mourn—not for their own loss of sacrificial perquisites (Numbers 18, 8-15), but because they can no longer offer the appointed offerings to Jehovah, to whom they minister. 10. field . . . land—differing in that "field" means the open unenclosed country; "land," the rich red soil (from a root to be red) fit for cultivation. Thus, "a man of the field," in Hebrew, is a hunter; a man of the ground or land, an agriculturist (Genesis 25, 27). Field and land are here personified. new wine—from a Hebrew root implying that it takes possession of the brain, so that a man is not master of himself. So the Arabic term is from a root to hold captive. It is already fermented, and so intoxicating, unlike the sweet fresh wine, in v. 5, called also "new wine," though a different Hebrew word. It and "the oil" stand for the vine and the olive tree, from which the "wine" and "oil" are obtained (v. 12). dried up—not "ashamed," as Margin, as is proved by the parallelism to "languisheth," i. e., droopeth. 11. Be . . . ashamed—i. e., Ye shall have the shame of disappointment on account of the failure of "the wheat" and "barley" "harvest." howl . . . vine-dressers—the semicolon should follow, as it is the "husbandmen" who are to be "ashamed" "for the wheat," &c. The cause of the "vine-dressers" being called to "howl" does not come till v. 12, "The vine is dried up." 12. pomegranate—a tree straight in the stem, growing twenty feet high; the fruit is of the size of an orange, with blood-red coloured pulp. palm tree—the dates of Palestine were famous. The palm is the symbol of Judea on coins under the Roman emperor Vespasian. It often grows a hundred feet high. apple tree—the Hebrew is generic, including the orange, lemon, and pear tree joy is withered away—such as is felt in the harvest and the vintage (Psalm 4. 7; Isaiah 9. 3). 13. Gird yourselves—viz., with sackcloth; as in Isaiah 32. 11, the ellipsis is supplied (cf. Jeremiah 4. 8). lament, ye priests—as it is your duty to set the example to others; also as the guilt was greater, and a greater scandal was occasioned, by your sin to the cause of God. come—LXX., "enter" the house of God (cf. v. 14). He all night in sackcloth—so Ahab (1 Kings 21. 27). ministers of my God—(1 Corinthians 9. 13.) Joel claims authority for his doctrine; it is in God's name and by His mission I speak to you. 14. Sanctify . . . a fast—appoint a solemn fast. solemn assembly—lit., a day of restraint or cessation from work, so that all might give themselves to supplication (ch. 2. 15, 16; 1 Samuel 7. 5, 6; 2 Chronicles 20. 3-13). elders—the opposition to "children" (ch. 2. 16) requires age to be intended, though probably elders in office are included. Being the people's leaders in guilt, they ought to be their leaders also in repentance. 15. day of the Lord—(Ch. 2. 1, 11); i. e., the day of His anger (Isaiah 13. 9; Obadiah 15; Zephaniah 1. 7, 15). It will be a foretaste of the coming day of the Lord, as Judge of all men, whence it receives the same name. Here the transition begins from the plague of locusts to the worse calamities (ch. 2.) from invading armies about to come on Judea, of which the locusts were the prelude. 16. Cf. v. 9, and latter part of v. 12. joy—which prevailed at the annual feasts, as also in the ordinary sacrificial offerings, which the offerers ate of before the Lord with gladness and thanksgivings (Deuteronomy 12. 6, 7, 12; 16. 11, 14, 15). 17. is rotten—"is dried up," "vanishes away," from an Arabic root. [MAURER.] "Seed," lit., grains. The drought causes the seeds to lose all their vitality and moisture. graners—granaries; generally underground, and divided into separate receptacles for the different kinds of grain. 18. cattle . . . perplexed—implying the restless gestures of the dumb beasts in their inability to find food. There is a tacit contrast between the sense of the brute creation and the insensibility of the people. yea, the . . . sheep—even the sheep, which are content with less rich pasturage, cannot find food. are made desolate—lit., suffer punishment. The innocent brute shares the punishment of guilty man (Exodus 12. 29; Jonah 3. 7; 4. 11). 19. to thee will I cry—Joel here interposes, As this people is insensible to shame or fear and will not hear, I will leave them and address myself directly to thee (cf. Isaiah 15. 5; Jeremiah 23. 9). fire—i. e., the parching heat. pastures—"grassy places;" from a Hebrew root "to be pleasant." Such places would be selected for "habitations." But the English Version rendering is better than Margin. 20. beasts . . . cry . . . unto thee—i. e., look up to heaven with heads lifted up, as if their only expectation was from God (Job 38. 41; Psalm 104. 21; 145. 15; 147. 9; cf. Psalm 42. 1). They tacitly prove the deadness of the Jews for not even now invoking God.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-32. THE COMING JUDGMENT A MOTIVE TO REPENTANCE. PROMISE OF BLESSINGS IN THE LAST DAYS. A more terrific judgment than that of the locusts foretold, under imagery drawn from that of the calamity then engrossing the afflicted nation. He therefore exhorts to repentance, assuring the Jews of Jehovah's pity if they would repent. Promise of the Holy Spirit in the last days under Messiah, and the deliverance of all believers in Him. 1. Blow . . . trumpet—to sound an alarm of coming war (Numbers 10.; Hosea 5. 8; Amos 3. 6); the office of the priests. Ch. 1. 15 is an anticipation of the fuller prophecy in this chapter. 2. darkness . . . gloominess . . . clouds . . . thick darkness—accumulation of synonyms, to intensify the picture of calamity (Isaiah 8. 22).

Appropriate here, as the swarms of locusts intercepting the sunlight suggested darkness as a fit image of the coming visitation. as the morning spread upon the mountains: a great people—substitute a comma for a colon after mountains; As the morning light spreads itself over the mountains, so a people numerous [MAURER] and strong shall spread themselves. The suddenness of the rising of the morning light which glids the mountain tops first is less probably thought by others to be the point of comparison to the sudden inroad of the foe. MAURER refers it to the yellow splendour which arises from the reflection of the sunlight on the wings of the immense hosts of locusts as they approach. This is likely; understanding, however, that the locusts are only the invaders of human foes. The immense Assyrian host of invaders under Sennacherib (cf. Isaiah 37. 36) destroyed by God (v. 18, 20, 21), may be the primary objects of the prophecy; but ultimately the last Antichristian confederacy destroyed by special Divine interposition, is meant (Note, ch. 3. 2). there hath not been ever the like—(Cf. ch. 1. 2 and Exodus 10. 14.) 3. before . . . behind—i. e., on every side (1 Chronicles 19. 10). fire . . . flame—destruction . . . desolation (Isaiah 10. 17). as . . . Eden . . . wilderness—conversely (Isaiah 51. 3; Ezekiel 36. 35). 4. appearance . . . of horses—(Revelation 9. 7.) Not literal, but figurative locusts. The fifth trumpet, or first woe, in the parallel passage (Revelation 9.), cannot be literal; for in Revelation 19. 11 it is said, "they had a king over them, the angel of the bottomless pit—in the Hebrew, Abaddon (Destroyer), but in the Greek, Apollyon"—and (Revelation 9. 7) "on their heads were as it were crowns like gold, and their faces were as the faces of men." Cf. v. 11, "the day of the Lord . . . great and very terrible;" implying their ultimate reference to be connected with Messiah's second coming in judgment. The locust's head is so like that of a horse, that the Italians call it cavalette. Cf. Job 39. 20, "the horse . . . as the grasshopper," or locust. run—the locust bounds, not unlike the horse's gallop, raising and letting down together the two front feet. 5. Like the noise of chariots—referring to the loud sound caused by their wings in motion, or else the movement of their hind legs. on the tops of mountains—MAURER connects this with "they," i. e., the locusts, which first occupy the higher places, and thence descend to the lower places. It may refer (as in English Version) to "chariots," which make most noise in crossing over rugged heights. 6. much pained—viz., with terror. The Arab proverb is, "More terrible than the locusts." faces shall gather blackness—(Isaiah 13. 8; Jeremiah 30. 6; Nahum 2. 10.) MAURER translates, "withdraw their brightness," i. e., wax pale, lose colour (cf. v. 10 and ch. 3. 15). 7-9. Depecting the regular military order of their advance, "One locust not turning a nail's breadth out of his own place in the march." [JEROME.] Cf. Proverbs 30. 27, "The locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands." 8. Neither shall one thrust another—i. e., press upon so as to thrust his next neighbour out of his place, as usually occurs in a large multitude, when they fall upon the sword—i. e., among missiles, not be wounded—because they are protected by defensive armour. [GROTUS.] MAURER translates, "Their (the locusts') ranks are not broken when they rush among missiles" (cf. Daniel 11. 22). 9. run to and fro in the city—greedily seeking what they can devour. the wall—surrounding each house in Eastern buildings. enter in at the windows—though barred. like a thief—(John 10. 1; cf. Jeremiah 9. 21.) 10. earth . . . quake before them—i. e., the inhabitants of the earth quake with fear of them. heavens . . . tremble—i. e., the powers of heaven (Matthew 24. 29); its illumining powers are disturbed by the locusts which intercept the sunlight with their dense flying swarms. These, however, are but the images of revolutions of states caused by such foes as were to invade Judea. 11. Lord . . . his army—so among Mohammedans, "Lord of the locusts" is a title of God, his voice—His word of command to the locusts, and to the antitypical human foes of Judea, as "His army." strong that executeth his word—(Revelation 18. 8.) 13. With such judgments impending over the Jews, Jehovah Himself urges them to repentance. also now—even now, which none could have hoped or believed possible, God still invites you to the hope of salvation. fasting . . . weeping . . . mourning—their sin being most heinous needs extraordinary humiliation. The outward marks of repentance are to signify the depth of their sorrow for sin. 13. Let there be the inward sorrow of heart, and not the mere outward manifestation of it by "rending the garment" (Joshua 7. 6). the evil—the calamity which He had threatened against the impenitent. 14. leave . . . a meat offering and a drink offering—i. e., give plentiful harvests, out of the first-fruits of which we may offer the meat and drink offering, now "cut off" through the famine (ch. 1. 9, 13, 16). "Leave behind Him," as God in visiting His people now has left behind Him a curse, so He will, on returning to visit them, leave behind him a blessing. 15. Blow the trumpet—to convene the people (Numbers 10. 3). Cf. ch. 1. 14. The nation was guilty, and therefore there must be a national humiliation. Cf. Hezekiah's proceedings before Sennacherib's invasion, 2 Chronicles 30. 16. sanctify the congregation—viz., by expiatory rites and purification with water [CALVIN] (Exodus 19. 10, 22). MAURER translates, "appoint a solemn assembly," which would be a tautological repetition of v. 15. elders . . . children—no age was to be excepted (2 Chronicles 20. 13). bridgroom—ordinarily exempted from public duties (Deuteronomy 24. 5; cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 5, 29). closet—or, nuptial bed, from a Hebrew root to cover, referring to the canopy over it. 17. between the porch and . . . altar—the porch of Solomon's temple on the east (1 Kings 6. 3). The altar of burnt offerings in the court of the priests, before the porch (2 Chronicles 8. 12; cf. Ezekiel 8. 16; Matthew 23. 35). The suppliants thus were to stand with their backs to the altar on which they had nothing to offer, their faces towards the place of the Shekinah presence. heathen should rule over them—this shows that not locusts, but human foes, are intended. The Margin translation, "use a by-word against them," is not supported by the Hebrew. wherefore should they say . . . Where is their God?—i. e., do not for thine own honour's sake, let the heathen sneer at the God of Israel, as unable to save His people (Psalm 79. 10; 115. 2). 18. Then—When God sees His people penitent. be jealous for his land—as a husband jealous of any dishonour done to the wife whom he loves, as if done to himself. The Hebrew comes from an Arabic root, to be flushed in face through indignation. 19. corn . . . wine . . . oil—rather, as Hebrew, "the corn . . . the wine . . . the oil," viz., which the locusts have destroyed. [HENDERSON.] MAURER not so well explains, "the corn, &c., necessary for your sustenance." "The Lord will answer," viz., the prayers of His people, priests and prophets. Cf. in the case of Sennacherib, 2 Kings 19. 20, 21. 20. the northern army—The Hebrew expresses that the north in relation to Palestine is not merely the quarter whence the invader comes, but is his native land, "the Northlander;" viz., the Assyrian or Babylonian (cf. Jeremiah 1. 14, 15; Zephaniah 2. 13). The locust's native country is not the north, but the south, the deserts of Arabia, Egypt and Libya. Assyria and Babylon are the type and forerunner of all Israel's foes, Rome, and the final Antichrist, from whom God will at last deliver His people, as He did from Sennacherib (2 Kings 19. 35). face . . . hinder part—more applicable to a human army's van and rear, than to locusts. The northern invaders are to be dispersed in every other direction but that from which they had come: "A land barren and desolate," i. e., Arabia Deserta: "The eastern (or front) sea," i. e., the Dead Sea: "The utmost (or hinder) sea," i. e., the Mediterranean. In front and behind mean east and west, as, in marking the quarters of the world, they faced the east, which was therefore "in front;" the west was behind them; the south was on their right, and the north on their left. stink—metaphor from locusts, which perish when blown by a storm into the sea or the desert, and emit from their putrefying bodies such a stench as often breeds a pestilence. because he hath done great things—i. e., because the invader hath haughtily magnified himself in his doings. Cf. as to Sennacherib, 2 Kings 19. 11-13, 22, 23. This is quite inapplicable to the locusts, who merely seek food, not self-glorification, in invading a country. 21-23. In an ascending gradation, the land destroyed by the enemy, the beasts of the field, and the children of Zion, the land's inhabitants, are addressed, the former two by personification. Lord will do great things—in contrast to the "great things" done by the haughty foe (v. 20) to the hurt of Judah stand the "great things" to be done by Jehovah for her benefit (cf. Psalm 126. 2, 3). 22. (Zechariah 8. 12.) As before (ch. 1. 13, 20) he represented the beasts as groaning and crying for want of food in the "pastures," so now he reassures them by the promise of springing pastures. 23. rejoice in the Lord—not merely in the springing pastures, as the brute "beasts" which cannot raise their thoughts higher (Isaiah 61. 10; Habakkuk 3. 18). former rain . . . the rain . . . the former . . . the latter rain—the autumnal, or "former rain," from the middle of October to the middle of December, is put first, as Joel prophesies in summer when the locusts' invasion took place, and therefore looks to the time of early sowing in autumn, when the autumnal rain was indispensably required. Next, "the rain," generically, lit., the showering or heavy rain. Next, the two species of the latter, "the former and the latter rain" (in March and April). The repetition of the "former rain" implies that He will give it not merely for the exigence of that particular season when Joel spake, but also for the future in the regular course of nature, the autumn and the spring rain; the former being put first, in the order of nature, as being required for the sowing in autumn, as the latter is required in spring for maturing the young crop. The Margin, "a teacher of righteousness," is wrong. For the same Hebrew word is translated "former rain" in the next sentence, and cannot therefore be differently translated here. Besides Joel begins with the inferior and temporal blessings, and not till v. 28 proceeds to the higher and spiritual ones, of which the former are the pledge. moderately—rather, "in due measure," as much as the land requires; lit., "according to right;" neither too much nor too little, either of which extremes would hurt the crop (cf. Deuteronomy 11. 14; Proverbs 16. 15; Jeremiah 5. 24; Note, Hosea 6. 3). The phrase, "in due measure," in this clause is parallel to "in the first month," in the last clause (i. e., "in the month when first it is needed," each rain in its proper season). Heretofore the just or right order of nature has been interrupted through your sin; now God will restore it. See my Introduction to Joel. 24. The effect of the seasonable rains shall be abundance of all articles of food. 25. locust . . . canker-worm . . . caterpillar . . . palmer-worm—the reverse order from ch. 1. 4, where (see Note) God will restore not only what has been lost by the full-grown consuming locust, but also what has been lost by the less destructive licking locust, and swarming locust, and gnawing locust. 26. never be ashamed—shall no longer endure the "reproach of the heathen (v. 17) [MAURER]; or rather, "shall not bear the shame of disappointed hopes," as the husbandmen had heretofore (ch. 1. 11). So spiritually, waiting on God, His people shall not have the shame of disappointment in their expectations from Him (Romans 9. 33). 27. know that I am in the midst of Israel—as in the Old Testament dispensation God was present by the Shekinah, so in the New Testament first, for a brief time by the Word made flesh dwelling among us (John 1. 14), and to the close of this dispensation by the Holy Spirit in the Church (Matthew 28. 20), and probably in a more sensible manner with Israel when restored (Ezekiel 37. 26-28). never be ashamed—not an unmeaning repetition from v. 26; the twice-asserted truth enforces its unflinching certainty. As the "shame" in v. 26 refers to temporal blessings, so in this verse it refers to the spiritual blessings flowing from the presence of God with His people (cf. Jeremiah 3. 16, 17; Revelation 21. 3). 28. afterward—"in the last days" (Isaiah 2. 2) under Messiah after the invasion and deliverance of Israel from the northern army. Having heretofore stated the outward blessings, he now raises their minds to the expectation of extraordinary spiritual blessings, which constitute the true restoration of God's people (Isaiah 44. 3). Fulfilled in earnest (Acts 2. 17) on Pentecost; among the Jews and the subsequent election of a people among the Gentiles; hereafter more fully at the restoration of Israel (Isaiah 54. 13; Jeremiah 31. 9, 34; Ezekiel 39. 29; Zechariah 12. 10) and the consequent conversion of the whole world (Isaiah 2. 2; 11. 9; 66. 18-23; Micah 5. 7; Romans 11. 12, 15). As the Jews have been the seedmen of the elect Church gathered out of Jews and Gentiles, the first Gospel preachers being Jews from Jerusalem, so they shall be the harvest-men of the coming world-wide Church, to be set up at Messiah's appearing. That the promise is not restricted to the first Pentecost appears from Peter's own words: "The promise is (not only) unto you and to your children, (but also) to all that are afar off (both in space and in time), even as many as the Lord our God shall call" (Acts 2. 39). So here "upon all flesh," I will pour out—under the new covenant; not merely, let fall drops, as under the Old Testament (John 7. 39). my Spirit—the Spirit "proceeding from the Father and the Son," and at the same time One with the Father and the Son (cf. Isaiah 11. 2). sons . . . daughters . . . old . . . young—not merely on a privileged few (Numbers 11. 29) as the prophets of the Old Testament, but men of all ages and ranks. See Acts 21. 9, and 1 Corinthians 11. 5, as to "daughters," i. e., women, prophesying. dreams . . . visions—(Acts 9. 10; 16. 9). The "dreams" are attributed to the "old men," as more in accordance with their years; "visions" to the "young men," as adapted to their more lively minds. The three modes whereby God revealed His will under the Old Testament (Numbers 12. 6), "prophecy, dreams, and visions," are here made the symbol of the full manifestation of Himself to all His people, not only in miraculous gifts to some, but by His indwelling Spirit to all in the New Testament (John 14. 21, 23; 15. 15). In Acts 16. 9, and 18. 9, the term used is "vision," though in the night, not a dream. No other dream is mentioned in the New Testament save those given to Joseph in the very beginning of the New Testament, before the full gospel had come; and to the wife of Pilate, a Gentile (Matthew 1. 20; 2. 13; 27. 19). "Prophecy" in the New Testament is applied to all speaking under the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, and not merely to foretelling events. All true Christians are "priests" and "ministers" of our God (Isaiah 61. 6), and have the Spirit (Ezekiel 36. 26, 27). Besides this, probably, a special gift of prophecy and miracle-working is to be given at or before Messiah's coming again. 29. And also—And even. The very slaves by becoming the Lord's servants are His freemen (1 Corinthians 7. 22; Galatians 3. 28; Colossians 3. 11; Philemon 16). Therefore, in Acts 2. 18 it is quoted, "my servants" and "my handmaidens," as it is only by becoming the Lord's servants they are spiritually free, and partake of the same spirit as the other members of the Church. 30, 31. As Messiah's manifestation is full of joy to believers, so it has an aspect of wrath to unbelievers, which is represented here. Thus when the Jews received Him not in His coming of grace, He came in judgment on Jerusalem. Physical prodigies, massacres, and conflagrations preceded its destruction (JOSEPHUS, J. B.). To these the language here may allude; but the figures chiefly symbolize political revolutions and changes in the ruling powers of the world, prognosticated by previous disasters (Amos 8. 9; Matthew 24. 29; Luke 21. 25-27), and convulsions such as preceded the overthrow of the Jewish polity. Such shall probably occur in a more appalling degree before the final destruction of the ungodly world ("the great and terrible day of Jehovah," cf. Malachi 4. 5), of which Jerusalem's overthrow is the type and earnest. 32. call on . . . name of . . . Lord—Hebrew, JENOVAH. Applied to Jesus in Romans 10. 13 (cf. Acts 9. 14; 1 Corinthians 1. 2). Therefore, Jesus is JENOVAH; and the phrase means, "Call on Messiah in His Divine attributes," shall be delivered—as the Christians were, just before Jerusalem's destruction, by retiring to Pella, warned by the Saviour (Matthew 24. 16); a type of the spiritual deliverance of all believers, and of the last deliverance of the elect "remnant" of Israel from the final assault of Antichrist. "In Zion and Jerusalem" the Saviour first appeared; and there again shall He appear as the Deliverer (Zechariah 14. 1-5), as the Lord hath said—Joel herein refers, not to the other prophets, but to his own words preceding. call—metaphor from an invitation to a feast, which is an act of gratuitous kindness (Luke 14. 16). So the remnant called and saved is according to the election of grace, not for man's merits, power, or efforts (Romans 11. 5).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-21. GOD'S VENGEANCE ON ISRAEL'S FOES IN THE VALLEY OF JEHOSEPHAT. HIS BLESSING ON THE CHURCH. 1. bring again the captivity—i. e., reverse it. The Jews restrict this to the return from Babylon. Christians refer it to the coming of Christ. But the prophet comprises the whole redemption, beginning from the return out of Babylon, then continued from the first advent of Christ down to the last day (His second advent), when God will restore His Church to perfect felicity. [CALVIN.] 2. Parallel to Zechariah 14. 2, 3, 4, where the "Mount of Olives" answers to the "Valley of Jehoshaphat" here. The latter is called "the valley of blessing" (Berachah) (2 Chronicles 20. 26). It lies between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, and has the Kedron flowing through it. As Jehoshaphat overthrew the confederate foes of Judah, viz., Ammon, Moab, &c. (Psalm 83. 6-8), in this valley, so God was to overthrow the Tyrians, Zidonians, Philistines, Edom, and Egypt, with a similar utter overthrow (v. 4, 19). This has been long ago fulfilled; but the ultimate event shadowed forth herein is still future, when God shall specially interpose to destroy Jerusalem's last foes, of whom Tyre, Zidon, Edom, Egypt, and Philistia are the types. As "Jehoshaphat" means "the judgment of Jehovah," the valley of Jehoshaphat may be used as a general term for the theatre of God's final judgments on Israel's foes, with an allusion to the judgment inflicted on them by Jehoshaphat. The definite mention of the Mount of Olives in Zechariah 14, and the fact that this was the scene of the ascension, makes it likely the same shall be the scene of Christ's coming again; cf. "this same Jesus . . . shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts 1. 11). all nations—viz., which have maltreated Judah. plead with them—(Isaiah 66. 16; Ezekiel 33. 22). my heritage Israel—(Deuteronomy 32. 9; Jeremiah 10. 16.) Implying that the source of Judah's redemption is God's free love, wherewith He chose Israel as His peculiar heritage, and at the same time assuring them, when desponding because of trials, that he would plead their cause as His own, and as if He were injured in their person. 3. cast lots for my people—i. e., divided among themselves my people as their captives by lot. Cf. as to the distribution of captives by lot (Obadiah 11; Nahum 3. 10). given a boy for . . . harlot—instead of paying a harlot for her prostitution in money, they gave her a Jewish captive boy as a slave. girl for wine—so valueless did they regard a Jewish girl that they would sell her for a draught of wine. 4. what have ye to do with me—ye have no connection with me (i. e., with my people: God identifying Himself with Israel; I, i. e., my people, have given you no cause of quarrel, why then do ye trouble me (i. e., my people)? Cf. the same phrase, Joshua 22. 24; Judges 11. 12; 2 Samuel 16. 10; Matthew 8. 29. Tyre . . . Zidon . . . Palestine—(Amos 1. 6, 9.) if ye recompense me—if ye injure me (my people), in revenge for fancied wrongs (Ezekiel 25. 15-17), I will requite you in your own coin swiftly and speedily. 5. my silver . . . my gold—i. e., the gold and silver of my people. The Philistines and Arabians had carried off all the treasures of King Jehoram's house (2 Chronicles 21. 16, 17). Cf. also 1 Kings 15. 18; 2 Kings 12. 18; 14. 14, for the spoiling of the treasures of the temple and the king's palace in Judah by Syria. It was customary among the heathen to hang up in the idol temples some of the spoils of war as presents to their gods. 6. Grecians—lit., Javanites, i. e., the Ionians, a Greek colony on the coast of Asia Minor, who were the first Greeks known to the Jews. The Greeks themselves, however, in their original descent came from Javan (Genesis 10. 2, 4). Probably the germ of

Greek civilization in part came through the Jewish slaves imported into Greece from Phœnicia by traffickers. Ezekiel 27. 13 mentions Javan and Tyre as trading in the persons of men. far from their border—far from Judea; so that the captive Jews were cut off from all hope of return. 7. raise them—i. e., I will rouse them. Neither sea nor distance will prevent my bringing them back. Alexander, and his successors, restored to liberty many Jews in bondage in Greece (JOSEPHUS 13. 5; J. B. 3. 9, 2). 8. sell them to . . . Sabeans—the Persian Artaxerxes Mnemon and Darius Ochus, and chiefly the Greek Alexander, reduced the Phœnician and Philistine powers. Thirty thousand Tyrians after the capture of Tyre by the last conqueror, and multitudes of Philistines on the taking of Gaza, were sold as slaves. The Jews are here said to do that which the God of Judah does in vindication of their wrong, viz., sell the Phœnicians who sold them, to a people "far off," as was Greece, whither the Jews had been sold. The Sabeans at the most remote extremity of Arabia Felix are referred to (cf. Jeremiah 6. 20; Matthew 12. 42). 9. The nations hostile to Israel are summoned by Jehovah to "come up" (this phrase is used because Jerusalem was on a hill) against Jerusalem, not that they may destroy it, but be destroyed by the Lord at it (Ezekiel 33. 7-23; Zechariah 12. 2-9; 14. 2, 3). Prepare war—lit., Sanc-tify war; because the heathen always began war with religious ceremonies. The very phrase used of Babylon's preparations against Jerusalem (Jeremiah 6. 4) is now used of the final foes of Jerusalem. As Babylon was then desired by God to advance against her for her destruction, so now all her foes, of whom Babylon was the type, are desired to advance against her for their own destruction. 10. Beat your ploughshares into swords—As the foes are desired to "beat their ploughshares into swords, and their pruning hooks into spears," that so they may perish in their unhallowed attack on Judah and Jerusalem, so these latter, and the nations converted to God by them, after the overthrow of the Antichristian confederacy, shall, on the contrary, "beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks," when under Messiah's coming reign there shall be war no more (Isaiah 2. 4; Hosea 2. 18; Micah 4. 3). let the weak say, I am strong—so universal shall be the rage of Israel's foes for invading her, that even the weak among them will fancy themselves strong enough to join the invading forces. Age and infirmity were ordinarily made valid excuses for exemption from service, but so mad shall be the fury of the world against God's people, that even the feeble will not desire to be exempted (cf. Psalm 2. 1-3). 11. Assemble—"Hasten." [MAURER.] thither—to the valley of Jehoshaphat. thy mighty ones—the warriors who fancy themselves "mighty ones," but who are on that very spot to be overthrown by Jehovah. [MAURER.] Cf. "the mighty men" (v. 9). Rather, Joel speaks of God's really "mighty ones" in contrast to the self-styled "mighty men" (v. 9; Psalm 103. 20; Isaiah 13. 3; cf. Daniel 10. 13). AUBERLEN remarks: one prophet supplements the other, for they all prophesied only "in part." What was obscure to one was revealed to the other; what is briefly described by one is more fully so by another. Daniel calls Antichrist a king, and dwells on his worldly conquests; John looks more to his spiritual tyranny, for which reason he adds a second beast, wearing the semblance of spirituality. Antichrist himself is described by Daniel. Isaiah (Isaiah 29.), Joel (ch. 3), and Zechariah (Zechariah 12., 13. and 14.), describe his army of heathen followers coming up against Jerusalem, but not Antichrist himself. 12. See v. 2, judge all the heathen round about—i. e., all the nations from all parts of the earth which have maltreated Israel, not merely, as HENDERSON supposes, the nations round about Jerusalem (cf. Psalm 110. 6; Isaiah 2. 4; Micah 4. 3, 11-13; Zephaniah 3. 15-19; Zechariah 12. 9; 14. 3-11; Malachi 4. 1-3). 13. Direction to the ministers of vengeance to execute God's wrath, as the enemy's wickedness is come to its full maturity. God does not cut off the wicked at once, but waits till their guilt is at its full (so as to the Amorites' iniquity, Genesis 15. 16), to show forth His own long suffering, and the justice of their doom who have so long abused it (Matthew 13. 27-30, 33, 40; Revelation 14. 15-19). For the image of a harvest to be threshed, cf. Jeremiah 51. 33; and a wine-press, Isaiah 63. 3; Lamentations 1. 15. 14. The prophet in vision seeing the immense array of nations congregating, exclaims, "Multitudes, multitudes!" a Hebrewism for immense multitudes. valley of decision—i. e., the valley in which they are to meet their determined doom. The same as "the valley of Jehoshaphat," i. e., "the valley of judgment" (Note, v. 2). Cf. v. 12, "there will I sit to judge," which confirms English Version rather than Margin, "threshing." The repetition of "valley of decision" heightens the effect, and pronounces the awful certainty of their doom. 15. (Notes, ch. 2. 10, 31.) 16. (Cf. Ezekiel 38. 18-22.) The victories of the Jews over their cruel foe Antiochus, under the Maccabees, may be a reference of this prophecy; but the ultimate reference is to the last Antichrist, of whom Antiochus was the type. Jerusalem being the central seat of the theocracy (Psalm 132. 13), it is from thence that Jehovah discomfits the foe. roar—as a lion (Jeremiah 25. 30; Amos 1. 2; 3. 8). Cf. as to Jehovah's voice thundering, Psalm 18. 13; Habakkuk 3. 10, 11. Lord . . . the hope of his people—or, their refuge (Psalm 46. 1). 17. shall ye know—experimentally by the proofs of favours which I shall vouchsafe to you. So "know" (Isaiah 60. 16; Hosea 2. 20). dwelling in Zion—as peculiarly your God. holy . . . no strangers pass through—to attack, or to defile, the holy city (Isaiah 35. 8; 52. 1; Zechariah 14. 21). Strangers, or Gentiles, shall come to Jerusalem, but it shall be in order to worship Jehovah there (Zechariah 14. 16). 18. mountains . . . drop . . . wine—figurative for abundance of vines, which were cultivated in terraces of earth between the rocks on the sides of the hills of Palestine (Amos 9. 13). hills . . . flow with milk—i. e., they shall abound in flocks and herds yielding milk plentifully, through the richness of the pastures. waters—the great desideratum for fertility in the parched East (Isaiah 30. 25). fountain . . . of . . . house of . . . Lord . . . water . . . valley of Shittim—the blessings, temporal and spiritual, issuing from Jehovah's house at Jerusalem, shall extend even to Shittim, on the border between Moab and Israel, beyond Jordan (Numbers 25. 1; 33. 49; Joshua 2. 1; Micah 6. 5). Shittim means acacias, which grow only in arid regions; implying, that even the arid desert shall be fertilized by the blessing from Jerusalem. So Ezekiel 47. 1-12 describes the waters issuing from the threshold of the house as flowing into the Dead Sea, and purifying it. Also in Zechariah 11. 8 the waters flow on one side into the Mediterranean, on the other side into the Dead Sea, near which latter Shittim was situated (cf. Psalm 46. 4; Revelation 22. 1). 19. Edom—it was subjugated by David, but revolted under Jehoram (2 Chronicles 21. 8-10); and at every subsequent opportunity tried to injure Judah. Egypt under Shishak spoiled Jerusalem under Rehoboam of the treasures of the temple and the king's house; subsequently to the captivity, it inflicted under the Ptolemies various injuries on Judea. Antiochus spoiled Egypt (Daniel 11. 40-43). Edom was made "desolate" under the Maccabees (JOSEPHUS 12. 11, 12). The low condition of the two countries for centuries proves the truth of the prediction (cf. Isaiah 19. 1, &c.; Jeremiah 49. 17; Obadiah 10). So shall fare all the foes of Israel, typified by these two (Isaiah 63. 1, &c.). 20. dwell for ever—(Amos 9. 15), i. e., be established as a flourishing state. 21. cleanse . . . blood . . . not cleansed—I will purge away from Judah the extreme guilt (represented by "blood," the shedding of which was the climax of her sin, Isaiah 1. 15) which was for long not purged away, but visited with judgments (Isaiah 4. 4). Messiah saves from guilt, in order to save from punishment (Matthew 1. 21).

AMOS.

INTRODUCTION.

AMOS (meaning in Hebrew "a burden") was (ch. 1. 1) a shepherd of Tekoa, a small town of Judah, six miles south-east from Bethlehem, and twelve from Jerusalem, on the borders of the great desert (2 Chronicles 20. 20; cf. 11. 6, ibid). The region being sandy was fitter for pastoral than for agricultural purposes. Amos therefore owned and tended flocks, and collected sytæmore figs; not that the former was a menial office, kings themselves, as Meshah of Moab (2 Kings 3. 4), exercising it. Amos, however (from ch. 7. 14, 15), seems to have been of humble rank.

Though belonging to Judah, he was commissioned by God to exercise his prophetic function in Israel; as the latter kingdom abounded in impostors, and the prophets of God generally fled to Judah through fear of the kings of Israel, a true prophet from Judah was the more needed in it. His name is not to be confounded with that of Isaiah's father, Amoz.

The time of his prophesying was in the reigns of Uzziah king of Judea, and Jeroboam II. son of Joash, king of Israel (ch. 1. 1), i. e., in part of the time in which the two kings were contemporary; probably in Jeroboam's latter years, after that monarch had recovered from Syria "the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath to the sea of the plain" (2 Kings 14. 25-27); for Amos foretells that these same coasts, "from the entering in of Hamath unto the river of the wilderness," should be the scene of Israel's being afflicted (ch. 6. 14); also his references to the state of luxurious security then existing (ch. 6. 1, 4, 13), and to the speedy termination of it by the Assyrian foe (ch. 1. 5; 3. 12, 15; 5. 27; 8. 2), point to the latter part of Jeroboam's reign, which terminated in 784 B. C., the twenty-seventh year of Uzziah's reign, which continued down to 759 B. C.

He was contemporary with Hosea, only that the latter continued to prophesy in reigns subsequent to Uzziah (Hosea 1. 1), whereas Amos ceased to prophesy in the reign of that monarch. The scene of his ministry was Beth-el, where the idol calves were set up (ch. 7. 10-13). There his prophecies roused Amaziah the idol priest to accuse him of conspiracy, and to try to drive him back to Judah.

The first six chapters are without figure; the last three symbolical, but with the explanation subjoined. He first denounces the neighbouring peoples, then the Jews, then Israel (from ch. 3. to the end), closing with the promise of restoration under Messiah (ch. 9. 11-15). His style is thought by JEROME to betray his humble origin; but though no sublime, it is regular, perspicuous, and energetic; his images are taken from the scenes in nature with which he was familiar; his rhythms are flowing, his parallelisms exact, and his descriptions minute and graphic. Some peculiar expressions occur: "cleanness of teeth," i. e., want of bread (ch. 4. 6); "the excellency of Jacob" (ch. 6. 8; 8. 7); "the high places of Isaac" (ch. 7. 9); "the house of Isaac" (ch. 7. 16); "he that createth the wind" (ch. 4. 13).

HENGSTENBERG draws an able argument for the genuineness of the Mosaic records from the evidence in Amos, that the existing institutions in Israel as well as Judah (excepting the calves of Jeroboam), were framed according to the Pentateuch rules.

Two quotations from Amos occur in the New Testament (cf. Acts 7. 42, 43, with ch. 5. 25, 26; and Acts 15. 16, 17, with ch. 9. 11).

PHILO, JOSEPHUS, MELITO'S catalogue, JEROME, JUSTIN MARTYR (sec. 22, quoting the fifth and six chapters of Amos as "one of the twelve minor prophets"), and the 60th canon of the Laodicean council support the canonicity of the book of Amos.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-15. GOD'S JUDGMENTS ON SYRIA, PHILISTIA, TYRE, EDMON, AND AMMON. 1. The words of Amos—i. e., Amos' oracular communications. A heading found only in Jeremiah 1. 1. among the herdmen—rather, "shepherds;" both owning and tending sheep; from an Arabic root, to mark with pricks, viz., to select the best among a species of sheep and goats ill-shapen and short-footed (as others explain the name from an Arabic root), but distinguished by their wool. [MAURER.] God chooses "the weak things of the world to confound the mighty," and makes a humble shepherd reprove the arrogance of Israel and her king arising from prosperity (cf. 1 Samuel 17. 40). which he saw—in supernatural vision (Isaiah 1. 1). two years before the earthquake—mentioned in Zechariah 14. 5. The earthquake occurred in Uzziah's reign, at the time of his being stricken with leprosy for usurping the priest's functions. [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities 9. 10. 4.] This clause must have been inserted by Ezra and the compilers of the Jewish canon. 2. will roar—as a lion (Joel 3. 16). Whereas Jehovah is there represented roaring in Israel's behalf, here he roars against her (cf. Psalm 18. 13; Jeremiah 23. 30). from Zion . . . Jerusalem—the seat of the theocracy, from which ye have revolted; not from Dan and Beth-el, the seat of your idolatrous worship of the calves. habitation . . . mourn—poetical personification. Their inhabitants shall mourn, imparting a sadness to the very habitations. Carmel—the mountain promontory north of Israel, in Asher, abounding in rich pastures, olives, and vines. The name is the symbol of fertility.

"When Carmel itself "withers," how utter the desolation! (Song of Solomon 7. 5; Isaiah 33. 9; 35. 2; Jeremiah 50. 19; Nahum 1. 4). 3. Here begins a series of threatenings of vengeance against six other states, followed by one against Judah, and ending with one against Israel, with whom the rest of the prophecy is occupied. The eight predictions are in symmetrical stanzas, each prefaced by "Thus saith the Lord." Beginning with the sin of others, which Israel would be ready enough to recognize, he proceeds to bring home to Israel her own guilt. Israel must not think hereafter, because she sees others visited similarly to herself, that such judgments are matters of chance; nay, they are divinely foreseen and foreordered, and are confirmations of the truth that God will not clear the guilty. If God spares not the nations that know not the truth, how much less Israel that sins wilfully (Luke 12. 47, 48; James 4. 17)! For three transgressions . . . and for four—If Damascus had only sinned once or twice, I would have spared them, but since, after having been so often pardoned, they still persevere so continually, I will no longer "turn away" their punishment. The Hebrew is simply, "I will not reverse it," viz., the sentence of punishment which follows; the negative expression implies more than it expresses, i. e., "I will most surely execute it;" God's fulfilment of His threats being more awful than human language can express. "Three and four" imply sin multiplied on sin. Cf. Exodus 20. 5; Proverbs 30. 15, 16, 21; "six and seven," Job 5. 19; "once and twice," Job 33. 14; "twice and thrice," Margin; "oftentimes," English Version, Job 33. 29; "seven and also eight," Ecclesiastes 11. 2. There may be also a reference to seven, the product of three and four added; seven expressing the full completion of the measure of their guilt (Leviticus 26. 18, 21, 24; cf. Matthew 23. 32). threshed—the very term used of the Syrian king Hazael's oppression of Israel under Jehu and Jehoahaz (2 Kings 10. 32, 33; 13. 7). The victims were thrown before the threshing-sledges, the teeth of which tore their bodies. So David to Ammon (2 Samuel 12. 31; cf. Isaiah 28. 27). 4. Hazael . . . Ben-hadad—A black marble obelisk found in the central palace of Nimroud, and now in the British Museum, is inscribed with the names of Hazael and Ben-hadad of Syria, as well as Jehu of Israel, mentioned as tributaries of "Shalmanubar," king of Assyria. The kind of tribute from Jehu is mentioned, gold, pearls, precious oil, &c. [G. V. SMITH.] The Ben-hadad here is the son of Hazael (2 Kings 13. 3), not the Ben-hadad supplanted and slain by Hazael (2 Kings 8. 7, 15). The phrase, "I will send a fire," &c., i. e., the flame of war (Psalm 78. 63), occur also (v. 7, 10, 12, 14, and ch. 2. 2, 5; Jeremiah 49. 27; Hosea 8. 14). 5. Bar of Damascus—i. e., the bar of its gates (cf. Jeremiah 51. 30). the inhabitant—singular for plural, "inhabitants." HENDERSON, because of the parallel, "him that holdeth the sceptre," translates, "the ruler." But the parallelism is that of one clause complementing the other, "the inhabitant" or subject here answering to "him that holdeth the sceptre" or ruler there, both ruler and subject alike being cut off. Aven—the same as Oon or Un, a delightful valley, four hours' journey from Damascus, towards the desert. Proverbial in the East as a place of delight. [JOSEPHUS ABASSUS.] It is here parallel to "Eden," which also means pleasantness; situated at Lebanon. As JOSEPHUS ABASSUS is a doubtful authority, perhaps the reference may be rather to the valley between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, called El-Bekaa, where are the ruins of the Baalbek temple of the sun; so the LXX. render it On, the same name as the city in Egypt bears, dedicated to the sun-worship (Genesis 41. 45; Margin, Ezekiel 30. 17, Heliopolis, "the city of the sun"). It is termed by Amos "the valley of Aven," or vanity, from the worship of idols in it. Kir—a region subject to Assyria (Isaiah 22. 6) in Iberia, the same as that called now in Armenian Kur, lying by the river Cyrus which empties itself into the Caspian Sea. Tiglath-pileser fulfilled this prophecy when Ahaz applied for help to him against Rezin king of Syria, and the Assyrian king took Damascus, slew Rezin, and carried away its people captive to Kir. 6. Gaza—the southernmost of the five capitals of the five divisions of Philistia, and the key to Palestine on the south: hence put for the whole Philistine nation. Uzziah commenced the fulfilment of this prophecy (see 2 Chronicles 26. 6), because they carried away . . . the whole captivity—i. e., they left none. Cf. with the phrase here, Jeremiah 13. 19, "Judah . . . carried captive all of it . . . wholly carried away." Under Jehoram already the Philistines had carried away all the substance of the king of Judah, and his wives and his sons, "so that there was never a son left to him, save Jehoahaz;" and after Amos' time (if the reference include the future, which to the prophet's eye is as if already done), under Ahaz (2 Chronicles 28. 18), they seized on all the cities and villages of the low country and south of Judah. to deliver them up to Edom—Judah's bitterest foe; as slaves (v. 9; cf. Joel 3. 1, 3, 6). GROTIUS refers it to the fact (Isaiah 16. 4) that on Sennacherib's invasion of Judah, many fled for refuge to neighbouring countries; the Philistines, instead of hospitably sheltering the refugees, sold them, as if captives in war, to their enemies, the Idumeans. 7. fire—i. e., the flame of war (Numbers 21. 28; Isaiah 26. 11). Hezekiah fulfilled the prophecy, smiting the Philistines unto Gaza (2 Kings 18. 8). Foretold also by Isaiah 14. 23, 31. 8. Ashdod, &c.—Gath alone is not mentioned of the five chief Philistine cities. It had already been subdued by David; and it, as well as Ashdod, was taken by Uzziah (2 Chronicles 26. 6). Gath perhaps had lost its position as one of the five primary cities before Amos uttered this prophecy, whence arose his omission of it. So Zephaniah 2. 4, 5. Cf. Jeremiah 47. 4; Ezekiel 25. 16. Subsequently to the subjugation of the Philistines by Uzziah, and then by Hezekiah, they were reduced by Ptolemy of Egypt, Nebuchadnezzar, the Persians, Alexander, and lastly the Asmonians. 9. Tyrus . . . delivered up the . . . captivity to Edom—the same charge as against the Philistines (v. 6). remembered not the brotherly covenant—the league of Hiram of Tyre with David and Solomon, the former supplying cedars for the building of the temple and king's house in return for oil and corn (2 Samuel 5. 11; 1 Kings 5. 2-6; 9. 11-14, 27; 10. 22; 1 Chronicles 14. 1; 2 Chronicles 8. 18; 9. 10). 10. fire—(Cf. v. 4, 7; notes, Isaiah 23; Ezekiel 26, 27, and 28.) Many parts of Tyre were burnt by fiery missiles of the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar. Alexander of Macedon subsequently overthrew it. 11. Edom . . . did pursue his brother—(Isaiah 34. 5.) The chief aggravation to Edom's violence against Israel was, that they both came from the same parents, Isaac and Rebecca (cf. Genesis 25. 24-26; Deuteronomy 23. 7, 8; Obadiah 10, 12; Malachi 1. 2). cast off all pity—lit., destroy compassions, i. e., did suppress all the natural feeling of pity for a brother in distress. his wrath for ever—as Esau kept up his grudge against Jacob, for having twice supplanted him, viz., as to the birth-right and the blessing (Genesis 27. 41), so Esau's posterity against Israel (Numbers 20. 14, 21). Edom first showed his spite in not letting Israel pass through his borders when coming from the wilderness, but threatening to "come out against him with the sword;" next, when the Syrians attacked Jerusalem under Ahaz (cf. 2 Chronicles 28. 17, with 2 Kings 18. 5); next, when Nebuchadnezzar assailed Jerusalem (Psalm 137. 7, 8). In each case Edom chose the day of Israel's calamity for venting his grudge. This is the point of Edom's guilt dwelt on in Obadiah 10-13. God punishes the children, not for the sin of their fathers, but for their own filling up the measure of their fathers' guilt, as children generally follow in the steps of, and even exceed, their fathers' guilt (cf. Exodus 20. 5). 12. Teman—a city of Edom, called from a grandson of Esau (Genesis 36. 11, 15; Obadiah 8, 9). Situated five miles from Petra; south of the present Wady Musa. Its people were famed for wisdom (Jeremiah 49. 7). Bozrah—a city of Edom (Isaiah 63. 1). Selah or Petra is not mentioned, as it had been overthrown by Amaziah (2 Kings 14. 7). 13. Ammon—the Ammonites under Nahash attacked Jabesh-gilead, and refused to accept the offer of the latter to save them, unless the Jabesh-gileadites would put out all their right eyes (1 Samuel 11. 1, &c.). Saul rescued Jabesh-gilead. The Ammonites joined the Chaldeans in their invasion of Judea for the sake of plunder. ripped up . . . women with child—as Hazael of Syria also did (2 Kings 8. 12; cf. Hosea 13. 16). Ammon's object in this cruel act was to leave Israel without "heir," so as to seize on Israel's inheritance (Jeremiah 49. 1). 14. Rabbah—the capital of Ammon; meaning "the Great." Distinct from Rabbah of Moab. Called Philadelphia, afterwards, from Ptolemy Philadelphus. tempest—i. e., with an onset swift, sudden, and resistless as a hurricane. day of the whirlwind—parallel to "the day of battle;" therefore meaning "the day of the foe's tumultuous assault." 15. their king . . . princes—or else, "their Molech (the idol of Ammon) and his priests." [GROTIUS and LXX.] Isaiah 43. 28 so uses "princes" for priests. So ch. 5. 26, "your Molech;" and Jeremiah 49. 3, Margin. English Version, however, is perhaps preferable both here and in Jeremiah 49. 3; see notes there.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-16. CHARGES AGAINST MOAB, JUDAH, AND LASTLY ISRAEL, THE CHIEF SUBJECT OF AMOS' PROPHECIES. 1. burned . . . bones of . . . king of Edom into lime—when Jehoram of Israel, Jehoshaphat of Judah, and the king of Edom, combined against Mesha king of Moab, the latter falling in battle to break through to the king of Edom, took the eldest son of the latter and offered him as a burnt offering on the wall (2 Kings 3. 27). [MICHAELIS.] Thus, "king of Edom" is taken as the heir to the throne of Edom. But "his son" is rather the king of Moab's own son, whom the father offered to Molech. [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 9. 3.] Thus the reference here in Amos is not to that fact, but to the revenge which probably the king of

Moab took on the king of Edom, when the forces of Israel and Judah had retired after their successful campaign against Moab, leaving Edom without allies. The Hebrew tradition is, that Moab in revenge tore from their grave, and burned the bones of the king of Edom, the ally of Jehoram and Jehoshaphat, who was already buried. Probably the "burning of the bones" means, he burned the king of Edom alive, reducing his very bones to lime. [MAURER.] 2. Kirioth—the chief city of Moab, called also Kir-Moab (Isalah 15. 1); the form is plural here, as including both the acropolis and town itself (see Jeremiah 48. 24, 41, Margin). die with tumult—i. e., amidst the tumult of battle (Hosea 10. 14). 3. the judge—the chief magistrate, the supreme source of justice. "King" not being used, it seems likely a change of government had before this time substituted for kings, supreme judges. 4. From foreign kingdoms he passes to Judah and Israel, lest it should be said, he was strenuous in denouncing sins abroad, but connived at those of his own nation. Judah's guilt differs from that of all the others, in that it was directly against God, not merely against man. Also because Judah's sin was wilful and wittingly against light and knowledge. law—the Mosaic code in general. commandments—or statutes, the ceremonies and civil laws. their lies—their lying idols (Psalm 40. 4; Jeremiah 16. 19), from which they drew false hopes. The order is to be observed. The Jews first cast off the Divine law, then fall into lying errors; God thus visiting them with a righteous retribution (Romans 1. 25, 26, 28; 2 Thessalonians 2. 11, 12). The pretext of a good intention is hereby refuted: the "lies" that mislead them are "their (own) lies." [CALVIN.] after . . . which their fathers . . . walked—we are not to follow the fathers in error, but must follow the word of God alone. Nay, it was an aggravation of the Jews' sin, that it was not confined to preceding generations; the sons rivalled the sins of their fathers (Matthew 23. 32; Acts 7. 51). [CALVIN.] 5. a fire—Nebuchadnezzar. 6. Israel—the ten tribes, the main subject of Amos' prophecies. sold the righteous—Israel's judges for a bribe are induced to condemn in judgment him who has a righteous cause; in violation of Deuteronomy 16. 19. the poor for a pair of shoes—lit., sandals of wood, secured on the foot by leathern straps; less valuable than shoes. Cf. the same phrase, for the most paltry bribe, ch. 8. 6; Ezekiel 13. 19; Joel 3. 3. They were not driven by poverty to such a sin; beginning with suffering themselves to be tempted by a large bribe, they at last are so reckless of all shame as to prostitute justice for the merest trifle. Amos convicts them of injustice, incestuous unchastity, and oppression first, as these were so notorious that they could not deny them, before he proceeds to reprove their contempt of God, which they would have denied on the ground that they worshipped God in the form of the calves. 7. pant after . . . dust of . . . earth on . . . head of . . . poor—i. e., eagerly thirst for this object, by their oppression to prostrate the poor so as to cast the dust on their heads in mourning on the earth (cf. 2 Samuel 1. 2; Job 2. 12; Ezekiel 17. 30). turn aside . . . way of . . . meek—pervert their cause (ch. 5. 12; Job 24. 4 [GROTIUS]; Isalah 10. 2). a man and his father—a crime "not so much as named among the Gentiles" (1 Corinthians 5. 1). When God's people sin in the face of light, they often fall lower than even those who know not God. go in unto the same maid—from v. 8 it seems likely the damsel meant is one of the prostitutes attached to the idol Astarte's temple: prostitution being part of her filthy worship. to profane my . . . name—Israel in such abominations as it were designedly seeks to insult God. 8. lay themselves . . . upon clothes laid to pledge—the outer garment, which Exodus 22. 25-27 ordered to be restored to the poor man before sunset, as being his only covering. It aggravated the crime, that they lay on these clothes in an idol temple. by every altar—they partook in a recumbent posture of their idolatrous feasts; the ancients being in the habit of reclining at full length in eating, the upper part of the body resting on the left elbow, not sitting as we do. drink . . . wine of the condemned—i. e., wine bought with the money of those whom they unjustly fined. 9. Yet—My former benefits to you heighten your ingratitude. the Amorite—the most powerful of all the Canaanite nations, and therefore put for them all (Genesis 15. 16; 48. 22; Deuteronomy 1. 20; Joshua 7. 7). height . . . like . . . cedars—(Numbers 13. 32, 33.) destroyed his fruit . . . above . . . roots . . . beneath—i. e., destroyed him utterly (Job 18. 16; Ezekiel 17. 9; Malachi 4. 1). 10. brought you up from . . . Egypt—"brought up" is the phrase, as Egypt was low and flat and Canaan hilly. to possess the land of the Amorite—the Amorites strictly occupied both sides of the Jordan, and the mountains afterward possessed by Judah; but they here, as in v. 9, stand for all the Canaanites. God kept Israel forty years in the wilderness, which tended to discipline them in His statutes, so as to be the better fitted for entering on the possession of Canaan. 11. Additional obligations under which Israel lay to God; the prophets, and Nazarites, appointed by Him, to furnish religious instruction and examples of holy self-restraint. of your young men—It was a specimen of Israel's highly favoured state, that, of the class most addicted to pleasures, God chose those who by a solemn vow bound themselves to abstinence from all produce of the vine, and from all ceremonial and moral defilement. The Nazarite was not to shave (Numbers 6. 2, &c.). God left nothing undone to secure the purity of their worship and their faithfulness to it (Lamentations 4. 7). The name comes from a Hebrew root, Nazar, "to set apart." Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist were Nazarites. Is it not even thus—Will any of you dare to deny it is so? 12. Ye so despised these my favours, as to tempt the Nazarite to break his vow; and forbad the prophets prophesying (Isalah 30. 10). So Amaziah forbad Amos (ch. 7. 12, 13, 14). 13. I am pressed under you—so CALVIN (cf. Isalah 1. 14). Margin translates actively, "I will depress your place," i. e., I will make it narrow, a metaphor for afflicting a people; the opposite of enlarging, i. e., relieving (Psalm 4. 1; Proverbs 4. 12). MAURER translates, "I will press you down" (not as Margin, "your place;" so the Hebrew, Job 40. 12; or v. 7 in Hebrew text). Amos, as a shepherd, appropriately draws his similes from rustic scenes. 14. flight shall perish from . . . swift—even the swift shall not be able to escape. strong shall not strengthen his force—i. e., shall not be able to use his strength. himself—lit., his life. 16. flee . . . naked—if any escape, it must be with the loss of accoutrements, and all that would impede rapid flight. They must be content with saving their life alone.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-15. GOD'S EXTRAORDINARY LOVE, BEING REPAID BY ISRAEL WITH INGRATITUDE, OF NECESSITY CALLS FOR JUDGMENTS, WHICH THE PROPHETS ANNOUNCE, NOT AT RANDOM, BUT BY GOD'S COMMISSION, WHICH THEY CANNOT BUT FULFIL. THE OPPRESSION PREVALENT IN ISRAEL WILL BRING DOWN RUIN ON ALL SAVE A SMALL REMNANT. 1. children of Israel—not merely the ten tribes, but "the whole family brought up from Egypt;" all the descendants of Jacob, including Judah and Benjamin. Cf. Jeremiah 8. 3, and Micah 2. 3, on "family" for the nation. However, as the prophecy following refers to the ten tribes, they must be chiefly, if not solely, meant: they were the majority of the nation; and so Amos concedes what they so often boasted, that they were the elect people of God [CALVIN], but implies that this only heightens their sins. 2. You only have I known—i. e., acknowledged as my people, and treated with peculiar favour (Exodus 19. 5; Deuteronomy 4. 20). Cf. the use of "know," Psalm 1. 6; 144. 3; John 10. 14; 2 Timothy 2. 19. therefore I will punish—the greater the privileges, the heavier the punishment for the abuse of them; for to the other offences there is added, in this case, ingratitude. When God's people do not glorify Him, He glorifies Himself by punishing them. 3. Here follow several questions of a parable-like kind, to awaken conviction in the people. Can two walk together, except they be agreed?—Can God's prophets be so unanimous in prophesying against you, if God's Spirit were not joined with them, or if their

prophecies were false? The Israelites were "at ease," not believing that God was with the prophets in their denunciations of coming ruin to the nation (ch. 6, 1, 3; cf. 1 Kings 22, 18, 24, 27; Jeremiah 43, 2). This accords with v. 7, 8. So "I will be with thy mouth" (Exodus 4, 12; Jeremiah 1, 8; Matthew 10, 20). If the prophets and God were not agreed, the former could not predict the future as they do. In ch. 2, 12 he had said, the Israelites forbid the prophets prophesying; therefore, in v. 3, 8, he asserts the agreement between the prophets and God who spake by them against Israel. [ROSENMULLER.] Rather, I once walked with you (Leviticus 26, 12) as a Father and Husband (Isaiah 54, 5; Jeremiah 3, 14); but now your way and mine are utterly diverse, there can therefore be no fellowship between us such as there was (v. 2); I will walk with you only to "punish you;" as a "lion" walks with his "prey" (v. 4), as a bird-catcher with a bird. [TARNOVIUS.] The prophets, and all servants of God, can have no fellowship with the ungodly (Psalm 119, 63; 2 Corinthians 6, 16, 17; Ephesians 5, 11; James 4, 4). 4. The same idea as in Matthew 34, 23. Where a corrupt nation is, there God's instruments of punishment are sure also to be. The lion roars loudly only when he has prey in sight. will a young lion cry out . . . if he (the "lion," not the "young lion") have taken nothing?—The young lion just weaned lies silent, until the old lion brings the prey near; then the scent rouses him. So, the prophet would not speak against Israel, if God did not reveal to him Israel's sins as requiring punishment. 5. When a bird trying to fly upwards is made to fall upon the earth by an earth-snare, it is a plain proof that the snare is there; so, Israel, now that thou art falling, infer thence, that it is in the snare of the Divine judgment that thou art entangled. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing?—The bird-catcher does not remove his snare off the ground till he has caught some prey; so God will not withdraw the Assyrians, &c., the instruments of punishment, until they have had the success against you which God gives them. The foe corresponds to the "snare" suddenly springing from the ground and enclosing the bird on the latter touching it; the Hebrew is lit., "Shall the snare spring from the earth?" Israel entangled in judgments answers to the bird "taken." 6. When the sound of alarm is trumpeted by the watchman in the city, the people are sure to run to and fro in alarm (Hebrew lit.). Yet Israel is not alarmed, though God threatens judgments. shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?—This is the explanation of the preceding similes: God is the Author of all the calamities which happen you, and which are foretold by His prophets. The evil of sin is from ourselves; the evil of trouble is from God, whoever be the instruments. 7. his secret—viz., His purpose hidden from all, until it is revealed to His prophets (cf. Genesis 18, 17). In a wider sense, God's will is revealed to all who love God, which it is not to the world (Psalm 25, 14; John 15, 15; 17, 25, 26). unto his servants—who being servants cannot but obey their Lord in setting forth His purpose (viz., that of judgment against Israel) (Jeremiah 20, 9; Ezekiel 9, 11). Therefore the fault which the ungodly find with them is groundless (1 Kings 18, 17). It aggravates Israel's sin, that God is not about to inflict judgment, without having fully warned the people, if haply they might repent. 8. As when "the lion roars" (cf. ch. 1, 2; and v. 4 above), none can help but "fear," so when Jehovah communicates His awful message, the prophet cannot but prophesy. Find not fault with me for prophesying, I must obey God. In a wider sense true of all believers (Acts 4, 20; 5, 29). 9. Publish in . . . palaces—as being places of greatest resort (cf. Matthew 10, 27); and also as it is the sin of princes that he arraigns, he calls on princes (the occupants of the "palaces") to be the witnesses. Ashdod—put for all Philistia. Convene the Philistine and the Egyptian magnates, from whom I have on various occasions rescued Israel. (The opposite formula to "Tell it not in Gath," viz., lest the heathen should glory over Israel). Even these idolaters, in looking on your enormities, will condemn you, how much more will the holy God? upon the mountains of Samaria—on the hills surrounding and commanding the view of Samaria, the metropolis of the ten tribes, which was on a lower hill (ch. 4, 1; 1 Kings 16, 24). The mountains are to be the tribunal on which the Philistines and Egyptians are to sit aloft to have a view of your crimes, so as to testify to the justice of your punishment (v. 13). tumults—caused by the violence of the princes of Israel in "oppressions" of the poor (Job 35, 9; Ecclesiastes 4, 1). 10. know not to do—their moral corruption blinds their power of discernment so that they cannot do right (Jeremiah 4, 22). Not simple intellectual ignorance; the defect lay in the heart and will. store up violence and robbery—i. e., treasures obtained by "violence and robbery." (Proverbs 10, 2). 11. Translate, "An adversary (the abruptness produces a startling effect!) and that too, from every side of the land." So in the fulfilment, 2 Kings 17, 5: "The king of Assyria (Shalmaneser) came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years." bring down thy strength from thee—i. e., bring thee down from thy strength (the strength on which thou didst boast thyself); all thy resources (Proverbs 10, 15). palaces shall be spoiled—a just retribution in kind (v. 10). The palaces in which spoils of robbery were stored up, "shall be spoiled." 12. shepherd—a pastoral image, appropriately used by Amos, a shepherd himself. piece of . . . ear—brought by the shepherd to the owner of the sheep, so as not to have to pay for the loss (Genesis 31, 39; Exodus 22, 13). So if aught of Israel escapes, it shall be a miracle of God's goodness. It shall be but a scanty remnant. There is a kind of goat in the East the ears of which are a foot long, and proportionally broad. Perhaps the reference is to this. Cf. on the image 1 Samuel 17, 34, 35; 2 Timothy 4, 17. that dwell in Samaria in the corner of a bed—i. e., that live luxuriously in Samaria (cf. ch. 6, 1, 4). "A bed" means here the Oriental divan, a raised part of the room covered with cushions. in Damascus in a couch—Jeroboam II. had lately restored Damascus to Israel (2 Kings 14, 25, 28). So the Israelites are represented as not merely in "the corner of a bed," as in Samaria, but "in a (whole) couch," at Damascus, living in luxurious ease. Of these, now so luxurious, soon but a remnant shall be left by the foe. The destruction of Damascus and that of Samaria shall be conjoined; as here their luxurious lives, and subsequently under Pekah and Rezin their inroads on Judah, were combined (Isaiah 7, 1-8; 8, 4, 9; 17, 3). The parallelism of "Samaria" to "Damascus," and LXX. favour English Version rather than GESENIUS: "on a damask couch." The Hebrew pointing, though generally expressing damask, may express the city "Damascus;" and many MSS. point it so. Cf. for Israel's overthrow, 2 Kings 17, 5, 6; 18, 9-12. 13. testify in the house, &c.—i. e., against the house of Jacob. God calls on the same persons as in v. 9, viz., the heathen Philistines and the Egyptians to witness with their own eyes Samaria's corruptions above described, so as that none may be able to deny the justice of Samaria's punishment. [MAURER.] God of hosts—having all the powers of heaven and earth at command, and therefore One calculated to strike terror into the hearts of the guilty whom he threatens. 14. That—rather, since, or for. This verse is not, as English Version translates, the thing which the witnesses cited are to "testify" (v. 13), but the reason why God calls on the heathen to witness Samaria's guilt, viz., in order to justify the punishment which He declares He will inflict. I will also visit . . . Beth-el—the golden calves which were the source of all "the transgressions of Israel" (1 Kings 12, 32; 13, 2; 2 Kings 23, 15, 16), though Israel thought that by them their transgressions were atoned for and God's favour secured. horns of the altar—which used to be sprinkled with the blood of victims. They were hornlike projecting points at the corners of ancient altars. The singular, "altar," refers to the great altar erected by Jeroboam to the calves. The "altars," plural, refer to the lesser ones made in imitation of the great one (2 Chronicles 34, 5, cf. with 1 Kings 13, 2; Hosea 8, 11; 10, 1). 15. winter . . . summer house—(Judges 3, 20; Jeremiah 36, 22). Winter houses of the great were in sheltered positions facing the south to get all possible sunshine, summer houses in forests and on hills, facing the east and north. houses of ivory—having their walls, doors, and ceilings inlaid with ivory. So Ahab's house (1 Kings 22. 39; Psalm 45. 8).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-13. DENUNCIATION OF ISRAEL'S NOBLES FOR OPPRESSION; AND OF THE WHOLE NATION FOR IDOLATRY; AND FOR THEIR BEING UNREFORMED EVEN BY GOD'S JUDGMENTS: THEREFORE THEY MUST PREPARE FOR THE LAST AND WORST JUDGMENT OF ALL. 1. kine of Bashan—fat and wanton kine such as the rich pasture of Bashan (east of Jordan, between Hermon and Gilend) was famed for (Deuteronomy 52. 14; Psalm 22. 12; Ezekiel 39. 18). Fig. for those luxurious nobles mentioned, ch. 3. 9, 10, 12, 15. The feminine, kine, or cows, not bulls, expresses their effeminacy. This accounts for masculine forms in the Hebrew being intermixed with feminine; the latter being fig., the former the real persons meant. say to their masters—i. e., to their king, with whom the princes indulged in rotations (Hosea 7. 5), and whom here they importune for more wine. "Bring" is singular, in the Hebrew implying that one "master" alone is meant. 2. The Lord—the same Hebrew as "masters" (v. 1). Israel's nobles say to their master or lord, Bring us drink: but "the Lord" of him and them "hath sworn," &c. by his holiness—which binds Him to punish the guilty (Psalm 89. 35). he will take you away—i. e., God by the instrumentality of the enemy. with hooks—lit., "thorns" (cf. 2 Chronicles 33. 11). As fish are taken out of the water by hooks, so the Israelites are to be taken out of their cities by the enemy (Ezekiel 29. 4; cf. Job 41. 1, 2; Jeremiah 16. 16; Habakkuk 1. 15). The image is the more appropriate, as anciently captives were led by their conquerors by a hook made to pass through the nose (2 Kings 19. 28), as is to be seen in the Assyrian remains. 3. go out at the breaches—viz., of the city walls broken by the enemy. every cow at that which is before her—fig. for the once luxurious nobles (cf. v. 1, "kine of Bashan") shall go out each one right before her; not through the gates, but each at the breach before him, not turning to the right or left, apart from one another. ye shall cast them into the palace—"them," i. e., "your posterity," from v. 2. Yourselves shall escape through the breaches, after having cast your little children into the palace, so as not to see their destruction, and to escape the more quickly. Rather, "ye shall cast yourselves into the palace," so as to escape from it out of the city. [CALVIN.] The palace, the scene of the princes' riots (ch. 3. 10, 15; 4. 1), is to be the scene of their ignominious flight. Cf. in the similar case of Jerusalem's capture, the king's escape by way of the palace, through a breach in the wall, Ezekiel 12. 5, 12. GENESENIUS translates, "Ye shall be cast (as captives) into the (enemy's) stronghold;" in this view, the enemy's stronghold is called "palace," in retributive contrast to the "palaces" of Israel's nobles, the store-houses of their robberies (ch. 3. 10). 4. God gives them up to their self-willed idolatry, that they may see how unable their idols are to save them from their coming calamities. So Ezekiel 20. 39. Beth-el—(Ch. 3. 14.) Gilgal—(Hosea 4. 15; 9. 15; 12. 11.) sacrifices every morning—as commanded in the law (Numbers 28. 3, 4). They imitated the letter, whilst violating by calf-worship the spirit, of the Jerusalem temple worship. after three years—every third year; lit., after three (years of) days (i. e., the fullest complement of days, or a year); "after three full years." Cf. Leviticus 25. 20; Judges 17. 10, and "the days" for the years, Joel 1. 2. So a month of days is used for a full month, wanting no day to complete it (Margin, Genesis 29. 14; Numbers 11. 20, 21). The Israelites here also kept to the letter of the law in bringing in the tithes of their increase every third year (Deuteronomy 14. 28; 28. 12). 5. offer—lit., burn incense; i. e., "offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with burnt incense and with leavened bread." The frankincense was laid on the meat offering, and taken by the priest from it to burn on the altar (Leviticus 2. 1, 2, 8-11). Though unleavened cakes were to accompany the peace offering sacrifice of animals, leavened bread was also commanded (Leviticus 7. 12, 13), but not as a "meat offering" (Leviticus 2. 11). this liketh you—i. e., this is what ye like. 6-11. Jehovah details His several chastisements inflicted with a view to reclaiming them: but adds to each the same sad result, "yet have ye not returned unto me" (Isaiah 9. 13; Jeremiah 5. 3; Hosea 7. 10); the monotonous repetition of the same burden marking their pitiable obstinacy. cleanness of teeth—explained by the parallel, "want of bread." The famine alluded to is that mentioned, 2 Kings 8. 1. [GROTIUS.] Where there is no food to masticate, the teeth are free from uncleanness, but it is the cleanness of want. Cf. Proverbs 14. 4, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean." So spiritually, where all is outwardly smooth and clean, it is often because there is no solid religion. Better fightings and fears with real piety, than peace and respectable decorum without spiritual life. 7. withholden . . . rain . . . three months to . . . harvest—the time when rain was most needed, and when usually "the latter rain" fell, viz., in spring, the latter half of February, and the whole of March and April (Hosea 6. 3; Joel 2. 23). The drought meant is that mentioned 1 Kings 17. 1. [GROTIUS.] rain upon one city . . . not . . . upon another—any rain that fell was only partial. 8. three cities wandered—i. e., the inhabitants of three cities (cf. Jeremiah 14. 1-6). GROTIUS explains this verse and v. 7, "The rain fell on neighbouring countries, but not on Israel, which marked the drought to be, not accidental, but the special judgment of God." The Israelites were obliged to leave their cities and homes to seek water at a distance. [CALVIN.] 9. blasting—the blighting influence of the east wind on the corn (Genesis 41. 6). when . . . gardens . . . increased—in vain ye multiplied your gardens, &c., for I destroyed their produce. BOCHART supports Margin, "the multitude of your gardens," palmer-worm—a species of locust is here meant hurtful to fruits of trees, not to herbage or corn. The same east wind which brought the drought, blasting, and mildew, brought also the locusts into Judea [BOCHART] (Exodus 10. 13). 10. pestilence after the manner of Egypt—such as I formerly sent on the Egyptians (Exodus 9. 3, &c., 8, &c.; 12. 29; Deuteronomy 28. 27, 60). Cf. the same phrase, Isaiah 10. 24. have taken away your horses—lit., accompanied with the captivity of your horses: I have given up your young men to be slain, and their horses to be taken by the foe (cf. 2 Kings 13. 7). stink of your camps—i. e., of your slain men (cf. Isaiah 34. 3; Joel 2. 20). to come up unto your nostrils—The Hebrew is more emphatic, "to come up, and that unto your nostrils." 11. some of you—some parts of your territory. as God overthrew Sodom—(Deuteronomy 29. 23; Isaiah 13. 19; Jeremiah 49. 18; 50. 40; 2 Peter 2. 6; Jude 7.) "God" is often repeated in Hebrew instead of I. The earthquake here apparently alluded to is not that in the reign of Uzziah, which occurred "two years" later (ch. 1. 1). Traces of earthquakes and volcanic agency abound in Palestine: to some of the effects of these in previous times the allusion here is. Cf. the prophecy, Deuteronomy 28. 15-68, with v. 6-11 here. as a firebrand plucked out of . . . burning—(Cf. Isaiah 7. 4; Zechariah 3. 2.) The phrase is proverbial for a narrow escape from utter extinction. Though Israel revived as a nation under Jeroboam II, it was but for a time, and that after an almost utter destruction previously (2 Kings 14. 26). 12. Therefore—as all chastisements have failed to make thee "return unto me," thus will I do unto thee—as I have threatened (v. 2, 3). prepare to meet thy God—God is about to inflict the last and worst judgment on thee, the extinction of thy nationality; consider then what preparation thou canst make for encountering Him as thy foe (Jeremiah 46. 14; Luke 14. 31, 32). But as that would be madness to think of (Isaiah 27. 4; Ezekiel 22. 14; Hebrews 10. 31), see what can be done towards mitigating the severity of the coming judgment, by penitence (Isaiah 27. 5; 1 Corinthians 11. 31). This latter exhortation is followed up in ch. 5. 4, 6, 8, 14, 15. 13. The God whom Israel is to "prepare to meet" (v. 12) is here described in sublime terms. wind—not as Margin, "spirit." The God with whom thou hast to do is the Omnipotent Maker of things seen, such as the stupendous mountains, and of things too subtle to be seen, though of powerful agency, as the "wind," declareth unto man . . . his thought—(Psalm 139. 2.) Ye think that your secret thoughts escape my cognizance, but I am the searcher of hearts. maketh . . . morning darkness—(Ch. 5. 8; 8. 9.) Both lit. turning the sunshine into darkness, and fig. turning the prosperity of the ungodly into sudden adversity (Psalm 73. 12, 13, 19; cf. Jeremiah 13. 16). treadeth upon . . . high places—God treadeth down the proud of the earth. He subjects to Him all things however high they be (Micah 1. 3). Cf. Deuteronomy 32. 13; 33. 29, where the same phrase is used of God's people, elevated by God above every other human height.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-27. ELEGY OVER THE PROSTRATE KINGDOM: RENEWED EXHORTATIONS TO REPENTANCE: GOD DECLARES THAT THE COMING DAY OF JUDGMENT SHALL BE TERRIBLE TO THE SCORNEES WHO DESPISE IT: CEREMONIAL SERVICES ARE NOT ACCEPTABLE TO HIM WHERE TRUE PIETY EXISTS NOT: ISRAEL SHALL THEREFORE BE REMOVED FAR EASTWARD. 1. lamentation—an elegy for the destruction coming on you. Cf. Ezekiel 32. 2, "take up," viz., as a mournful burden (Ezekiel 19. 1; 27. 2). 2. virgin of Israel—the Israelite state heretofore unsubdued by foreigners. Cf. Isaiah 23. 12; Jeremiah 18. 13; 31. 4, 21; Lamentations 2. 13 may be interpreted, Thou who wast once the "virgin daughter of Zion." Rather, "virgin" as applied to a state implies its beauty, and the delights on which it prides itself, its luxuries, power, and wealth. [CALVIN.] no more rise—in the existing order of things: in the Messianic dispensation it is to rise again, according to many prophecies. Cf. 2 Kings 6. 23; 24. 7, for the restricted sense of "no more." 3. forsaken upon her land—or, "prostrated upon," &c. (cf. Ezekiel 29. 5; 32. 4). [MAURER.] 3. went out by a thousand—i. e., "the city from which there used to go out a thousand" equipped for war. "City" is put for "the inhabitants of the city," as in ch. 4. 8. shall leave . . . hundred—shall have only a hundred left, the rest being destroyed by sword and pestilence (Deuteronomy 28. 62). 4. Seek ye me, and ye shall live—lit., "Seek . . . me, and live." The second imperative expresses the certainty of "life" (escape from judgment) resulting from obedience to the precept in the first imperative. If they perish, it is their own fault; God would forgive, if they would repent (Isaiah 55. 3, 6). 5. seek not Beth-el—i. e., the calves at Beth-el. Gilgal—(Note, ch. 4. 4.) Beer-sheba—in Judah on the southern frontier towards Edom. Once "the well of the oath" by Jehovah, ratifying Abraham's covenant with Abimelech, and the scene of his calling on "the Lord, the everlasting God" (Genesis 21. 31, 33), now a stronghold of idolatry (ch. 8. 14). Gilgal shall surely go into captivity—a play on similar sounds in the Hebrew, Gilgal, galah, yigleh: "Gilgal (the place of rolling) shall rolling be rolled away." Beth-el shall come to naught—Beth-el (i. e., the house of God), called because of its vain idols Beth-aven (i. e., the house of vanity, or naught, Hosea 4. 15; 10. 5, 8), shall indeed "come to naught." 6. break out like fire—bursting through every thing in His way. God is "a consuming fire" (Deuteronomy 4. 24; Isaiah 10. 17; Lamentations 2. 3). the house of Joseph—the kingdom of Israel, of which the tribe of Ephraim, Joseph's son, was the chief tribe (cf. Ezekiel 37. 16). none to quench it in Beth-el—i. e., none in Beth-el to quench it; none of the Beth-el idols on which Israel so depended, able to remove the Divine judgments. 7. turn judgment to wormwood—i. e., pervert it to most bitter wrong. As justice is sweet, so injustice is bitterness to the injured. Wormwood is from a Hebrew root, to excrete, on account of its noxious and bitter qualities. leave off righteousness in . . . earth—MAURER translates, "cast righteousness to the ground," as in Isaiah 23. 2; Daniel 8. 12. 8. the seven stars—lit., the heap or cluster of seven larger stars and others smaller (Job 9. 9; 38. 31). The former whole passage seems to have been in Amos' mind. He names the stars well known to shepherds (to which class Amos belonged), Orion as the precursor of the tempests which are here threatened, and the Pleiades as ushering in spring,

shadow of death—Hebraism for the densest darkness. calleth for the waters of the sea—both to send deluges in judgment, and the ordinary rain in mercy (1 Kings 18. 44). 9. strengtheneth the spoiled—lit., spoil or devastation: hence the person spoiled. WINER, MAURER, and the best modern critics translate, "maketh devastation (or destruction) suddenly to arise," lit., maketh it to gleam forth like the dawn. Ancient versions support English Version. The Hebrew is elsewhere used, to make, to shine, to make glad; and as English Version here (Psalm 39. 13), "recover strength." the spoiled shall come—"devastation," or "destruction shall come upon." [MAURER.] English Version expresses that, strong as Israel fancies herself after the successes of Jeroboam II. (2 Kings 14. 25), even the weakest can be made by God to prevail against the strong. 10. him that rebuketh in the gate—the judge who condemns their iniquity in the place of judgment (Isaiah 29. 21). abhor him that speaketh uprightly—the prophet telling them the unwelcome truth: answering in the parallelism to the judge "that rebuketh in the gate" (cf. 1 Kings 22. 8; Proverbs 9. 8; 12. 1; Jeremiah 36. 23). 11. burdens of wheat—burdensome taxes levied in kind from the wheat of the needy, to pamper the lusts of the great. [HENDERSON.] Or wheat advanced in time of scarcity, and exacted again at a burdensome interest. [RABBI SALOMON.] built houses . . . but not dwell in them . . . vineyards, . . . but not drink wine of them—according to the original prophecy of Moses (Deuteronomy 28. 30, 33, 39). The converse shall be true in restored Israel (ch. 9. 14; Isaiah 65. 21, 22). they afflict . . . they take—rather, "(ye) who afflict . . . take." bribe—lit., a price with which one who has an unjust cause ransoms himself from your sentence (1 Samuel 12. 3, Marginal; Proverbs 6. 35). turn aside the poor in the gate—refuse them their right in the place of justice (ch. 2. 7; Isaiah 29. 21). 13. the prudent—the spiritually wise. shall keep silence—not mere silence of tongue, but the prudent shall keep himself quiet from taking part in any public or private affairs which he can avoid: as it is "an evil time," and one in which all law is set at naught. Ephesians 5. 16 refers to this. Instead of impatiently agitating against irremediable evils, the godly wise will not cast pearls before swine, who would trample these, and rend the offerers (Matthew 7. 6), but will patiently wait for God's time of deliverance in silent submission (Psalm 39. 9). 14. and so—on condition of your "seeking good." shall be with you as ye have spoken—as ye have boasted, viz., that God is with you, and that you are His people (Micah 3. 11). 15. Hate . . . evil . . . love . . . good—(Isaiah 1. 16, 17; Romans 12. 9.) judgment in the gate—justice in the place where causes are tried. It may be that the Lord . . . will be gracious—so, "peradventure" (Exodus 32. 30). Not that men are to come to God with an uncertainty whether or no He will be gracious: the expression merely implies the difficulty in the way, because of the want of true repentance on man's part, so as to stimulate the zealous earnestness of believers in seeking God (cf. Genesis 16. 2; Joel 2. 14; Acts 8. 22). the remnant of Joseph—(see v. 6.) Israel (represented by "Ephraim," the leading tribe, and descendant of Joseph) was, comparatively to what it once was, now but a remnant, Hazael of Syria having smitten all the coasts from Jordan eastward, Gilead and Bashan, Gad, Reuben, and Manasse (2 Kings 10. 32, 33). [HENDERSON.] Rather, "the remnant of Israel that shall have been left after the wicked have been destroyed." [MAURER.] 16. Therefore—resumed from v. 13. God foresees they will not obey the exhortation (v. 14, 15); but will persevere in the unrighteousness stigmatized (v. 7, 10, 12). the Lord (JEHOVAH), the God of hosts, the Lord—an accumulation of titles, of which His lordship over all things is the climax, to mark that from His judgment there is no appeal. streets . . . highways—the broad open spaces and the narrow streets common in the East. call the husbandman to mourning—the citizens shall call the inexperienced husbandmen to act the part usually performed by professional mourners, as there will not be enough of the latter for the universal mourning which prevails. such as are skillful of lamentation—professional mourners hired to lead off the lamentations for the deceased; alluded to in Ecclesiastes 12. 5; generally females (Jeremiah 9. 17-19). 17. In all vineyards . . . walling—where usually songs of joy were heard. pass through thee—taking vengeance (Exodus 12. 12, 23; Nahum 1. 12). "Pass over" and "pass by," on the contrary, are used of God's forgiving (Exodus 12. 23; Micah 7. 18; cf. ch. 7. 8). 18. Woe unto you who do not scruple to say in irony. "We desire that the day of the Lord would come," i. e., "Woe to you who treat it as if it were a mere dream of the prophets" (Isaiah 5. 19; Jeremiah 17. 15; Ezekiel 12. 22). to what end is it for you!—Amos taking their ironical words in earnest; for God often takes the blasphemer at his own word, in righteous retribution making the scoffer's jest a terrible reality against himself. Ye have but little reason to desire the day of the Lord; for it will be to you calamity, and not joy. 19. As if a man did flee . . . a lion, and a bear met him—trying to escape one calamity, he falls into another. This perhaps implies that in v. 18 their ironical desire for the day of the Lord was as if it would be an escape from existing calamities. The coming of the day of the Lord would be good news to us, if true; for we have served God (i. e., the golden calves). So do hypocrites flatter themselves as to death and judgment, as if these would be a relief from existing ills of life. The lion may from generosity spare the prostrate, but the bear spares none (cf. Job 20. 24; Isaiah 24. 18). leaned . . . on the wall—on the side wall of the house, to support himself from falling. Snakes often hide themselves in fissures in a wall. Those not reformed by God's judgments will be pursued by them: if they escape one, another is ready to seize them. 21. I hate, I despise—the two verbs joined without a conjunction express God's strong abhorrence. your fast-days—yours; not mine; I do not acknowledge them: unlike those in Judah, yours are of human, not Divine institution. I will not smell—i. e., I will take no delight in the sacrifices offered (Genesis 8. 21; Leviticus 26. 31). in your solemn assemblies—lit., days of restraint. Isaiah 1. 10-15 is parallel. Isaiah is fuller; Amos, more condensed. Amos condemns Israel not only on the ground of their thinking to satisfy God by sacrifices without obedience, the charge brought by Isaiah against the Jews, but also because even their external ritual was a mere corruption, and unsanctioned by God. 22. meat offerings—flour, &c. Unbloody offerings. peace offerings—offerings for obtaining from God peace and prosperity. Hebrew, thank offerings. 23. Take away from me—lit., "Take away, from upon me;" the idea being that of a burden pressing upon the bearer. So Isaiah 1. 14, "They are a trouble unto me (lit., a burden upon me): I am weary to bear them." the noise of thy songs—the hymns and instrumental music on sacred occasions are to me nothing but a disagreeable noise. I will not hear—Isaiah substitutes "prayers" (Isaiah 1. 15) for the "songs" and "melody" here; but, like Amos, closes with "I will not hear." 24. judgment—justice. run down—lit., roll, i. e., flow abundantly (Isaiah 48. 18). Without the desire to fulfil righteousness in the offerer, the sacrifice is hateful to God (1 Samuel 15. 22; Psalm 66. 18; Hosea 6. 6; Micah 6. 8). 25, 26. Have ye offered, &c.—Yes; ye have. "But (all the time with strange inconsistency) ye have borne (aloft in solemn pomp) the tabernacle (i. e., the portable shrine, or model tabernacle: small enough not to be detected by Moses; cf. Acts 19. 24) of your Molech" (that idol is "your god; I am not, though ye go through the form of presenting offerings to me). The question, "Have ye," is not a denial (for they did offer in the wilderness to Jehovah sacrifices of the cattle which they took with them in their nomad life there, Exodus 24. 4; Numbers 7. and 9. 1, &c.), but a strong affirmation (cf. 1 Samuel 2. 27, 28; Jeremiah 31. 20; Ezekiel 20. 4). The sin of Israel in Amos' time is the very sin of their forefathers, mocking God with worship, whilst at the same time worshipping idols (cf. Ezekiel 20. 39). It was clandestine in Moses' time, else he would have put it down; he was aware generally of their unfaithfulness, though not knowing the particulars (Deuteronomy 31. 21, 27). Molech . . . Chium—Molech, means king: answering to Mars

[BENGEL]; the Sun [JABLONSKI]; Saturn, the same as "Chium." [MAURER.] The LXX. translate "Chium" into Remphan, as Stephen quotes it (Acts 7. 42, 43). The same god had often different names. Molech is the Ammonite name; Chium, the Arabic and Persian name, written also Chevan. In an Arabic lexicon Chium means astere; so astrologers represented Saturn as a planet baleful in his influence. Hence the Phœnicians offered human sacrifices to him, children especially; so idolatrous Israel also. Rimmon was the Syrian name (2 Kings 5. 18); pronounced as Remvan, or "Remphan," just as Chium was also Chevan. Molech had the form of a king; Chevan, or Chium, of a star. [GROTIUS.] Remphan was the Egyptian name for Saturn; hence the LXX. translator of Amos gave the Egyptian name for the Hebrew, being an Egyptian. [HODIUS II. Bibl. 4. 115.] The same as the Nile, of which the Egyptians made the star Saturn the representative. [HARENBERG.] BENGEL considers Remphan or Rephan akin to Teraphim and Remphis, the name of a king of Egypt. The Hebrews became infected with Sabeanism, the oldest form of idolatry, the worship of the Saba or starry hosts in their stay in the Arabian desert, where Job notices its prevalence (Job 31. 26); in opposition, in v. 27, Jehovah declares Himself "the God of hosts." the star of your god—R. ISAAC CARO says all the astrologers represented Saturn as the star of Israel. Probably there was a figure of a star on the head of the image of the idol, to represent the planet Saturn; hence "images" correspond to "star" in the parallel clause. A star in hieroglyphics represents God (Numbers 24. 17). Images are either a Hebraism for image, or refer to the many images made to represent Chium. 27. beyond Damascus—In Acts 7, 43 it is "beyond Babylon," which includes beyond Damascus. In Amos' time, Damascus was the object of Israel's fear because of the Syrian wars. Babylon was not yet named as the place of their captivity. STEPHEN supplies this name. Their place of exile was in fact, as he states, "beyond Babylon," in Halah and Habor by the river Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (2 Kings 17. 6; cf. here ch. 1. 5; 4. 3; 6. 14). The road to Assyria lay through "Damascus." It is therefore specified, that not merely shall they be carried captives to Damascus, as they had been by Syrian kings (2 Kings 10. 32, 33; 13. 7), but, beyond that, to a region whence a return was not so possible as from Damascus. They were led captive by Satan into idolatry, therefore God caused them to go captive among idolaters. Cf. 2 Kings 15. 29; 16. 9; Isaiah 8. 4, whence it appears Tiglath-pileser attacked Israel and Damascus at the same time at Ahaz's request (Amos 3. 11).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-14. DENUNCIATION OF BOTH THE SISTER NATIONS (ESPECIALLY THEIR NOBLES) FOR WANTON SECURITY—ZION, AS WELL AS SAMARIA: THREAT OF THE EXILE; RUIN OF THEIR PALACES AND SLAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE: THEIR PERVERSE INJUSTICE. 1. named chief of the nations—i. e., you nobles, so eminent in influence, that your names are celebrated among the chief nations. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] Hebrew, "Men designated by name among the first-fruits of the nations," i. e., men of note in Israel, the people chosen by God as first of the nations (Exodus 19. 5; cf. Numbers 21. 20). [PISCATOR.] to whom . . . Israel came—i. e., the princes to whom the Israelites used to repair for the decision of controversies, recognizing their authority. [MAURER.] I prefer to refer "which" to the antecedent "Zion" and "Samaria;" these were esteemed "chief" strongholds among the heathen nations "to whom . . . Israel came" when it entered Canaan; v. 2 accords with this. 2. Calneh—on the east bank of the Tigris. Once powerful, but recently subjugated by Assyria (Isaiah 10. 9; about B. C. 791). Hamath—subjugated by Jeroboam II. (2 Kings 14. 25). Also by Assyria subsequently (2 Kings 18. 31). Cf. v. 14, below. Gath—subjugated by Uzziah (2 Chronicles 26. 6). 4. be they better—no. Their so recent subjugation renders it needless for me to tell you they are not. And yet they once were: still they could not defend themselves against the enemy

How vain, then, your secure confidence in the strength of Mounts Zion and Samaria! He takes cities respectively east, north, south, and west of Israel (cf. Nahum 3. 8). 3. Ye persuade yourselves that "the evil day" foretold by the prophets is "far off," though they declare it near (Ezekiel 12, 22, 27). Ye in your imagination put it far off, and therefore bring near violent oppression, suffering it to sit enthroned, as it were, among you (Psalm 94, 20). The notion of judgment being far off has always been an incentive to the sinner's recklessness of living (Ecclesiastes 8, 12, 13; Matthew 24, 48). Yet that very recklessness brings near the evil day which he puts far off. "Ye bring on fever by your intemperance, and yet would put it far off." [CALVIN.] 4. (See ch. 2. 8.) beds of ivory—i. e., adorned, or inlaid, with ivory (ch. 3, 15). stretch themselves—in luxurious self-indulgence. lambs out of the flock—picked out as the choicest, for their owners' selfish gratification. 5. chant—lit., mark distinct sounds and tones. viol—the lyre, or lute. invent . . . instruments . . . like David—they fancy they equal David in musical skill (1 Chronicles 23, 5; Nehemiah 12, 36). They defend their luxurious passion for music by his example: forgetting that he pursued this study when at peace and free from danger, and that for the praise of God; but they pursue for their own self-gratification, and that when God is angry and ruin is imminent. 6. drink . . . in bowls—in the large vessels or basins in which wine was mixed; not satisfied with the smaller *cup*s in which it was ordinarily drunk, after having been poured from the large mixer. chief ointments—i. e., the most costly: not for health or cleanliness, but wanton luxury. not grieved for the affliction of Joseph—lit., the breach, i. e., the national wound or calamity (Psalm 60, 2; Ezekiel 34, 4) of the house of Joseph (ch. 5, 6); resembling in this the heartlessness of their forefathers, the sons of Jacob, towards Joseph, "eating bread" whilst their brother lay in the pit, and then selling him to Ishmaelites. 7. Therefore . . . shall they go captive with the first—As they were first among the people in rank (v. 1), and anointed themselves "with the chief ointments" (v. 6), so shall they be among the foremost in going into captivity. banquet—lit., the merry-making shout of revellers; from an Arabic root, to cry out. In the Hebrew, "Marzeach," here, there is an allusion to "Mizraqu," bowls (v. 6). them that stretched themselves—on luxurious couches (v. 4). 8. the excellency of Jacob—(Psalm 47, 4) The sanctuary which was the great glory of the covenant people [VATABLUS] (Ezekiel 24, 21). The priesthood, and kingdom, and dignity, conferred on them by God. These, saith God, are of no account in my eyes towards averting punishment. [CALVIN.] hate his palaces—as being the store-houses of "robbery" (ch. 3, 10, 15). How sad a change from God's love of Zion's gates (Psalm 87, 2) and palaces (Psalm 48, 3, 13), owing to the people's sin! the city—collectively: both Zion and Samaria (v. 1). all that is therein—lit., its fulness: the multitude of men and of riches in it (cf. Psalm 24, 1). 9. If as many as ten (Leviticus 26, 26; Zechariah 8, 23) remain in a house (a rare case, and only in the scattered villages, as there will be scarcely a house in which the enemy will leave any), they shall all, to a man, die of the plague, a usual concomitant of war in the East (Jeremiah 24, 10; 44, 13; Ezekiel 6, 11). 10. a man's uncle—the nearest relatives had the duty of burying the dead (Genesis 25, 9; 35, 29; Judges 16, 31). No nearer relative was left of this man than an uncle. and he that burneth him—the uncle, who is also at the same time the one that burneth him (one of the "ten," v. 9). Burial was the usual Hebrew mode of disposing of their dead. But in cases of necessity, as when the men of Jabesh-gilead took the bodies of Saul and his three sons from the walls of Beth-shan and burned them to save them from being insulted by the Philistines, burning was practised. So in this case, to prevent contagion. the bones—i. e., the dead body (Genesis 50, 25). Perhaps here there is an allusion in the phrase to the emaciated condition of the body, which was little else but skin and bones. say unto him that is by the sides of the house—i. e., to the only one left of the ten in the interior of the house [MAURER] (cf. Note, Isaiah 14, 13). Hold thy tongue . . . we may not . . . mention . . . the Lord—After receiving the reply, that none is left besides the one addressed, when the man outside fancies the man still surviving inside to be on the point, as was customary, of expressing devout gratitude to God who spared him, the man outside interrupts him, "Hold thy tongue! for there is not now cause for mentioning with praise (Joshua 23, 7) the name of Jehovah:" for thou also must die; as all the ten are to die to the last man (v. 9; cf. ch. 8, 3). Formerly ye boasted in the name of Jehovah, as if ye were His peculiar people; now ye shall be silent and shudder at His name, as hostile to you, and as one from whom ye wish to be hidden (Revelation 6, 16). [CALVIN.] 11. commandeth, and he will smite—His word of command, when once given, cannot but be fulfilled (Isaiah 55, 11). His mere word is enough to smite with destruction. great house . . . little house—He will spare none, great or small (ch. 3, 15). JEROME interprets the great house as Israel, and the small house as Judah: the former being reduced to branches or ruins, lit., small drops; the latter, though injured with clefs or rents, which threaten its fall, yet still permitted to stand. 12. In turning judgment (justice) into gall (poison), and righteousness into hemlock (or wormwood; bitter and noxious), ye act as perversely as if one were to make horses to run upon a rock or to plough with oxen there. [MAURER.] As horses and oxen are useless on a rock, so ye are ineapable of fulfilling justice. [GROTIUS.] Ye impede the course of God's benefits, because ye are as it were a hard rock on which His favour cannot run. "Those that will not be tilled as fields, shall be abandoned as rocks." [CALVIN.] 13. rejoice in a thing of naught—i. e., in your vain and fleeting riches. Have we not taken to us horns—i. e., acquired power, so as to conquer our neighbours (2 Kings 14, 25). Horns are the Hebrew symbol of power, being the instrument of strength in many animals (Psalm 73, 10). 14. from the entering in of Hamath—the point of entrance for an invading army (as Assyria) into Israel from the north; specified here, as Hamath had been just before subjugated by Jeroboam II. (v. 2). Do not glory in your recently-acquired city, for it shall be the starting-point for the foe to afflict you. How sad the contrast to the feast of Solomon attended by a congregation from this same Hamath, the most northern boundary of Israel, to the Nile, the river of Egypt, the most southern boundary! unto the river of the wilderness—i. e., to Kedron, which empties itself into the north bay of the Dead Sea below Jericho (2 Chronicles 28, 15), the southern boundary of the ten tribes (2 Kings 14, 25, "from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain"). [MAURER.] To the river Nile, which skirts the Arabian wilderness, and separates Egypt from Canaan. [GROTIUS.] If this verse includes Judah, as well as Israel (cf. v. 1, Zion and Samaria), GROTIUS' view is correct; and it agrees with 1 Kings 8, 65.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-9. Chapters 7, 8., 9., contain VISIONS, WITH THEIR EXPLANATIONS. Ch. 7. consists of two parts: first (v. 1-9), PROPHECIES ILLUSTRATED BY THREE SYMBOLS: (1), A vision of grasshoppers or young locusts, which devour the grass, but are removed at Amos' entreaty; (2), Fire drying up even the deep, and withering part of the land, but removed at Amos' entreaty; (3), A plumb-line to mark the buildings for destruction. Secondly (v. 10-17), NARRATIVE OF AMAZIAH'S INTERRUPTION OF AMOS IN CONSEQUENCE OF THE FOREGOING PROPHECIES, AND PREDICTION OF HIS DOOM. 1. showed . . . me; and, behold—the same formula prefaces the three visions in this chapter, and the fourth in ch. 8, 1. grasshoppers—rather, locusts in the caterpillar state, from a Hebrew root, to creep forth; in the autumn the eggs are deposited in the earth; in the spring the young come forth. [MAURER.] the latter growth—viz., of grass, which comes up after the mowing. They do not in the East mow their grass and make hay of it, but cut it off the ground as they require it. the king's movings—the first-fruits of the mown grass, tyrannically exacted by the king from the people. The literal locusts, as in Joel, are probably symbols of human

foes: thus the growth of grass after the king's mowings will mean the political revival of Israel under Jeroboam II. (2 Kings 14, 25), after it had been mown down, as it were, by Hazael and Ben-hadad of Syria (2 Kings 13, 3). [GROTIUS.] 2. by whom shall Jacob arise?—If thou, O God, dost not spare, how can Jacob maintain his ground, reduced as he is by repeated attacks of the Assyrians, and ere long about to be invaded by the Assyrian Pul (2 Kings 15, 19, 20)? Cf. Isaiah 51, 19. The mention of "Jacob" as a plea that God should "remember for them His covenant" with their forefather, the patriarch (Psalm 106, 45). he is small—reduced in numbers and in strength. 3. repented for this—i. e., of this. The change was not in the mind of God (Numbers 2, 19; James 1, 17), but in the effect outwardly. God unchangeably does what is just; it is just that He should hear intercessory prayer (James 5, 16-18), as it would have been just for him to have let judgment take its course at once on the guilty nation, but for the prayer of one or two righteous men in it (cf. Genesis 18, 23-33; 1 Samuel 15, 11; Jeremiah 42, 10). The repentance of the sinner, and God's regard to His own attributes of mercy and covenantal love, also cause God outwardly to deal with him as if he repented (Jonah 3, 10), whereas the change in outward dealing is in strictest harmony with God's own unchangeableness. It shall not be—Israel's utter overthrow now. Pul was influenced by God to accept mercy and withdraw from Israel. 4. called to contend—i. e., with Israel judicially (Job 9, 3; Isaiah 66, 16; Ezekiel 33, 22). He ordered to come at His call the infliction of punishment by fire on Israel, i. e., drought (cf. ch. 4, 6-11). [MAURER.] Rather, war (Numbers 21, 28), viz., Tiglath-pileser. [GROTIUS.] devoured the . . . deep—i. e., a great part of Israel, whom he carried away. Waters are the symbol for many people (Revelation 17, 15). did eat up a part—viz., all the land (cf. ch. 4, 7) of Israel east of Jordan (1 Chronicles 5, 26; Isaiah 9, 1). This was a worse judgment than the previous one: the locusts ate up the grass; the fire not only affects the surface of the ground, but burns up the very roots and reaches even to the deep. 7. wall made by a plumb-line—viz., perpendicular. 8. plumb-line in . . . midst of . . . Israel—no longer are the symbols, as in the former two, stated generally; this one is expressly applied to Israel. God's long-suffering is worn out by Israel's perversity: so Amos ceases to intercede (cf. Genesis 18, 33). The plummet-line was used not only in building, but in destroying houses (2 Kings 21, 13; Isaiah 23, 17; 34, 11; Lamentations 2, 8). It denotes that God's judgments are measured out by the exactest rules of justice. Here it is placed in the midst of Israel, i. e., the judgment is not to be confined to an outer part of Israel, as by Tiglath-pileser; it is to reach the very centre. This was fulfilled when Shalmaneser, after a three years' siege of Samaria, took it, and carried away Israel captive finally to Assyria (2 Kings 17, 3, 5, 6, 23). not . . . pass by . . . any more—not forgive them any more (ch. 8, 2; Proverbs 19, 11; Micah 7, 18). 9. high places—dedicated to idols. of Isaac—they boasted of their following the example of their forefather Isaac, in erecting high places at Beer-sheba (ch. 5, 5; cf. Genesis 28, 23, 24; 46, 1); but he and Abraham erected them before the temple was appointed at Jerusalem; and to God, whereas they did so, after the temple had been fixed as the only place for sacrifices; and to idols. In the Hebrew here Isaac is written with s, instead of the usual ts; both forms mean laughter; the change of spelling perhaps expresses that their "high places of Isaac" may be well so called, but not as they meant by the name; for they are only fit to be laughed at in scorn. Probably, however, the mention of "Isaac" and "Israel" simply expresses that these names, which their degenerate posterity boasted in as if ensuring their safety, will not save them and their idolatrous "sanctuaries" on which they depended from ruin (cf. ch. 8, 14). house of Jeroboam with . . . sword—fulfilled in the extinction of Zachariah, son of Jeroboam II., the last of the descendants of Jeroboam I., who had originated the idolatry of the calves (2 Kings 15, 8-10).

10-17. AMAZIAH'S CHARGE AGAINST AMOS: HIS DOOM

FORETOLD. 10. priest of Beth-el—chief priest of the royal sanctuary to the calves at Beth-el. These being an engine of state policy to keep Israel separate from Judah, Amaziah construes Amos' words against them as treason. So in the case of Elijah and Jeremiah (1 Kings 18, 17; Jeremiah 37, 13, 14). So the antitype Jesus was charged (John 19, 12); political expediency being made in all ages the pretext for dishonouring God and persecuting His servants (John 11, 48-50). So in the case of Paul (Acts 17, 6, 7; 24, 5). in the midst of . . . Israel—probably alluding to Amos' own words, "in the midst of . . . Israel" (v. 8), foretelling the state's overthrow to the very centre. Not secretly, or in a corner, but openly, in the very centre of the state, so as to upset the whole utterly. land is not able to bear all his words—they are so many and so intolerable. A sedition will be the result. The mention of his being "priest of Beth-el" implies that it was for his own priestly gain, not for the king or state, he was so keen. 11. Jeroboam shall die, &c.—Amos had not said this: but that "the house of Jeroboam" should fall "with the sword" (v. 9). But Amaziah exaggerates the charge, to excite Jeroboam against him. The king, however, did not give ear to Amaziah, probably from religious awe of the prophet of Jehovah. 12. Also—Besides informing the king against Amos, lest that course should fail, as it did, Amaziah urges the troublesome prophet himself to go back to his own land Judah, pretending to advise him in friendliness. seer—said contemptuously in reference to Amos' visions which precede. there eat bread—you can earn a livelihood there, whereas remaining here you will be ruined. He judges of Amos by his own selfishness, as if regard to one's own safety and livelihood are the paramount considerations. So the false prophets (Ezekiel 13, 19) were ready to say whatever pleased their hearers, however false, for "handfuls of barley and pieces of bread." 13. prophesy not again—(Ch. 2, 12.) at Beth-el—Amaziah wants to be let alone at least in his own residence. the king's chapel—Beth-el was preferred by the king to Dan, the other seat of the calf-worship, as being nearer Samaria, the capital, and as hallowed by Jacob of old (Genesis 28, 16, 19; 35, 6, 7). He argues by implication against Amos' presumption, as a private man, in speaking against the worship sanctioned by the king, and that in the very place consecrated to it for the king's own devotions. king's court—i. e., residence; the seat of empire, where the king holds his court, and which thou oughtest to have revered. Samaria was the usual king's residence; but for the convenience of attending the calf-worship, a royal palace was at Beth-el also. 14. I was no prophet—in answer to Amaziah's insinuation (v. 12), that he discharged the prophetic office to earn his "bread" (like Israel's mercenary prophets). So far from being rewarded, Jehovah's prophets had to expect imprisonment and even death as the result of their prophesying in Samaria or Israel, whereas the prophets of Baal were maintained at the king's expense (cf. 1 Kings 18, 19). I was not, says Amos, of the order of prophets, or educated in their schools, and deriving a livelihood from exercising the public functions of a prophet. I am a shepherd (cf. v. 15, "flock;" the Hebrew for "herdman" includes the meaning, shepherd, cf. ch. 1, 1) in humble position, who did not even think of prophesying among you, until a Divine call impelled me to it. prophet's son—i. e., disciple. Schools of prophets are mentioned first in 1 Samuel; in these youths were educated to serve the theocracy as public instructors. Only in the kingdom of the ten tribes the continuance of the schools of the prophets is mentioned. They were missionary stations near the chief seats of superstition in Israel, and associations endowed with the Spirit of God; none were admitted but those to whom the Spirit had been previously imparted. Their spiritual fathers travelled about to visit the training-schools, and cared for the members and even their widows (2 Kings 4, 1, 2). The pupils had their common board in them, and after leaving them still continued members. The offerings which in Judah were given by the pious to the Levites, in Israel went to the schools of the prophets (2 Kings 4, 42). Prophecy (e. g., Elijah and (Elisha) in Israel was more connected with extraordinary events than in Judah, inasmuch as, in the absence of the legal hierarchy of the latter, it needed to have more palpable Divine sanction. sycamore—abounding in Palestine. The fruit was like the fig, but inferior; according to PLINY, a sort of compound, as the name expresses, of the fig and the mulberry. It was only eaten by the poorest (cf. 1 Kings 10. 27). gatherer—one occupied with their cultivation. [MAURER.] The mode of cultivating it was, they made an incision in the fruit when of a certain size, and on the fourth day afterwards it ripened (PLINY, H. N. 13. 7, 14). GROTIVS from JEROME says, if it be not plucked off and "gathered" (which favours English Version), it is spoiled by gnats. 15. took me as I followed the flock—so David was taken (2 Samuel 7. 8; Psalm 78. 70, 71). Messiah is the antitypical Shepherd (Psalm 23.; John 10). unto my people—against [MAURER]; so v. 16. Jehovah claims them still as His by right, though slighting His authority. God would recover them to His service by the prophet's ministry. 16. drop—distil as the refreshing drops of rain (Deuteronomy 32. 2; Ezekiel 21. 2; cf. Micah 2. 6, 11). 17. Thy wife shall be an harlot in the city—i. e., shall be forced by the enemy, whilst thou art looking on, unable to prevent her dishonour (Isaiah 13. 16; Lamentations 5. 11). The words, "saith THE LORD," are in striking opposition to "Thou sayest" (v. 16). divided by line—among the foe. a polluted land—Israel regarded every foreign land as that which really her own land was now, "polluted" (Isaiah 24. 5; Jeremiah 2. 7).

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-14. VISION OF A BASKET OF SUMMER FRUIT, SYMBOLICAL OF ISRAEL'S END. RESUMING THE SERIES OF SYMBOLS INTERRUPTED BY AMAZIAH, AMOS ADDS A FOURTH, THE AVARICE OF THE OPPRESSORS OF THE POOR: THE OVERTHROW OF THE NATION: THE WISH FOR THE MEANS OF RELIGIOUS COUNSEL, WHEN THERE SHALL BE A FAMINE OF THE WORD. 1. summer fruit—Hebrew, Kitz. In v. 2 "end" is in Hebrew Keetz. The similarity of sounds implies that, as the summer is the end of the year and the time of the ripeness of fruits, so Israel is ripe for her last punishment, ending her national existence. As the fruit is plucked when ripe from the tree, so Israel from her land. 2. end—(Ezekiel 7. 2, 6.) 3. songs of . . . temple—(Ch. 5. 23.) The joyous hymns in the temple of Judah (or rather, in the Beth-el "royal temple," ch. 7. 13; for the allusion is to Israel, not Judah, throughout this chapter) shall be changed into howlings. GROTIVS translates, "palace;" cf. ch. 6. 5, as to the songs there. But ch. 5. 23, and 7. 13, favour English Version, they shall cast them forth with silence—not as Margin, "be silent." It is an adverb, silently. There shall be so great slaughter as even to prevent the bodies being buried. [CALVIN.] There shall be none of the usual professional mourners (ch. 5. 16), but the bodies will be cast out in silence. Perhaps also it is meant, terror both of God (cf. ch. 6. 10) and of the foe shall close their lips. 4. Hear—The nobles needed to be urged thus, as hating to hear reproof. swallow up the needy—or, gape after, i. e., pant for their goods; so the word is used, Job 7. 2, Margin, to make the poor . . . to fail—"that they (themselves) may be placed alone in the midst of the earth" (Isaiah 5. 8). 5. So greedy are they of unjust gain that they cannot spare a single day, however sacred, from pursuing it. They are strangers to God and enemies to themselves, who love market days better than sabbath days; and they who have lost piety will not long keep honesty. The new moon (Numbers 10. 10) and sabbath were to be kept without working or trading (Nehemiah 10. 31). set forth wheat—lit., "open out" stores of wheat for sale. ephah—containing three seahs, or above three pecks. making . . . small—making it below the just weight to purchasers. shekel great—taking from purchasers a greater weight of money than was due. Shekels used to be weighed out in payments (Genesis 23. 16). Thus they committed a double fraud against the law (Deuteronomy 25. 13, 14). 6. buy . . . poor for silver . . . pair of shoes—i. e., that we may compel the needy for money, or any other thing of however little

worth, to sell themselves to us as bondmen, in defiance of Leviticus 25. 39; the very thing which brings down God's judgment (ch. 2. 6). sell the refuse of . . . wheat—which contains no nutriment, but which the poor eat at a low price, being unable to pay for flour. 7. Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob—i. e., by Himself, in whom Jacob's seed glory. [MAURER.] Rather, by the spiritual privileges of Israel, the adoption as His peculiar people [CALVIN;] the temple, and its Shekinah symbol of His presence. Cf. ch. 6. 8, where it means Jehovah's temple (cf. ch. 4. 2). never forget—not pass by without punishing (v. 2; Hosea 8. 13; 9. 9). 8. the land . . . rise up wholly as a flood—the land will, as it were, be wholly turned into a flooding river (a flood being the image of overwhelming calamity, Daniel 9. 26). cast out and drowned, &c.—swept away and overwhelmed, as the land adjoining the Nile is by it, when flooding (ch. 9. 5). The Nile rises generally twenty feet. The waters then "cast out" mire and dirt (Isaiah 57. 20). 9. "Darkness" made to rise "at noon" is the emblem of great calamities (Jeremiah 15. 9; Ezekiel 32. 7-10). 10. baldness—a sign of mourning (Isaiah 15. 2; Jeremiah 48. 37; Ezekiel 7. 18). I will make it as . . . mourning of an only son—"it," i. e., the earth (v. 9). I will reduce the land to such a state that there shall be the same occasion for mourning as when parents mourn for an only son (Jeremiah 6. 26; Zechariah 12. 10). 11. famine of . . . hearing the words of the Lord—a just retribution on those who now will not hear the Lord's prophets, nay even try to drive them away, as Amaziah did (ch. 7. 12); they shall look in vain, in their distress, for Divine counsel, such as the prophets now offer (Ezekiel 7. 26; Micah 3. 7). Cf. as to the Jews' rejection of Messiah, and their consequent rejection by Him (Matthew 21. 43); and their desire for Messiah too late (Luke 17. 22; John 7. 34; 8. 21). So, the prodigal when he had sojourned a while in the "far-off country, began to be in want" in the "mighty famine" which arose (Luke 15. 14; cf. 1 Samuel 3. 1; 7. 2). It is remarkable, the Jews' religion is almost the only one that could be abolished against the will of the people themselves, on account of its being dependent on a particular place, viz., the temple. When that was destroyed, the Mosaic ritual, which could not exist without it, necessarily ceased. Providence designed it, that, as the law gave way to the gospel, so all men should perceive it was so, in spite of the Jews' obstinate rejection of the gospel. 12. they shall wander from sea to sea—i. e., from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean, from east to west. from . . . north . . . to . . . east—where we might expect "from north to south." But so alienated was Israel from Judah, that no Israelite even then would think of repairing southward, i. e., to Jerusalem for religious information. The circuit is traced as in Numbers 34. 3, &c., except that the south is omitted. Their seeking the word of the Lord would not be from a sincere desire to obey God, but under the pressure of punishment. 13. faint for thirst—viz., thirst for hearing the words of the Lord, being destitute of all other comfort. If even the young and strong faint, how much more the infirm (Isaiah 40. 30, 31)! 14. swear by the sin of Samaria—viz., the calves (Deuteronomy 9. 21; Hosea 4. 15). "Swear by" means to worship (Psalm 68. 11). The manner—i. e., as "the way" is used (Psalm 139. 24; Acts 9. 2), the mode of worship. Thy God, O Dan—the other golden calf at Dan (1 Kings 22. 26-30). liveth . . . liveth—rather, "May thy god . . . live . . . may the manner . . . live." Or, "As (surely as) thy God, O Dan, liveth." This is their formula when they swear; not "May Jehovah live!" or, "As Jehovah liveth!"

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-15. FIFTH AND LAST VISION. None can escape the coming judgment in any hiding-place: for God is omnipresent and irresistible (v. 1-6). As a kingdom, Israel shall perish as if it never was in covenant with Him: but as individuals the house of Jacob shall not utterly perish, nay, not one of the least of the righteous shall fall, but only all the sinners (v. 7-10). Restoration of the Jews finally to their own land after the re-establishment of the fallen tabernacle of David; conse quent conversion of all the heathen (v. 11-15). 1. Lord . . . upon the altar—viz., in the idolatrous temple at Beth-el; the calves of which were spoken of in the verse just preceding, of ch. 8. Hither they would flee for protection from the Assyrians, and would perish in the ruins, with the vain object of their trust. [HENDERSON.] Jehovah stands here to direct the destruction of it, them, and the idolatrous nation. He demands many victims on the altar, but they are to be human victims. CALVIN and FAIRBAIRN, &c., make it in the temple at Jerusalem. Judgment was to descend both on Israel and Judah. As the services of both alike ought to have been offered on the Jerusalem temple-altar, it is there that Jehovah ideally stands, as if the whole people were assembled there, their abominations lying unpardoned there, and crying for vengeance, though in fact committed elsewhere (cf. Ezekiel 8, 1-18). This view harmonizes with the similarity of the vision in Amos to that in Isaiah 6., at Jerusalem. Also with the end of this chapter (v. 11-15), which applies both to Judah and Israel: "the tabernacle of David," viz., at Jerusalem. His attitude, standing, implies fixity of purpose. Intel—rather, the spherelike capital of the column. [MAURER.] posts—rather, thresholds, as in Isaiah 6, 4. Margin. The temple is to be smitten below as well as above, to ensure utter destruction. cut them in the head—viz., with the broken fragments of the capitals and columns (cf. Psalm 68, 21; Habakkuk 3, 13). slay the last of them—their posterity. [HENDERSON.] The survivors. [MAURER.] Jehovah's directions are addressed to His angels, ministers of judgment (cf. Ezekiel 9). he that fleeth . . . shall not flee away—he who fancies himself safe and out of reach of the enemy shall be taken (ch. 2, 14). 2. Though they dig into hell—Though they hide ever so deeply in the earth (Psalm 139, 8). though they climb . . . heaven—though they ascend the greatest heights (Job 20, 6, 7; Jeremiah 51, 53; Obadiah 4). 3. Carmel—where the forests, and, on the west side, the caves, furnished hiding-places (ch. 1, 2; Judges 6, 2; 1 Samuel 13, 6). the sea—the Mediterranean, which flows at the foot of Mount Carmel; forming a strong antithesis to it. command the serpent—the sea-serpent, a term used for any great water-monster (Isaiah 27, 1). The symbol of cruel and oppressive kings (Psalm 74, 13, 14). 4. though they go into captivity—hoping to save their lives by voluntarily surrendering to the foe. 5. As Amos had threatened that nowhere should the Israelites be safe from the Divine judgments, he here shows God's omnipotent ability to execute His threats. So in the case of the threat in ch. 8, 8, God is here stated to be the first cause of the mourning of all that dwell in the land, and of its rising like a flood, and of its being drowned as by the flood of Egypt. 6. stories—lit., ascents, i. e., upper chambers, to which the ascent is by steps [MAURER]; evidently referring to the words, Psalm 104, 3, 13. GROTIUS explains it, God's royal throne, expressed in language drawn from Solomon's throne, to which the ascent was by steps (cf. 1 Kings 10, 18, 19). founded his troop—viz., all animate creatures, which are God's troop, or host (Genesis 2, 1), doing His will (Psalm 103, 20, 21; Joel 2, 11). MAURER translates, "His vault," i. e., the vaulted sky, which seems to rest on the earth supported by the horizon. 7. unto me—however great ye seem to yourselves. Do not rely on past privileges, and on my having delivered you from Egypt, as if therefore I never would remove you from Canaan. I make no more account of you than of "the Ethiopian" (cf. Jeremiah 13, 23). "Havenot I (who) brought you out of Egypt," done as much for other peoples? For instance, did I not bring "the Philistines (Notes, Isaiah 14, 29, &c.) from Caphtor (cf. Deuteronomy 2, 23; Note, Jeremiah 47, 4), where they had been bond-servants, and the Syrians from Kir?" It is appropriate, that as the Syrians migrated into Syria from Kir (cf. Note, Isaiah 22, 6), so they should be carried back captive into the same land (Note, ch. 1, 5; 2 Kings 16, 9), just as elsewhere Israel is threatened with a return to Egypt whence they had been delivered. The "Ethioplans," Hebrew, Cushites, were originally akin to the race that founded Babylon: the cuneiform inscriptions in this confirming independently the Scripture statement (Genesis 10, 6, 8, 10). 8. eyes . . . upon the sinful kingdom—i. e., I am watching all its sinful course in order to punish it (cf. v. 4; Psalm 34, 15, 16). not utterly destroy the house of Jacob—though as a "kingdom" the nation is now utterly to perish, a remnant is to be spared for "Jacob" their forefather's sake (cf. Jeremiah 30, 11); to fulfil the covenant whereby "the seed of Israel" is hereafter to be "a nation for ever" (Jeremiah 31, 36). 9. sift—I will cause the Israelites to be tossed about through all nations as corn is shaken about in a sieve, in such a way, however, that whilst the chaff and dust (the wicked) fall through (perish), all the solid grains (the godly elect) remain (are preserved), (Romans 11, 26; cf. Note, Jeremiah 3, 14). So spiritual Israel's final safety is ensured (Luke 22, 32; John 10, 28; 6, 39). 10. All the sinners—answering to the chaff in the image in v. 9; which falls on the earth, in opposition "to the grain" that does not "fall." overtake . . . us—"come on us from behind." [MAURER.] 11. In that day—quoted by St. James (Acts 15, 16, 17), "After this," i. e., in the dispensation of Messiah (Genesis 49, 10; Hosea 3, 4, 5; Joel 2, 28; 3, 1). tabernacle of David—not "the house of David," which is used of his affairs when prospering (2 Samuel 3, 1), but the tent or booth, expressing the low condition to which his kingdom and family had fallen in Amos' time, and subsequently at the Babylonian captivity before the restoration; and secondarily, in the last days preceding Israel's restoration under Messiah, the antitype to David (Psalm 102, 13, 14; Note, Isaiah 12, 1; Jeremiah 30, 9; Ezekiel 34, 24; 37, 24). The type is taken from architecture (Ephesians 2, 20). The restoration under Zerubbabel can only be a partial, temporary fulfilment; for it did not include Israel, which nation is the main subject of Amos' prophecies, but only Judah; also Zerubbabel's kingdom was not independent and settled; also all the prophets end their prophecies with Messiah, whose advent is the cure of all previous disorders. "Tabernacle" is appropriate to Him, as His human nature is the tabernacle which He assumed in becoming Immanuel, "God with us" (John 1, 14). "Dwelt," lit., tabernacled "among us" (cf. Revelation 21, 3). Some understand "the tabernacle of David" as that which David pitched for the ark in Zion, after bringing it from Obed-edom's house. It remained there all his reign for thirty years, till the temple of Solomon was built; whereas the "tabernacle of the congregation" remained at Gibeon (2 Chronicles 1, 2), where the priests ministered in sacrifices (1 Chronicles 16, 39). Song and praise was the service of David's attendants before the ark (Asaph, &c.); a type of the gospel separation between the sacrificial service (Messiah's priesthood now in heaven) and the access of believers on earth to the presence of God, apart from the former (cf. 2 Samuel 6, 12-17; 1 Chronicles 16, 37-39; 2 Chronicles 1, 3). branches thereof—lit., of them, i. e., of the whole nation, Israel as well as Judah. as in . . . days of old—as it was formerly in the days of David and Solomon, when the kingdom was in its full extent and undivided. 12. That they may possess . . . remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen—"Edom," the bitter foe, though the brother, of Israel; therefore to be punished (ch. 1, 11, 12). Israel shall be lord of the "remnant" of Edom left after the punishment of the latter. St. James quotes it, "That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles," &c. For "all the heathen" nations stand on the same footing as Edom: Edom is the representative of them all. The residue or remnant in both cases expresses those left after great antecedent calamities (Romans 9, 27; Zechariah 14, 16). Here the conversion of "all nations" (of which the earnest was given in St. James' time) is represented as only to be realized on the re-establishment of the theocracy under Messiah, the Heir of the throne of David (v. 11). The possession of the heathen nations by Israel is to be spiritual, the latter being the ministers to the former for their conversion to Messiah, King of the Jews; just as the first conversions of heathens were through the ministry of the apostles, who were Jews. Cf. Isaiah 51, 3, "thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles" (cf. Isaiah 49, 8; Romans 4, 13). A remnant of Edom became Jews under John Hyrcanus, and the rest amalgamated with the Arabians, who became Christians subsequently, which are called by my name—i. e., who belong to me, whom I claim as mine (Psalm 2. 8); in the purposes of electing grace, God terms them already called by His name. Cf. the title, "the children," applied by anticipation, Hebrews 2. 14. Hence as an act of sovereign grace, fulfilling His promise, it is spoken of God. Proclaim His title as sovereign, "the Lord that doeth this" ("all these things," Acts 15. 17, viz., all these and such like acts of sovereign love). 13. the days come—at the future restoration of the Jews to their own land. ploughman shall overtake . . . reaper . . . treader of grapes him that soweth—fulfilling Leviticus 26. 5. Such shall be the abundance that the harvest and vintage can hardly be gathered before the time for preparing for the next crop shall come. Instead of the greater part of the year being spent in war, the whole shall be spent in sowing and reaping the fruits of earth. Cf. Isaiah 65. 21-23, as to the same period. soweth seed—hil., draweth it forth, viz., from the sack in order to sow it. mountain . . . drop sweet wine—an appropriate image, as the vines in Palestine were trained on terraces at the sides of the hills. 14. build the waste cities—(Isaiah 61. 4; Ezekiel 36. 33-36.) 15. plant them . . . no more be pulled up—(Jeremiah 32. 41.) thy God—Israel's; this is the ground of their restoration, God's original choice of them as His.

OBADIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

THIS is the shortest book in the Old Testament. The name means "servant of Jehovah." Obadiah stands fourth of the minor prophets according to the Hebrew arrangement of the canon, the fifth according to the Greek. Some consider he is the same as the Obadiah who superintended the restoration of the temple under Josiah, B. C. 627 (2 Chronicles 34. 12). But v. 11-16, 20 imply that Jerusalem was by this time overthrown by the Chaldeans, and that he refers to the cruelty of Edom towards the Jews on that occasion, which is referred to also in Lamentations 4. 21, 22; Ezekiel 25. 12-14, and 35; Psalm 137. 7. From comparing v. 5 with Jeremiah 49. 9; v. 6 with Jeremiah 49. 10; v. 8 with Jeremiah 49. 7, it appears that Jeremiah embodied in his prophecies part of Obadiah's, as he had done in the case of other prophets also (cf. Isaiah 15. and 16. with Jeremiah 48). The reason for the present position of Obadiah before other of the minor prophets anterior in date is, Amos at the close of his prophecies foretells the subjugation of Edom hereafter by the Jews; the arranger of the minor prophets in one volume, therefore, placed Obadiah next, as being a fuller statement, and, as it were, a commentary on the foregoing briefer prophecy of Amos as to Edom [MAURER] (cf. Amos 1. 11). The date of Obadiah's prophecies was probably immediately after the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, 588 B. C. In five years afterwards (583 B. C.) Edom was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah must have incorporated part of Obadiah's prophecies with his own immediately after they were uttered, thus stamping his canonicity.

JEROME makes him contemporary with Hosea, Joel, and Amos. It is an argument in favour of this view that Jeremiah would be more likely to insert in his prophecies a portion from a preceding prophet than from a contemporary. If so, the allusion in v. 11-14 will be to some one of the former captures of Jerusalem: by the Egyptians under Rehoboam (1 Kings 14. 25, 26; 2 Chronicles 12. 2, &c.), or that by the Philistines and Arabians in the reign of Joram (2 Chronicles 21. 16, 17); or that by Joash, king of Israel, in the reign of Amaziah (2 Chronicles 25. 22, 23); or that in the reign of Jehoiakim (2 Kings 24. 1, &c.); or that in the reign of Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24. 8-16). On all occasions the Idumeans were hostile to the Jews; and the terms in which that enmity is characterized are not stronger in Obadiah than in Joel 3. 19 (cf. Obadiah 10); Amos 1. 11, 12. The probable capture of Jerusalem alluded to by Obadiah is that by Joash and the Israelites in the reign of Amaziah. For as, a little before, in the reign of the same Amaziah, the Jews had treated harshly the Edomites after conquering them in battle (2 Chronicles 25. 11-23), it is probable that the Edomites, in revenge, joined the Israelites in the attack on Jerusalem. [JAEGER.]

This book may be divided into two parts: (I.) v. 1-6 set forth Edom's violence toward his brother Israel in the day of the latter's distress, and his coming destruction with the rest of the foes of Judah; (II.) v. 17-21, the coming re-establishment of the Jews in their own possessions, to which shall be added those of the neighbouring peoples, and especially those of Edom.

Ver. 1-21. DOOM OF EDOM FOR CRUELTY TO JUDAH, EDOM'S BROTHER; RESTORATION OF THE JEWS. 1. Obadiah—i. e., servant of Jehovah; same as Abdeel and Arabic Abd-allah. We—I and my people. heard—(Isaiah 21. 10.) and an ambassador is sent—yea, an ambassador is already sent, viz., an angel, to stir up the Assyrians (and afterwards the Chaldeans) against Edom. The result of the ambassador's message on the heathen is, they simultaneously exclaim, "Arise ye, and let us (with united strength) rise," &c. Jeremiah 49. 14 quotes this. 2. I have made thee small—thy reduction to insignificance is as sure as if it were already accomplished; therefore the past tense is used. [MAURER.] Edom then extended from Dedan of Arabia to Bozrah in the north (Jeremiah 49. 8, 13). CALVIN explains it, "Whereas thou wast made by me an insignificant people, why art thou so proud" (v. 3)? But if so, why should the heathen peoples be needed to subdue one so insignificant? Jeremiah 49. 15, confirms MAURER'S view. 3. clefts of . . . rock—(Song of Solomon 2. 14; Jeremiah 48. 23.) The cities of Edom, and among them Petra (Hebrew, Sela, meaning rock, 2 Kings 14. 7, Margin), the capital, in the Wady Musa, consisted of houses mostly cut in the rocks. 4. exalt thyself—or suppl^y from the second clause, "thy nest" [MAURER] (cf. Job 20. 6; Jeremiah 49. 16; Amos 9. 2.). set . . . nest among . . . stars—viz., on the loftiest hills which seem to reach the very stars. Edom is a type of Antichrist (Isaiah 14. 13; Daniel 8. 10; 11. 37). thence will I bring thee down—in spite of thy boast (v. 3), "Who shall bring me down?" 5. The spoliation which thou shalt suffer shall not be such as that which thieves cause, bad as that is, for these when they have seized enough, or all they can get in a hurry, leave the rest,—nor such as grape-gatherers cause in a vineyard, for they, when they have gathered most of the grapes, leave gleanings behind,—but it shall be utter, so as to leave thee nothing. The exclamation, "How art thou cut off!" bursting in amidst the words of the image, marks strongly-excited feeling. The contrast between Edom where no gleanings shall be left, and Israel where at the worst a gleanings is left (Isaiah 17. 6; 24. 13), is striking. 6. How are the things of Esau searched out—by hostile soldiers seeking booty. Cf. with v. 5, 6 here, Jeremiah 49. 9, 10. hidden things—places. Edom abounded in such hiding-places, as caves, clefts in the rock, &c. None of these should be left unexplored by the foe. 7. Men of thy confederacy—i. e., thy confederates. brought thee . . . to the border—i. e., when Idumean ambassadors shall go to confederate states seeking aid, these latter shall conduct them with due ceremony to their border, giving them empty compliments, but not the aid required. [DRAUSIUS.] This view agrees with the context, which speaks of false friends deceiving Edom: i. e., failing to give help in need (cf. Job 6. 14, 15). CALVIN translates, "have driven," i. e., shall drive thee; shall help to drive thee to thy border on thy way into captivity in foreign lands. them that were at peace with thee—lit., the men of thy peace. Cf. Psalm 41. 9; Jeremiah 38. 22 (Margin), where also the same formula occurs, "prevailed against thee." they that eat thy bread—the poorer tribes of the desert who subsisted on the bounty of Edom. Cf. again Psalm 41. 9, which seems to have been before Obadiah's mind; as his words were before Jeremiah's. have laid a wound under thee—"laid" implies that their intimacy was used as a snare laid with a view to wound; also, these guest-friends of Edom, instead of the cushions ordinarily laid under guests at table, laid snares to wound, viz., had a secret understanding with Edom's foe for that purpose. MAURER translates, "a snare." But English Version agrees with the Hebrew, which means, lit., "a bandage for a wound." none understanding—none of the wisdom for which Edom was famed (see v. 8) to extricate him from his perilous position. in him—instead of "in thee." The change implies the alienation of God from Edom: Edom has so estranged himself from God, that He speaks now of him, not to him. 8. (Isaiah 49. 7; cf. Job 5. 12, 13; Isaiah 19. 3; Jeremiah 19. 7.) in that day . . . even destroy—heretofore Edom, through its intercourse with Babylon and Egypt, and from its means of information through the many caravans passing to and fro between Europe and India, has been famed for knowledge; but in that day at last ("even") I will destroy its wise men. mount of Esau—i. e., Idumea, which was a mountainous region. 9. cut off by slaughter—MAURER translates, "on account of the slaughter," viz., that inflicted on Judea by Edom (cf. v. 14). LXX., Syriac and Vulgate connect these words with v. 10, "for the slaughter, for the violence (of which thou art guilty) against thy brother Jacob," &c. English Version, "cut off by slaughter" (i. e., an utter cutting off), answers well to "cut off for ever" (v. 10). However, the arrangement of LXX. gives a better parallelism in v. 10. "For the slaughter" (1) being balanced in just retribution by "thou shalt be cut off for ever" (4); as "For thy violence (not so bad as slaughter) against thy brother Jacob" (2) is balanced by "shame (not so bad as being cut off) shall cover thee" (3). Shame and extinction shall repay violence and slaughter (Matthew 26. 52; Revelation 13. 10). Cf. as to Edom's violence, Psalm 137. 7; Ezekiel 25. 12; Amos 1. 11. 10. against thy brother—this aggravates the sin of Esau, that it was against him who was his brother by birth and by circumcision. The posterity of Esau followed in the steps of their father's hatred to Jacob by violence against Jacob's seed (Genesis 27. 41). Jacob—not merely his own brother, but his twin brother; hence the name Jacob is here put emphatically, not Israel. Cf. Deuteronomy 23. 7 for the opposite feeling which Jacob's seed was commanded to entertain towards Edom's, shame . . . cover thee—(Psalm 35. 26; 69. 7.) for ever—(Isaiah 34. 10; Ezekiel 35. 9; Malachi 1. 4.) Idumea, as a nation, should be "cut off for ever," though the land should be again inhabited. 11. thou stoodest on the other side—in an attitude of hostility, rather than the sympathy which became a brother, festling thine eyes (see v. 12) with the misery of Jacob, and eagerly watching for his destruction. So Messiah, the antitype to Jerusalem, abandoned by His kinsmen (Psalm 38. 11). strangers—the Philistines, Arabians in the reign of Jehoram, &c. (2 Chronicles 21. 16); the Syrians in the reign of Joash of Judah (2 Chronicles 21. 24); the Chaldeans (2 Chronicles 36). carried . . . captive his forces—his "host" (v. 20); the multitude of Jerusalem's inhabitants. cast lots upon Jerusalem—(Joel 3. 3.) So Messiah, Jerusalem's antitype, had his only earthly possessions cast lots for (Psalm 22. 18). 12. looked on—with malignant pleasure, and a brutal stare. So the antitypes, Messiah's foes (Psalm 22. 17). MAURER translates, as Margin, "thou shouldst not look"

any more. English Version agrees with the context better. the day of thy brother—his day of calamity. became a stranger—i. e., was banished as an alien from his own land. God sends heavy calamities on those who rejoice in the calamities of their enemies (Proverbs 17. 5; 24. 17, 18). Contrast the opposite conduct of David and of the Divine Son of David in a like case (Psalm 35. 13-15). spoken proudly—lit., made great the mouth: proudly insulting the fallen (Ezekiel 35. 13, Margin; cf. 1 Samuel 2. 3; Revelation 13. 6). 13. substance—translated "forces" in v. 11. 14. stood in the crossway, to cut off those of his (Judah's) that did escape—the Jews naturally fled by the crossways (MAURER translates, "narrow mountain passes") well known to them, to escape to the desert, and through Edom to Egypt; but the Edomites stood ready to intercept the fugitives, and either kill or "deliver them up" to the foe. 15. For—resumptive in connection with v. 10, wherein Edom was threatened with cutting off for ever. the day of the Lord—the day in which He will manifest Himself as the Righteous Punisher of the ungodly peoples (Joel 3. 14). The "all" shows that the fulfilment is not exhausted in the punishment inflicted on the surrounding nations by the instrumentality of Nebuchadnezzar; but, as in Joel 3. 14, and Zechariah 12. 3, that the last judgment to come on the nations confederate against Jerusalem is referred to, as thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee—the righteous principle of retribution in kind (Leviticus 24. 17; Matthew 7. 2; cf. Judges 1. 6, 7; 8. 19; Esther 7. 10). thy reward—the reward of thy deed (cf. Isaiah 3. 9-11). 16. ye . . . upon my holy mountain—a periphrasis for, "ye Jews" [MAURER], whom Obadiah now by a sudden apostrophe addresses. The clause, "upon my holy mountain," expresses the reason of the vengeance to be taken on Judah's foes, viz., that Jerusalem is God's holy mountain, the seat of His temple, and Judah His covenant people. Jeremiah 49. 12, which is copied from Obadiah, establishes this view (cf. 1 Peter 4. 17). as ye have drunk, &c.—viz., the cup of wrath, being dispossessed of your goods and places as a nation, by Edom and all the heathen; so shall all the heathen (Edom included) drink the same cup (Psalm 60. 3; Isaiah 51. 17, 22; Jeremiah 13. 12, 13; 25. 15-33; 49. 12; 51. 7; Lamentations 4. 21, 22; Nahum 3. 11; Habakkuk 2. 16). continually—whereas Judah's calamity shall be temporary (v. 17). The foes of Judah shall never regain their former position (v. 18, 19). swallow down—so as not to leave anything in the cup of calamity; not merely "drink" (Psalm 75. 8). be as though they had not been—not a trace left of their national existence (Job 10. 19; Psalm 37. 36; Ezekiel 26. 21). 17. upon . . . Zion . . . deliverance—both in the literal sense and spiritual sense (Joel 2. 32; Isaiah 46. 16; 59. 20; Romans 11. 26). MAURER as Margin explains it, "there shall be a remnant that shall escape." Cf. Isaiah 37. 32; to the deliverance from Sennacherib there described GROTIUS thinks Obadiah here refers. "Jerusalem shall not be taken, and many of the neighbouring peoples also shall find deliverance there." Unlike Judah's heathen foes of whom no remnant shall escape (v. 9, 16), a remnant of Jews shall escape when the rest of the nation has perished, and shall regain their ancient "possessions." there shall be holiness—i. e., Zion shall be sacrosanct or inviolable; no more violated by foreign invaders (Isaiah 42. 1; Joel 3. 17). 18. fire—see the same figure, Numbers 21. 28; Isaiah 5. 21; 10. 17. house of Jacob . . . Joseph—i. e., the two kingdoms, Judah and Ephraim or Israel. [JEROME.] The two shall form one kingdom, their former feuds being laid aside (Isaiah 11. 12, 13; 37. 22-23; Jeremiah 3. 18; Hosea 1. 11). The Jews returned with some of the Israelites from Babylon, and, under John Hyrcanus, so subdued and, compelling them to be circumcised, incorporated the Idumeans with themselves that they formed part of the nation. [JOSEPHUS, 13. 17, and 12. 11.] This was but an earnest of the future union of Israel and Judah in the possession of the enlarged land as one kingdom (Ezekiel 37. 16, &c.). stubble—(Malachi 4. 1.) 19. they of the south—the Jews who in the coming time are to occupy the south of Judea shall possess, in addition to their own territory, the adjoining mountainous region of Edom. they of the plain—

the Jews who shall occupy the low country along the Mediterranean, south and south-west of Palestine, shall possess, in addition to their own territory, the land of "the Philistines," which runs as a long strip between the hills and the sea. and they shall possess the fields of Ephraim—i. e., the rightful owners shall be restored, the Ephraimites to the fields of Ephraim. Benjamin shall possess Gilead—i. e., the region east of Jordan, occupied formerly by Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh. Benjamin shall possess besides its own territory the adjoining territory eastward, whilst the two and a half tribes shall in the redistribution occupy the adjoining territory of Moab and Ammon. 20. the captivity of this host—*i. e., the captives of this multitude of Israelites. shall possess that of the Canaanites—MAURER translates, "the captives . . . whom the Canaanites (carried away captive into Phœnicia) even unto Zarephath, &c., shall possess the south," viz., Idumea as well as the south (v. 19). HENDERSON, similarly, "the captives that are among the Canaanites," &c. But the corresponding clauses of the parallelism are better balanced in English Version, "the ten tribes of Israel shall possess the territory of the Canaanites," viz., Western Palestine and Phœnicia (Judges 3. 3). "And the captives of Jerusalem (and Judah) shall possess the southern cities," viz., Edom, &c. Each has the region respectively adjoining assigned to it; Israel has the western Canaanite region; Judah, the southern. even unto Zarephath—near Zidon; called Sarepta in Luke 4. 26. The name implies it was a place for smelting metals. From this quarter came the "woman of Canaan" (Matthew 15. 21, 22). Captives of the Jews had been carried into the coasts of Palestine or Canaan, about Tyre and Zidon (Joel 3. 3, 4; Amos 1. 9). The Jews when restored shall possess the territory of their ancient oppressors. in Sepharad—*i. e., the Bosphorus. [JEROME, from his Hebrew instructor]

Sephar, according to others (Genesis 10. 30). Palseography confirms JEROME. In the cuneiform inscription containing a list of the tribes of Persia [NIEBUHR, Tab. 31. 1], before Ionia and Greece, and after Cappadocia comes, the name CPaRaD. It was therefore a district of Western Asia Minor, about Lydia, and near the Bosphorus. It is made an appellative by MAURER. "The Jerusalem captives of the dispersion" (cf. James 1. 1), wherever they be dispersed, shall return and possess the southern cities. Sepharad, though literally the district near the Bosphorus, represents the Jews far and wide dispersion. JEROME says the name in Assyrian means a boundary, i. e., "the Jews scattered in all boundaries and regions." 21. saviours—there will be in the kingdom yet to come no king, but a prince; the sabbatic period of the judges will return (cf. the phrase so frequent in Judges, only once found in the times of the kings, 2 Chronicles 14. 1, "the land had rest"), when there was no visible king, but God reigned in the theocracy. Israelites, not strangers, shall dispense justice to a God-fearing people (Isaiah 1. 26; Ezekiel 45). The judges were not such a burden to the people as the kings proved afterwards (1 Samuel 8. 11-20). In their time the people more readily repented than under the kings (cf. 2 Chronicles 15. 17). [Roos.] Judges were from time to time raised up as saviours or deliverers of Israel from the enemy. These, and the similar deliverers in the long subsequent age of Antiochus, the Maccabees, who conquered the Idumeans (as here foretold, cf. 2 Maccabees 10. 15, 23), were types of the peaceful period yet to come to Israel. to judge . . . Esau—to punish (so "judge," 1 Samuel 3. 13) . . . Edom (cf. v. 1-9, 15-19). Edom is the type of Israel's and God's last foes (Isaiah 63. 1-4). kingdom shall be the Lord's—under Messiah (Daniel 2. 44; 7. 14, 27; Zechariah 14. 9; Luke 1. 33; Revelation 11. 15; 19. 6).

JONAH.

INTRODUCTION.

JONAH was the son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher in Zebulun (called Gittah-hepher in Joshua 19. 10-13), so that he belonged to the kingdom of the ten tribes, not to Judah. His date is to be gathered from 2 Kings 14. 25-27, "He (Jeroboam II.) restored the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain, according to the word of the Lord God of Israel, which He spake by the hand of His servant Jonah, the son of Amittai, the prophet, which was of Gath-hepher. For the Lord saw the affliction of Israel, that it was very bitter: for there was not any shut up, nor any left, nor any helper for Israel. And the Lord said not that He would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven: but he saved them by the hand of Jeroboam the son of Joash." Now as this prophecy of Jonah was given at a time when Israel was at the lowest point of depression, when "there was not any shut up or left," i. e., confined or left at large, none to act as a helper for Israel, it cannot have been given in Jeroboam's reign, which was marked by prosperity, for in it Syria was worsted in fulfilment of the prophecy, and Israel raised to its former greatness. It must have been, therefore, in the early part of the reign of Joash, Jeroboam's father, who had found Israel in subjection to Syria, but had raised it by victories which were followed up so successfully by Jeroboam. Thus Jonah was the earliest of the prophets, and close upon Elisha, who died in Joash's reign, having just before his death given a token prophetic of the thrice defeat of Syria (2 Kings 13. 14-21). Hosea and Amos prophesied also in the reign of Jeroboam II., but towards the closing part of his forty-one years' reign. The transactions in the book of Jonah probably occurred in the latter part of his life; if so, the book is not much older than part of the writings of Hosea and Amos. The use of the third person is no argument against Jonah himself being the writer: for the sacred writers in mentioning themselves do so in the third person (cf. John 19. 26). Nor is the use of the past tense (ch. 3. 3, "Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city") a proof that Nineveh's greatness was past when the book of Jonah was being written; it is simply used to carry on the negative uniformly,—"the word of the Lord came to Jonah—so Jonah arose—now Nineveh was," &c. The mention of its greatness proves rather that the book was written at an early date, before the Israelites had that intimate knowledge of it which they must have had soon afterwards through frequent Assyrian invasions.

As early as Julian and Porphyry, Pagans ridiculed the credulity of Christians in believing the deliverance of Jonah by a fish. Some infidels have derived it from the heathen fable of the deliverance of Andromeda from a sea monster by Perseus (APOLLON. 2. 4, 3); or from that of Arion the musician thrown into the sea by sailors, and carried safe to shore on a dolphin (HERODOTUS, 1. 24); or from that of Hercules, who sprang into the jaws of a sea monster, and was three days in its belly, when he undertook to save Hesione (DIODORUS SICULUS, 4. 42; Iliad, 20. 145; 21. 442). Probably the heathen fables are, vice versa, corruptions of the sacred narrative, if there be any connection. JEROME states that near Joppa lay rocks, pointed out as those to which Andromeda was bound when exposed to the sea monster. This fable implies the likelihood of the story of Jonah having passed through the Phœnicians in a corrupted form to Greece. That the account of Jonah is history, and not parable, as rationalists represent, appears from our Lord's reference to it, in which the personal existence, miraculous fate, and prophetic office of Jonah are explicitly asserted: "No sign shall be given but the sign of the prophet Jonas: for, as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." The Lord recognizes his being in the belly of the fish as a "sign," i. e., a real miracle, typical of a similar event in His own history; and assumes the execution of the prophet's commission to Nineveh, "The men of Nineveh . . . repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold, a greater than Jonas is here" (Matthew 12. 39-41).

It seemed strange to Kimchi, a Jew himself, that the book of Jonah is among the Scriptures, as the only prophecy in it concerns Nineveh, a heathen city, and makes no mention of Israel, which is referred to by every other prophet. The reason seems to be, a tacit reproof of Israel is intended: a heathen people were ready to repent at the first preaching of the prophet, a stranger to them, but Israel, who boasted of being God's elect, repented not, though warned by their own prophets at all seasons. This was an anticipatory streak of light ere the dawn of the full "light to lighten the Gentiles." Jonah is a strange paradox himself: a prophet of God, and yet a runaway from God: a man drowned, and yet alive: a preacher of repentance, yet one that repines at repentance. Yet Jonah, saved from the jaws of death himself on repentance, was the fittest to give a hope to Nineveh, doomed though it was, of a merciful respite on its repentance. The patience and pity of God stand in striking contrast with the selfishness and hardness of man.

Nineveh in particular was chosen to teach Israel these lessons, on account of its being capital of the then world-kingdom, and because it was now beginning to make its power felt by Israel. Our Lord (Matthew 12. 41) makes Nineveh's repentance a reproof of the Jews' impenitence in His day, just as Jonah provoked Israel to jealousy (Deuteronomy 32. 21) by the same example. Jonah's mission to Nineveh implied that a heathen city afforded as legitimate a field for the prophet's labours as Israel, and with a more successful result (cf. Amos 9. 7).

The book is prose narrative throughout, except the prayer of thanksgiving in ch. 2. The Chaldeisms in the original do not prove spuriousness, or a later age, but were natural in the language of one living in Zebulun on the borders of the north, whence Aramaic peculiarities would readily arise; moreover, his message to Nineveh implies acquaintance with Assyrian. Living as Jonah did in a part of Israel exposed to Assyrian invasions, he probably stood in the same relation to Assyria as Elijah and Elisha had stood to Syria. The purity of the language implies the antiquity of the book, and the likelihood of its being Jonah's own writing. Indeed, none but Jonah could have written or dictated so peculiar details, known only to himself.

The tradition that places the tomb of Jonah opposite to Mosul, and names it "Nebbi Junus" (i. e., prophet Jonah), originated probably in the spot having been occupied by a Christian church or convent dedicated to him. [LAYARD.] A more ancient tradition of JEROME'S time placed the tomb in Jonah's native village of Gath-hepher.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-17. JONAH'S COMMISSION TO NINEVEH, FLIGHT, PUNISHMENT, AND PRESERVATION BY MIRACLE. 1. Jonah—meaning in Hebrew, dove. Cf. Genesis 8. 8, 9, where the dove in vain seeks rest after flying from Noah and the ark: so Jonah. GROTIUS not so well explains it, "one sprung from Greece" or Ionia, where there were prophets called Amythaonidæ. Amitai—Hebrew for "truth," "truth-telling:" appropriate to a prophet. 2. to Nineveh—east of the Tigris, opposite the modern Mosul. The only case of a prophet being sent to the heathen. Jonah, however, is sent to Nineveh, not solely for Nineveh's good, but also to shame Israel, by the fact of a heathen city repenting at the first preaching of a single stranger, Jonah, whereas God's people will not repent, though preached to by their many national prophets, late and early. Nineveh means the residence of Ninus, i. e., Nimrod. Genesis 10. 11, where the translation ought to be, "He (Nimrod) went forth into Assyria and builded Nineveh." Modern research into the cuneiform inscriptions confirms the Scripture account, that Babylon was founded earlier than Nineveh, and that both cities were built by descendants of Ham, encroaching on the territory assigned to Shem (Genesis 10. 5, 6, 8, 10, 25). great city—480 stadia in circuit, 150 in length, and 90 in breadth (DIODORUS SICULUS, 2. 3). Taken by Arbaces the Mede, in the reign of Sardanapalus, about the seventh year of Uzziah; and a second time by Nabopolassar of Babylon and Cyaxares the Mede in 625 B. C. See my note, ch. 3. 3. cry—(Isalah 40. 6; 58. 1) come up before me—(Genesis 4. 10; 6. 13; 18. 21; Ezra 9. 6; Revelation 18. 5), i. e., their wickedness is so great as to require my open interposition for punishment. 3. flee—Jonah's motive for flight is hinted at in ch. 4. 2, fear that after venturing on such a dangerous commission to so powerful a heathen city, his prophetic threats should be set aside by God's "repenting of the evil," just as God had so long spared Israel notwithstanding so many provocations, and so he should seem a false prophet. Besides, he may have felt it beneath him to discharge a commission to a foreign idolatrous nation, whose destruction he desired rather than their repentance. This is the only case of a prophet, charged with a prophetic message, concealing it, from the presence of the Lord—(Cf. Genesis 4. 16.) Jonah thought in fleeing from the land of Israel, where Jehovah was peculiarly present, that he should escape from Jehovah's prophecy-inspiring influence. He probably knew the truth stated in Psalm 139. 7-10, but virtually ignored it (cf. Genesis 3. 8-10; Jeremiah 23. 24). went down—appropriate in going from land to the sea (Psalm 107. 23). Joppa—now Jaffa, in the region of Dan; a harbour as early as Solomon's time (2 Chronicles 2. 16). Tarshish—Tartessus in Spain; in the farthest west at the greatest distance from Nineveh in the east. 4. sent out—ill., caused a wind to burst forth. COVERDALE translates, "hurled a greete wynde into the see." 5. mariners were afraid—though used to storms; the danger therefore must have been extreme. cried every man unto his god—the idols proved unable to save them, though each, according to Phœnician custom, called on his tutelary god. But Jehovah proved able: and the heathen sailors owned it in the end by sacrificing to Him (v. 16). into the sides—i. e., the interior recesses (cf. 1 Samuel 24. 3; Isalah 14. 13, 15). Those conscious of guilt shrink from the presence of their fellow-man into concealment. fast asleep—sleep is no necessary proof of innocence; it may be the fruit of carnal security and a seared conscience. How different was Jesus' sleep on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 4. 37-39). Guilty Jonah's indifference to fear contrasts with the unoffending mariners' alarm. The original therefore is in the nominative absolute: "But as for Jonah, he," &c. Cf. spiritually, Ephesians 5. 14. 6. call upon thy God—the ancient heathen in dangers called on foreign gods, besides their national ones (cf. Psalm 107. 28). MAURER translates the preceding clause, "What is the reason that thou sleepest?" think upon us—for good (cf. Genesis 8. 1; Exodus 2. 25; 3. 7, 9; Psalm 40. 17). 7. cast lots—God sometimes sanctioned this mode of deciding in difficult cases. Cf. the similar instance of Achan, whose guilt involved Israel in suffering, until God revealed the offender, probably by the casting of lots (Proverbs 16. 33; Acts 1. 26). Primitive tradition and natural conscience led even the heathen to believe that one guilty man involves all his associates, though innocent, in punishment. So CICERO (Nat. Deorum, 3. 37) mentions that the mariners sailing with Diagoras, an atheist, at tributed a storm that overtook them to his presence in the ship (cf. Hor. Od. 3. 2. 26). 8. The guilty individual being discovered is interrogated so as to make full confession with his own mouth. So in Achan's case (Joshua 7. 19). 9. I am an Hebrew—he does not say "an Israelite." For this was the name used among themselves; "Hebrew," among foreigners (Genesis 40. 15; Exodus 3. 18). I fear the Lord—in profession; his practice belied his profession: his profession aggravated his guilt. God . . . which . . . made the sea—appropriately expressed, as accounting for the tempest sent on the sea. The heathen had distinct gods for the "heaven," the "sea," and the "land." Jehovah is the one and only true God of all alike. Jonah at last is awakened by the violent remedy from his lethargy. Jonah was but the reflection of Israel's backsliding from God, and so must bear the righteous punishment. The guilt of the minister is the result of that of the people, as in Moses' case (Deuteronomy 4. 21). This is what makes Jonah a suitable type of Messiah, who bore the imputed sin of the people. 10. "The men were exceedingly afraid," when made aware of the wrath of so powerful a God at the flight of Jonah. Why hast thou done this!—If professors of religion do wrong, they will hear of it from those who make no such profession. 11. What shall we do unto thee!—They ask this, as Jonah himself must best know how his God is to be appeased. "We would gladly save thee, if we can do so, and yet be saved ourselves" (v. 13, 14). 12. cast me . . . into the sea—Herein Jonah is a type of Messiah, the one man who offered Himself to die, in order to allay the stormy flood of God's wrath (cf. Psalm 69. 1, 2, as to Messiah), which otherwise must have engulfed all other men. So Caiaphas by the Spirit declared it expedient that one man should die, and that the whole nation should not perish (John 11. 50). Jonah also herein is a specimen of true repentance, which leads the penitent to "accept the punishment of his iniquity" (Leviticus 26. 41, 43), and to be more indignant at his sin than at his suffering. 13. they could not—(Proverbs 21. 30.) Wind and tide—God's displeasure and God's counsel—were against them. 14. for this man's life—i. e., for taking this man's life. innocent blood—do not punish us as thou wouldst punish the shedders of innocent blood (cf. Deuteronomy 21. 8). In the case of the Antitype, Pontius Pilate washed his hands and confessed Christ's innocence, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person." But whereas Jonah the victim was guilty and the sailors innocent, Christ our sacrificial victim was innocent and Pontius Pilate and all of us men were guilty. But by imputation of our guilt to Him and His righteousness to us, the spotless Antitype exactly corresponds to the guilty type. thou . . . Lord, hast done as it pleased thee—that Jonah has embarked in this ship, that a tempest has arisen, that he has been detected by casting of lots, that he has passed sentence on himself, is all thy doing. We reluctantly put him to death, but it is thy pleasure it should be so. 15. sea ceased . . . raging—so at Jesus' word (Luke 8. 24). God spares the prayerful penitent, a truth illustrated now in the case of the sailors, presently in that of Jonah, and thirdly, in that of Nineveh. 16. offered a sacrifice—they offered some sacrifice of thanksgivings at once, and vowed more when they should land. GLASSIUS thinks it means only, "They promised to offer a sacrifice." 17. prepared a great fish—not created specially for this purpose, but appointed in His providence, to which all creatures are subservient. The fish, through a mistranslation of Matthew 12. 40, was formerly supposed to be a whale; there, as here, the original means "a great fish." The whale's neck is too narrow to receive a man. BOCHART thinks, the dogfish, the stomach of which is so large that the body of a man in armour was once found in it (HIEROZO. 2. 5. 12). Others, the shark. [JEBB.] The cavity in the whale's throat, large enough, according to Captain SCORESBY, to hold a ship's jolly-boat full of men. A miracle in any view is needed, and we have no data to speculate further. A "sign" or miracle it is expressly called by our Lord in Matthew 12. Respiration in such a position could only be by miracle. The miraculous interposition was not without a sufficient reason; it was calculated to affect not only Jonah, but also Nineveh and Israel. The life of a prophet was often marked by experiences which made him, through sympathy, best suited for discharging the prophetic function to his hearers and his people. The infinite resources of God in mercy as well as judgment are prefigured in the devourer being transformed into Jonah's preserver. Jonah's condition under punishment, shut out from the outer world, was rendered as much as possible the emblem of death, a present type to Nineveh and Israel, of the death in sin, as his deliverance was of the spiritual resurrection on repentance; as also, a future type of Jesus' literal death for sin, and resurrection by the Spirit of God. three days and three nights—probably, like the Antitype, Christ, Jonah was cast forth on the land on the third day (Matthew 12. 40); the Hebrew counting the first and third parts of days as whole twenty-four hour days.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-10. JONAH'S PRAYER OF FAITH AND DELIVERANCE. 1. his God—his still, though Jonah had fled from Him. Faith enables Jonah now to feel this; just as the returning prodigal says of the Father, from whom he had wandered, "I will arise and go to my Father" (Luke 15. 18). out of the fish's belly—every place may serve as an oratory. No place is amiss for prayer. Others translate, "when (delivered) out of the fish's belly." English Version is better. 2. His prayer is partly descriptive and precatory, partly eucharistical. Jonah incorporates with his own language inspired utterances familiar to the Church long before in v. 2, Psalm 120. 1; in v. 3, Psalm 42. 7; in v. 4, Psalm 31. 22; in v. 5, Psalm 69. 1; in v. 7, Psalm 142. 3, and 18. 6; in v. 8, Psalm 31. 6; in v. 9, Psalm 116. 17, 18, and 3. 8. Jonah an inspired man thus attests both the antiquity and inspiration of the Psalms. It marks the spirit of faith, that Jonah identifies himself with the saints of old, appropriating their experiences as recorded in the word of God (Psalm 119. 50). Affliction opens up the mine of Scripture, before seen only on the surface. out of the belly of hell—Sheol, the unseen world, which the belly of the fish resembled. 3. thou hadst cast . . . thy billows . . . thy waves—Jonah recognizes the source whence his sufferings came. It was no mere chance, but the hand of God which sent them. Cf. Job's similar recognition of God's hand in calamities, Job 1. 21; 2. 10; and David's, 2 Samuel 16. 5-11. 4. cast out from thy sight—i. e., from thy favourable regard. A just retribution on one who had fled "from the presence of the Lord" (ch. 1. 3). God's presence, which once he regarded as a burden, and from which he desired to escape, now that he has got his desire, he feels it to be his bitterest sorrow to be deprived of. He had turned his back on God, so God turned His back on him, making his sin his punishment. toward thy holy temple—in the confidence of faith he anticipates yet to see the temple at Jerusalem, the appointed place of worship (1 Kings 8. 38), and there to render thanksgiving. [HENDERSON.] Rather, I think, "Though cast out of thy sight, I will still with the eye of faith once more look in prayer towards thy temple at Jerusalem, whither, as thy earthly throne, thou hast desired thy worshippers to direct their prayers." 5. even to the soul—i. e., threatening to extinguish the animal life. weeds—he felt as if the sea-weeds through which he was dragged were wrapped about his head. 6. bottoms of . . . mountains—their extremities where they terminate in the hidden depths of the sea. Cf. Psalm 18. 7, "the foundations of the hills" (Psalm 18. 15). earth with her bars was about me—earth, the land of the living, is (not "was") shut against me. for ever—so far as any effort of mine can deliver me. yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption—rather, "thou bringest . . . from the pit." [MAURER.] As in the previous clauses he expresses the hopelessness of his state, so in this, his sure hope of deliverance through Jehovah's infinite resources. "Against hope he believes in hope," and speaks as if the deliverance were actually being accomplished. Hezekiah seems to have incorporated

Jonah's very words in his prayer (Isaiah 38. 17), just as Jonah appropriated the language of the Psalmists. 7. soul fainted . . . I remembered the Lord—beautifully exemplifying the triumph of spirit over flesh, of faith over sense (Psalm 73. 26; 42. 6). For a time troubles shut out hope; but faith revived when Jonah "remembered the Lord," what a gracious God he is, and how now He still preserves his life and consciousness in his dark prison-house. into thine holy temple—the temple at Jerusalem (v. 4). As there he looks in believing prayer towards it, so here he regards his prayer as already heard. 8. observe lying vanities—regard or reverence idols, powerless to save (Psalm 31. 6). mercy—Jehovah, the very idea of whom is identified now in Jonah's mind with mercy and loving-kindness. As the Psalmist (Psalm 144. 2) styles Him, "my goodness;" God who is to me all beneficence. Cf. Psalm 59. 17, "the God of my mercy," lit., "my kindness-God." Jonah had "forsaken His own mercy," God, to flee to heathen lands where "lying vanities" (idols) were worshipped. But now, taught by his own preservation in conscious life in the fish's belly, and by the inability of the mariners' idols to lull the storm (ch. 1. 5), estrangement from God seems estrangement from his own happiness (Jeremiah 2. 13; 17. 13). Prayer has been restrained in Jonah's case, so that he was "fast asleep" in the midst of danger, heretofore; but now prayer is the sure sign of his return to God. 9. I will sacrifice . . . thanksgiving—In the believing anticipation of sure deliverance he offers thanksgivings already. So Jehoshaphat (2 Chronicles 20. 21) appointed singers to praise the Lord in front of the army before the battle with Moab and Ammon, as if the victory was already gained. God honours such confidence in Him. There is also herein a mark of sanctified affliction, that he vows amendment and thankful obedience (Psalm 119. 67). 10. upon the dry land—probably on the coast of Palestine.

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-10. JONAH'S SECOND COMMISSION TO NINEVEH; THE NINEVITES REPENT OF THEIR EVIL WAY: SO GOD REPENTS OF THE EVIL THREATENED. 2. preach . . . the preaching—lit., proclaim the proclamation. On the former occasion the specific object of his commission to Nineveh was declared; here it is indeterminate. This is to show how freely he yields himself, in the spirit of unconditional obedience, to speak whatever God may please. 3. arose and went—like the son who was at first disobedient to the father's command, "Go work in my vineyard," but who afterwards "repented and went" (Matthew 21. 28, 29). Jonah was thus the fittest instrument for proclaiming judgment, and yet hope of mercy on repentance to Nineveh, being himself a living exemplification of both—judgment in his entombment in the fish, mercy on repentance in his deliverance. Israel professing to obey, but not obeying, and so doomed to exile in the same Nineveh, answers to the son who said "I go, sir, and went not." In Luke 11. 30 it is said that Jonas was not only a sign to the men in Christ's time, but also "unto the Ninevites." On the latter occasion (Matthew 16. 1-4) when the Pharisees and Sadducees tempted Him, asking a sign from heaven, He answered, "No sign shall be given, but the sign of the prophet Jonas." Thus the sign had a twofold aspect, a direct bearing on the Ninevites, an indirect bearing on the Jews in Christ's time. To the Ninevites he was not merely a prophet, but himself a wonder in the earth, as one who had tasted of death, and yet had not seen corruption, but had now returned to witness among them for God. If the Ninevites had indulged in a captious spirit, they never would have inquired and so known Jonah's wonderful history; but being humbled by God's awful message, they learnt from Jonah himself, that it was the previous concealing in his bosom of the same message of their own doom that caused him to be entombed as an outcast from the living. Thus he was a "sign" to them of wrath on the one hand, and, on the other, of mercy. Guilty Jonah saved from the jaws of death gives a ray of hope to guilty Nineveh.

Thus God, who brings good from evil, made Jonah in his fall, punishment, and restoration, a sign (an embodied lesson or living symbol) through which the Ninevites were roused to hear and repent, as they would not have been likely to do, had he gone on the first commission before his living entombment and resurrection. To do evil that good may come, is a policy which can only come from Satan; but from evil already done to extract an instrument against the kingdom of darkness, is a triumphant display of the grace and wisdom of God. To the Pharisees in Christ's time, who, not content with the many signs exhibited by Him, still demanded a sign from heaven, He gave a sign in the opposite quarter, viz., Jonah, who came "out of the belly of hell" (the unseen region). They looked for a Messiah gloriously coming in the clouds of heaven; the Messiah, on the contrary, is to pass through a like though a deeper humiliation than Jonah; He is to lie "in the heart of the earth." Jonah and his Antitype alike appeared low and friendless among their hearers; both victims to death for God's wrath against sin, both preaching repentance. Repentance derives all its efficacy from the death of Christ, just as Jonah's message derived its weight with the Ninevites from his entombment. The Jews stumbled at Christ's death, the very fact which ought to have led them to Him, as Jonah's entombment attracted the Ninevites to his message. As Jonah's restoration gave hope of God's placability to Nineveh, so Christ's resurrection assures us God is fully reconciled to man by Christ's death. But Jonah's entombment only had the effect of a moral suasive, Christ's death is an efficacious instrument of reconciliation between God and man. [FAIRBAIRN.] Nineveh was an exceeding great city—lit., great to God, i. e., before God. All greatness was in the Hebrew mind associated with God; hence arose the idiom (cf. Psalm 36. 6; 80. 10), "great mountains," Margin, "mountains of God;" "goodly cedars," Margin, "cedars of God." Genesis 10. 9, "a mighty hunter before the Lord." three days' journey—i. e., about sixty miles round, allowing about twenty miles for a day's journey. Jonah's statement is confirmed by heathen writers, who describe Nineveh as 480 stadia in circuit [DIODORUS SICULUS, 2. 3]. HERODOTUS defines a day's journey to be 150 stadia; so three days' journey will not be much below DIODORUS' estimate. The parallelogram in Central Assyria covered with remains of buildings has Khorsabad north-east; Koyunjik and Nebli Yunus near the Tigris, north-west; Nimroud, between the Tigris and the Zab, south-west; and Karamless, at a distance inward from the Zab, south-east. From Koyunjik to Nimroud is about eighteen miles; from Khorsabad to Karamless, the same; from Koyunjik to Khorsabad, thirteen or fourteen miles; from Nimroud to Karamless, fourteen miles. The length thus was greater than the breadth; cf. v. 4, "a day's journey," which is confirmed by heathen writers and by modern measurements. The walls were 100 feet high, and broad enough to allow three chariots abreast, and had moreover 1500 lofty towers. The space between, including large parks and arable ground, as well as houses, was Nineveh in its full extent. The oldest palaces are at Nimroud, which was probably the original site. LAYARD latterly has thought that the name Nineveh belonged originally to Koyunjik, rather than to Nimroud. Jonah (ch. 4. 11), mentions the children as numbering 120,000, which would give about a million to the whole population. Existing ruins show that Nineveh acquired its greatest extent under the kings of the second dynasty, i. e., the kings mentioned in Scripture; it was then that Jonah visited it, and the reports of its magnificence were carried to the west. [LAYARD.] 4. a day's journey—not going straight forward without stopping: for the city was but eighteen miles in length; but stopping in his progress from time to time to announce his message to the crowds gathering about him. Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown—The commission, given indefinitely at his setting out, assumes now on his arrival a definite form, and that severer than before. It is no longer a cry against the sins of Nineveh, but an announcement of its ruin in forty days. This number is in Scripture associated often with humiliation. It was forty days that Moses, Elijah, and Christ fasted. Forty years elapsed from the beginning of Christ's ministry (the antitype of Jonah's) to the destruction of Jerusalem. The more definite form of the denunciation implies that Nineveh has now almost filled up the measure of her guilt. The change in the form which the Ninevites would hear from Jonah on anxious inquiry into his history, would alarm them the more, as implying the increasing nearness and certainty of their doom, and would at the same time reprove Jonah for his previous guilt in delaying to warn them. The very solitariness of the one message announced by the stranger thus suddenly appearing among them, would impress them with the more awe. Learning from him, that so far from lightly prophesying evil against them, he had shrunk from announcing a less severe denunciation, and therefore had been cast into the deep and only saved by miracle, they felt how imminent was their peril, threatened as they now were by a prophet whose fortunes were so closely bound up with theirs. In Noah's days 120 years of warning were given to men, yet they repented not till the flood came, and it was too late. But in the case of Nineveh, God granted a double mercy, first, that its people should repent immediately after threatening; second, that pardon should immediately follow their repentance.

5. believed God—gave credit to Jonah's message from God; thus recognizing Jehovah as the true God. fast . . . sackcloth—in the East outward actions are often used as symbolical expressions of inward feelings. So fasting and clothing in sackcloth were customary in humiliation. Cf. in Ahab's case, parallel to that of Nineveh, both receiving a respite on penitence (1 Kings 21. 27; 20, 31, 32; Joel 1. 13). from the greatest . . . to the least—the penitence was not partial, but pervading all classes. 6. in ashes—emblem of the deepest humiliation (Job 2. 8; Ezekiel 27. 30). 7. neither . . . beast . . . taste any thing—the brute creatures share in the evil effects of man's sin (ch. 4. 11; Romans 8. 20, 22); so they here, according to Eastern custom, are made to share in man's outward indications of humiliation. "When the Persian general Masistias was slain, the horses and mules of the Persians were shorn, as well as themselves." [NEWCOMB from PLUTARCH; also HERODOTUS, 9. 24.] 8. cry . . . turn—prayer without reformation is a mockery of God (Psalm 66. 18; Isaiah 58. 6). Prayer, on the other hand, must precede true reformation, as we cannot turn to God from our evil way unless God first turns us (Jeremiah 31. 18, 19). 9. Who can tell—(Cf. Joel 2. 14.) Their acting on a vague possibility of God's mercy, without any special ground of encouragement, is the more remarkable instance of faith, as they had to break through long-rooted prejudices in giving up idols to seek Jehovah at all. The only ground which their ready faith rested on, was, the fact of God sending one to warn them, instead of destroying them at once; this suggested the thought of a possibility of pardon. Hence they are cited by Christ as about to condemn in the judgment those who, with much greater light and privileges, yet repent not (Matthew 12. 41). 11. God repented of the evil—when the message was sent to them, they were so ripe for judgment that a purpose of destruction to take effect in forty days was the only word God's righteous abhorrence of sin admitted of as to them. But when they repented, the position in which they stood towards God's righteousness was altered. So God's mode of dealing with them must alter accordingly, if God is not to be inconsistent with His own immutable character of dealing with men according to their works and state of heart, taking vengeance at last on the hardened impenitent, and delighting to show mercy on the penitent. Cf. Abraham's reasoning, Genesis 18. 25; Ezekiel 18. 21-25; Jeremiah 18. 7-10. What was really a change in them and in God's corresponding dealings is, in condescension to human conceptions, represented as a change in God (cf. Exodus 32. 14), who, in His essential righteousness and mercy, changeth not (Numbers 23. 19; 1 Samuel 15. 29; Malachi 3. 6; James 1. 17). The reason why the announcement of destruction was made absolute, and not dependent on Nineveh's continued impenitence, was, that this form was the only one calculated to rouse them; and at the same time it was a truthful representation of God's purpose towards Nineveh under its existing state, and of Nineveh's due. When that state ceased, a new relation of Nineveh to God, not contemplated in the message, came in, and room was made for the word to take effect, "the curse causeless shall not come." [FAIRBAIRN.] Prophecy is not merely for the sake of proving God's omniscience by the verification of predictions of the future, but is mainly designed to vindicate God's justice and mercy in dealing with the impenitent and penitent respectively (Romans 11. 22). The Bible ever assigns the first place to the eternal principles of righteousness, rooted in the character of God, subordinating to them all Divine arrangements. God's sparing Nineveh when in the jaws of destruction on the first dawn of repentance encourages the timid penitent, and shows beforehand that Israel's doom, soon after accomplished, is to be ascribed, not to unwillingness to forgive on God's part, but to their own obstinate impenitence.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-11. JONAH REPINES AT GOD'S MERCY TO NINEVEH: IS REPROVED BY THE TYPE OF A GOURD. 1. angry—lit., hot, probably, with grief or vexation, rather than anger. [FAIRBAIRN.] How sad the contrast between God's feeling on the repentance of Nineveh towards Him, and Jonah's feeling on the repentance of God towards Nineveh. Strange in one who was himself a monument of mercy on his repentance! We all, like him, need the lesson taught in the parable of the unforgiving, though forgiven, debtor (Matthew 18. 23-35). Jonah was grieved because Nineveh's preservation, after his denunciation, made him seem a false prophet. [CALVIN.] But it would make Jonah a demon, not a man, to have preferred the destruction of 600,000 men rather than his prophecy should be set aside through God's mercy triumphing over judgment. And God in that case would have severely chastised, whereas He only expostulates mildly with him, and by a mode of dealing at once gentle and condescending tries to show him his error. Moreover, Jonah himself, in apologizing for his vexation, does not mention the failure of his prediction as the cause; but solely the thought of God's slowness to anger. This was what led him to flee to Tarshish at his first commission; not the likelihood then of his prediction being falsified; for in fact his commission then was not to foretell Nineveh's downfall, but simply to "cry against" Nineveh's "wickedness" as having "come up before God." Jonah could hardly have been so vexed for the letter of his prediction failing, when the end of his commission had virtually been gained in leading Nineveh to repentance. This then cannot have been regarded by Jonah as the ultimate end of his commission. If Nineveh had been the prominent object with him, he would have rejoiced at the result of his mission. But Israel was the prominent aim of Jonah, as a prophet of the elect people. Probably then he regarded the destruction of Nineveh as fitted to be an example of God's judgment at last suspending His long forbearance so as to startle Israel from its desperate degeneracy, heightened by its new prosperity under Jeroboam II. at that very time, in a way that all other means had failed to do. Jonah, despairing of anything effectual being done for God in Israel, unless there were first given a striking example of severity, thought when he proclaimed the downfall of Nineveh in forty days, that now at last God is about to give such an example; so when this means of awakening Israel was set aside by God's mercy on Nineveh's repentance, he was bitterly disappointed, not from pride or mercilessness, but from hopelessness as to anything being possible for the reformation of Israel, now that his cherished hope is baffled. But God's plan was to teach Israel, by the example of Nineveh, how inexcusable is their own impenitence, and how inevitable their ruin if they persevere. Repenting Nineveh has proved herself more worthy of God's favour than apostate Israel; the children of the covenant have not only fallen down to, but actually below the level of a heathen people; Israel, therefore, must go down, and the heathen rise above her. Jonah did not know the important lessons of hope to the penitent, and condemnation to those amidst outward privileges impenitent, which Nineveh's preservation on repentance was to have for after times, and to all ages. He could not foresee that Messiah Himself was thus to apply that history. A lesson to us that if we could in any particular alter the plan of Providence, it would not be for the better, but for the worse. [FAIRBAIRN.] 2. my saying—my thought, or feeling. fled before—I anticipated by fleeing, the disappointment of my design through thy long-suffering mercy. gracious . . . and merciful, &c.—Jonah here has before his mind Exodus 34. 6; as Joel (Joel 2. 13) in his turn quotes from Jonah. 3. Jonah's impatience of life under disappointed hopes of Israel's reformation through the destruction of Nineveh, is like that of Elijah at his plan for reforming Israel (1 Kings 18.) falling through Jezebel (1 Kings 19. 4). 4. Doest thou well to be angry?—or grieved; rather as Margin, "Art thou much angry," or "grieved?" [FAIRBAIRN with LXX. and Syriac.] But English Version suits the spirit of the passage, and is quite tenable in the Hebrew. [GESENIUS.] 5. made him a booth—i. e., a temporary hut of branches and leaves, so slightly formed as to be open to the wind and sun's heat. see what would become of the city—the term of forty days had not yet elapsed, and Jonah did not know that anything more than a suspension, or mitigation, of judgment had been granted to Nineveh. Therefore, not from sullenness, but in order to watch the event from a neighbouring station, he lodged in the booth. As a stranger, he did know the depth of Nineveh's repentance; besides, from the Old Testament stand-point he knew that chastening judgments often followed, as in David's case (2 Samuel 12. 10-12, 14), even where sin had been repented of. To show him what he knew not, the largeness and completeness of God's mercy to penitent Nineveh, and the reasonableness of it, God made his booth a school of discipline to give him more enlightened views. 6. gourd—Hebrew, kikaion; the Egyptian kiki, the "ricinus" or castor-oil plant, commonly called palm-christ (palma christi). It grows from eight to ten feet high. Only one leaf grows on a branch, but that leaf being often more than a foot large, the collective leaves give good shelter from the heat. It grows rapidly, and fades as suddenly when injured. to deliver him from his grief—it was therefore grief, not selfish anger, which Jonah felt (Note, v. 1). Some external comforts will often turn the mind away from its sorrowful bent. 7. a worm—of a particular kind, deadly to the ricinus. A small worm at the root destroys a large gourd. So it takes but little to make our creature comforts wither. It should silence discontent to remember, that when our gourd is gone, our God is not gone. the next day—after Jonah was so "exceeding glad" (cf. Psalm 30. 7). 8. vehement—rather, scorching; Margin, silent, expressing sultry stillness, not vehemence. 9. (Note, v. 4.) I do well to be angry, even unto death—"I am very much grieved, even to death." [FAIRBAIRN.] So the Antitype (Matthew 26. 38). 10, 11. The main lesson of the book. If Jonah so pities a plant which cost him no toil to rear, and which is so short-lived and valueless, much more must Jehovah pity those hundreds of thousands of immortal men and women in great Nineveh whom He has made with such a display of creative power, especially when many of them repent, and seeing that, if all in it were destroyed, "more than six score thousand" of unoffending children, besides "much cattle," would be involved in the common destruction. Cf. the same argument drawn from God's justice and mercy in Genesis 18. 23-32. A similar illustration from the insignificance of a plant, which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, and which, nevertheless, is clothed by God with surpassing beauty, is given by Christ to prove that God will care for the infinitely more precious bodies and souls of men who are to live for ever (Matthew 6. 28-30). One soul is of more value than the whole world; surely, then, one soul is of more value than many gourds. The point of comparison spiritually is, the need which Jonah for the time had of the foliage of the gourd; however he might dispense with it at other times, now it was necessary for his comfort, and almost for his life. So now that Nineveh, as a city, fears God and turns to Him, God's cause needs it, and would suffer by its overthrow, just as Jonah's material well-being suffered by the withering of the gourd. If there were any hope of Israel's being awakened by Nineveh's destruction to fulfil her high destination of being a light to surrounding heathenism, then there would not have been the same need to God's cause of Nineveh's preservation, (though) there would have always been need of saving the penitent). But as Israel after judgments, now with returning prosperity turns back to apostasy, the means needed to vindicate God's cause, and provoke Israel, if possible, to jealousy, is the example of the great capital of heathendom suddenly repenting at the first warning, and consequently being spared. Thus Israel would see the kingdom of heaven transplanted from its ancient seat to another which would willingly yield its spiritual fruits. The tidings which Jonah brought back to his countrymen of Nineveh's repentance and rescue, would, if believably understood, be far more fitted than the news of its overthrow to recall Israel to the service of God. Israel failed to learn the lesson, and so was cast out of her land. But even this was not an unmitigated evil. Jonah was a type, as of Christ, so also of Israel. Jonah, though an outcast, was highly honoured of God in Nineveh; so Israel's outcast condition would prove no impediment to her serving God's cause still, if only she was faithful to God. Ezekiel and Daniel were so at Babylon; and the Jews scattered in all lands as witnesses for the one true God, pioneered the way for Christianity, so that it spread with a rapidity which otherwise was not likely to have attended it. [FAIRBAIRN.] that cannot discern between their right hand and their left—children under three or four years old (Deuteronomy 1. 39). Six score thousand of these, allowing them to be a fifth of the whole, would give a total population of 600,000. much cattle—God cares even for the brute creatures, which man takes little account of. These in wonderful powers and in utility are far above the shrub which Jonah is so concerned for. Yet Jonah is reckless as to their destruction and that of innocent children. The abruptness of the close of the book is more strikingly suggestive than if the thought had been followed out in detail.

MICAH.

INTRODUCTION.

MICAH was a native of Moresheth, not the same as Marshah in ch. 1. 15, but the town called Moresheth-gath (ch. 1. 11), which lay near Eleutheropolis, west of Jerusalem, on the border of the Philistine country; so called to distinguish it from Moresheth of Judah. The full name is Micatah (not the Micalah mentioned 1 Kings 22. 8, the son of Imlah), signifying, Who is like Jehovah? The time of his prophesying is stated in the introduction to be in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, i. e., between 757 and 699 B. C. Jeremiah (Jeremiah 26. 18) quotes ch. 3. 12, as delivered in the reign of Hezekiah. He was thus a contemporary of Isaiah and Hosea. The idolatries practised in the reign of Ahaz accord with Micah's denunciations of such gross evils, and confirm the truth of the time assigned ch. 1. 1. His prophecies are partly against Israel (Samaria), partly against Judah. As Samaria, Israel's metropolis, was taken first, and Jerusalem, the capital of Judah, subsequently, in the introductory heading ch. 1. 1, Samaria is put first, then Jerusalem. He prophesies the capture of both: the Jews' captivity and restoration; and the coming and reign of Messiah. His style is full, round, and perspicuous; his diction pure, and his parallels regular. His description of Jehovah (ch. 7. 18, 19) is not surpassed by any elsewhere in Scripture. The correspondence between Isaiah and Micah in some passages (cf. ch. 4. 1-3, with Isaiah 2. 2-4) is to be accounted for by their being contemporaries, acquainted with each other's inspired writings, and having the same subjects as their theme. HENGSTENBERG maintains that the passage in Micah is the original. Isaiah was somewhat the elder, being a prophet in the reign of Uzziah, Jotham's predecessor, whereas Micah began his prophecies under Jotham.

The book consists of two parts: (I.) ch. 1.-5.; (II.) ch. 6., 7., a dialogue or contestation between Jehovah and His people, in which he reproaches them with their unnatural and ungrateful conduct, and threatens judgment for their corruptions, but consoles them with the promise of restoration from captivity.

Micah stands sixth of the minor prophets in the Hebrew canon, but third in the LXX.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-16. GOD'S WRATH AGAINST SAMARIA AND JUDAH; THE FORMER IS TO BE OVERTHROWN; SUCH JUDGMENTS IN PROSPECT CALL FOR MOURNING. 2. all that therein is—Hebrew, whatever fills it. Micaiah, son of Imlah, our prophet's namesake, begins his prophecy similarly, "Hearken, O people, every one of you." Micah designedly uses the same preface, implying that his ministrations are a continuation of his predecessor's of the same name. Both probably had before their mind Moses' similar attestation of heaven and earth in a like case (Deuteronomy 31. 28; 32. 1, cf. Isaiah 1. 2). God be witness against you—viz., that none of you can say, when the time of your punishment shall come, that you were not forewarned. The punishment denounced is stated at v. 3, &c. from his holy temple—i. e., heaven (1 Kings 8. 30; Psalm 11. 4; Jonah 2. 7; cf. Romans 1. 18). 3. tread upon the high places of the earth—He shall destroy the fortified heights (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 13; 33. 29). [GROTIUS.] 4. Imagery from earthquakes and volcanic agency, to describe the terrors which attend Jehovah's coming in judgment (cf. Judges 5. 5). Neither men of high degree, as the mountains, nor men of low degree, as the valleys, can secure themselves or their land from the judgments of God. as wax—(Psalm 97. 5; cf. Isaiah 64. 1-3.) The third clause, "as wax," &c., answers to the first in the parallelism, "the mountains shall be molten;" the fourth, "as the waters," &c., to the second, "the valleys shall be cleft." As wax melts by fire, so the mountains before God, at His approach; and as waters poured down a steep cannot stand, but are diffused abroad, so the valleys shall be cleft before Jehovah. 5. For the transgression of Jacob is all this—All these terrors attending Jehovah's coming are caused by the sins of Jacob or Israel, i. e., the whole people. What is the transgression of Jacob?—Taking up the question often in the mouths of the people when reproved, "What is our transgression?" (cf. Malachi 1. 6, 7)? He answers, Is it not Samaria? Is not that city (the seat of the calf-worship) the cause of Jacob's apostasy (1 Kings 14. 16; 15. 26, 34; 16. 13, 19, 25, 30)? and what are the high places of Judah?—what city is the cause of the idolatries on the high places of Judah? Is it not Jerusalem (cf. 2 Kings 18. 4)? 6. Samaria's punishment is mentioned first, as it was to fall before Jerusalem. as an heap of the field—(Ch. 3. 12.) Such a heap of stones and rubbish as is gathered out of fields, to clear them (Hosea 12. 11). Palestine is of a soil abounding in stones, which are gathered out before the vines are planted (Isaiah 5. 2). as plantings of a vineyard—as a place where vines are planted. Vineyards were cultivated on the sides of hills exposed to the sun. The hill on which Samaria was built by Omri, had been, doubtless, planted with vines originally; now it is to be reduced again to its original state (1 Kings 16. 24). pour down—dash down the stones of the city into the valley beneath. A graphic picture of the present appearance of the ruins, which is as though "the buildings of the ancient city had been thrown down from the brow of the hill." [SCOTTISH MISSION OF INQUIRY, pp. 293, 294.] discover the foundations—destroy it so utterly as to lay bare its foundations (Ezekiel 13. 14). Samaria was destroyed by Shalmaneser. 7. all the hires—the wealth which Israel boasted of receiving from her idols as the "rewards" or hire for worshipping them (Hosea 2. 5, 12). idols . . . will I . . . desolate—i. e., give them up to the foe to strip off the silver and gold with which they are overlaid. she gathered it of the hire of an harlot, and they shall return to the hire of an harlot—Israel gathered (made for herself) her idols from the gold and silver received from false gods, as she thought, the hire of her worshipping them; and they shall again become what they had been before, the hire of spiritual harlotry, i. e., the prosperity of the foe, who also being worshippers of idols will ascribe the acquisition to their idols. [MAURER.] GROTIUS explains it, The offerings sent to Israel's temple by the Assyrians, whose idolatry Israel adopted, shall go back to the Assyrians, her teachers in idolatry, as the hire or fee for having taught it. The image of a harlot's hire for the supposed temporal reward of spiritual fornication, is more common in Scripture (Hosea 9. 1). 8. Therefore I will wall—The prophet first shows how the coming judgment affects himself, in order that he might affect the minds of his countrymen similarly. stripped—i. e., of shoes, or sandals, as the LXX. translate. Otherwise "naked" would be a tautology. "Naked" means divested of the upper garment (Isaiah 20. 2). "Naked and barefoot," the sign of mourning (2 Samuel 15. 30). The prophet's upper garment was usually rough and coarse-haired (2 Kings 1. 8; Zechariah 13. 4). like the dragons—so JEROME. Rather, "the wild dogs," jackals or wolves, which wall like an infant when in distress or alone. [MAURER.] (See Note, Job 30. 29.) owls—rather, "ostriches," which give a shrill and long-drawn sigh-like cry, especially at night. 9. wound . . . incurable—her case, politically and morally, is desperate (Jeremiah 8. 22). it is come—the wound, or impending calamity (cf. Isaiah 10. 23). he is come . . . even to Jerusalem—the evil is no longer limited to Israel. The prophet foresees Sennacherib coming even "to the gate" of the principal city. The use of "it" and "he" is appropriately distinct. It, the calamity, "came unto" Judah, many of the inhabitants of which suffered, but did not reach the citizens of Jerusalem, "the gate" of which the foe (he) "came unto," but did not enter (Isaiah 36. 1; 37. 33-37). 10. Declare ye it not at Gath—on the borders of Judea, one of the five cities of the Philistines, who would exult at the calamity of the Hebrews (2 Samuel 1. 20). Gratify not those who exult over the falls of the Israel of God. weep ye not at all—do not betray your inward sorrow by outward weeping, within the cognizance of the enemy, lest they should exult at it. RELAND translates, "Weep not in Acco," i. e., Ptolemais, now St. Jean d'Acre, near the foot of Mount Carmel; allotted to Asher, but never occupied by that tribe (Judges 1. 31); Acco's inhabitants would, therefore, like Gath's, rejoice at Israel's disaster. Thus the parallelism is best carried out in all the three clauses of the verse, and there is a similar play on sounds in each, in the Hebrew Gath, resembling in sound the Hebrew for declare; Acco, resembling the Hebrew for weep; and Aphrah, meaning dust. Whilst the Hebrews were not to expose their misery to foreigners, they ought to bewail it in their own cities, e. g., Aphrah or Ophrah (Joshua 18. 23; 1 Samuel 13. 17), in the tribe of Benjamin. To roll in the dust marked deep sorrow (Jeremiah 6. 26; Ezekiel 27. 30). 11. Pass ye away—i. e., Thou shalt go into captivity. Inhabitant of Saphir—a village amidst the hills of Judah, between Eleutheropolis and Ascalon, called so, from the Hebrew word for beauty. Though thy name be beauty, which heretofore was thy characteristic, thou shalt have thy "shame" made "naked." This city shall be dismantled of its walls, which are the garments, as it were, of cities; its citizens also shall be hurried into captivity, with persons exposed (Isaiah 47. 3; Ezekiel 16. 37; Hosea 2. 10). the inhabitant of Zaanan came not forth—Its inhabitants did not come forth to console the people of Beth-ezel in their mourning, because the calamity was universal, none was exempt from it (cf. Jeremiah 6. 25). Zaanan is the same as Zenan, in Judah (Joshua 15. 37), meaning the place of flocks. The form of the name used is made like the Hebrew for "came forth." Though in name seeming to imply that thou dost come forth, thou "camest not forth." Beth-ezel—perhaps Azal (Zechariah 14. 5), near Jerusalem. It means a house on the side, or near. Though so near, as its name implies, to Zaanan, Beth-ezel received no succour or sympathy from Zaanan. he shall receive of you his standing—"he," i. e., the foe; "his standing," i. e., his sustenance. [PISCATOR.] Or, "he shall be caused a delay by you, Zaanan." He shall be brought to a stand for a time in besieging you; hence it is said just before, "Zaanan came not forth," i. e., shut herself up within her walls to withstand a siege. But it was only for a time. She, too, fell like Beth-ezel before her. [VATABLUS.] MAURER construes thus; "The inhabitant of Zaanan came not forth; the mourning of Beth-ezel takes away from you her shelter." Though Beth-ezel be at your side (i. e., near), according to her name, yet as she also mourns under the oppression of the foe, she cannot give you shelter, or be at your side as a helper (as her name might lead you to expect), if you come forth and be intercepted by him from returning to Zaanan. 12. Maroth—possibly the same as Maarath (Joshua 15. 59). Perhaps a different town, lying between the previously mentioned towns and the capital, and one of those plundered by Rabshakeh on his way to it. waited carefully for good—i. e., for better fortune, but in vain. [CALVIN.] GESENIUS translates, "is grieved for her goods taken away from her. This accords with the meaning of Maroth, "bitterness," to which allusion is made in "is grieved." But the antithesis favours English Version, "waited carefully (i. e., anxiously) for good; but evil came down." from the Lord—not from chance. unto the gate of Jerusalem—after the other cities of Judah have been taken. 13. "Bind the chariot to the swift steed," in order by a hasty flight to escape the invading foe. Cf. Note, Isaiah 36. 2, on "Lachish," at which Sennacherib fixed his headquarters (2 Kings 18. 14, 17; Jeremiah 34. 7). she is the beginning of the sin to . . . Zion—Lachish was the first of the cities of Judah, according to this passage, to introduce the worship of false gods, imitating what Jeroboam had introduced in Israel. As lying near the border of the north kingdom, Lachish was first to be infected by its idolatry, which thence spread to Jerusalem. 14. shalt thou give presents to Moresheth-gath—that its inhabitants may send thee help. MAURER explains it, "thou shalt give a writing of renunciation to Moresheth-gath," i. e., thou shalt renounce all claim to it, being compelled to yield it up to the foe. "Thou," i. e., Judah, "Israel" in this verse is used for the kingdom of Judah, which was the chief representative of the whole nation of Israel. Moresheth-gath is so called, because it had fallen for a time under the power of the neighbouring Philistines of Gath. It was the native town of Micah (v. 1). Achzib—meaning "lying." Achzib, as its name implies, shall prove a "lie to . . . Israel," i. e., shall disappoint Israel's hopes of succour from her (cf. Job 6. 15-20; Jeremiah 15. 18). Achzib was in Judah between Kellah and Mareshah (Joshua 15. 44). Perhaps the same as Chezb (Genesis 38. 5). 15. Yet will I bring an heir unto thee—rather, "the heir." As thou art now occupied by possessors who expelled the former inhabitants, so will I bring "yet" again the new possessor, viz., the Assyrian foe. Other heirs will supplant us in every inheritance but that of heaven. There is a play upon the meaning of Mareshah, an inheritance: there shall come the new heir of the inheritance. Adullam the glory of Israel—so called as being superior in situation; when it and the neighbouring cities fell, Israel's glory was gone. MAURER, as Margin, translates, "the glory of Israel (her chief citizens: answering to "thy delicate children," v. 16) shall come in flight to Adullam." English Version better preserves the parallelism, "the heir" in the first clause answering to "he" in the second. 16. Make thee bald, &c.—a token of deep mourning (Ezra 9. 3; Job 1. 20). Mourn, O land, for thy darling children. poll—shave off thy hair. enlarge thy baldness—mourn grievously. The land is compared to a mother weeping for her children. as the eagle—the bald eagle, or the dark-winged vulture. In the moulting season all eagles are comparatively bald (cf. Psalm 103. 5).

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-13. DENUNCIATION OF THE EVILS PREVALENT: THE PEOPLE'S UNWILLINGNESS TO HEAR THE TRUTH: THEIR EXPULSION FROM THE LAND THE FITTING FRUIT OF THEIR SIN: YET JUDAH AND ISRAEL ARE HEREAFTER TO BE RESTORED. 1. devise . . . work . . . practise—They do evil not merely on a sudden impulse, but with deliberate design. As in the former chapter sins against the first table are reproved, so in this chapter sins against the second table. A gradation: "devise" is the conception of the evil purpose; "work" (Psalm 58. 2), or "fabricate," the maturing of the scheme; "practise," or "effect," the execution of it. because it is in the power of their hand—for the phrase see Genesis 31. 29; Proverbs 3. 27. Might, not right, is what regulates their conduct. Where they can, they commit oppression; where they do not, it is because they cannot. 2. Parallelism, "Take by violence," answers to "take away;"^f "fields" and "houses," to "house" and "heritage" (i. e., one's land). 3. against this family—against the nation, and especially against those reprobated in v. 1, 2. I devise an evil—a happy antithesis between God's dealings and the Jews' dealings (v. 1). Ye "devise evil" against your fellow-countrymen; I devise evil against you. Ye devise it wrongfully, I by righteous retribution in kind. from which ye shall not remove your necks—as ye have done from the law. The yoke I shall impose shall be one which ye cannot shake off. They who will not bend to God's "easy yoke" (Matthew 11. 29, 30), shall feel His iron yoke. go haughtily—(Cf. Note, Jeremiah 6. 23.) Ye shall not walk as now with neck haughtily uplifted, for the yoke shall press down your "neck." this time is evil—rather, "for that time shall be an evil time," viz., the time of the carrying away into captivity (cf. Amos 5. 13; Ephesians 5. 16). 4. one take up a parable against you—viz., some of your foes shall do so, taking in derision from your own mouth your "lamentation," viz., "We be spoiled," &c. lament with a doleful lamentation—lit., lament with a lamentation of lamentations. Hebrew, "naha, nehi, nihyah," the repetition representing the continuous and monotonous wail. he hath changed the portion of my people—a charge of injustice against Jehovah. He transfers to other nations the sacred territory assigned as the rightful portion of our people (ch. 1. 15). turning away he hath divided our fields—turning away from us to the enemy, he hath divided among them our fields. CALVIN, as Margin, explains, "Instead of restoring our territory, He hath divided our fields among our enemies, each of whom henceforward will have an interest in keeping what he hath gotten: so that we are utterly shut out from hope of restoration." MAURER translates as a noun, "He hath divided our fields to a rebel," i. e., to the foe who is a rebel against the true God, and a worshipper of idols. So "backsliding," i. e., backslider (Jeremiah 49. 4). English Version gives a good sense; and is quite tenable in the Hebrew. 5. Therefore—resumed from v. 3. On account of your crimes described in v. 1, 2. thou—the ideal individual ("me," v. 4), representing the guilty people in whose name he spoke. none that . . . cast a cord by lot—none who shall have any possession measured out. in the congregation of the Lord—among the people consecrated to Jehovah. By covetousness and violence (v. 2) they had forfeited "the portion of Jehovah's people." This is God's implied answer to their complaint of injustice (v. 4). 6. "Prophecy ye not," say they—viz., the Israelites say to the true prophets, when announcing unwelcome truths. Therefore God judicially abandons them to their own ways: "The prophets, by whose ministry they might have been saved from shame (ignominious captivity), shall not (i. e., no longer) prophecy to them" (Isaiah 30. 10; Amos 2. 12; 7. 16). MAURER translates the latter clause, "they shall not prophesy of such things" (as in v. 3-5, these being rebellious Israel's words); "let them not prophesy;" "they never cease from insult" (from prophesying-insults to us). English Version is supported by the parallelism: wherein the similarity of sound and word implies how exactly God makes their punishment answer to their sin, and takes them at their own word. "Prophecy," lit., drop (Deuteronomy 32. 2; Ezekiel 21. 2). 7. O thou . . . named The house of Jacob—priding thyself on the name, though having naught of the spirit, of thy progenitor. Also, bearing the name which ought to remind thee of God's favours granted to thee because of His covenant with Jacob. is the Spirit of the Lord straitened?—Is His compassion contracted within narrower limits now than formerly, so that He should delight in your destruction (cf. Psalm 77. 7-9; Isaiah 59. 1, 2)? are these his doings?—i. e., Are such threatenings His delight? Ye dislike the prophets' threatenings (v. 6); but who is to blame? Not God, for He delights in blessing, rather than threatening; but yourselves (v. 8) who provoke His threatenings. [GROTIUS.] CALVIN translates, "Are your doings such as are prescribed by Him?" Ye boast of being God's peculiar people: Do ye then conform your lives to God's law? do not my words do good to him that walketh uprightly—Are not my words good to the upright? If your ways were upright, my words would not be threatening (cf. Psalm 18. 26; Matthew 11. 19; John 7. 17). 8. Your ways are not such that I can deal with you as I would with the upright. Even of late—lit., yesterday: "long ago." So "of old," Hebrew, "yesterday" (Isaiah 30. 33); "heretofore," Hebrew, "since yesterday" (Joshua 3. 4). my people is risen up as an enemy—i. e., has rebelled against my precepts; also has become an enemy to the unoffending passers-by. robe with the garment—not content with the outer "garment," ye greedily rob passers-by of the ornamental "robe" fitting the body closely and flowing down to the feet [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU] (Matthew 5. 40). as men averse from war—in antithesis to (my people) "as an enemy." Israel treats the innocent passers-by, though "averse from war," "as an enemy" would treat captives in his power, stripping them of their habiliments as lawful spoils. GROTIUS translates, "as men returning from war," i. e., as captives over whom the right of war gives the victors an absolute power. English Version is supported by the antithesis. 9. The women of my people—i. e., the widows of the men slain by you (v. 2) ye cast out from their homes which had been their delight, and seize on them for yourselves. from their children—i. e., from the orphans of the widows. taken away my glory—viz., their substance and raiment, which, being the fruit of God's blessing on the young, reflected God's glory. Thus Israel's crime was not merely robbery, but sacrilege. Their sex did not save the women, nor their age the children from violence. for ever—there was no repentance. They persevered in sin. The pledged garment was to be restored to the poor before sunset (Exodus 22. 26, 27); but these never restored their unlawful booty. 10. Arise ye, and depart—not an exhortation to the children of God to depart out of an ungodly world, as it is often applied; though that sentiment is a scriptural one. This world is doubtless not our "rest," being "polluted" with sin: it is our passage, not our portion; our aim, not our home (2 Corinthians 6. 17; Hebrews 13. 14). The imperatives express the certainty of the future event predicted. "Since such are your doings (cf. v. 7, 8, &c.), my sentence on you is irrevocable (v. 4, 5), however distasteful to you (v. 6), ye who have cast out others from their homes and possessions (v. 2, 8, 9) must arise, depart, and be cast out of your own (v. 4, 5): for this is not your rest" (Numbers 10. 33; Deuteronomy 12. 9; Psalm 95. 11). Canaan was designed to be a rest to them after their wilderness fatigues. But it is to be so no longer. Thus God refutes the people's self-confidence, as if God were bound to them inseparably. The promise (Psalm 132. 14) is quite consistent with temporary withdrawal of God from Israel for their sins. it shall destroy you—the land shall spew you out, because of the defilements wherewith ye polluted it (Leviticus 18. 25, 28; Jeremiah 3. 2; Ezekiel 36. 12-14). 11. walking in the spirit—the Hebrew means also wind. "If a man professing to have the spirit of inspiration (Ezekiel 13. 3; so 'man of the spirit,' i. e., one claiming inspiration, Hosea 9. 7), but really walking in wind (prophecy void of nutriment for the soul, and unsubstantial as the wind) and falsehood, do lie, saying (that which ye like to hear), I will prophecy," &c., even such a one, however false his prophecies, since he flatters your wishes, shall be your prophet (cf. v. 6; Jeremiah 5. 31). prophecy . . . of wine—i. e., of an abundant supply of wine. 12. A sudden transition from threats to the promise of a glorious restoration. Cf. a similar transition, Hosea 1. 9, 10. Jehovah, too, prophecies of good things to come, but not like the false prophets, "of wine and strong drink" (v. 11). After I have sent you into captivity as I have just threatened, I will thence assemble you again (cf. ch. 4. 6, 7). all of thee—the restoration from Babylon was partial. Therefore that here meant must be still future, when "all Israel shall be saved" (Romans 11. 26). The restoration from "Babylon" (specified ch. 4. 10) is the type of the future one. Jacob . . . Israel—the ten tribes' kingdom (Hosea 12. 2) and Judah (2 Chronicles 19. 8; 21. 2, 4). remnant—the elect remnant, which shall survive the previous calamities of Judah, and from which the nation is to spring into new life (Isaiah 6. 13; 10. 20-22). as the sheep of Bozrah—a region famed for its rich pastures (cf. 2 Kings 3. 4). GESSENIUS for Bozrah translates, "sheepfold." But thus there will be tautology, unless the next clause be translated, "in the midst of their pasture." English Version is more favoured by the Hebrew. 13. The breaker—Jehovah Messiah, who breaks through every obstacle in the way of their restoration; not as formerly breaking forth to destroy them for transgression (Exodus 19. 22; Judges 21. 15), but breaking a way for them through their enemies. they—the returning Israelites and Jews. passed through the gate—i. e., through the gate of the foe's city in which they had been captives. So the image of the resurrection (Hosea 13. 14) represents Israel's restoration. their king—"the Breaker," peculiarly "their king" (Hosea 3. 5; Matthew 27. 37). pass before them—as He did when they went up out of Egypt (Exodus 13. 21; Deuteronomy 1. 30, 33). the Lord on the head of them—Jehovah at their head (Isaiah 52. 12). Messiah, the second person, is meant (cf. Exodus 23. 20; 33. 14; Isaiah 63. 9).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-12. THE SINS OF THE PRINCES, PROPHETS, AND PRIESTS: THE CONSEQUENT DESOLATION OF ZION, AND PRINCES—magistrates or judges. Is it not for you?—Is it not your special function (Jeremiah 5. 4, 5)? judgment—justice. Ye sit in judgment on others; surely then ye ought to know the judgment for injustice which awaits yourselves (Romans 2. 1). 2. pluck off their skin . . . flesh—rob their fellow-countrymen of all their substance (Psalm 14. 4; Proverbs 30. 14). 3. pot . . . flesh within . . . caldron—manifold species of cruel oppressions. Cf. Ezekiel 24. 3, &c., containing as to the coning punishment the same figure as is here used of the sin: implying that the sin and punishment exactly correspond. 4. Then—at the time of judgment, which Micah takes for granted, so certain is it (cf. ch. 2. 3). they cry . . . but he will not hear—just as those oppressed by them had formerly cried, and they would not hear. Their prayer shall be rejected, because it is the mere cry of nature for deliverance from pain, not that of repentance for deliverance from sin. Ill in their doings—men cannot expect to do ill and fare well. 5. Here he attacks the false prophets, as before he had attacked the "princes." make my people err—knowingly misled my people by not denouncing their sins as incurring judgment. bite with . . . teeth, and cry, Peace—i. e., who, so long as they are supplied with food, promise peace and prosperity in their prophecies. he that putteth not into their mouths, they . . . prepare war against him—whenever they are not supplied with food, they foretell war and calamity. prepare war—lit., sanctify war, i. e., proclaim it as a holy judgment of God because they are not fed (Note, Jeremiah 6. 4; cf. Isaiah 13. 3; Joel 1. 14). 6. night . . . dark—calamities shall press on you so overwhelming as to compel you to cease pretending to divine (Zechariah 13. 4). Darkness is often the image of calamity (Isaiah 8. 22; Amos 5. 18; 8. 9). 7. cover their lips—The Orientals prided themselves on the moustache and beard (Margin, "upper lip"). To cover it, therefore, was a token of shame and sorrow (Leviticus 13. 45; Ezekiel 24. 17, 22). "They shall be so ashamed of themselves as not to dare to open their mouths or boast of the name of prophet." [CALVIN.] there is no answer of God—they shall no more profess to have responses from God, being struck dumb with calamities (v. 6). 8. I—in contrast to the false prophets (v. 5, 7). fall of power—that which "the Spirit of Jehovah" imparts for the discharge of the prophetic function (Luke 1. 17; 24. 49; Acts 1. 8). judgment—a sense of justice [MAURER]; as opposed to the false prophets' speaking to please men, not from a regard to truth. Or, judgment to discern between graver and lighter offences, and to denounce punishments accordingly. [GROTIUS.] might—moral intrepidity in speaking the truth at all costs (2 Timothy 1. 7). to declare unto Jacob his . . . sin—(Isaiah 58. 1.) Not to flatter the sinner as the false prophets do with promises of peace. 9. Hear—resumed from v. 1. Here begins the leading subject of the prophecy: a demonstration of his assertion that he is "full of power by the Spirit of Jehovah" (v. 8). 10. They—change of person from "ye" (v. 9); the third person puts them to a greater distance as estranged from him. It is, lit., "Whosoever builds," singular, build up Zion with blood—build on it stately mansions with wealth obtained by the condemnation and murder of the innocent (Jeremiah 22. 13; Ezekiel 22. 27; Habakkuk 2. 12). 11. heads thereof—the princes of Jerusalem. judge for reward—take bribes as judges (ch. 7. 3). priests teach for hire—it was their duty to teach the law and to decide controversies gratuitously (Leviticus 10. 11; Deuteronomy 17. 11; Malachi 2. 7; cf. Jeremiah 6. 13; Jude 11). prophets . . . divine—i. e., false prophets. Is not the Lord among us?—viz., in the temple (Isaiah 48. 2; Jeremiah 7. 4, 8-11). 12. Jeremiah 26. 13 quotes this verse. The Talmud and Maimonides record that at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans under Titus, Terentius Rufus, who was left in command of the army, with a ploughshare tore up the foundations of the temple. mountain of the house—the height on which the temple stands. as the high places of the forest—shall become as heights in a forest overrun with wild shrubs and brushwood.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-13. TRANSITION TO THE GLORY, PEACE, KINGDOM, AND VICTORY OF ZION. 1-3. Almost identical with Isaiah 2. 2-4. the mountain of the house of the Lord—which just before (ch. 3. 12) had been doomed to be a wild forest-height. Under Messiah, its elevation is to be not that of situation, but of moral dignity, as the seat of God's universal empire. people shall flow into it—In Isaiah it is "all nations:" a more universal prophecy. 3. rebuke—convict of sin (John 16. 8, 9); and subdue with judgments (Psalm 2. 5, 9; 110. 5, 6; Revelation 2. 27; 12. 5). many people . . . strong nations afar off—In Isaiah 2. 4 it is "the nations . . . many people." 4. sit every man under his vine, &c.—i. e., enjoy the most prosperous tranquillity (1 Kings 4. 25; Zechariah 3. 10). The vine and fig tree are mentioned rather than a house, to signify, there will be no need of a covert; men will be safe even in the fields and open air. Lord of hosts hath spoken it—therefore it must come to pass, however unlikely now it may seem. 5. For—rather, Though it be that all people walk after their several gods, yet we (the Jews in the dispersion) will walk in the name of the Lord. So the Hebrew particle means in Margin, Genesis 8. 21; Exodus 13. 17; Joshua 17. 18. The resolution of the exile Jews is, As Jehovah gives us hope of so glorious a restoration, notwithstanding the overthrow of our temple and nation, we must in confident reliance on His promise persevere in the true worship of Him, however the nations around, our superiors now in strength and numbers, walk after their gods. [ROSENMULLER.] As the Jews were thoroughly weaned from idols by the Babylonian captivity, so they shall be completely cured of unbelief by their present long dispersion (Zechariah 10. 8-12). 6. assemble her that halteth—feminine for neuter in Hebrew idiom, "whatever halteth;" metaphor from sheep weaned out with a journey: all the suffering exiles of Israel (Ezekiel 34. 16; Zephaniah 3. 19). her . . . driven out—all Israel's outcasts. Called "the Lord's flock" (Jeremiah 13. 17; Ezekiel 34. 13; 37. 21). 7. I will make her that halted a remnant—I will cause a remnant to remain which shall not perish. Lord shall reign . . . in . . . Zion—David's kingdom shall be restored in the person of Messiah, who is the seed of David and at the same time Jehovah (Isaiah 24. 23), for ever—(Isaiah 9. 6, 7; Daniel 7. 14, 27; Luke 1. 33; Revelation 11. 15). 8. tower of the flock—following up the metaphor of sheep (Note, v. 6). Jerusalem is called the "tower," from which the King and Shepherd observes and guards His flock: both the spiritual Jerusalem, the Church now whose towerlike elevation is that of doctrine and practice (Song of Solomon 4. 4, "Thy neck is like the tower of David"), and the literal hereafter (Jeremiah 3. 17). In large-pastures it was usual to erect a high wooden tower, so as to oversee the flock. JEROME takes the Hebrew for "flock," Eder or Eder, as a proper name, viz., a village near Bethlehem, for which it is put, Bethlehem being taken to represent the royal stock of David (ch. 5. 2; cf. Genesis 35. 21). But the explanatory words, "the stronghold of the daughter of Zion," confirm English Version. stronghold—Hebrew, "Ophel:" an impregnable height on Mount Zion (2 Chronicles 27. 3; 33. 14; Nehemiah 3. 26, 27). unto thee shall . . . come . . . the first dominion—viz., the dominion formerly exercised by thee shall come back to thee. kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem—rather, "the kingdom of the daughter of Jerusalem shall come (again):" such as it was under David, before its being weakened by the secession of the ten tribes. 9. Addressed to the daughter of Zion, in her consternation at the approach of the Chaldeans. Is there no king in thee?—asked tauntingly. There is a king in her; but it is the same as if there were none, so helpless to devise means of escape are he and his counsellors. [MAURER.] Or, Zion's pains are because her king is taken away from her (Jeremiah 52. 9; Lamentations 4. 20; Ezekiel 12. 13). [CALVIN.] The former is perhaps the preferable view (cf. Jeremiah 49. 7). The latter, however, describes better Zion's kingless state during her present long dispersion (Hosea 3. 4, 5). 10. Be in pain, and labour—carrying on the metaphor of a pregnant woman. Thou shalt be affected with bitter sorrows before thy deliverance shall come. I do not forbid thy grieving, but I bring thee consolation. Though God cares for His children, yet they must not expect to be exempt from trouble, but must prepare for it. go forth out of the city—on its capture. So "come out" is used 2 Kings 24. 12; Isaiah 36. 16. dwell in the field—viz., in the open country, defenceless, instead of their fortified city. Beside the Chebar (Psalm 137. 1; Ezekiel 3. 15). Babylon—Like Isaiah, Micah looks beyond the existing Assyrian dynasty to the Babylonian, and to Judah's captivity under it, and restoration (Isaiah 39. 7; 43. 14; 48. 20). Had they been, as rationalists represent, merely sagacious politicians, they would have restricted their prophecies to the sphere of the existing Assyrian dynasty. But their seeing into the far-off future of Babylon's subsequent supremacy, and Judah's connection with her, proves them to be inspired prophets. there . . . there—emphatic repetition. The very scene of thy calamities is to be the scene of thy deliverance. In the midst of enemies, where all hope seems cut off, there shall Cyrus, the deliverer, appear (cf. Judges 14. 14). Cyrus again being the type of the greater Deliverer, who shall finally restore Israel. 11. many nations—the subject peoples composing Babylon's armies: and also Edom, Ammon, &c., who exulted in Judah's fall (Lamentations 2. 16; Obadiah 11-13). defiled—metaphor from a virgin. Let her be defiled (i. e., outraged by violence and bloodshed), and let our eye gaze insultingly on her shame and sorrow (ch. 7. 10). Her foes desired to feast their eyes on her calamities. 12. thoughts of the Lord—their unsearchable wisdom, overruling seeming disaster to the final good of His people, is the very ground on which the restoration of Israel hereafter (of which the restoration from Babylon is a type) is based in Isaiah 55. 8, cf. with v. 3, 12, 13, which prove that Israel, not merely the Christian Church, is the ultimate subject of the prophecy; also in Romans 11. 13. God's counsel is to discipline His people for a time with the foe as a scourge; and then to destroy the foe by the hands of His people. gather them as . . . sheaves—them who "gathered" themselves for Zion's destruction (v. 11), the Lord "shall gather" for destruction by Zion (v. 13), like sheaves gathered to be threshed (cf. Isaiah 21. 10; Jeremiah 51. 33). The Hebrew is singular, "sheaf." However great the numbers of the foe, they are all but as one sheaf ready to be threshed. [CALVIN.] Threshing was done by treading with the feet: hence the propriety of the image for treading under foot and breaking asunder the foe. 13. thresh—destroy thy foes "gathered" by Jehovah as "sheaves" (Isaiah 41. 15, 16). thine horn—Zion being compared to an ox treading corn, and an ox's strength lying in the horns, her strength is implied by giving her a horn of iron (cf. 1 Kings 22. 11). beat in pieces many—(Daniel 2. 44.) I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord—God subjects the nations to Zion, not for her own selfish aggrandizement, but for His glory (Isaiah 60. 6, 9; Zechariah 14. 20, with which cf. Isaiah 23. 18) and for their ultimate good; therefore He is here called, not merely God of Israel, but "Lord of the whole earth."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-15. THE CALAMITIES WHICH PRECEDE MESSIAH'S ADVENT. HIS KINGDOM, CONQUEST OF JACOB'S FOES, AND BLESSING UPON HIS PEOPLE. 1. gather thyself in troops—i. e., thou shalt do so, to resist the enemy. Lest the faithful should fall into carnal security because of the previous promises, he reminds them of the calamities which are to precede the prosperity. daughter of troops—Jerusalem is so called on account of her numerous troops. he hath laid siege—the enemy hath. they shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek—the greatest of insults to an Oriental. Zedekiah, the judge (or king, Amos 2. 3) of Israel, was loaded with insults by the Chaldeans. So also the other princes and judges (Lamentations 3. 30). HENGSTENBERG thinks the expression, "the judge," marks a time when no king of the house of David reigned. The smiting on the cheek of other judges of Israel was a type of the same indignity offered to Him who nevertheless is the Judge, not only of Israel, but also of the world, and who is "from everlasting" (v. 2; Isaiah 50. 6; Matthew 26. 67; 27. 30). 2. Beth-lehem Ephrath—Genesis 48. 7), or, Beth-lehem Judah; so called to distinguish it from Beth-lehem in Zebulun. It is a few miles south-west of Jerusalem. Beth-lehem means the house of bread; Ephrath means fruitful; both names referring to the fertility of the region. though thou be little among—though thou be scarcely large enough to be reckoned among, &c. It was insignificant in size and population; so that in Joshua 15. 21, &c., it is not enumerated among the cities of Judah; nor in the 11st, Nehemiah 11. 25, &c. Under Rehoboam it became a city: 2 Chronicles 11. 6, "He built Beth-lehem." Matthew 2. 6 seems to contradict Micah, "thou art not the least." But really he, by an independent testimony of the Spirit, confirms the prophet. Little in worldly importance, thou art not least (i. e., far from least, yea, the very greatest) among the thousands, or princes of Judah, in the spiritual significance of being the birth-place of Messiah (John 7. 42). God chooses the little things of the world to eclipse in glory its greatest things (Judges 6. 15; John 1. 46; 1 Corinthians 1. 27, 28). The low state of David's line when Messiah was born is also implied here. thousands—each tribe was divided into clans or "thousands" (each thousand containing a thousand families: like our old English division of counties into hundreds), which had their several heads or "princes;" hence in Matthew 2. 6 it is quoted "princes," substantially the same as in Micah, and authoritatively explained in Matthew. Since it is not so much this thousand that is preferred to the other thousands of Judah, but the Governor or Chief Prince out of it, who is preferred to the governors of all the other thousands. It is called a "town" (rather in the Greek "village"), John 7. 42; though scarcely containing a thousand inhabitants, it is ranked among the "thousands" or larger divisions of the tribe, because of its being the cradle of David's line, and of the Divine Son of David. Moses divided the people into thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, with their respective "rulers" (Exodus 18. 25; cf. 1 Samuel 10. 19). unto me—unto God the Father (Luke 1. 32): to fulfil all the Father's will and purpose from eternity. So the Son declares (Psalm 2. 7; 40. 7, 8; John 4. 34); and the Father confirms it (Matthew 3. 17; 12. 18, cf. with Isaiah 42. 1). God's glory is hereby made the ultimate end of redemption. ruler—the "Shiloh," "Prince of peace," "on whose shoulders the government is laid" (Genesis 49. 10; Isaiah 9. 6). In 2 Samuel 23. 3, "He that ruleth over men must be just," the same Hebrew word is employed; Messiah alone realizes David's ideal of a ruler. Also in Jeremiah 30. 21, "their governor shall proceed from the midst of them;" answering closely to "out of thee shall come forth the ruler," here (cf. Isaiah 11. 1-4). goings forth . . . from everlasting—the plain antithesis of this clause, to "come forth out of thee" (from Beth-lehem), shows that the eternal generation of the Son is meant. The terms convey the strongest assertion of infinite duration of which the Hebrew language is capable (cf. Psalm 90. 2; Proverbs 8. 22, 23; John 1. 1). Messiah's generation as man coming forth unto God to do His will on earth is from Beth-lehem; but as Son of God, His goings forth are from everlasting. The promise of the Redeemer at first was vaguely general (Genesis 3. 15). Then the Shemitic division of mankind is declared as the quarter in which He was to be looked for (Genesis 9. 26, 27); then it grows clearer, defining the race and nation whence the Deliverer should come, viz., the seed of Abraham, the Jews (Genesis 12. 3); then the particular tribe, Judah (Genesis 49. 10); then the family, that of David (Psalm 89. 19, 20); then the very town of His birth, here. And as His coming drew nigh, the very parentage (Matthew 1.; Luke 1. and 2.); and then all the scattered rays of prophecy concentrate in Jesus, as their focus (Hebrews 1. 1, 2). 3. "Therefore (because of His settled plan) will God give up to their foes His people Israel, until," &c. she which travaileth hath brought forth—viz., "the virgin" mother, mentioned by Micah's contemporary, Isaiah 7. 14. Zion "in travail" (ch. 4. 9, 10) answers to the virgin in travail of Messiah. Israel's deliverance from her long travail pangs of sorrow will synchronize with the appearance of Messiah as her Redeemer (Romans 11. 26) in the last days, as the Church's spiritual deliverance synchronized with the virgin's giving birth to Him at His first advent. The ancient Church's travail-like waiting for Messiah is represented by the virgin's travail. Hence, both may be meant. It cannot be restricted to the Virgin Mary: for Israel is still "given up," though Messiah has been "brought forth" eighteen and a half centuries ago. But the Church's throes are included, which are only to be ended when Christ, having been preached for a witness to all nations, shall at last appear as the Deliverer of Jacob, and when the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, and Israel as a nation shall be born in a day (Isaiah 66. 7-11; Luke 21. 24; Revelation 12. 1, 2, 4; cf. Romans 8. 22). the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel—(Cf. ch. 4. 7.) The remainder of the Israelites dispersed in foreign lands shall return to join their countrymen in Canaan. The Hebrew for "unto" is, lit., upon, implying superaddition to those already gathered. 4. he shall stand—i. e., persevere: implying the endurance of His kingdom. [CALVIN.] Rather, His sedulous care and pastoral circumspection, as a shepherd stands erect to survey and guard on every side his flock (Isaiah 61. 5). [MAURER.] feed—i. e., rule: as the Greek word similarly in Matthew 2. 6 (Margin), means both feed and rule (Isaiah 40. 11; 49. 10; Ezekiel 34. 23; cf. 2 Samuel 5. 2; 7. 8). in the majesty of the name of the Lord—possessing the majesty of all Jehovah's revealed attributes ("name") (Isaiah 11. 2; Philippians 2. 6, 9; Hebrews 2. 7-9). his God—God is "his God" in a oneness of relation distinct from the sense in which God is our God (John 20. 17). they shall abide—the Israelites ("they," viz., the returning remnant and the "children of Israel" previously in Canaan) shall dwell in permanent security and prosperity (ch. 4. 4; Isaiah 14. 30). unto the ends of the earth—(Ch. 4. 1; Psalm 72. 8; Zechariah 9. 10). 5. this man—in Hebrew simply This. The One just mentioned; He and He alone. Emphatical for Messiah (cf. Genesis 5. 29). the peace—the fountain-head of peace between God and man, between Israel and Israel's justly offended God (Genesis 49. 10; Isaiah 9. 6; Ephesians 2. 14, 17; Colossians 1. 20), and, as the consequence, the fountain of "peace on earth," where heretofore all is strife (ch. 4. 3; Hosea 2. 18; Zechariah 9. 10; Luke 2. 14). the Assyrian—being Israel's most powerful foe at that time, Assyria is made the representative of all the foes of Israel in all ages, who shall receive their final destruction at Messiah's appearing (Ezekiel 38). seven shepherds, and eight—seven expresses perfection; seven and eight is an idiom for a full and sufficient number (Job 5. 19; Proverbs 6. 16; Ecclesiastes 11. 2). principal men—lit., anointed (humble) men (Psalm 62. 9), such as the apostles were. Their anointing, or consecration and qualification to office, was by the Holy Spirit [CALVIN] (1 John 2. 20, 27). "Princes" also were anointed, and they are mentioned as under Messiah (Isaiah 32. 1). English Version therefore gives the probable sense. 6. waste—lit., eat up: following up the metaphor of shepherds (cf. Numbers 22. 4; Jeremiah 6. 3). land of Nimrod—Babylon (ch. 4. 10; Genesis 10. 10); or, including Assyria also, to which he extended his borders (Genesis 10. 11). in the entrances—the passes into Assyria (2 Kings 3. 21). The Margin and JEROME, misled by a needless attention to the parallelism, "with the sword," translate, "with her own naked swords;" as in Psalm 55. 21 the Hebrew is translated. But "in the entrances" of Assyria, answers to, "within our borders." As the Assyrians invade our border, so shall their own borders or "entrances" be invaded. he . . . he—Messiah shall deliver us, when the Assyrian shall come. 7. remnant of Jacob—already mentioned in v. 3. It in its comparative smallness stands in antithesis to the "many people." A remnant though Israel be amidst many nations after her restoration, yet she shall exercise the same blessed influence in quickening them spiritually that the small imperceptible dew exercises in refreshing the grass (Deuteronomy 32. 2; Psalm 72. 6; 110. 3). The influence of the Jews restored from Babylon in making many Gentile proselytes is an earnest of a larger similar effect hereafter (Isaiah 60. 19; Zechariah 8. 13). from the Lord—Israel's restoration, and the consequent conversion of the Gentiles are solely of grace. tarieth not for man—entirely God's work, as independent of human contrivance, as the dew and rains that fertilize the soil. 8. as a lion—In v. 7 Israel's benignant influence on the nations is described; but here her vengeance on the godless hosts who assail her (Isaiah 66. 15, 16, 19, 24; Zechariah 12. 3, 6, 8, 9; 14. 17, 18). Judah will be "as a lion," not in respect to its cruelty, but in its power of striking terror into all opponents. Under the Maccabees, the Jews acquired Idumea, Samaria, and parts of the territory of Ammon and Moab. [GROTIUS.] But this was only the earnest of their future glory on their coming restoration. 9. Thine hand shall be lifted up—In Isaiah 26. 11

it is Jehovah's hand that is lifted up; here Israel's, as v. 8 implies, just as "Zion" is addressed and directed to "beat in pieces many people" (ch. 4. 13; cf. Isaiah 54. 15, 17). For Israel's foes are Jehovah's foes. When her hand is said to be lifted up, it is Jehovah's hand that strikes the foe by her (cf. Exodus 13. 9, with 14. 8). 10. cut off thy horses . . . chariots—viz., those used for the purposes of war. Israel had been forbidden the use of cavalry, or to go to Egypt for horses (Deuteronomy 17. 16), lest they should trust in worldly forces, rather than in God (Psalm 20. 7). Solomon had disregarded this command (1 Kings 10. 26, 28). Hereafter, saith God, I will remove these impediments to the free course of my grace; horses, chariots, &c., on which ye trust. The Church will never be safe, till she is stripped of all creature-trusts, and rests on Jehovah alone. [CALVIN.] The universal peace given by God shall cause warlike instruments to be needless. He will cut them off from Israel (Zechariah 9. 10); as she will cut them off from Babylon, the representative of the nations (Jeremiah 50. 37; 51. 21). 11. cut off . . . cities . . . strongholds—such as are fortified for war. In that time of peace, men shall live in unwall'd villages (Ezekiel 38. 11; cf. Jeremiah 23. 6; 49. 31; Zechariah 2. 8). 12. witchcrafts out of thine hand—i. e., which thou now usest. 13. graven images . . . cut off—(Cf. Isaiah 2. 8, 18-21; 30. 22; Zechariah 13. 2.) standing images—statues. 14. groves . . . cities—the "groves" are the idolatrous symbol of As-tarte (Deuteronomy 16. 21; 2 Kings 21. 7). "Cities" being parallel to "groves," must mean cities in or near which such idolatrous groves existed. Cf. "city of the house of Baal" (2 Kings 10. 25), i. e., a portion of the city sacred to Baal. 15. vengeance . . . such as they have not heard—or, as the Hebrew order favours, "the nations that have not hearkened to my warnings." So LXX. (Psalm 149. 7).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-16. APPEAL BEFORE ALL CREATION TO THE ISRAELITES TO TESTIFY, IF THEY CAN, IF JEHOVAH EVER DID AUGHT BUT ACTS OF KINDNESS TO THEM FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD: GOD REQUIRES OF THEM NOT SO MUCH SACRIFICES, AS REAL PIETY AND JUSTICE: THEIR IMPIETIES AND COMING PUNISHMENT. 1. contend thou—Israel is called by Jehovah to plead with Him in controversy. Ch. 5. 11-13 suggested the transition from those happy times described in ch. 4. and 5., to the prophet's own degenerate times and people. before the mountains—in their presence; personified as if witnesses (cf. ch. 1. 2; Deuteronomy 32. 1; Isaiah 1. 2). Not as Margin, "with;" as God's controversy is with Israel, not with them. 2. Lord's controversy—How great is Jehovah's condescension, who, though the supreme Lord of all, yet wishes to prove to worms of the earth the equity of His dealings (Isaiah 5. 3; 43. 26). 3. my people—the greatest aggravation of their sin, that God always treated them, and still treats them, as His people. what have I done unto thee?—save kindness, that thou revoltest from me (Jeremiah 2. 5, 31). wherein have I wearied thee?—What commandments have I enjoined that should have wearied thee as irksome (1 John 5. 3)? 4. For—Nay, on the contrary, so far from doing anything harsh, I did thee every kindness from the earliest years of thy nationality. Miriam—mentioned, as being the prophetess who led the female chorus who sang the song of Moses (Exodus 15. 20). God sent Moses to give the best laws; Aaron to pray for the people; Miriam as an example to the women of Israel. 5. what Balak . . . consulted—how Balak plotted to destroy thee by getting Balaam to curse thee (Numbers 22. 5). what Balaam . . . answered—how the avaricious prophet was constrained against his own will, to bless Israel whom he had desired to curse for the sake of Balak's reward (Numbers 24. 9-11). [MAURER.] GROTIUS explains it, "how Balaam answered, that the only way to injure thee was by tempting thee to idolatry and whoredom" (Numbers 31. 16). The mention of "Shittim" agrees with this: as it was the scene of Israel's sin (Numbers 25. 1-5; 2 Peter 2. 15; Revelation 2. 14). from Shittim unto Gilgal—not that Balaam accompanied Israel from Shittim

to Gilgal: for he was slain in Midian (Numbers 31. 8). But the clause, "from Shittim," alone applies to Balaam. "Remember" God's kindnesses "from Shittim," the scene of Balaam's wicked counsel taking effect in Israel's sin, whereby Israel merited utter destruction but for God's sparing mercy, "to Gilgal," the place of Israel's first encampment in the promised land between Jericho and Jordan, where God renewed the covenant with Israel by circumcision (Joshua 5. 2-11). know the righteousness—recognize that, so far from God having treated thee harshly (v. 8), His dealings have been kindness itself (so "righteous acts" for gracious, Judges 5. 11; Psalm 24. 5; 112. 9). 6. Wherewith shall I come before the Lord?—The people, convicted by the previous appeal of Jehovah to them, ask as if they knew not (cf. v. 8) what Jehovah requires of them to appease Him, adding that they are ready to offer an immense heap of sacrifices, and those the most costly, even to the fruit of their own body. burnt offerings—(Leviticus 1.) calves of a year old—which used to be offered for a priest (Leviticus 9. 2, 3). 7. rivers of oil—used in sacrifices (Leviticus 2. 1, 15). Will God be appeased by my offering so much oil that it shall flow in myriads of torrents? my first-born—(2 Kings 3. 27.) As the king of Moab did. fruit of my body—my children, as an atonement (Psalm 132. 11). The Jews offered human sacrifices in the valley of Hinnom (Jeremiah 19. 5; 32. 35; Ezekiel 23. 27). 8. He—Jehovah. hath showed thee—long ago, so that thou needest not ask the question as if thou hadst never heard (v. 6; cf. Deuteronomy 10. 12; 30. 11-14). what is good—"the good things to come" under Messiah, of which "the law had the shadow." The Mosaic sacrifices were but suggestive foreshadowings of His better sacrifice (Hebrews 9. 23; 10. 1). To have this "good" first "showed," or revealed by the Spirit, is the only basis for the superstructure of the moral requirements which follow. Thus the way was prepared for the Gospel. The banishment of the Jews from Palestine is designed to preclude the possibility of their looking to the Mosaic rites for redemption, and shuts them up to Messiah. justly . . . mercy—preferred by God to sacrifices. For the latter being positive ordinances, are only means designed with a view to the former, which being moral duties are the ends, and of everlasting obligation (1 Samuel 15. 22; Hosea 6. 6; 12. 6; Amos 5. 22, 24). Two duties towards man are specified—justice, or strict equity; and mercy, or a kindly abatement of what we might justly demand, and a hearty desire to do good to others. to walk humbly with thy God—passive and active obedience towards God. The three moral duties here are summed up by our Lord (Matthew 23. 23), "judgment, mercy and faith" (in Luke 11. 42, "the love of God"). Cf. James 1. 27. To walk with God implies constant prayer and watchfulness, familiar yet "humble" converse with God (Genesis 5. 24; 17. 1). 9. unto the city—Jerusalem. the man of wisdom—as in Proverbs 13. 6, Hebrew, "sin" is used for "a man of sin," and in Psalm 109. 4, "prayer" for "a man of prayer;" so here "wisdom" for "the man of wisdom." shall see thy name—shall regard thee, in thy revelations of thyself. Cf. the end of ch. 2, v. 7. God's "name" expresses the sum total of His revealed attributes. Contrast with this Isaiah 26. 10, "will not behold the majesty of the Lord." Another reading is adopted by LXX., Syriac and Vulgate, "there is deliverance for those who fear thy name." English Version is better suited to the connection; and the rarity of the Hebrew expression, as compared with the frequency of that in the other reading, makes it less likely to be an interpolation. hear . . . the rod, &c.—hear what punishment (cf. v. 13, &c.; Isaiah 9. 3; 10. 5, 21) awaits you, and from whom. I am but a man, and so ye may disregard me; but remember my message is not mine, but God's. Hear the rod when it is come, and you feel its smart. Hear what counsels, what cautions it speaks. appointed it—(Jeremiah 47. 7). 10. Are there yet—notwithstanding all my warnings. Is there to be no end of acquiring treasures by wickedness? Jehovah is speaking (v. 9). scant measure . . . abominable—(Proverbs 11. 1; Amos 8. 5.) 11. Shall I count them pure—lit., "Shall I be pure with," &c. With the pure God shows Him- self pure; but with the froward God shows Himself froward (Psalm 138. 26). Men often are changeable in their judgments. But God, in the case of the impure who use "wicked balances," cannot be pure, i. e., cannot deal with them as He would with the pure. VATABLUS and HENDERSON make the "I" to be "any one;" "Can I (i. e., one) be innocent with wicked balances?" But as "I," in v. 13, refers to Jehovah, it must refer to Him also here. the bag—in which weights used to be carried, as well as money (Deuteronomy 25. 13; Proverbs 16. 11). 12. For—rather, "Inasmuch as," &c.; the conclusion "therefore," &c., following in v. 13. thereof—of Jerusalem. 13. make thee sick in smiting—(Leviticus 26. 16, to which perhaps the allusion here is, as in v. 14; Psalm 107. 17, 18; Jeremiah 13. 13.) 14. eat . . . not be satisfied—fulfilling the threat, Leviticus 26. 26. thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee—thou shalt be cast down, not merely on my borders, but in the midst of thee, thy metropolis and temple being overthrown. [TIRINUS.] Even though there should be no enemy, yet thou shalt be consumed with infestine evils. [CALVIN.] MAURER translates, as from an Arabic root, "there shall be emptiness in thy belly." Similarly GROTIUS, "there shall be a sinking of thy belly (once filled with food), through hunger." This suits the parallelism to the first clause. But English Version maintains the parallelism sufficiently. The casting down in the midst of the land, including the failure of food, through the invasion; thus answering to, "Thou shalt eat, and not be satisfied," thou shalt take hold, but . . . not deliver—thou shalt take hold (with thine arms), in order to save [CALVIN] thy wives, children and goods. MAURER, from a different root, translates, "thou shalt remove them," in order to save them from the foe. But thou shalt fail in the attempt to deliver" them (Jeremiah 50. 37). that which thou deliverest—if haply thou dost rescue aught, it will be for a time; I will give it up to the foe's sword. 15. sow . . . not reap—fulfilling the threat (Leviticus 26. 16; Deuteronomy 28. 33-40; Amos 5. 11). 16. statutes of Omri—the founder of Samaria and of Ahab's wicked house; and a supporter of Jeroboam's superstitions (1 Kings 16. 16-23). This verse is a recapitulation of what was more fully stated before, Judah's sin and consequent punishment. Judah, though at variance with Israel on all things else, imitated her impiety. works of . . . Ahab (1 Kings 21. 25, 26.) ye walk in their counsels—though these superstitions were the fruit of their king's "counsels" as a master-stroke of state policy, yet these pretences were no excuse for setting at naught the counsels and will of God. that I should make thee a desolation—thy conduct is framed so, as if it was thy set purpose "that I should make thee a desolation." inhabitants thereof—viz., of Jerusalem. hissing—(Lamentations 2. 15.) the reproach of my people—the very thing ye boast of, viz., that ye are "my people," will only increase the severity of your punishment. The greater was my grace to you, the greater shall be your punishment for having despised it. Your being God's people in name, whilst walking in His love, was an honour; but now the name, without the reality, is only a "reproach" to you.

CHAPTER VII.

VER. 1-20. THE UNIVERSALITY OF THE CORRUPTION; THE CHOSEN REMNANT, DRIVEN FROM EVERY HUMAN CONFIDENCE, TURNS TO GOD; TRIUMPHS BY FAITH OVER HER ENEMIES; IS COMFORTED BY GOD'S PROMISES IN ANSWER TO PRAYER, AND BY THE CONFUSION OF HER ENEMIES, AND SO BREAKS FORTH INTO PRAISES OF GOD'S CHARACTER. 1. I am as when, &c.—It is the same with me as with one seeking fruits after the harvest, grapes after the vintage. "There is not a cluster" to be found; no "first-ripe fruit" (or early fig, note, Isaiah 28. 4) which "my soul desireth." [MAURER.] So I look in vain for any good men left (v. 2). 2. (Psalm 12. 1.) good man—the Hebrew expresses "one merciful and good in relation to man," rather than to God. 3. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly—lit., "Their hands are for evil that they may do it well" (i. e., cleverly and successfully). the

great man, he—emphatic repetition. As for the great man, he no sooner has expressed his bad desire (lit., the mischief or lust of his soul), than the venal judges are ready to wrest the decision of the case according to his wish. so they wrap it up—the Hebrew is used of intertwining cords together. The “threefold cord is not quickly broken” (Ecclesiastes 4. 12); here the “prince,” the “judge,” and the “great man” are the three in guilty complicity. “They wrap it up,” viz., they conspire to carry out the great man’s desire at the sacrifice of justice. 4. as a bribe—or thorn; pricking with injury all who come in contact with them (2 Samuel 23. 6, 7; Isaiah 55. 13; Ezekiel 2. 6). the day of thy watchmen—the day foretold by thy (true) prophets, as the time of “thy visitation” in wrath. [GROTIVS.] Or, “the day of thy false prophets being punished;” they are specially threatened as being not only blind themselves, but leading others blindfold. [CALVIN.] now—at the time foretold, “at that time;” the prophet transporting himself into it. perplexity—(Isaiah 22. 5.) They shall not know whither to turn to. 5. Trust ye not in a friend—Faith is kept nowhere; all to a man are treacherous (Jeremiah 9. 2-6). When justice is perverted by the great, faith nowhere is safe. So, in gospel times of persecution, “a man’s foes are they of his own household” (Matthew 10. 35, 36; Luke 12. 53). guide—a counsellor [CALVIN] able to help and advise (cf. Psalm 118. 8, 9; 146. 3). The head of your family, to whom all the members of the family would naturally repair in emergencies. Similarly the Hebrew is translated in Joshua 22. 14, and “chief friends” in Proverbs 16. 28. [GROTIVS.] her that lieth in thy bosom—thy wife (Deuteronomy 13. 6). 6. son dishonoureth the father—the state of unnatural lawlessness in all relations of life is here described which is to characterize the last times, before Messiah comes to punish the ungodly and save Israel (cf. Luke 21. 16; 2 Timothy 3. 1-3). 7. Therefore I will look unto the Lord—as if no one else were before mine eyes. We must not only “look unto the Lord,” but also “wait for Him.” Having no hope from man (v. 5, 6), Micah speaks in the name of Israel, who herein, taught by chastisement (v. 4) to feel her sin (v. 9), casts herself on the Lord as her only hope, in patient waiting (Lamentations 3. 26). She did so under the Babylonian captivity; she shall do so again hereafter when the spirit of grace shall be poured on her (Zechariah 12. 10-13). 8. Rejoice not—at my fall, when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light—Israel reasons as her Divine representative, Messiah, reasoned by faith in His hour of darkness and desertion (Isaiah 50. 7, 8, 10). Israel addresses Babylon, her triumphant foe (or Edom), as a female; the type of her last and worst foes (Psalm 137. 7, 8). “Mine enemy,” in Hebrew, is feminine. when I fall, I shall arise—(Psalm 37. 24; Proverbs 24. 16.) 9. bear—patiently. the indignation of the Lord—His punishment inflicted on me (Lamentations 3. 39). The true penitent “accepts the punishment of his iniquity” (Leviticus 26. 41, 43); they who murmur against God, do not yet know their guilt (Job 40. 4, 5). execute judgment for me—against my foe. God’s people plead guilty before God; but, in respect to their human foes, they are innocent and undeserving of their foes’ injuries. bring me forth to the light—to the temporal and spiritual redemption. I shall behold his righteousness—His gracious faithfulness to His promises (Psalm 103. 17). 10. shame shall cover her—In seeing how utterly mistaken she was in supposing that I was utterly ruined. Where is . . . thy God—(Psalm 42. 3, 10). If He be “thy God,” as thou sayest, let Him come now and deliver thee. So as to Israel’s representative, Messiah (Matthew 27. 43). mine eyes shall behold her—a just retribution in kind upon the foe who had said, “Let our eye look upon Zion.” Zion shall behold her foe prostrate, not with the carnal joy of revenge, but with spiritual joy in God’s vindicating His own righteousness (Isaiah 66. 24; Revelation 16. 5-7). shall she be trodden down—herself, who had trodden down me. 11. thy walls . . . be built—under Cyrus, after the seventy years’ captivity; and again, hereafter, when the Jews shall be restored (Amos 9. 11; Zechariah 12. 6). shall the decree be far removed—viz., thy tyrannical decree or rule of Babylon shall be put away from thee, “the statutes that were not good” (Ezekiel 20. 25). [CALVIN.] Psalm 102. 13-16; Isaiah 9. 4. The Hebrew is against MAUREL’S translation, “the boundary of the city shall be far extended,” so as to contain the people flocking into it from all nations (v. 12; Isaiah 49. 20; 54. 2). 12. In that day also—rather, an answer to the supposed question of Zion, “When shall my walls be built? “The day (of thy walls being built) is the day when there shall come to thee he (i. e., many) from Assyria,” &c. [LUDOVICUS DE DIEU.] The Assyrians (including the Babylonians) who spoiled thee shall come. and from the fortified cities—rather, to suit the parallelism, “from Assyria even to Egypt.” (Matzor may be so translated.) So Assyria and Egypt are contrasted in Isaiah 19. 23. [MAUREL.] CALVIN agrees with English Version, “from all fortified cities.” from the fortress even to the river—“from Egypt even to the river” Euphrates (answering in parallelism to “Assyria”). [MAUREL.] Cf. Isaiah 11. 15, 16; 19. 23-25; 27. 13; Hosea 11. 11; Zechariah 10. 10. 13. However glorious the prospect of restoration, the Jews are not to forget the visitation on their “land” which is to intervene for the “fruit of (evil caused by) their doings” (cf. Proverbs 1. 31; Isaiah 3. 10, 11; Jeremiah 21. 14). 14. Feed thy people—Prayer of the prophet, in the name of his people to God, which, as God fulfils believing prayer, is prophetic of what God would do. When God is about to deliver His people, He stirs up their friends to pray for them. feed—including the idea of both pastoral rule and care over His people (Margin, ch. 5. 4), regarded as a flock (Psalm 89. 1; 100. 3). Our calamity must be fatal to the nation, unless thou of thy unmerited grace, remembering thy covenant with “thine heritage” (Deuteronomy 4. 20; 7. 6; 32. 9), shalt restore us. thy rod—the shepherd’s rod, wherewith he directs the flock (Psalm 23. 4). No longer the rod of punishment (ch. 6. 9). which dwell solitarily in the wood, in . . . Carmel—let thy people who have been dwelling as it were in a solitude of woods (in the world, but not of it), scattered among various nations, dwell in Carmel, i. e., where there are fruit-bearing lands and vineyards. [CALVIN.] Rather, “which are about to dwell (i. e., that they may dwell) separate in the wood, in . . . Carmel” [MAUREL], which are to be no longer mingled with the heathen, but are to dwell as a distinct people in their own land. Micah has here Balaam’s prophecy in view (cf. ch. 6. 5, where also Balaam is referred to). “Lo, the people shall dwell alone” (Numbers 23. 9; cf. Deuteronomy 33. 28). To “feed in the wood in Carmel,” is to feed in the rich pastures among its woods. To “sleep in the woods,” is the image of most perfect security (Ezekiel 34. 25). So that the Jews’ security, as well as their distinct nationality, is here foretold. Also Jeremiah 49. 31. Bashan—famed for its cattle (Psalm 22. 12; Amos 4. 1). Parallel to this passage is Jeremiah 50. 19. Bashan and Gilead, east of Jordan, were chosen by Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, as abounding in pastures suited for their many cattle (Numbers 32.; Deuteronomy 3. 12-17). 15. thy . . . him—both referring to Israel. So in v. 19 the person is changed from the first to the third, “us . . . our . . . their.” Jehovah here answers Micah’s prayer in v. 14, assuring him, that as He delivered His people from Egypt by miraculous power, so He would again “show” it in their behalf (Jeremiah 16. 14, 15). 16. shall see—the “marvellous things” (v. 15; Isaiah 26. 11). confounded at all their might—having so suddenly proved unavailing; that might wherewith they had thought that there is nothing which they could not effect against God’s people. Jay . . . hand upon . . . mouth—the gesture of silence (Job 21. 5; 40. 4; Psalm 107. 42; Isaiah 52. 15). They shall be struck dumb at Israel’s marvellous deliverance, and no longer boast that God’s people is destroyed. ears . . . deaf—they shall stand astonished so as not to hear what shall be said. [GROTIVS.] Once they had eagerly drunk in all rumours as so many messages of victories; but then they shall be afraid of hearing them, because they continually fear new disasters, when they see the God of Israel to be so powerful. [CALVIN.] They shall close their ears so as not to be compelled to hear of Israel’s successes. 17. lick the dust—in abject prostration as suppliants (Psalm 72. 9; cf. Isaiah 49. 23; 65. 25). move out of their holes—as reptiles from their holes, they shall come forth from their hiding-places, or fortresses (Psalm 18. 45), to give themselves up to the conquerors. More lit., "they shall tremble from," i. e., tremblingly come forth from their coverts. like worms—reptiles or crawlers (Deuteronomy 32. 24). they shall be afraid of the Lord—or, they shall in fear turn with haste to the Lord. Thus the antithesis is brought out. They shall tremble forth from their holes: they shall in trepidation turn to the Lord for salvation (cf. Note, Hosea 3. 5, and Jeremiah 33. 9). fear because of thee—shall fear thee, Jehovah [and so fear Israel as under thy guardianship]. There is a change here from speaking of God to speaking to God. [MAURER.] Or rather, "shall fear thee, Israel." [HENDERSON.] 18. Grateful at such unlooked-for grace being promised to Israel, Micah breaks forth into praises of Jehovah. passeth by the transgression—not conniving at it, but forgiving it; leaving it unpunished, as a traveller passes by what he chooses not to look into (Proverbs 19. 11). Contrast Amos 7. 8, and "mark iniquities," Psalm 130. 3. the remnant—who shall be permitted to survive the previous judgment: the elect remnant of grace (ch. 4. 7; 5. 3, 7, 8). rejoiceth not . . . anger—(Psalm 103. 9.) delighteth in mercy—God's forgiving is founded on His nature, which delights in loving-kindness, and is averse from wrath. 19. turn again—to us, from having been turned away from us. subdue our iniquities—lit., tread under foot, as being hostile and deadly to us. Without subjugation of our bad propensities, even pardon could not give us peace. When God takes away the guilt of sin that it may not condemn us, He takes away also the power of sin that it may not rule us. cast . . . into . . . depths of the sea—never to rise again to view, buried out of sight in eternal oblivion: not merely at the shore side, where they may rise again. our . . . their—change of person. Micah in the first case identifying himself and his sins with his people and their sins; in the second, speaking of them and their sins. 20. perform the truth—the faithful promise. to Jacob . . . Abraham—thou shalt make good to their posterity the promise made to the patriarchs. God's promises are called "mercy," because they flow slowly from grace; "truth," because they will be surely performed (Luke 1. 72, 73; 1 Thessalonians 5. 24). sworn unto our fathers—(Psalm 105. 9, 10.) The promise to Abraham is in Genesis 12. 2; to Isaac, in Genesis 26. 24; to Jacob, in Genesis 28. 13. This unchangeable promise implied an engagement that the seed of the patriarchs should never perish, and should be restored to their inheritance as often as they turned wholly to God (Deuteronomy 30. 1, 2).

NAHUM.

INTRODUCTION.

NAHUM means consolation and vengeance; symbolizing the "consolation" in the book for God's people, and the "vengeance" coming on their enemies. In the first chapter the two themes alternate; but as the prophet advances, vengeance on the capital of the Assyrian foe is the predominant topic. He is called the Elkoshite (ch. 1. 1), from Elkosh, or Elkesi, a village of Galilee, pointed out to JEROME (Preface in Nahum) as a place of note among the Jews, having traces of ancient buildings. The name Capernaum, i. e., "village of Nahum," seems to take its name from Nahum having resided in it, though born in Elkosh in the neighbourhood. There is another Elkosh east of the Tigris, and north of Mosul, believed by Jewish pilgrims to be the birth-place and burial-place of the prophet. But the book of Nahum in its allusions shows a particularity of acquaintance with Palestine (ch. 1. 4), and only a more general knowledge as to Nineveh (ch. 2. 4-6; 3. 2, 3).

His graphic description of Sennacherib and his army (ch. 1. 9-12) makes it not unlikely, that he was in or near Jerusalem at the time; hence the number of phrases corresponding to those of Isaiah (cf. ch. 1. 8, 9, with Isaiah 8. 8; 10. 23; ch. 2. 10, with Isaiah 24. 1, and 21. 3; ch. 1. 15, with Isaiah 52. 7). The prophecy in ch. 1. 14 probably refers to the murder of Sennacherib twenty years after his return from Palestine (Isaiah 37. 38). The date of his prophecies, thus, seems to be about the former years of Hezekiah. So JEROME thinks. He plainly writes whilst the Assyrian power was yet unbroken (ch. 1. 12; 2. 11-13; 3. 15-17). The correspondence between the sentiments of Nahum and those of Isaiah and Hezekiah, as recorded in 2 Kings and Isaiah, proves the likelihood of Nahum's prophecies belonging to the time when Sennacherib was demanding the surrender of Jerusalem, and had not yet raised the siege (cf. ch. 1. 2, &c., with 2 Kings 19. 14, 15; ch. 1. 7, with 2 Kings 18. 22; 19. 19, 31; 2 Chronicles 32. 7, 8; ch. 1. 9, 11, with 2 Kings 19. 22, 27, 28; ch. 1. 14, with 2 Kings 19. 6, 7; ch. 1. 15, and 2. 1, 2, with 2 Kings 19. 32, 33; ch. 2. 13, with 2 Kings 19. 22, 23). The historical data in the book itself are the humiliation of Israel and Judah by Assyria (ch. 2. 2); the invasion of Judah (ch. 1. 9, 11); and the conquest of No-ammon, or Thebes, in Upper Egypt (ch. 3. 8-10). Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser had carried away Israel. The Jews were harassed by the Syrians, and impoverished by Ahaz' payments to Tiglath-pileser (2 Chronicles 28.; Isaiah 7. 9). Sargon, Shalmaneser's successor, after the reduction of Phœnicia by the latter, fearing lest Egypt should join Palestine against him, undertook an expedition to Africa (Isaiah 20.), and took Thebes; the latter fact we know only from Nahum, but the success of the expedition in general is corroborated in Isaiah 20. Sennacherib, Sargon's successor, made the last Assyrian attempt against Judea, ending in the destruction of his army, in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (713-710 B. C.). As Nahum refers to this in part prophetically, in part as matter of history (ch. 1. 9-13; 2. 13), he must have lived about B. C. 720-714, that is, almost 100 years before the event foretold, viz., the overthrow of Nineveh by the joint forces of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar in the reign of Chynl-adanus, B. C. 625, or else 603.

The prophecy is remarkable for its unity of aim. Nahum's object was to inspire his countrymen, the Jews, with the assurance that, however alarming their position might seem, exposed to the attacks of the mighty Assyrian, who had already carried away the ten tribes, yet that not only should the Assyrian (Sennacherib) fail in his attack on Jerusalem, but Nineveh his own capital be taken and his empire overthrown; and this, not by an arbitrary exercise of Jehovah's power, but for the iniquities of the city and its people.

His position in the canon is seventh of the minor prophets in both the Hebrew and Greek arrangement. He is seventh in point of date.

His style is clear, elegant, and forcible. Its most striking characteristic is the power of representing several phases of an idea in the briefest sentences, as in the majestic description of God in the commencement, the conquest of Nineveh, and the destruction of No-ammon. [EICHORN.] DE WETTE calls attention to his variety of manner in presenting ideas, as marking great poetic talent. "Here there is something sonorous in his language, there something murmuring; with both there alternates somewhat that is soft, delicate, and melting, as the subject demands." Excepting two alleged Assyrian words (ch. 3. 17), English Version "crowned," or princes, and English Version, "captains," or satraps (used by Jeremiah 51. 27), the language is pure. These two, doubtless, came to be known in Judea from the intercourse with Assyria in the eighth and seventh centuries B. C.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-15. JEHOVAH'S ATTRIBUTES AS A JEALOUS JUDGE OF SIN, YET MERCIFUL TO HIS TRUSTING PEOPLE, SHOULD INSPIRE THEM WITH CONFIDENCE. HE WILL NOT ALLOW THE ASSYRIANS AGAIN TO ASSAIL THEM, BUT WILL DESTROY THE FOE. 1. burden of Nineveh—The prophetic doom of Nineveh. Nahum prophesied against that city 150 years after Jonah. 2. jealous—In this there is sternness, yet tender affection. We are jealous only of those we love: a husband, of a wife; a king, of his subjects' loyalty. God is jealous of men, because He loves them. God will not bear a rival in His claims on them. His burning jealousy for his own wounded honour and their love, as much as His justice, accounts for all his fearful judgments: the flood, the destruction of Jerusalem, that of Nineveh. His jealousy will not admit of His friends being oppressed, and their enemies flourishing (cf. Exodus 20. 5; 1 Corinthians 16. 22; 2 Corinthians 11. 2). Burning zeal enters into the idea in "jealous" here (cf. Numbers 25. 11, 13; 1 Kings 19. 10). the Lord revegeth . . . Lord revegeth—the repetition of the incommunicable name JEHOVAH, and of His revenging, gives an awful solemnity to the introduction. furiously—lit., a master of fury. So a master of the tongue, i. e., eloquent. "One who, if He pleases, can most readily give effect to His fury." [GROTIUS.] Nahum has in view the provocation to fury given to God by the Assyrians, after having carried away the ten tribes, now proceeding to invade Judea under Hezekiah. reserveth wrath for his enemies—reserves it against his own appointed time (2 Peter 2. 9). After long waiting for their repentance in vain, at length punishing them. A wrong estimate of Jehovah is formed from His suspending punishment: it is not that He is insensible or dilatory, but He reserves wrath for His own fit time. In the case of the penitent He does not reserve or retain His anger (Psalm 103. 9; Jeremiah 3. 5, 12; Micah 7. 18). 3. slow to anger, and great in power—i. e., but great in power, so as to be able in a moment, if He pleases, to destroy the wicked. His long-suffering is not from want of power to punish (Exodus 34. 6, 7). not at all acquit—lit., will not acquitting acquit, or treat as innocent. Lord hath his way in the whirlwind—From this to v. 5, inclusive, is a description of His power exhibited in the phenomena of nature, especially when He is wroth. His vengeance shall sweep away the Assyrian foe like a whirlwind (Proverbs 10. 25). clouds are the dust of his feet—large as they are, He treads on them, as a man would on the small dust; He is Lord of the clouds, and uses them as he pleases. 4. rebuketh the sea—as Jesus did (Matthew 8. 26), proving Himself God (cf. Isaiah 50. 2). Bashan languisheth—through drought; ordinarily it was a region famed for its rich pasturage (cf. Joel 1. 10). flower of Lebanon—its bloom; all that blooms so luxuriantly on Lebanon (Hosea 14. 7). As Bashan was famed for its pastures, Carmel for its corn-fields and vineyards, so Lebanon for its forests (Isaiah 33. 9). There is nothing in the world so blooming that God cannot change it when He is wroth. 5. earth is burned—so GROTIUS. Rather, "lifts itself," i. e., heaveth [MAURER]: as the Hebrew is translated in Psalm 80. 9; Hosea 13. 1; cf. Margin, 2 Samuel 5. 21. 6. fury is poured out like fire—like the liquid fire poured out of volcanoes in all directions (see Jeremiah 7. 20). rocks are thrown down—or, "are burst asunder;" the usual effect of volcanic fire (Jeremiah 51. 25, 56). As Hannibal burst asunder the Alpine rocks by fire to make a passage for his army. [GROTIUS.] 7. Here Nahum enters on his special subject, for which the previous verses have prepared the way, viz., to assure his people of safety in Jehovah under the impending

attack of Sennacherib (v. 7), and to announce the doom of Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian foe (v. 8). The contrast of v. 7 and 8 heightens the force. he knoweth—recognizes as his own (Hosea 13. 5; Amos 3. 2); and so, cares for and guards (Psalm 1. 6; 2 Timothy 2. 19). 8. with an overrunning flood—i. e., with irresistible might which overruns every barrier like a flood. This image is often applied to overwhelming armies of invaders. Also of calamity in general (Psalm 32. 6; 42. 7; 90. 5). There is, perhaps, a special allusion to the mode of Nineveh's capture by the Medo-Babylonian army, viz., through a flood in the river which broke down the wall twenty furlongs (see Note, ch. 2. 6; Isaiah 8. 8; Daniel 9. 26; 11. 10, 22, 40). end of the place thereof—Nineveh is personified as a queen; and "her place" of residence (the Hebrew for "thereof" is feminine) is the city itself (ch. 2. 8). [MAURER.] Or, He shall so utterly destroy Nineveh that its place cannot be found; ch. 3. 17 confirms this (cf. Psalm 37. 36; Daniel 2. 35; Revelation 12. 8 and 20. 11). darkness—the severest calamities. 9. What do ye imagine against the Lord!—Abrupt address to the Assyrians. How mad is your attempt, O Assyrians, to resist so powerful a God! What can ye do against such an adversary, successful though ye have been against all other adversaries? Ye imagine ye have to do merely with mortals and with a weak people, and that so you will gain an easy victory; but you have to encounter God, the protector of His people. Parallel to Isaiah 37. 23-29; cf. Psalm 1. 1. he will make an utter end—the utter overthrow of Sennacherib's host, soon about to take place, is an earnest of the "utter end" of Nineveh itself. affliction shall not rise up the second time—Judah's "affliction" caused by the invasion shall never rise again. So v. 12. But CALVIN takes the "affliction" to be that of Assyria: "There will be no need of His inflicting on you a second blow; He will make an utter end of you once for all" (1 Samuel 3. 12; 26. 8; 2 Samuel 20. 10). If so, this verse, in contrast to v. 12, will express, Affliction shall visit the Assyrian no more, in a sense very different from that in which God will afflict Judah no more. In the Assyrian's case, because the blow will be fatally final; the latter, because God will make lasting blessedness in Judah's case succeed to temporary chastisement. But it seems simpler to refer "affliction" here, as in v. 12, to Judah; indeed destruction, rather than affliction, applies to the Assyrian. 10. while they are folded together as thorns—lit., "to the same degree as thorns" (cf. Margin, 1 Chronicles 4. 27). As thorns so folded together and entangled that they cannot be without trouble loosed asunder, are thrown by the husbandmen all in a mass into the fire, so the Assyrians shall all be given together to destruction. Cf. 2 Samuel 23. 6, 7, where also "thorns" are the image of the wicked. As this image represents the speediness of their destruction in a mass, so that of "drunkards," their rushing as it were of their own accord into it; for drunkards fall down without any one pushing them. [KIMCHI.] CALVIN explains, Although ye be dangerous to touch as thorns (i. e., full of rage and violence), yet the Lord can easily consume you. But "although" will hardly apply to the next clause. English Version and KIMCHI, therefore, are to be preferred. The comparison to drunkards is appropriate. For drunkards, though exulting and bold, are weak and easily thrown down by even a finger touching them. So the insolent self-confidence of the Assyrians shall precipitate their overthrow by God. The Hebrew is "soaked," or "drunken as with their own wine." Their drunken revelries are perhaps alluded to, during which the foe (according to DIODORUS SICULUS, 2.) broke into their city, and Sardanapalus burned his palace; though the main and ultimate destruction of Nineveh referred to by Nahum was long subsequent to that under Sardanapalus. 11. The cause of Nineveh's overthrow; Sennacherib's plots against Judah. out of thee—O Nineveh. From thyself shall arise the source of thy own ruin. Thou shalt have only thyself to blame for it. imagineth evil—Sennacherib carried out the imaginings of his countrymen (v. 9) against the Lord and His people (2 Kings 19. 22, 23). a wicked counsellor—lit., "a counsellor of Belial." Belial means without profit, worthless, and so bad (1 Samuel 25. 25; 2 Corinthians 6. 15). 12-14. The same truths repeated as in v. 9-11, Jehovah here being the speaker. He addresses Judah, prophesying good to it, and evil to the Assyrian. Though they be quiet—i. e., without fear, and tranquilly secure. So Chaldee and CALVIN. Or, entire, complete; "Though their power be unbroken [MAURER], and though they be so many, yet even so they shall be cut down" (lit., shorn; as hair shaved off closely by a razor, Isaiah 7. 20. As the Assyrian was a razor shaving others, so shall he be shaven himself. Retribution in kind). In the height of their pride and power, they shall be clean cut off. The same Hebrew stands for "likewise" and "yet thus." So many as they are, so many shall they perish. when he shall pass through—or, "and he shall pass away," viz., "the wicked counsellor" (v. 11), Sennacherib. The change of number to the singular distinguishes him from his host. They shall be cut down, he shall pass away home (2 Kings 19. 35, 36). [HENDERSON.] English Version is better, "they shall be cut down, when He (Jehovah) shall pass through," destroying by one stroke the Assyrian host. This gives the reason why they with all their numbers and power are to be so utterly cut off. Cf. "pass through," i. e., in destroying power (Ezekiel 12. 12, 23; Isaiah 8. 8; Daniel 11. 10). Though I have afflicted thee—Judah, "I will afflict thee no more" (Isaiah 40. 1, 2; 52. 1, 2). The contrast is between "they," the Assyrians, and "thee," Judah. Their punishment is fatal and final. Judah's was temporary and corrective. 13. will I break his yoke—the Assyrian's yoke, viz., the tribute imposed by Sennacherib on Hezekiah (2 Kings 18. 14). from off thee—O Judah (Isaiah 10. 27). 14. that no more of thy name be sown—that no more of thy seed, bearing thy name, as kings of Nineveh, be propagated; that thy dynasty become extinct, viz., on the destruction of Nineveh here foretold. "Thee" means the king of Assyria. will I cut off. . . graven image—the Medes under Cyaxares, the joint destroyers of Nineveh with the Babylonians, hated idolatry, and would delight in destroying its idols. As the Assyrians had treated the gods of other nations, so their own should be treated (2 Kings 19. 18). The Assyrian palaces partook of a sacred character [LAYARD]; so that "house of thy gods" may refer to the palace. At Khorsabad there is remaining a representation of a man cutting an idol to pieces. I will make thy grave—rather, "I will make it (viz., 'the house of thy gods,' i. e., Nisroch) thy grave" (2 Kings 19. 37; Isaiah 37. 38). Thus, by Sennacherib's being slain in it, Nisroch's house should be defiled. Neither thy gods, nor thy temple, shall save thee; but the latter shall be thy sepulchre. thou art vile—or, thou art lighter than due weight (Daniel 5. 27; cf. Job 31. 6). [MAURER.] 15. This verse is joined in the Hebrew text to ch. 2. It is nearly the same as Isaiah 52. 7, referring to the similar deliverance from Babylon. him that bringeth good tidings—announcing the overthrow of Sennacherib and deliverance of Jerusalem. The "mountains" are those round Jerusalem, on which Sennacherib's host had so lately encamped, preventing Judah from keeping her "feasts," but on which messengers now speed to Jerusalem, publishing his overthrow with a loud voice where lately they durst not have opened their mouths. A type of the far more glorious spiritual deliverance of God's people from Satan by Messiah, heralded by ministers of the gospel (Romans 10. 15). perform thy vows—which thou didst promise if God would deliver thee from the Assyrian. the wicked—lit., Belial; the same as the "counsellor of Belial" (Margin, ch. 1. 11), viz., Sennacherib.
